72. British Friend, Jan. 1, 1855; Anti-Slavery Advocate, May, June, 1855; London Anti-Slavery Conference: Papers Read and Statements Made on the Principal Subjects Submitted to the Anti-Slavery Conference, Held at the London Tavern on the 29th and 30th of November, 1854 (London: British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, [1855]). This report gives no inkling of the disagreements at the meeting, but the minutes of the Bristol and Clifton Ladies' Anti-Slavery Society for Dec. 7, 1854, do, in Rhodes House Antislavery Papers. See also J. B. Estlin to Chamerovzow, May 21, 1855, Rhodes House Antislavery Papers. For the attempt in 1859, see George Thompson to Chamerovzow, July 21, 25, 28, 1859, July 23, 1860, Rhodes House Antislavery Papers; Brougham Villiers and W. H. Chesson, Anglo-American Relations, 1861–1865 (London: T. Fisher Unwin, 1919), 182–183; Samuel J. May to Miss Estlin, Oct. 18, 1859, Estlin Papers.

73. Anti-Slavery Advocate, Jan., Sept., 1854, Oct., 1857.

74. Ibid., Jan., Sept., 1853, for references to these individuals.

Britain and in the States. In fact, it was one of the bonds that stimulated the British groups to attempt their reconciliation. Extra copies were printed to have on hand for presentation to American clergymen visiting England.[75]

In 1853 the British Quakers made a last attempt to arouse their American brethren to further exertions by sending William and Josiah Forster and William Holmes over with an address from the London Yearly Meeting "To Sovereigns and Those in Authority." John Candler, who had again been in the West Indies and Brazil, joined them to form a deputation to present the address in person to President Fillmore and to the state governors.[76] John Crampton, the British minister to the United States, was counseled by the Foreign Office in London to be of any assistance he could in getting access to officials, but he was not to "participate" in any appeal from British subjects to the government or citizens of the United States on matters connected with slavery.[77]

In most instances, even in the deep South, the deputation was given a respectful hearing, but in Missouri Governor Sterling Price denounced the " 'presumptious liberties which even foreigners themselves feel sometimes disposed to take' " when encouraged by fanatical American abolitionists. He demanded that in the future all such appeals "be directed to the improvement and amelioration of the distress and sufferings of the subjects of the British nation . . . whence had arisen that false philanthropy which has cursed the Negroes of the West Indies and which only tends to injure the condition of the slaves of this Union." [78]

Arguments against ministers speaking out or remaining silent on slavery when traveling abroad persisted throughout the decade. Henry Ward Beecher was recommended to the British and 75. John B. Estlin to Chamerovzow, Apr. 20, 1853, Rhodes House Antislavery Papers; Tappan to Sturge, June 28, 1852, Tappan Papers; British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book III, May 6, 1853.

76. Drake, Quakers and Slavery in America, 188; British Friend, Feb. 1, 1854; Anti-Slavery Advocate, June, 1854.

77. Foreign Office to Crampton, Aug. 9, 1853, F.O. 84/918, PRO.

78. Quoted in Drake, Quakers and Slavery in America, 189; Abel and Klingberg, eds., Side-Light, 339. A sad end to the mission was the death of William Forster while the group was in Tennessee.

Foreign Anti-Slavery Society as one who could "speak for freedom as few men can!" [79] Yet he was severely criticized for not doing so while in England. On the other hand, there were those who, while only lukewarm at home, posed as champions of the cause when they found that position would insure them a warmer welcome. One example was the Reverend J. W. Chickering of Maine, who was "exposed" by Lewis Tappan.[80] As usual, the accusation resulted in charges, countercharges, and long-drawn-out bickering over exaggerations on both sides, which must surely have alienated some of the British public not already converted to the antislavery movement. But to abolitionists the question was a serious one. "Our cotton parsons evidently feel sore at the prospect of losing caste in England," William Jay wrote, though at home they acted as "chaplains to slave catchers" and were the tools of "ungodly proslavery politicians." [81] One American minister who was the exception in escaping censure was the Reverend Charles Grandison Finney. Though he had been closely associated with Theodore Weld, Asa Mahan, and some of the early western abolitionists, I can find no evidence of his speaking on the slavery issue at all when he visited Great Britain in 1849–1850 or again in 1858–1860, nor does there seem to have been any fuss raised about his silence.

Another matter angering the abolitionists was the extent to which British antislavery opinion was expurgated from religious publications reprinted in America. William Jay discovered, for example, that the American publication of the bishop of Oxford's description of the American Episcopal church omitted those portions in which he condemned slavery and might therefore give offense to the South.[82] A check revealed that the same thing was true in the case of Sunday-school materials, tracts, and hymns. Lewis Tappan was so aroused that he advertised in the National Era for a competent person to collect and collate the principal 79. William Harned to P. J. Bolton, July 23, 1850, Rhodes House Antislavery Papers.

80. Abel and Klingberg, eds., Side-Light, 262, 278–280, 286–290nn.

81. Jay to Tappan, Oct. 27, 1851, Tappan Papers.

82. Anti-Slavery Advocate, Oct., 1852.

mutilations so they could be published together with a rebuke against publishers who thus catered to the slaveholders.[83] Tappan believed that the American Tract Society and the American Sunday School Union had consciously connived in this.[84] Upon receiving the complaints from Tappan, the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society undertook to warn the British Religious Tract Society of how its publications were being tampered with. They suggested that the society should issue some new tracts, specifically antislavery in content. A tract on "Expurgated American Literature" was published in the Leeds Anti-Slavery Society tract series in 1853.[85]

The American Bible Society was guilty of withholding its free Bibles from slaves, although its object was to put a Bible in every home. Tappan and Joshua Leavitt therefore urged British friends to send contributions to the American Missionary Association, which was attempting to supply slaves with Bibles. This was a difficult thing to do in the face of state laws against teaching slaves to read as well as those outlawing the distribution of "incendiary" literature, which included anything containing antislavery doctrine.[86] According to the "positive good" theory, the Bible sanctioned slavery, but slaveholders seem to have been not so convinced of this when it came to a question of allowing slaves to possess Bibles. Again in 1857 the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society sent an address to Christians in the United States and at the same time repeated their admonition to British churches to refuse to receive proslavery clergymen from the

83. "Information Wanted," ad copied from National Era, Tappan Papers. I have not located the publication Tappan planned, but there evidently was one, for James Vincent wrote from the Broad Street office in London on Feb. 22, 1854, to order six copies.

84. Tappan to Chamerovzow, Oct. 29, 1854, in Abel and Klingberg, eds., Side-Light, 341–350.

85. British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book III, Feb. 3, Apr. 7, 1854; Tract 20, Leeds Anti-Slavery Society Series, may be found in [Wilson Armistead, ed.], Five Hundred Thousand Strokes for Freedom. A Series of Anti-Slavery Tracts. Of Which Half a Million Are Now Fresh Issued by the Friends of the Negro (London: W. & F. Cash, 1853).

86. Abel and Klingberg, eds., Side-Light, 341–350; Leavitt to John Scoble, Feb. 27, 1847, Rhodes House Antislavery Papers.

United States as delegates to conferences or to enjoy communion and open fellowship with them when they visited Great Britain.[87]

In October, 1853, the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society decided that the two "most practical points to agitate" were the position of American religious bodies on slavery and the growth of cotton in India and on the west coast of Africa.[88] Besides being considered "practical," both were projects in which abolitionist factions could cooperate. Up to the middle of the 1840s the free-produce movement in Great Britain had concentrated mainly on the sugar question. In the debates over the duties of 1846, this concentration had left them wide open to the attack that they were inconsistent in not being equally concerned about cotton. American abolitionists were critical of their British colleagues on this point as well, and of course the issue of Texas at about the same time had aroused new fears regarding the extension of the cotton kingdom.

Joseph Sturge, particularly, took the criticism to heart, and in the late 1840s he began to use his influence to broaden the base of the British movement. George Thompson was another who became involved and much concerned. After a trip to India in 1843 he returned home to stand successfully for Parliament, and from that position he helped to direct the fight against the remnants of Indian slavery and for the encouragement of cotton produced by free labor. Leaders of both the major abolitionist camps were thus uniting in urging that the East India Company and Parliament take vigorous steps to facilitate the cultivation of both sugar and cotton.[89] Almost simultaneously the Free Produce Association in the United States set up shops in New York and Philadelphia and began to publish the Non-Slaveholder for the purpose of encouraging abolitionists to buy only goods produced by free labor.[90] Agents were sent into the South to buy cotton raised by small farmers who did not own or hire slaves.[91]

87. British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book III, May 1, 6, June 5, July 3, 1857, May 7, 1858.

88. Ibid., Oct. 5, 1853.

89. British Friend, Sept. 30, 1843; Sturge to Clarkson, Apr. 11, 1845, Clarkson Papers, Huntington Library; British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book II, 321, June 13, 1845; Non-Slaveholder, Jan., 1848.

It was the free-produce movement that brought Elihu Burritt to the fore as a liaison man between British and American anti-slavery forces. Burritt, like Sturge, Tappan, Leavitt, and so many other abolitionists, was involved in a variety of reforms. Pacifism was one of them, and he persuaded his League of Universal Brotherhood to add the free-produce cause to its program. Lewis Tappan wrote to Sturge about Burritt, the two began a correspondence, and in the fall of 1846 Burritt traveled to England at Sturge's expense to help inject new life into the free-produce movement there.[92] Not long afterward Gerrit Smith, another wealthy abolitionist who had abstained from the use of slave-produced goods for many years, financed Henry Bibb's trip to England for a similar purpose. In the early 1850s they were joined by Henry Highland Garnet and J. Miller McKim, who also came as special envoys of free produce.[93]

Before the year 1846 was out, the Executive Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society had voted to recommend to its members the disuse of all slave-produced articles. Early in 1847 they sent out such a notice in a pamphlet addressed "To the Friends of the Anti-Slavery Cause throughout the World." They also drew up a petition to Parliament to oppose the use of slave-grown produce by breweries and distilleries.[94] Sturge circulated a pamphlet by Burritt to his free-trade associates in Manchester, and the Manchester Commercial Association, in turn, 90. British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book II, 388, Feb. 27, 1846; Tappan to Sturge, Nov. 26, 1845, Tappan Papers.

91. Tappan to Sturge, Mar. 31, 1846, Tappan Papers; Non-Slaveholder, Mar., 1846; British Friend, Oct. 30, 1847.

92. Tappan to Sturge, Feb. 29, 1844, and Burritt to Tappan, May 1, 1846, Tappan Papers; Sturge to Burritt, Apr. 3, 1846, Jenkins Autograph Collection; British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book II, 455, Nov. 27, 1846; Merle Curti, The Learned Blacksmith: The Letters and Journals of Elihu Burritt (New York: Wilson-Erickson, 1937), 118.

93. British Friend, Apr. 29, 1848; British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book III, July 5, Aug. 2, 14, 1850.

94. G. W. Alexander to the editor, Non-Slaveholder, Jan., 1847; Non-Slaveholder, Feb., 1847; British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book II, 487, Feb. 26, 1847.

sent a letter to the East India Company urging them to cultivate cotton. A similar letter to the company was sent by the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society. It was also in 1847 that John Bright began to warn Parliament that cotton culture ought to be encouraged within the empire to avoid a cotton famine should the American supply be cut off. In the spring of 1848 Parliament responded to all of the pressure by appointing a committee to look into the problem of improving East Indian cotton and of facilitating its sale in Great Britain.[95] Meanwhile other interested abolitionists, sometimes missionaries, began to send in reports on the possibilities for raising cotton in Australia, the West Indies, and in various parts of Africa. David Livingstone crossed Africa in 1853–1854, and from 1858 to 1864 he kept the British informed on cotton possibilities in central Africa. Elliott Cresson, seeing a chance for the American Colonization Society to benefit, urged that if the free-produce people would subsidize gins and cane-crushing machines, Liberia could produce both cotton and sugar.[96]

When the Stowes arrived in Great Britain in 1853, Burritt was delighted to discover that they were willing to cooperate with him in emphasizing the free-produce approach as the way to end slavery. Burritt joined the Stowes at Sturge's home in Birmingham, and together they drafted resolutions that could be presented at antislavery gatherings.[97] Calvin Stowe went so far as to predict that without the British market for cotton, American slavery would die in two years.[98] Mrs. Stowe's support gave new zest to the female antislavery societies, since women were generally the clothing purchasers for their families. Special appeals were made to them to "do something" and not to let the emotions stirred up by the sufferings of Uncle Tom "evaporate in sighs

95. Sturge to Burritt, Apr. 3, 1846, Jenkins Autograph Collection; Non-Slaveholder, Jan., 1847; George M. Trevelyan, The Life of John Bright (London: Constable and Co., 1925), 169, 317; British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book III, Dec. 10, 1847; British Friend, Apr. 29, 1848.

96. British Friend, Nov. 30, 1848, July 31, 1849; Cresson to Hodgkin, July 24, 1848, Rhodes House Antislavery Papers; Shepperson, "Harriet Beecher Stowe and Scotland."

97. Burritt to [Anna Mary Southall], May 3, 1853, Elihu Burritt Letters, Friends House Library.

98. Stowe to Chamerovzow, Nov. 28, 1853, Rhodes House Antislavery Papers.

and tears." [99] New free-cotton depots were set up to receive supplies from the Free Labour Warehouse of Josias Browne in Manchester, which had been in operation since 1850.[100]

One of the schemes originated by Burritt was known as the premium system. The idea was to have free-produce people buy shares in a company that would pay bonuses to farmers who raised "free" cotton. Presumably they would prove the old abolitionist contention that free labor was cheaper than slave labor, make money, and enjoy dividends as well as free consciences. Such enterprises could be established either in the various parts of the British empire or in the United States. In conjunction with the premium system, Burritt was interested in experimenting with colonies of German, English, and Scotch-Irish immigrants to be planted in the heart of the American cotton kingdom. For example, he proposed that Gerrit Smith could exchange 500 of his acres in upstate New York for an equivalent acreage in Georgia to be devoted to the experiment.[101] Burritt tried to persuade John Ecroyd, who had urged cotton production in Natal, to go to the United States to manage such a cotton plantation, but Ecroyd declined. He was not convinced that free labor could compete with slave labor, and accounts of the operation of southern lynch law were discouraging to him. Another reason may have been that he agreed with the advice of his brother, who privately cautioned him that although Burritt was a good man, his schemes wre not always the most prudent from a pecuniary standpoint.[102]

99. Juliene M. Flack to Elihu Burritt, Aug. 4, [1854], Burritt Letters; The Twenty-eighth Report of the Ladies' Negro's Friend Society, for Birmingham, Westbromich, Wednesbury, Walsall, and Their Respective Neighborhoods, Including the Address Presented by the Committee to Mrs. Beecher Stowe, on the Occasion of Her Visit to Birmingham (Birmingham: B. Hudson & Son, 1853).

100. British Friend, July 31, 1848, Feb. 15, 1850; Josias F. Browne & Co., To the Friends of the Anti-Slavery Movement, Free Labour Cotton Depot, and Free Labour Association, all pamphlets, Ms Box 8.4, Friends House Library.

101. Burritt to Gerrit Smith, Oct. 6, 1856, in Curti, The Learned Blacksmith, 118, 125–126, 129–130; Burritt to Anna Mary Southall, Nov. 18, 1854, Feb. 12, Mar. 6, 10, 1855, Burritt Letters.

102. British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book III, July 11, 1853; photostat of Elihu Burritt to John Ecroyd, Jan. 21, 1854; typescript, Ecroyd to Burritt, n.d.; and typescript, Benjamin Ecroyd to John Ecroyd, n.d., all in Ms Box 11.3, Friends House Library.

Although the abolitionists kept issuing optimistic reports about the results of their free-produce efforts, especially the development of cotton in India, by the time the American Civil War broke out, there was very little actually reaching the Lancashire mills. Lack of transportation facilities rather than problems of production was largely responsible. Yet the idea had been firmly planted in people's minds that there were alternatives to American cotton. This in itself may have been a factor in their not rushing in haste to urge the British government to recognize the Confederacy or to break the Union blockade.

As in earlier periods, British travelers to the United States in the 1850s continued to be critical of slavery but morbidly fascinated by it, and such accounts perpetuated British curiosity and moral indignation.[103] But events in the United States in the latter half of the decade tended to focus attention on politics rather than on religion or travel accounts. The passage of the Kansas-Nebraska Act in 1854, which repealed the 36°30′ line of the Missouri Compromise, reopened debate over slavery in the territories. In April, 1855, Lewis Tappan, Gerrit Smith, W. E. Whiting, George Whipple, William Goodell, James McCune Smith, Simeon Jocelyn, and Frederick Douglass, who labeled themselves "radical political abolitionists," issued a call for a convention. "Our undertaking," they announced, "is to remove slavery from the national territories by means of our national political power, and to remove it from the states also, by means of the same power, whenever the States shall themselves refuse to remove it."[104] This group had accepted the views of Birney, Lysander Spooner, Goodell, and Alvan Stewart that the Constitution, if correctly interpreted, was an antislavery document. Goodell was the chief spokesman in the 1850s, publishing three books on the subject, which were distributed in Great Britain as well as at home.[105] Britishers needed to have the argument over federal and 103. See, for example, the ads in the Anti-Slavery Advocate for 1855–1857. See also Max Berger, "American Slavery as Seen by British Visitors, 1836–1860," Journal of Negro History, XXX (Apr., 1945), 181–202, and the bibliography in his book The British Traveler in America, 1836–1860 (Magnolia, Mass.: Peter Smith, 1964).

104. Anti-Slavery Advocate, June, 1855.

105. See Dwight L. Dumond, A Bibliography of Antislavery in America (Ann state control of slavery explained, especially as it was renewed by the Kansas conflict. Another reason for distributing Goodell's work was to counteract what the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society thought of as the Garrison "heresy," which called for disunion. As events in the United States moved toward secession and civil war, there was a growing wish on the part of many abolitionists to believe that the federal government did have clear authority, and this made them more receptive to the Goodell interpretation than they had been in the 1840s.

Even Mrs. Stowe, who had taken a Garrisonian nonpolitical approach when she was in England the first time, on her second trip in 1856 responded to the popular demand that she speak about the Free Soil party and the Kansas problem. When she returned to the United States, the Edinburgh Ladies' Emancipation Society sent her £35 for the benefit of "suffering settlers" in Kansas. Harriet Martineau got out her History of the American Compromises to explain what had led up to the betrayal of Kansas.[106] The political excitement infected some of the Garrisonians at home too. Lydia Maria Child wrote to a friend that for the sake of suffering Kansas, "I do long to have Fremont elected. Don't you? Let's vote." [107]

Charles Sumner became a hero in Britain as well as at home for his stand on Kansas, and the attack on him by Preston Brooks was interpreted as evidence of the growing uneasiness of slaveholders who realized that their institution was doomed. The British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society immediately voted a resolution of sympathy for him.[108] Actually Brooks could not have picked a better target than Sumner to capture the attention of political, social, and abolitionist circles in England. Sumner had made an extended trip there in the years 1837–1839 and had been Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1961), 6, for a complete list of Goodell's publications.

---

106. British Friend, Nov. 1, 1856, Mar. 2, 1857; Harriet Martineau, A History of the American Compromises, Reprinted with Additions from the Daily News (London: John Chapman, 1856).

107. Lydia Maria Child to [Lucy] Osgood, July 20, 1856, Anti-Slavery Papers, Cornell University.

108. British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book III, June 6, July 4, 1856.

lionized as an unusual example of a "cultured" American. He was on familiar terms with most of the celebrities who had acclaimed Mrs. Stowe, and he had continued correspondence with such prominent abolitionists as Lord Morpeth, now the earl of Carlisle, and Nassau Senior. In 1838 Sumner attended Parliament to hear Lord Brougham make his famous last speech on emancipation; he had dined with him in his country home on numerous occasions.[109] All of these British friends had followed Sumner's subsequent career in politics and had praised his speech on the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850, and Nassau Senior wrote a pamphlet reviewing the speech that had precipitated Brooks's attack.[110] When Sumner returned to England in 1857, he was welcomed as the man of the hour, and it was in Sumner rather than in any other American politician that the British were to put their trust in the early dark days of the Lincoln administration.

The election of Buchanan in 1856 and the Dred Scott decision of 1857 were, of course, victories for the proslavery side, but far from producing a reaction of defeatism, both set off more antislavery activity. In response to the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society's plea for more information on Kansas and Congress, Tappan answered that the effect of the recent proceedings had been a "revival of the anti-slavery spirit" and that tens of thousands of citizens were now aroused. The Fugitive Slave Act and the Kansas-Nebraska Act together, he claimed, "have opened the eyes of the clergy and the laity in the free States, on these subjects, & a vast change has taken place in public sentiment."[111] All of this was adding to a rapid increase in the Republican party, which had succeeded on the foundation of the Free Soil party and now included the political abolitionists who had founded the Liberty party.

The Garrisonian response to political events was the "disunion convention" of 1857, with its motto of liberty before union. Conservative abolitionists as well as most Americans dismissed as vi-

109. Edward L. Pierce, ed., Memoir and Letters of Charles Sumner, 4 vols. (Boston: Roberts Bros., 1877), I, 197, 300–302, 328–332, 340, 348–355; II, 45.

110. Ibid., III, 311, 504, 527, 613; Senior, American Slavery.

111. British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book III, Mar. 2, 1857; Tappan to Chamerovzow, Oct. 29, 1854, in Abel and Klingberg, eds., Side-Light, 341–350.

sionary radicalism any call for breaking up the Union, and all were equally wary of endorsing the convention's assertion that "slavery must be conquered 'peacefully if we can, forcibly if we must.'" [112] At the other end of the spectrum those who feared disunion and civil war, led by Elihu Burritt and Gerrit Smith, met in a Cleveland convention to revive and discuss the idea of compensated emancipation, which the American Anti-Slavery Society had rejected in the 1830s. Elihu Burritt thought compensated emancipation as feasible for the United States as it had been for Great Britain, or even more so, since it could be financed from the sale of vast western lands rather than by taxation. In 1856 and again in 1857 he made tours that took him as far west as Missouri and Iowa to promote the idea.[113] In Great Britain the discussion centered about the pros and cons of sending a "National Protest" from England to the United States, but it was finally rejected as a step that would stir up resentment without doing any practical good.[114]

John Brown's attack on Harpers Ferry and his execution in 1859 aroused the British almost as much as it did the Americans, and because Frederick Douglass once more sought sanctuary in England, they had a direct source of information about the events. Douglass and Brown were both heroes. "The death of Socrates is paralleled by the Death of John Brown who died in as noble a cause," wrote Richard Webb from Dublin.[115] Sarah Parker Remond, the sister of Charles Remond, and Samuel J. May, who were both giving abolitionist lectures in Great Britain in 1859, helped to keep the image of Brown as a martyred abolitionist before the British public. In addition to lecturing, May contributed many articles and letters to the Anti-Slavery Advo-

112. The Anti-Slavery Advocate for Oct., 1857, carried a letter from Samuel J. May on plans for the disunion convention, and there was much discussion about it in the paper. For more details on the convention, see Johnson, William Lloyd Garrison and His Times; Proceedings of the State Disunion Convention, Held at Worcester, Massachusetts, January 25, 1857 (Boston, 1857).

113. Anti-Slavery Advocate, Nov., 1857; Burritt to Anna Mary Southall, July 28, 1856, Burritt Letters; Curti, The Learned Blacksmith, 119–120, 131–132, 136.

114. Anti-Slavery Advocate, issues throughout 1858.

115. Webb to J. Miller McKim, Mar. 12, 1860, Anti-Slavery Papers, Cornell University.

cate to explain the events in America.[116] Victor Hugo's famous letter asking mercy for Brown and indicting the whole American people was written to the editor of the London Star and was publicized in other newspapers as well. The London Patriot, which gave a good deal of coverage to slavery and antislavery issues throughout the 1850s, declared in an editorial that John Brown may have been a fanatic, but woe to the nation that maintained an institution so bad that it led men to act fanatically.[117]

While the rivalry of the factional split in the antislavery movement had stimulated the Anglo-American connection in the 1840s, by the 1850s it had become an albatross around the neck of the abolitionists. Now the excitement over John Brown's raid and execution and the common fears of an impending crisis did tend to bring the British groups together, just as it had a similar effect in the United States, but it was really not until the Civil War actually began that the factions were able to overcome internal bickering and buckle down to present a united front.

Yet it is not surprising that on the eve of the American Civil War British abolitionists were able to maintain a more long-range perspective and therefore a more optimistic attitude than their American allies. Their own long-sustained struggle against the slave trade and slavery had been marked by gradual, peaceful, and steady achievements. As early as the late eighteenth century religious leaders and prominent political leaders had united their efforts, and the antislavery movement won a status of respectability that it continued to enjoy. In Britain abolition affected economic investments and trade, but, unlike the situation in the United States, it had never threatened to overthrow an entrenched social system and presented no great racial problems. It could, therefore, be considered in a much less emotional context, and abolitionists did not have to labor under the stigma of such labels as fanatics, visionary radicals, or incendiaries as they did in the United States. Repercussions of the social and economic upheavals in the West Indian colonies touched very few Britishers directly or personally. Paradoxically, distance often seems to add clarity to the outlines of justice, and once perceived by a few, the many can be convinced of an abstract ideal, provided its embodiment in law will not drastically change their own lives. West Indian traders and planters were materially affected and had fought a last-ditch stand, but, unlike the American planters, their political strength was overbalanced earlier and more decisively by rising industrial interests and by the consequent changing emphasis in commercial expansion. The abolition movement in Great Britain was not led by men who were the victims of a status revolution.[118] A substantial number of them came from the ranks of the rising middle class and comprised a liberal bourgeois reform element. Although in an initial period British labor cried that too much attention was being paid to the slave and not enough to the poor workers at home, they eventually turned sympathy for the slave into concern for the exploited white worker as well. There was no long-term threat of potential economic rivalry from freed blacks and certainly no emotional fears that racial incompatibility would endanger their social order.

116. Life and Times of Frederick Douglass, 393; Anti-Slavery Advocate, Mar., Apr., Nov., Dec., 1859; British Friend throughout 1860 issues. Since Douglass's first visit to England, he had broken with the Garrisonians, and they now were denouncing him. Mrs. Chapman wrote to Sarah Remond that she must watch to see if Douglass tried to gain the sympathy of George Thompson in order to "use" him. "Whoever in England fraternizes with him helps and sanctions his falsehoods," she warned, ". . . he was kept in the dark by slavery too long ever to be able to see things straight. . . ." See Chapman to Remond, Sept. 4, 1859, Estlin Papers.

117. Ann S. Stephens, Victor Hugo's Letter on John Brown, with Mrs. Ann S. Stephens' Reply (New York: Irwin P. Beadle, 1860); London Patriot, Dec. 1, 1859.

The significance of all this is that abolition in Great Britain had proceeded along peaceful legislative lines, was less divisive, and each success marked a clear step forward without resulting in more polarization and confrontation, as was so clearly the pattern in the United States. By the time immediatism became the cry in antislavery circles, the gradualist approach had already succeeded in eliciting an acknowledgment from the British government that complete emancipation was the ultimate goal. All that remained, therefore, was to rally the public to back an accelerated pace.

Not so in the United States—there immediatism had been, at least partially, a response to repeated frustrations and failures on the political front, pushing abolitionists to more aggressive, militant confrontations and demands bound to result in high-pitched emotions and even violence. Southerners not only refused to acknowledge emancipation as a far-off but hoped-for ideal, but they defended slavery as a positive good, and no federal administration or major political party until the Republican dared to suggest even a containment policy, let alone complete emancipation by federal action. Failure to enforce the slave-trade laws, the continuing internal slave trade, gag laws, censorship of the press and mails, the admission of Texas, the new Fugitive Slave Law of 1850, the Kansas-Nebraska Act, and the Dred Scott decision all seemed evidence of retrogression rather than progression. Although antislavery doctrine had become respectable in many areas of the North, and probably a majority of northerners were willing to accept an end to slavery itself, relatively few looked with approval on the twin abolitionist goal of equality for blacks. Northern racism meant that the antislavery movement seemed to be fighting a losing battle in all sections.

118. I do not mean to imply that in the United States a status revolution accounts for abolitionist leadership.

By the 1840s, when the great split occurred in the antislavery movement, abolition in the West Indies was an accomplished fact, and the schismatic in-fighting added some spirit and zest to the British movement without seriously impairing its effectiveness. One cannot help but give credence to the traditional view that the schisms within the antislavery ranks weakened the movement in the United States at the time when it most needed unity. In this respect the antislavery movement followed the pattern of most reforms. As they gather strength and numbers, diverse groups, each with its own ideas and idiosyncrasies, inevitably disagree on ways and means. Yet can we be sure that this apparent tugging in several directions is completely detrimental? It seems possible that each group appeals to certain types of individuals; therefore, the wider the appeal, the greater the number who may be enlisted. Certainly some Americans responded to the political approach who were alienated by the Garrisonians; on the other hand, some who were more sympathetic to social revolution could adopt the Garrison brand of antislavery more easily than that of the political activists. Others were drawn in by their religious convictions and dedication. To contemporaries, however, the lack of unity was disheartening—it had been a burden throughout the 1850s.

The British antislavery perspective benefited from two historical factors absent from the American scene: the long view and the world view. Centuries of national history marked by defeats as well as successes had bred a less visionary, more practical approach. Goals were measured in terms of attainability; expediency and compromise had positive rather than negative connotations. If one could free slaves by compensating their owners, so be it. If Spain and Portugal could be persuaded to prohibit the slave trade in return for cash settlements, was not the end justifiable? Abolitionists could let up on their own crusade during a national emergency such as the Napoleonic wars, knowing they would return to it in the long run having earned more government and public support.

Americans, in their immaturity as a nation, had not developed the patience that comes with experience, and yet, often paradoxically, they accepted with little question a belief in an inevitable destiny. Southerners supported their "peculiar institution" as God-ordained and sanctioned by tradition. Antislavery reformers naïvely expected the universal acceptance of their own "self-evident truths" and equated national progress with national conversion. The entanglement of the antislavery movement with other social reforms and "isms"—all of which seemed to threaten the status quo—merely compounded the difficulties, blurred the focus, and emphasized the consequent frustrations. The rise of political democracy for the white "common man" had no apparent parallel in acceptance of equal rights for blacks, and national expansion seemed to benefit the "slave power" more than to fulfill the ideals of liberty and equality.

Taking the world view, British abolitionists could chalk up several accomplishments by 1861: emancipation in the West Indies, virtual abolition of their own slave trade, and international prohibitory agreements with the Netherlands, Denmark, Spain, Portugal, and France, in addition to formal expressions by the Concert of Europe denouncing slavery and the slave trade in principle. Abolition of serfdom in Russia was balanced against the continuation of slavery in the United States. Canada and the West Indies, as well as the British Isles, were maintained as havens of refuge for fugitives from slavery and as outposts from which salvos could be discharged in the form of diplomatic pressures. British abolitionists still kept faith in the efficacy of agitation through personal contacts established by lecturers or delegates to church conferences, and they firmly believed that the printed word was a major weapon in the campaign of persuasion.

If slavery should split the American Union, either war or separation might be the expedient means of dealing a death blow to the institution. For years abolitionists had been using the slogan "no union with slaveholders." Their theory was that slavery was maintained by federal power. If the slave states should cut themselves off from such support, the institution would crumble. For one thing, if the South voluntarily separated from the Union, it would have to relinquish all claims to share in the western territories. They believed that if slavery could not expand, it would cease to be economically profitable for either cotton planters or slave breeders. Without the force of a federal law requiring the return of fugitives, thousands of slaves would escape, resulting in constant erosion of the institution. Monetary investment in slaves would be much more of a gamble, and constant fear of more John Browns, guerrilla warfare, and slave insurrections would push individuals and states toward emancipation. Moreover, there would be increased moral pressure from the rest of the world against a nation completely devoted to slavery, as presumably the South would be, once the saving leaven of abolitionist activity was eliminated. Perhaps even economic boycotts could be invoked.

Much as the prospect of fratricidal war was deplored, the British could take a more detached view of it as well. Such a war would stem from action of the slaveholding section; therefore, the federal government would be justified in imposing a final settlement that would include either the confiscation of slave property or forced emancipation with compensation.

Obviously Americans were in no position to face any of these possibilities with equanimity. Each of them represented a regression from the ideal to the expedient, negating their aims of nonviolence and moral suasion. In the Declaration of Sentiments of the American Anti-Slavery Society they had rejected the "use of all carnal weapons for deliverance from bondage" and had deplored the use of violence by the fathers of the American Revolution as a means to liberty. Having held up the banner of "no compromise with slaveholders" for so long, most of them were equally reluctant to give ground by agreeing to compensated emancipation or settling for the Republican party platform, which called only for prohibiting slavery in the new territories.

As the crisis of 1860–1861 hit them, American abolitionists were tormented with the dilemma of what position to take: to let their erring sisters depart in peace or to move to a position of expediency, justifying their support of Union action on the grounds that if force was to be employed, with or without their consent, the best they could do was to capitalize on the opportunity to deal a death blow to slavery. They could even salve their consciences with the thought that it was not they but "expedient politicians" who had forsaken the purity of their ideals, who were responsible for the imminent violent upheaval. Their part would be to salvage from the debacle what they could for the cause of liberty and justice. Lincoln's hesitancy in making emancipation a war aim not only intensified the problem for American abolitionists but baffled the British and, as we shall see, compounded their problem of rallying public support to the side of the North.

British Abolitionists and the American Civil War

XVI

In 1860–1861 British abolitionist camps, still disunited, quite definitely reflected the different attitudes of the American abolitionist factions toward Lincoln's election and secession. At this stage their lack of unity had a decidedly weakening effect on the cause as a whole, for it added to the confusions in British public opinion about whether the South's move for independence should be applauded and encouraged or condemned and opposed.

This can first be noted in the reaction to Lincoln's election. The politically oriented abolitionists in the United States, who had been responsible for broadening the base of the Liberty party to make it the Free Soil party, and who then as Free Soilers had thrown in their lot with the Republican party, tended to be optimistic about Lincoln. They knew full well he could not abolish slavery outright, but he sincerely hated the institution and was pledged against allowing its extension into new territories. It was this group's opinions that were reflected in the British Anti-Slavery Reporter, whose pages were filled particularly with speeches of Sumner and Seward. Consequently the adherents of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society never faltered in their support of the Union and in opposition to secession and to British recognition of the Confederacy. As soon as secession began, they declared that no European power would dare to form an alliance with a federation that rested on slavery and the extension of a slave empire, thus acknowledging from the beginning their conviction that slavery was the basic issue in the disagreement.[1]

Indeed, this set of British abolitionists outdid their American counterparts in their support of the Lincoln administration. Their publications from early 1861 and throughout the war exude a steady confidence that the final outcome was ordained by God: victory for the Union and complete abolition of slavery. The early ascendancy of the South in the war was always seen as temporary, as God's chastening of his children in the North because they had not, as a nation, acted sooner to fulfill his will. Moreover, they were much more tolerant than American abolitionists of Lincoln's initial refusal to make the war a crusade against slavery as well as to save the Union. Numerous articles were written to explain to readers the constitutional handicaps under which he operated and which could be maneuvered around only gradually and with care not to alienate his own northern political support. British abolitionists were more prone to face practical political considerations and the inevitability of compromise (as they had in agreeing to compensated emancipation with the apprenticeship system in 1833). To them half a loaf was definitely better than no loaf at all.

On the other hand, the Garrisonian abolitionists in Great Britain, as in the United States, reflected little faith in the political process, at least to begin with. After the nominating conventions of 1860 the Anti-Slavery Advocate opined that there was little difference between the attitudes of Lincoln and Douglas: ". . . both despise the colored man, both advocate the withholding of his equal rights; and while the one would oppress him while here, the other would oppress him while here, and hustle him off to Central America as soon as possible."[2] When the southern states began to secede, again this group reflected the Garrisonian conviction that disunion was to be welcomed, for only by purging the federal government of its proslavery leadership was there any hope of salvation.[3] For this group, consequently, it was much more difficult to come around to support of the Union once war had begun, especially since Lincoln would not include emancipation as a war aim.

1. Anti-Slavery Reporter, Jan. 1, 1861.
2. Anti-Slavery Advocate, Aug., 1860.

Lincoln's stand lent credence to the cries of the nonabolitionist, pro-southern opinion in England that for the North it was just another imperialistic war of the industrialists against the agricultural, free-trade South. Considering the fact that some of the antislavery leadership doubted whether the North was worthy of sympathy and moral support, it is easier to understand the confusion of the masses of the English working people. They were definitely against slavery, but they could not be sure the Union government was; since their economic well-being rested on supplies of cotton from the South, it made it easier for them to rationalize that abolition was just as likely to result from a dissolution of the Union as from a northern victory. After all, for years the point had been made that if the southern states did separate, they could no longer depend on federal protection for their "peculiar institution." Slaves could then escape more easily without a national fugitive-slave law, and the South, by secession, would have to relinquish its right to spread slavery into the new territories. Containment, the argument ran, meant eventual death, since the cotton kingdom's well-being was predicated on expansion, and the upper South's prosperity from slave breeding depended on the opening of new cotton, slave-labor areas. It was no wonder that George Thompson (who was a politician, although a Garrisonian) in March of 1861 expressed to the Pennsylvania Abolition Society his wish for a "complete and irrevocable" separation of free and slave states.[4]

Another constitutional question, besides the slavery issue, that created confusion in the British mind was the blockade. Technically, by declaring the blockade, Lincoln had himself recognized Confederate belligerency. The friends of the North in the British cabinet, therefore, pushed for a proclamation of neutrality, because only then could the blockade be officially recognized.[5] The

3. Ibid., Feb., 1861.
4. Pennsylvania Abolition Society, Minutes, III, entry for Mar. 25, 1861.
5. Parliamentary Debates, 3rd ser., CLXV, 1187–97, for William Forster's niceties of such legal points were completely overlooked by American public opinion, however, and the British declaration of neutrality was interpreted as a distinctly pro-South gesture. As the war went on and the question of breaking the blockade became an issue, these same friends of the North could fall back on British recognition of the blockade as a legal impediment to breaking it, an action which most certainly would result in war with the United States. At that point they were able to consolidate the British people's fear of involvement in war with their basically antislavery attitude.

As long as the United States refused to make slavery an issue in the war, there were many grounds on which the pro-southern factions in the British government, industrial interests, and press could appeal to public sympathy. The South was the minority section, the underdog, standing up valiantly for its rights against the industrial colossus of the North. Their cause for independence was equated with those of the Greeks, the Belgians, and the Poles, all of whom were heroes in British eyes. Economically, there was not only the need for southern cotton, but the South was the section which favored free trade—a cause over which many Britons could become very vociferous. Of perhaps even greater importance was the combination of economic-nationalistic rivalry with the United States. A setback to the power of that quickly growing young nation was considered almost automatically a positive gain for Britain. Unless slowed down, the United States would not be content merely with the land she had taken on her way to the Pacific, but she would turn next to Canada, Mexico, and Central America, including the Caribbean islands. A weaker United States, it was argued, would certainly mean a safer, stronger Canada.

All of these points were hammered home to the British public over and over again in the press. The Trent affair in November, 1861, blown up all out of proportion by both sides as a case involving vital national honor, provoked statements and actions indicating that even antislavery people were sometimes patriots speech of Mar. 7, 1862, on the blockade, and CLXII, 192–193, for Bright's speech of May 28, 1861, upholding the government position on neutrality; Villiers and Chesson, Anglo-American Relations, 37.

---

first and abolitionists second. At least they failed to see the antislavery issue clearly through the smoke of nationalistic uproar.

It would be rash to claim that antislavery sentiment pure and simple kept the British in the long run from recognizing the Confederacy or extending more aid to her. There were too many other factors involved: profits from trade with the North, reluctance to risk all-out involvement in war, mistrust of the French, and caution dictated by a fear of ending up on the losing side after all. But it would be equally inaccurate to disregard the antislavery element altogether. It was one of a combination of influences that helped to determine British policy. My purpose is not to judge the relative weight of each of these factors in the government's final decisions. It is, rather, to present evidence of continuing abolitionist endeavors against recognition of southern independence and against forcible intervention to break the blockade. My conclusion is that the importance of these efforts lay not so much in that they deflected government policy from a course it would otherwise have taken but, rather, in that they gave a supporting boost in the direction to which the government was already inclined. In this case, therefore, the government welcomed rather than resented abolitionist agitation.

Before any military clash had occurred between the North and the South, Lords Russell and Lyons both plainly interpreted the secession crisis as one based on slavery. It is also evident from their letters that they were convinced that the English in this case could never ally themselves with the South. ". . . it must ever be repugnant to our feelings to be in intimate relations with a Confederation formed on the avowed principle of perpetuation, if not of extending, slavery," wrote Lyons to Russell in December, 1860. Both believed that the indignation and horror of the British people's reaction might overpower all their material interests—an avowal, surely, of their belief that the antislavery movement in England had been effective and was a potent force to reckon with.[6] In other words, whether or not antislavery conviction actually would overbalance other interests may not be so important as the fact that the government believed it might. If they overestimated the antislavery influence, it is probable they would also overestimate positive reaction to the Emancipation Proclamation when it came, despite the intervening impatience with Lincoln and the North. At the same time they were realistic about the economic question of cotton. A quarrel with the South would give Great Britain no opportunity of helping the slaves (they were convinced the South would not negotiate on the slavery issue for fear of acknowledging guilt) but would bring hardship to British working people. Therefore, the only possible policy was one of neutrality.

6. "Correspondence Relating to the Civil War in the United States of America," Parliamentary Papers, 1862, LXII, 5–6. The quotation is from Lyons to Russell, Dec. 18, 1860.

The shock to the British was great when Lincoln disavowed slavery as an issue and emancipation as a war aim, and one cannot be surprised that the expression of their adverse reaction was a general condemnation of the North, with a subsequent tendency to look for the good side in the southern position. If the North was pursuing only its nationalistic interests, not its humanitarian ideals, why should not Great Britain do the same? This policy allowed for material aid to the South if it would help bring cotton to the English mills, provided its practice should never be carried to the point of actually involving the nation in the war militarily. Britain had no compunctions about striking a blow at northern power if she could do so without injuring herself.

It seems clear now that at the time of the Trent affair, Great Britain did not want to be pushed to the point of war; again, when pressed about the building of ships destined for Confederate hands, she backed off. When the British did seriously consider intervention, it was intervention with the aim of mediation but not with the attitude that if mediation failed, forceful interference would necessarily follow. So even when some elements in the country clamored for action, the government was glad for the expression of contrary opinion (such as that of the antislavery forces) to bolster its own preference for neutrality. Of course the abolitionists could not know this and so were constantly fearful of recognition of the Confederate states, and they persistently agitated against it.

The big job of the abolitionists was to convince the British public that, official statements to the contrary, the real reason for secession and for the South's willingness to fight a war was to uphold slavery. Therefore, in view of her traditional antislavery stand, recognition of the Confederacy would be a dishonor to the British nation. Indications that the Confederacy's determination was to perpetuate slavery could be found in her constitution and also in the speeches of her leaders. The one of Vice-President Alexander Stephens in which he said that slavery was the cornerstone of the new nation was particularly revealing, and other statements were culled from the speeches of Jefferson Davis, Alexander Toombs, John J. Crittenden, and William Yancey. They also searched for and found articles in southern newspapers from throughout the 1850s advocating the reopening of the slave trade. This evidence was collected and collated and was published in 1862 as a pamphlet, What the South Is Fighting For.[7] It was advertised as testimony from the lips of the Confederates themselves, just as Theodore Weld's American Slavery as It Is had been. By early 1863 all 10,000 copies of the first edition of the pamphlet had been sold, and the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society approved another edition of 10,000.[8]

As usual, the British abolitionists fell back on their old tactic of inundating Parliament with petitions—this time concentrating on opposition to recognition of the Confederacy. The campaign was launched in the spring of 1861 as soon as it became known that a motion for recognition would be introduced in Commons. After conferring with William E. Forster, abolitionist M.P., the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society decided that their best strategy would be to have Forster offer an amendment to any such motion that would make recognition contingent upon the Confederacy's concession of the right of search and a promise to cooperate against the slave trade. In view of other statements of the abolitionists insisting unconditionally on nonrecognition, it seems that their motive was to amend for the sake of emasculating and thus defeat the whole motion. As it turned out, it was not necessary for Forster to compromise even that much. His amendment simply expressed the inexpediency of interfering on behalf of those now in insurrection, and that sufficed to persuade Mr. Gregory of Galway to withdraw his recognition motion.[9]

7. What the South Is Fighting For (London, 1863). The London Daily News carried a series of letters by John Elliott Cairnes on the South and the reopening of the slave trade. See the issues of Nov. 5 and Dec. 18, 1862. See also the London Morning Star and Dial, Jan. 7, 9, 22, 27, 1862. On Aug. 27, 28, 29, and 30 the Morning Star carried reprints from the Charleston Standard and the New Orleans Delta favoring a reopening of the slave trade.

8. British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book IV, Feb. 6, 1863.

In the summer a deputation of the antislavery society met with Palmerston to impress on him their views. So from the beginning, although a great part of the British press was asking for recognition, the government knew that there was a contrary point of view to be considered, even though it might constitute a minority view. Palmerston's adherence to a policy of abstention was probably influenced to some extent by his long dedication to the fight to end the slave trade and by the willingness of the Lincoln government to negotiate a new treaty based on mutual search. According to Palmerston's biographer, it was no small triumph for him to succeed in this matter, which had been such a persistent diplomatic problem over so many years.[10] It is interesting to note, too, that when Lord Russell received the Confederate agents William Yancey, A. Dudley Mann, and Pierre A. Yost, one of the questions he raised with them was the possibility of a revival of the slave trade by the South.[11] Palmerston acquiesced in Prince Albert's "toning down" of the British message after the Trent affair and privately, if not publicly, admitted his embarrassment over the Gladstone speech of October, 1862, which seemed to predict government recognition of the Confederacy.[12]

Although the Garrisonian abolitionists had at first favored letting the erring South depart in peace, once Fort Sumter was fired upon, they, too, for the most part, threw in their lot with the

9. Ibid., Apr. 5, 15, 1861; Parliamentary Debates, 3rd ser., CLXIII, 762–763.

10. Anti-Slavery Reporter, May 1, Aug. 1, 1861; Herbert C. F. Bell, Lord Palmerston, 2 vols. (London: Longmans, Green, 1936), II, 276.

11. Lord Russell to Lord Lyons, May 11, 1861, in "Correspondence Relating to the Civil War," Parliamentary Papers, 1862, LXII, 26.

12. Adams to Seward, Oct. 24, 1862, in "Correspondence Relating to the Civil War," Parliamentary Papers, 1863, LXXII, 208–209; Bell, Lord Palmerston, II, 294–295.

Union. A letter written by Harriet Beecher Stowe to Lord Shaftesbury may have been helpful, since she was idolized by the British abolitionists, especially the Garrisonian faction. She insisted that the war was over slavery and that the new Confederacy rested on it.[13] George Thompson became a most indefatigable lecturer in the effort to keep reminding the British populace, suffering workers especially, that their antislavery convictions must take precedence over their economic needs. And in the crisis of the war, British as well as American abolitionists subordinated their internal differences to the common cause. By the autumn of 1862 George Thompson and Louis Chamerovzow were corresponding with amazing cordiality (considering their recent bitter exchanges) over the need to cooperate to strengthen the hands of friends of the Union in Parliament. They also wanted to neutralize the effects of speeches made by the few antislavery men who were refusing to accept the general abolitionist position that the South's cause was, above all, slavery and that the North's was emancipation.[14]

Among the important men who refused to go along with the general abolitionist position were Lord Brougham and Charles Buxton. Brougham held that unless the federal government defined an antislavery position, the English were entitled to look on the invasion of the South as just as tyrannical as the recent invasions of Italy and Hungary to stop independence movements. Brougham had been in the antislavery movement too long and had played too important a role for his colleagues to denounce him, so sadly they attributed his "signs of decay" to his age and feebleness (he was in his eighties).[15] Buxton, the son of the great leader in the fight for the Emancipation Act of 1833, could not be thus excused on grounds of age. A speech he made in Maidstone in the fall of 1862 was considered by the abolitionists as particularly unfortunate. Buxton had not forsaken his antislavery

13. Anti-Slavery Reporter, Nov. 1, 1861.

14. Thompson to Chamerovzow, Nov. 9, 1862, Rhodes House Antislavery Papers, C 37/9.

15. Villiers and Chesson, Anglo-American Relations, 187. W. H. Chesson, one of the authors of this volume, was the son of F. W. Chesson, abolitionist of the Civil War period. Much of the son's material was taken from his father's diary.

principles, but he had turned against the North for doing so. Wilberforce's son Samuel, now the bishop of Oxford, was also among those who argued that abolition was more apt to result from secession than from a maintenance of the Union. Nassau Senior, despite his friendship and correspondence with Charles Sumner, was convinced that slavery was so entrenched in the United States that it could not be overthrown.[16]

During the first two years of the war the abolitionists were sometimes hard put to it to justify and defend the Lincoln administration, but they latched on to every ray of hope they could find. In the autumn of 1861 Henry Highland Garnet, the black abolitionist from New York who had previously been forced to travel to England without a passport, was now issued one. Although this act passed unnoticed except in abolitionist circles, it was actually of major import, for it was the first practical step taken by the U.S. government to nullify the Dred Scott decision. Garnet was warmly welcomed in Great Britain as "the first black citizen of the Dis-United States." [17]

In October, 1861, when Senator Sumner gave a speech in Worcester, Massachusetts, calling for abolition as a war aim, it was interpreted as a signal that the government might be ready to take such a step.[18] Actions taken by the Lincoln administration in 1862 that were accepted as indicating an antislavery policy were the signing of the treaty providing for mutual search, application of the death penalty for conviction of guilt in slave trading, and the diplomatic recognition extended to Liberia and Haiti, the two black republics hitherto denied this American favor. Although most American abolitionists vehemently attacked the president's proposals for compensated emancipation in the border states, to be accompanied by colonization of those freed, British abolitionists reacted more favorably and added this to 16. Morning Star, Nov. 7, 1862; Daily News, Dec. 5, 1862; Ephraim D. Adams, Great Britain and the American Civil War, 2 vols. (London: Longmans, Green, 1925), I, 33; Pierce, ed., Memoir and Letters of Charles Sumner, IV, 150–151. See the Daily News, Dec. 27, 1862, for an editorial critical of Buxton for raising the bogey of a servile insurrection.

17. Anti-Slavery Reporter, Oct. 1, 1861.

18. Ibid., Nov. 1, 1861.

their list of signs of Lincoln's sincere wish to do everything that was constitutionally possible.[19] Salmon P. Chase, with a long record of antislavery activity and supposedly a power in Lincoln's cabinet, was already on record as willing to accept emancipation with compensation.[20] The passage of a law abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia was yet another positive accomplishment. Even when Lincoln rescinded the order of General David Hunter that slaves escaping behind Union lines should be considered free, the Anti-Slavery Reporter was very lenient and appreciated his constitutional predicament.[21]

Early in 1862, while the resolution of the Trent affair was still pending, the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society moved to establish contact with the American minister, Charles Francis Adams. In February the society's secretary, Louis Chamerovzow, had an interview with him that led to the preparation of an address presented in April by an imposing deputation including Chamerovzow, Josiah Forster, and three abolitionist M.P.s: Samuel Gurney, John I. Briscoe, and A. Kinnaird. Also among the group was Gerard Ralston, who had been an active colonizationist, had backed Elliott Cresson in the 1830s, and had accepted an honorary office in the American Colonization Society. Evidently the war crisis was helping to heal old wounds between colonizationists and abolitionists as well as those between abolitionist factions.

No doubt the presentation of the address by delegation was done for publicity's sake, and they got it—but not all favorable. The Times commented sarcastically that a society that could be "condensed" into one hansom cab could hardly profess to speak for the nation. However, the fact that the Times deigned to notice the event at all perhaps indicates some fear that the antislavery forces were not so powerless as the Times's publishers could have wished. Adams, in any case, received the deputation cordially and assured them that the Union's aim was to spread the blessings of liberty as much as possible, consistent with existing obligations.

19. Ibid., Jan. 1, Apr. 1, May 1, June 2, 1862; Glasgow Sentinel, May 17, 1862.

20. Chase to John Greenleaf Whittier, Nov. 23, 1860, Whittier Letters.

21. Daily News, May 10, 30, 1862.

Since the slave-trade treaty providing for mutual search had just been signed, he could advance it as evidence to back up his words.[22]

Cordial relations between Adams and the antislavery society continued throughout the war. William E. Forster's role was significant, for he and Adams became personal friends, and he entertained the American minister at his home in Yorkshire. Indeed, Adams confided to Seward that he put much faith in Forster's "sound and valuable" advice and judgment on parliamentary matters.[23] Certainly the abolitionists considered themselves lucky to have a man of Adams's persuasion in the American legation.

Another friend to their cause was the American consul in Bristol, Zebina Eastman, who had previously edited an antislavery newspaper in Chicago, had visited England for the antislavery cause in the early 1850s, and who now combined antislavery activities with his official duties.[24] He was the first American holding a government position to give an antislavery lecture in Great Britain. In 1865 Elihu Burritt was made a consular agent in Birmingham, an area in which he was well known because of his earlier activity in connection with the free-produce movement. The presence of these men as appointees of the Lincoln administration seemed in itself an expression of the government's basic soundness on the slavery question.

It was in the autumn of 1862 that the London Emancipation Committee reorganized as the Emancipation Society and set up an office in Fleet Street, just in time to capitalize on the news of the Emancipation Proclamation. They were fortunate to have as influential founding members Samuel Lucas, who was business manager of the Morning Star, and P. A. Taylor, M.P. Simultaneously, a new Ladies' Emancipation Society began to meet at the Taylor home in Notting Hill.[25] During the course of the war years this ladies' group put out a series of pamphlets dealing with slavery, the South, and the Negro question. Some were written 22. Anti-Slavery Reporter, May 1, 1862; British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book IV, Feb. 7, Mar. 7, Apr. 4, May 2, 1862.

23. Adams to Seward, Oct. 17, 1860, in "Correspondence Relating to the Civil War," Parliamentary Papers, 1863, LXXII, 208–209.

24. Anti-Slavery Reporter, May 1, 1862.

25. Villiers and Chesson, Anglo-American Relations, 182–183.

by the ladies themselves, such as those of Emily Sherriff on The Chivalry of the South; one, called Professor Huxley on the Negro Question, was compiled by Mrs. Taylor; and the American Sarah Remond contributed Negroes and Anglo-Americans as Freedmen and Soldiers.

In addition to the London societies, among the most active during the war was the Union and Emancipation Society of Manchester, operating in the heart of Lancashire. There the effects of the blockade were most acutely felt, and there was the most need to combat the pro-southern feeling resulting from the cotton famine. Under the leadership of Thomas Bayley Potter, a businessman and friend of Richard Cobden, in three years the society issued and circulated 400,000 books, pamphlets, and tracts and held nearly 500 official and public meetings.[26]

Contrary to the traditional myth that the cotton-starved workers of Lancashire refused to support the slaveholding South, a recent study presents an overwhelming mass of evidence that a great deal of pro-southern sentiment existed in that area and that there was a direct correlation between southern sympathy and the degree of the workers' suffering. Rochdale, the home of Bright and Cobden, did remain pro-North, but it was atypical rather than typical of Lancashire attitudes. The conclusion of this study by Mary Ellison is not that the Lancashire people became proslavery but that they found ways to rationalize the argument that emancipation was more apt to result from an independent South, since the North was denying all intentions of general emancipation.[27] The Glasgow Sentinel, which was often pro-North but also critical of specific federal policies, warned that the cotton weavers entertained some "very Napoleonic notions of the propriety of setting aside the southern blockade."[28] It is evident that the abolitionists realized the need for strong action in the Lancashire area, and their frequent references to, and praise of, the consistent antislavery principles of the workers were designed to revive and to try to salvage either a badly sagging morale or one that had already succumbed to economic pressures.

26. Ibid., 100–101, 107, 183.

27. Mary Louise Ellison, "The Reaction of Lancashire to the American Civil War" (Unpubl. Ph.D. dissertation, University of London, 1968).

28. Glasgow Sentinel, Jan. 25, 1862.

Of course the antislavery societies tried to enlist the aid of lecturers and writers whose prestige would carry influence. Harriet Beecher Stowe was at the top of the list. In 1861 her letter to Lord Shaftesbury was published, and in the summer of 1862 so was her letter to the duchess of Argyle, which challenged the "justice" of English sympathy for the South, particularly in such instances as the contretemps between General Benjamin Butler and the ladies of New Orleans. Late in 1862 she penned an address to the women of England that was an answer to the address they had sent through her to America eight years earlier.[29] Uncle Tom's Cabin was still fresh in English minds, as were two other novels of the fifties that were similar in sympathy and tone: Richard Hildreth's The White Slave and William Wells Brown's Clotel: Or the President's Daughter, both published in 1853. In 1862 F. W. Chesson sponsored the launching of another narrative of slavery, by Mrs. Harriet Jacobs, an escaped slave. It was published in England as The Deeper Wrong and in the United States as Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl, edited by Lydia Maria Child. Harriet Martineau wrote numerous articles for the papers, and Tom Hughes, best known as the author of Tom Brown's School Days, contributed a tract called The Cause of Freedom.[30]

Several university professors wrote books that were widely circulated by the antislavery societies. Notable were The Revolution in America by the economist John Elliott Cairnes of Queens College, Galway, and at least half a dozen by the Oxford historian Goldwin Smith. Professor F. W. Newman of the University of London challenged William E. Gladstone's pro-southern position as stated in his Newcastle speech of October, 1862 (in which Gladstone said the South had made a nation), and their exchange of letters was published.[31] Excerpts from the speeches or other 29. Fields, ed., Life and Letters of Harriet Beecher Stowe, 263–272; Anti-Slavery Reporter, Mar. 5, 1863.

30. Villiers and Chesson, Anglo-American Relations, 179, 185; Adams, Great Britain and the American Civil War, I, 70.

31. Anti-Slavery Reporter, Jan. 1, 1863.

writings of Richard Cobden, John Bright, and John Stuart Mill were also widely publicized.

John Stuart Mill's most significant piece was his article in Fraser's Magazine early in February, 1862, just after the crisis of the Trent.[32] He rejoiced that the storm was over, for it would have been shameful for a nation devoted to ending slavery and the slave trade to help establish one devoted to perpetuating them. If England had gone to war, he wrote, in the long run her "just" provocation would be forgotten and only the result remembered, to her disgrace. In the Trent affair Lincoln's government had been honest and had retracted; now the offense of the North should be forgotten, since slavery, he insisted, was the real issue. Even if the motives of the North lent themselves to misunderstanding and misinterpretation, surely those of the South did not: independence for freedom was one thing; independence in order to oppress was quite another. He reminded his readers that it was the southern states that had made the United States seem imperialistic—in Texas, for example. And as for the North's new tariff (the Morrill), so much criticized by free traders, it would never have been needed except to meet the cost of fighting secession.

It was in 1862, when southern prospects of victory seemed brightest, that Fanny Kemble decided to publish the journal she had kept in 1839 as the reluctant mistress of a Georgia rice plantation. Miss Kemble had gone to the United States in 1832 with her famous actor-father, Charles Kemble, and while there fell in love with and married Pierce M. Butler, unaware that he was the absentee owner of two plantations and over 600 slaves. In 1838, when the plantations were left without an overseer, Fanny went with her husband to Georgia to help take charge. The whole slave system was repugnant to her, and her journal was a severe indictment of it; but even after her divorce she had refrained from publishing. Now, alarmed by pro-southern public opinion and fearful that her country might recognize the Confederacy, she decided that it was her duty to bring out the book.[33] Abolitionists ascribed much credit to it as helping to influence public opinion.

32. John Stuart Mill, "The Contest in America," Fraser's Magazine, LXV (Feb., 1862), 258–268.

Just as the British antislavery societies were hitting their stride in publications and lectures to aid the Union, news came to boost their cause and substantiate their claims of the North's sincere desire to end slavery: the Emancipation Proclamation. Of course the pro-South press cried out that it was hypocritical, meant to provoke a slave insurrection, and a political move to conceal federal desperation. The Times described the horrors that would ensue from a servile uprising and depicted Lincoln as rubbing his hands together with the satisfaction of sweet revenge. After noting that he was proclaiming freedom for slaves in areas where he had no power but allowing slavery to remain where he did have power, they compared him to a pope who sold indulgences to his own votaries. It was an act, they concluded, prompted by hopelessness and recklessness. The Glasgow Sentinel bemoaned the fact that it came at a time when the Confederate Army lay within sight of the capital. It sounded, therefore, like the act of a desperate government exhibiting "petty and abortive spite." They did not doubt that its effect would be to serve the cause of humanity, but it would be absurd to pretend that its motive stemmed from great moral resolve.[34]

The antislavery antagonists hailed such criticism as "outcries of a faction sighting their defeat from afar." They admitted that Lincoln's proclamation stopped short of full achievement of their own hopes and that it was motivated by military necessity, but, they argued, it came on the wings of victory rather than despair, and the result was the important thing. It would mean freedom for the slaves whatever the administration's motives might have been. They accepted it as an earnest of full emancipation to come. They reminded the British public that Britain's own emancipation act had not been "pure" either. It had included compensation for the slave owners, and its apprenticeship system had postponed full emancipation for the slaves.[35]

33. John A. Scott, ed., Journal of a Residence on a Georgia Plantation in 1838–1839 by Frances Anne Kemble (New York: Alfred Knopf, 1961).

34. Times (London), Oct. 7, 1862; Glasgow Sentinel, Oct. 11, 1862. Miss Ellison's study shows that the Lancashire press interpreted the Emancipation Proclamation as a military maneuver that used the Negro as a pawn, and they remained anti-Lincoln until after his assassination. Russell wrote to Lord Lyons on Jan. 17, 1863, that the Emancipation Proclamation was "a measure of war, and a measure of war of a very questionable kind." Since it contained no principle adverse to slavery, he did not think it could "or ought to satisfy the friends of abolition, who look for total and impartial freedom for the slave, and not for vengeance on the slave owner." See "Correspondence Relating to the Civil War," Parliamentary Papers, 1863, LXXII, 51–52.

Regardless of the negative reaction of the British government, or what importance historians ascribe to the Emancipation Proclamation in influencing British diplomatic policy, contemporary abolitionists did not doubt that it turned the tide in their favor. In December, 1862, the Anti-Slavery Reporter believed that even the Times was wavering in its sympathies, and they saw in its articles "feelers" in order to know where next to plant the editorial foot, not to try the public pulse; according to the Reporter, the Times was well aware that "that beats healthily enough."[36] The Reporter was probably referring to editorials of November 13 and 15, which came out against England joining France in some scheme of mediation, and to the letter from the Times's American correspondent in the December 18 issue, which praised Lincoln's proposal to Congress that the Constitution should be amended to allow for abolition with compensation to loyal owners. The Times admitted that if Lincoln had taken such a stand at the outbreak of the war, the sympathies of the British should have been on his side.

On December 6, 1862, John Bright wrote to Charles Sumner that British antislavery sentiment was being called forth anew by the Emancipation Proclamation, and in February, 1863, Richard Cobden wrote Sumner that the proclamation had done its work effectively. By April the Anti-Slavery Reporter was ascribing a "new caution" to Lord Russell, stemming from the great outburst of feeling following Lincoln's proclamation. This was being expressed in large public gatherings all over Great 35. Villiers and Chesson, Anglo-American Relations, 85; Anti-Slavery Reporter, Nov. 1, 1862; Morning Star, Oct. 6, 1862.

36. Anti-Slavery Reporter, Dec. 1, 1862.

Britain.[37] By the autumn of that year Goldwin Smith wrote to the American abolitionist C. E. Norton that since the issue had become one of free labor versus slavery, the North had the support of a good many of the intellectual class, the more religious part of the middle class, the ministers of most of the Free churches, and the great mass of the intelligent lower class.[38]

It may well be, of course, that the abolitionists saw what they wanted to see, but certainly they put forth their utmost efforts to capitalize on what they viewed as the new turn of events enabling them to shift from a defensive to an offensive strategy. Late in 1862, even before the Emancipation Proclamation was to be officially in effect, the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society prepared an address to President Lincoln that could also be published as a tract on the American crisis. Copies were sent to all the London daily and religious papers, to fifty American newspapers, and to the governors of all the loyal states. When the mailing list was enlarged to include all of the Members of Parliament, ministers of the Gospel, and newspapers throughout Great Britain, the proposed edition of 5,000 was doubled.[39] About fifty abolitionists, "gentlemen of position and influence" from different parts of the country, met in London to make up a delegation to wait on Charles Francis Adams to present him with the official copy for President Lincoln. Evidently this time they did not want to give the Times the pleasure of calling them a one-hansom-cab society. Adams was explicitly told that neither he nor the American people should believe that the Times spoke for the British people, and the same message was conveyed in private correspondence with American abolitionists.[40]

37. Cobden to Sumner, Feb. 13, 1863, quoted in Villiers and Chesson, Anglo-American Relations, 86–87; Pierce, ed., Memoir and Letters of Charles Sumner, IV, 153; Anti-Slavery Reporter, Apr. 1, 1863.

38. Christine Anne Bolt, "British Attitudes to Reconstruction in the United States, 1863–1877" (Unpubl. Ph.D. dissertation, University of London, 1966), published as The Anti-Slavery Movement and Reconstruction (New York: Oxford University Press, 1969).

39. British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book IV, Nov. 17, Dec. 5, 22, 1862.

40. Ibid., Feb. 6, 1863; Richard D. Webb to J. Miller McKim, Aug. 30, 1861, Anti-Slavery Papers, Cornell University.

The British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, the London Emancipation Society, and the Union and Emancipation Society of Manchester were especially active in organizing public meetings that would give antislavery people the chance to voice their approval of Lincoln's progress. They were determined that the hitherto silent masses should now be heard to as great an extent as the vocal pro-Confederate press. Much of the effort, therefore, was aimed at the working classes. To start with, in December, 1862, mass meetings were held in London, Liverpool, Manchester, and Sheffield, with a similar format for all. Antislavery lectures were delivered, sometimes debates were included such as in the one at Liverpool where a Times correspondent defended the South, and then resolutions were passed in support of Lincoln and the Union. These were embossed and delivered to Minister Adams for transmission to Washington.[41] The fact that Lincoln had solicited such help, and had even sent Bright the draft of a sample resolution, seems not to have been known or, if it was, did not act as a deterrent to the "spontaneity" of such meetings.[42]

Similar meetings continued throughout the war. Professor Royden Harrison, who has concluded that ideological factors rather than the "direct operation of economic considerations" determined the British workers' opinions, counted five pro-Union meetings organized by British workers in 1862, fifty-six in 1863, and another fifty-six in 1864. These do not include those organized by other societies or groups.[43] In one issue alone of the Anti-

41. Anti-Slavery Reporter, Feb. 3, 1863.

42. Trevelyan, Life of John Bright, 303n; David Donald, Lincoln Reconsidered: Essays on the Civil War Era (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1956), 123.

43. Royden Harrison, "British Labor and American Slavery," Science and Society, XXV (Dec., 1961), 291–319. But he challenges the theory that British labor was solidly behind Lincoln from the beginning. Several labor leaders and editors were actually pro-Confederacy, but Harrison found the change dating from late 1862 (after the news of the forthcoming Emancipation Proclamation). Martin P. Claussen, "Peace Factors in Anglo-American Relations, 1861–1865," Mississippi Valley Historical Review, XXVI (Mar., 1939–1940), 511–522, concludes that some working-class papers were critical of both North and South but began to applaud northern abolitionism in the spring of 1863. He thinks a large ingredient in workers' sympathies was the factor of economic opportunity and democracy, which they associated with the North. Richard Greenleaf, "British Labor against American Slavery," Science and Society, XVII (Winter, 1953), 42–58, gives much more weight to labor's antislavery convictions.

Slavery Reporter (March 5, 1863) there are brief reports of forty-seven meetings at which pro-North, pro-Lincoln attitudes were expressed. John Bright repeatedly appealed to the workers to stick with the North because of the evil of the South. His great theme was that the Union had given refuge to thousands of British working people, while the South degraded and made chattels of its labor.

It was Bright who suggested that an American fund be raised to aid suffering workers in Lancashire. By early 1863 thousands of dollars had been donated, and the ship Hope, followed later by two other vessels, arrived in Liverpool with food and flour as tangible evidence of northern concern.[44] The Reverend Charles Wheeler Dennison, chaplain on the relief ship George Griswold, traveled and spoke in Lancashire for the northern cause.

Mary Ellison's recent study indicates doubt that the antislavery meetings, organized mostly by outsiders, had much effect on the attitudes of the Lancashire workers or that Bright carried with him many in the area outside of his own town of Rochdale and the noncotton section of the west. But the significant fact remains that if this is true, the government either did not realize it or chose to ignore it. It listened to voices it wanted to hear—those of Bright and Cobden.[45] Charles Francis Adams certainly appears to have accepted the mass meetings and resolutions as genuine support from the working classes hitherto denied a means of expression because of the pro-southern press.[46] Thomas Dudley, the American consul at Liverpool, reported strong pro-southern feeling in the area, but he credited Bright with "toning down" the war excitement over the Trent.[47]

44. Greenleaf, "British Labor against American Slavery"; Anti-Slavery Reporter, Jan. 1, 1863; Villiers and Chesson, Anglo-American Relations, 163.

45. Ellison, "Reaction of Lancashire to the American Civil War," 2, 17, 74, 100, 122. These pages refer to only a few of the pertinent statements. This is the essence of her whole thesis. She maintains that Lancashire workers also rejected such antislavery lecturers as Mason Jones, who had spent some time in the United States, and Peter Sinclair, but were more inclined to listen to Joseph Barker, who had lived there from 1851 to 1860, had been a Garrisonian abolitionist, but now supported the South and argued that slavery was not an issue in the war. See pp. 70–71.

46. Adams, Great Britain and the American Civil War, II, 108.

47. Thomas H. Dudley, Three Critical Periods in Our Diplomatic Relations with

It seems to have been in areas other than Lancashire that pro-northern appeals to the working classes received a positive reception and where speeches on northern democracy and free labor were the most effective. The London Trades Council, organized in 1860, promoted massive workingmen's demonstrations against slavery and for the North. Although many of the trade-union newspapers and editors were actually pro-South, the group in the London Trades Council known as the Junta managed to gain control of one paper, the Beehive, dismissed its editor, and changed the editorial policy to a pro-northern one. E. S. Beesly, professor of history at University College, London, was thereafter one of the most frequent contributors to the Beehive, and he played much upon the theme of "railsplitter to President." [48]

Another way of reaching the working classes, in addition to approaching them through the trade unions, was through the churches. After the crisis of the Trent affair, the Evangelical Alliance held a meeting in Exeter Hall to pray for peace that was attended by about 4,000 persons. On December 17, 1861, the ministers of the three great dissenting denominations held a meeting in London that unanimously adopted resolutions calling for arbitration and deprecating war; the Congregational Union took similar action separately. A joint deputation of Baptists and Independents interviewed Lord Russell in the interests of peace.[49] The London Emancipation Society appealed to all ministers of the Gospel to give prominence in their sermons to the Emancipation Proclamation. How many actually did is impossible to ascertain, but some certainly responded positively and were reported in the antislavery papers. Late in 1862 the Reverend Newman Hall, one of the most popular preachers of the day, delivered a series of lectures in Surrey Chapel to crowds of England during the Late War . . . , reprinted from Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, XVII (Apr., 1893).

---

48. Jack R. Pole, Abraham Lincoln and the Working Classes of Britain (London: Commonwealth-American Current Affairs Unit of the English Speaking Union, [1959]).

49. Donaldson Jordan and Edwin J. Pratt, Europe and the American Civil War (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1931), 39. Miss Ellison's study of Lancashire finds no support for the thesis that Nonconformists were pro-North and Church of England pro-South.

workers estimated in the thousands.[50] The great revivalist C. H. Spurgeon, who also drew thousands to his meetings, prayed publicly for the success of the northern cause.[51] When the Address of the Southern Clergy, which defended both slavery and the Confederate cause in the war, came out in England, the antislavery societies distributed it with confidence that it would do more harm than good for the South.[52]

Professor Goldwin Smith contributed to the religious argument with a pamphlet, Does the Bible Sanction American Slavery?, in which he traced the institution from Old Testament times but pointed out that just as other Old Testament institutions had been replaced in the course of evolutionary progress, so should slavery. To him the Civil War was basically the Christian ideal at its best versus slavery. Professor Smith did not absolve the North from all fault, but the slave-owning class of the South, in his book, bore the major share of the guilt. If that class should be defeated, he maintained, the poor whites as well as the blacks of the South would be better off.[53] (This was essentially the position Marx and Engels were taking in their New York Tribune articles.)

In the summer of 1863 a ministerial antislavery conference was held in Free Trade Hall, Manchester, and although it was disrupted by anti-North demonstrators, the Reverend Dr. James Massie and the Reverend J. H. Rylance were chosen to go to the United States to convey an address to the ministers there and to present a copy to President Lincoln. Massie was already the author of one pro-northern book, The American Crisis, in Relation to the Anti-Slavery Cause, and upon his return from America he penned another in defense of the North.[54]

When the Reverend Henry Ward Beecher arrived from Amer-

50. Morning Star, Oct. 22, 1862; Daily News, Dec. 12, 1862; Anti-Slavery Reporter, Jan. 1, 1863.

51. Villiers and Chesson, Anglo-American Relations, 111.

52. Anti-Slavery Reporter, Sept. 1, 1863.

53. Goldwin Smith, Does the Bible Sanction American Slavery? (Oxford: John Henry, 1863); Speech of Mr. W. E. Forster, M.P., on the Slaveholders' Rebellion; and Professor Goldwin Smith's Letter on the Morality of the Emancipation Proclamation (Manchester: Union and Emancipation Society, 1863).

54. Anti-Slavery Reporter, Feb. 1, 1864; James W. Massie, The American ica in the autumn of 1863, he was sometimes forced to overcome "a turbulent sea of noisy hostility" before he could speak. But he made major addresses to overflow crowds in London, Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, and Edinburgh. On October 20, in a triumphal climax, he spoke to a more than capacity audience in Exeter Hall, with thousands more outside trying to get in. He left for America convinced that the British people were sound to the core in their antislavery convictions. Other American antislavery ministers who visited England during the war and preached for the northern cause included William H. Channing, Charles Grandison Finney, George B. Cheever, J. M. Sturtevant, Dr. and Mrs. Walter C. Palmer, and Bishop Charles P. McIlvaine.[55]

Throughout the war escaped slaves still flocked to Great Britain for refuge. Indeed, their numbers swelled with the rising tide of freedmen who took advantage of the upheaval. As always, they were eager to cooperate with the antislavery people in publicizing the evils of the South and the atrocities committed against freedmen trying to escape. Among them was William A. Jackson, who had been a coachman for Jefferson Davis and was made to order for propaganda purposes.[56] The Reverend Sella Martin was another American Negro who worked in England during the war years. In March, 1863, the Freedman's Aid Society was organized in St. James Hall, Piccadilly, in London.[57]

Abolitionist optimism was not without its setbacks. In the spring of 1863 there was renewed alarm as news came in of the depredations of the Alabama, as reports multiplied that more ships were being built for the Confederacy, and as notice was given of upcoming motions in Parliament favoring recognition of

---

Crisis, in Relation to the Anti-Slavery Cause (London: John Snow, 1862); Massie, America: The Origin of Her Present Conflict; Her Prospect for the Slave, and Her Claim for Anti-Slavery Sympathy . . . (London: John Snow, 1864).

55. Villiers and Chesson, Anglo-American Relations, 127–129, 199–200; Anti-Slavery Reporter, Nov. 2, 1863; Henry Ward Beecher, American Rebellion: Report of the Speeches of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher . . . (Manchester: Union and Emancipation Society, 1864); Timothy Smith, Revivalism and Social Reform (New York: Harper & Row, 1965), 202.

56. Villiers and Chesson, Anglo-American Relations, 181.

57. Anti-Slavery Reporter, May 1, 1863.

the Confederate States of America. The antislavery societies responded as usual with direct pressure on Parliament and the organization of mass meetings of protest. In anticipation of Lord Stratheden's motion for recognition, the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society sent to each member of the House of Lords copies of What the South Is Fighting For and their latest tract, British Aid to the Confederates. It was not until Stratheden's motion was safely voted down that they could dismiss it as "a weak cause in the hands of the weakest of advocates." [58] In Commons William E. Forster introduced a motion censuring the building of the Alabama and other vessels for the South, and in preparation for the vote the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society distributed copies of their tracts to the members of that house. The Manchester Union and Emancipation Society prepared yet another petition.[59] They were able to claim victory when the Commons reacted so strongly that John A. Roebuck of Sheffield withdrew his motion that the British should negotiate with other powers to recognize the Confederacy. They did not, however, relax their agitation.[60]

In March, 1863, a great meeting was held at St. James Hall in London at which John Bright addressed an audience of artisans and workingmen on the subject of the Alabama. This meeting marked a reconciliation between Bright and the Junta of the London Trades Council, which had worked closely with Karl Marx, and thereby provided a stronger base for the argument that a northern victory was of prime importance to the English workingman. A victory for free labor in America, the argument ran, would have a direct impact on parliamentary reform in the direction of granting political rights to the British common people.[61]

During the first week in April a similar meeting was held at 58. Anti-Slavery Reporter, Apr. 1, 1863; British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book IV, Apr. 20, 1863.

59. British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book IV, Apr. 20, 1863; Anti-Slavery Reporter, Apr. 1, 1863.

60. Villiers and Chesson, Anglo-American Relations, 135; Adams, Great Britain and the American Civil War, II, 177.

61. Villiers and Chesson, Anglo-American Relations, 201; Pole, Lincoln and the Working Classes of Britain, 24.

the Free Trade Hall in Manchester at which George Thompson and Professors F. W. Newman and Goldwin Smith were among the main speakers. In addition to protesting the building of ships for the Confederacy, they concentrated on arguments of special concern to Lancashire. What good would it do to get cotton, they asked, if they could not get corn from the North? To recognize the Confederacy meant certain war with the North, but war would not assure success in breaking the blockade. English workers might be left without either cotton or corn. If free trade were the South's aim, why hadn't those states agitated for it by peaceful means, as the English had done? Always the South was represented as the land of aristocrats allied with English "capitalists, ship-builders and money brokers," while the North was the land of democracy and of opportunity for workingmen. English workers were reminded that the western territories were "the heritage of your descendants" (italics mine) and that southern control of those lands would mean decreasing the area of opportunity and liberty for their own sons.

There was also the appeal to antislavery ideals and necessary sacrifices: England had paid £20,000,000 to free her slaves; the North had paid already over 100,000 lives. As usual, the British press was denounced for pretending to speak for the people. The Times was accused of even suppressing news of northern military victories in order to make it seem that the South was unbeatable. At the end of the meeting a petition to the Commons was drawn up that objected to the Alabama and the Florida and to other ships reported in preparation. Abolitionists credited the "wind that blew from Manchester" as a result of this meeting with stopping the release of yet another ship, the Alexandra.[62]

Similar meetings protesting ships for the Confederacy were held in the spring of 1863 in Liverpool and Glasgow—on the banks of the rivers Mersey and Clyde, where ships were constructed—and a deputation of trade unionists led by John Bright and Professor E. S. Beesly visited Charles Francis Adams to present him with their resolutions.[63] In the autumn the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society drew up two new memorials on the war vessels, which were sent to Earl Russell and to Viscount Palmerston.[64] At the beginning of the new year, 1864, the Anti-Slavery Reporter claimed a victory in the seizure of a steamer called the Pampero, alleged to be destined for the Confederacy. According to them, the Glasgow Emancipation Society had spied on and reported its building, forcing the authorities to move in.[65]

62. Goldwin Smith, War Ships for the Southern Confederacy: Report of a Public Meeting in the Free-Trade Hall, Manchester . . . (Manchester: Union and Emancipation Society, 1863).

While it is true that most of the British press remained pro-South or at least anti-North throughout most of the war, the abolitionists did have some newspapers, periodicals, and influential individual writers on their side. We have noted that the London Morning Star was an abolitionist paper, but its circulation was limited. Of more consequence was the London Daily News, whose New York correspondent was E. L. Godkin. His letters provided a counterbalance to those furnished the Times by W. H. Russell. The Spectator and the Westminster Review also reached a wide audience.[66] Outside London, the Manchester Examiner, Newcastle Chronicle, and Birmingham Post were pro-Union.[67] In addition to writers who were specifically recruited by the antislavery societies, several others voluntarily added the influence of their names, among them Robert Browning and Sir Charles Lyell. Charles Darwin was strongly antislavery but, like Brougham and Buxton, lost his sympathy for the North. Anthony Trollope, after a tour of the United States in 1861, published a two-volume work called North America. He was completely sympathetic to the northern cause but despaired of forcing the South back into the Union.[68]

63. British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book IV, Apr. 20, 1863; Anti-Slavery Reporter, June 1, 1863.

64. British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book IV, Oct. 2, Nov. 6, 1863.

65. Anti-Slavery Reporter, Jan. 1, 1864.

66. Adams, Great Britain and the American Civil War, I, 69–70.

67. Bolt, "British Attitudes to Reconstruction," 9. A new study of British newspapers and the American Civil War is the subject of a doctoral dissertation in progress by Thomas Keiser at the University of Reading.

68. Adams, Great Britain and the American Civil War, I, 70, II, 153; Jordan and Pratt, Europe and the American Civil War, 77–79.

By late 1863 and 1864 there was a definite slackening of pace in antislavery activity. After Gettysburg and Vicksburg there was really no further danger of British recognition of the Confederacy, and hopeful signs loomed larger than discouraging ones. The Emancipation Proclamation had not produced the servile insurrection that Lincoln's critics at first predicted, slaves were being freed as they reached the security of Union lines, and in July, 1864, the much-hated Fugitive Slave Act was repealed. The seizure of the Laird Rams by the British authorities seemed to cinch things. Long before Congress passed the 13th Amendment in March, 1865, the British Anti-Slavery Reporter was exuding confidence that all was ending well.

In the autumn of 1864 Goldwin Smith traveled across the ocean to observe at first hand the presidential campaign and election. His optimistic pro-northern and pro-Lincoln reports strengthened British abolitionist conviction that victory was just around the corner.[69] By this time, also, the economic distress in Lancashire, which had reached its peak in 1862, had eased. By the late summer or early fall of 1863 a balance was reached in production, and by the end of 1863 profitable operations were once more possible. By early 1863 even the Times correspondent from Lancashire was reporting that prospects were brighter than they had been for months and that the worst was over.[70] Military, diplomatic, and economic factors provided solid backing for abolitionist optimism, and they claimed credit for their own efforts in all of these areas.

In the military area they claimed that abolitionist pressure in America had resulted in the use of Negro troops, thus adding another item on the credit side of Lincoln's good intentions and the North's basic belief in democracy, which British abolitionists had then put to good use in their pro-northern propaganda. Nor had these antislavery camps neglected to publicize Jefferson Davis's order that captured Negro troops would not be dealt with as other prisoners of war but would, in fact, be killed. All of these things, they believed, had helped to counteract pro-southern sympathies in England. In the diplomatic area abolitionists recounted the direct pressures they had applied on the British government through deputations and petitions but, more important, their indirect pressure by organizing public opinion and providing channels for its expression. As a result Great Britain had stuck to its policy of neutrality despite interventionist pressures from within the country and particularly from France.

69. Arnold Houltain, Goldwin Smith, His Life and Opinions . . . (London: T. Werner Laurie, [1913]).

70. Arthur W. Silver, Manchester Men and Indian Cotton 1847–1872 (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1966), 175, 225; Times (London), Jan. 3, 1863.

In the economic field abolitionists claimed credit for the fact that the loss of southern cotton was to some extent, at least, compensated for with Indian cotton. Ever since the late eighteenth century they had agitated for the substitution of Indian "free" cotton for American slave-produced cotton. In the 1820s, but especially in the 1840s and 1850s, this idea had been renewed with vigor. When the war came, even though the production of Indian cotton was still not really successful, the idea had taken hold that it could be made so. Belief in the possibility may have deterred both cotton manufacturers and the workers from exerting more pressure to recognize the Confederacy. Their faith in this alternative is evidenced in memorials sent to the government to request aid to facilitate the cotton projects already begun in India. At first the Indian merchants, thinking they no longer had any competition, sent to England their worst cotton—trash and sweepings in some cases—but by 1864 more emphasis was being put on the quality rather than the quantity of Indian cotton.[71]

All in all, the antislavery forces felt they were entitled to share the laurels of victory. Before the war was over, their activities were already shifting to the cause of the future: aid to the freedmen. In May, 1864, Levi Coffin, who had won the unofficial title of "President of the Underground Railroad," arrived from the United States to promote this new cause. He was cordially welcomed, sponsored by the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, and a meeting was arranged to organize the London Freedman's Aid Society. It was held at the home of Dr. Hodgkin, the old colonizationist, and attended by John Bright and Richard Cobden as well as such antislavery leaders as William E. Forster, 71. Silver, Manchester Men and Indian Cotton, 174, 186, 226.

Samuel Gurney, Newman Hall, and James Massie. Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton was named its first president.[72] For the most part the new society was but an extension of the antislavery societies. Such well-known names as Gurney, Buxton, Chesson, Allen, Forster, Smeal, and Chamerovzow still stood out in the new enterprise.[73]

When George Thompson visited the United States in 1864, the old antislavery men felt their cause had finally come full circle. Unlike his treatment in 1835, when he had been hounded out of the country as a radical agitator, now he (and vicariously all abolitionists with him) was honored in high places. The House of Representatives was opened for his reception, and President Lincoln and most of his cabinet were present to hear him speak. He visited Lincoln at the White House, and by invitation of Secretary of War Stanton, Thompson and Garrison accompanied Major Anderson on board the Arago in 1865 to unfurl the Stars and Stripes once more over Fort Sumter.[74] To abolitionists this symbolized the successful climax of Anglo-American cooperation against slavery. Back home in England, antislavery societies disbanded in the atmosphere of euphoria expressed by Goldwin Smith's eulogy: "SLAVERY IS DEAD EVERYWHERE AND FOREVER."

72. Friends Tract Association, Levi Coffin, the Friend of the Slave (London: Headley Brothers, 1915), 39–40 (this pamphlet may be found in the Lady Simon Papers, K/21, Rhodes House Library); Anti-Slavery Reporter, Aug. 1, 1864; British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Minute Book IV, July 1, 1864.

73. Bolt, "British Attitudes to Reconstruction," 182–184.

74. Johnson, William Lloyd Garrison and His Times, 137; George Thompson to [Oliver] Johnson, Mar. 31, 1864, Jenkins Autograph Collection.

Bibliography

Manuscript Collections

American Anti-Slavery Society Records. Boston Public Library.

American Colonization Society Papers. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress.

American Free Produce Association. Minutes, 1838–1846. Microfilm, Friends Historical Library, Swarthmore, Pa.

Anti-Slavery Papers. Cornell University Library, Ithaca, N.Y.

James G. Birney Papers. William L. Clements Library, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor.

Elihu Burritt Letters. Friends House Library, London.

Cadwalader Collection. Historical Society of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia.

Stratford Canning Papers. Public Record Office, London.

Thomas Clarkson Papers. British Museum, London.

Thomas Clarkson Papers. Huntington Library, San Marino, Calif.

Cope Manuscripts. Friends Historical Library, Swarthmore, Pa.

Frederick Douglass Papers. Microfilm, Morris Library, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale. Originals in Howard University Library, Washington, D.C.

Ferdinand J. Dreer Collection. Historical Society of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia.

Estlin Papers. British Records Relating to America. Microfilm, Morris Library, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale. Originals in Dr. Williams Library, London.

Etting Papers. Historical Society of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia.

Friends, Society of. Casual Correspondence. Friends House Library, London.

———. Letters to and from Philadelphia. Friends House Library, London.
———. London Yearly Meeting, Epistles Received. Friends House Library, London.
———. Minutes of a Standing Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings Appointed to Aid in Promoting the Total Abolition of the Slave Trade. Friends House Library, London.
———. Miscellaneous Manuscripts. Friends House Library, London.
———. Miscellaneous Manuscripts. Friends Historical Library, Swarthmore, Pa.
Simon Gratz Autograph Collection. Historical Society of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia.
Great Britain. Foreign Office Archives. Public Record Office, London.
Gurney Manuscripts. Friends House Library, London.
Huskisson Papers. British Museum, London.
Charles Francis Jenkins Autograph Collection. Friends Historical Library, Swarthmore, Pa.
"Autobiography of Benjamin Kite." Friends Historical Library, Swarthmore, Pa.
Francis Lieber Papers. Huntington Library, San Marino, Calif.
Zachary Macaulay Papers. Huntington Library, San Marino, Calif.
James Monroe Papers. New York Public Library.
Lucretia Mott Manuscripts. Friends Historical Library, Swarthmore, Pa.
New York Manumission Society. Minutes. New York Historical Library, New York City.
Robert Peel Papers. British Museum, London.
Pemberton Papers. Historical Society of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia.
Pennsylvania Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery; the Relief of Free Negroes Unlawfully Held in Bondage; and for Improving the Condition of the African Race. Correspondence. Historical Society of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia.
———. Letter Book. Historical Society of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia.
———. Minutes. Historical Society of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia.
Pritchard Letters. Friends House Library, London.
Rhodes House Antislavery Papers. Rhodes House Library, Oxford University.
Moses Sheppard Collection. Friends Historical Library, Swarthmore, Pa.
Spriggs Manuscripts. Friends House Library, London.
Lewis Tappan Papers. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress.
Thompson-Clarkson Collection. Friends House Library, London.
Vaux Papers. Historical Society of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia.
John Greenleaf Whittier Letters. Clarke Collection. Central Michigan University Library, Mt. Pleasant.
Whittier-Taylor Manuscripts. Friends Historical Library, Swarthmore, Pa.
Whittier Manuscripts. Friends Historical Library, Swarthmore, Pa.
Mary Wood Collection. Friends Historical Library, Swarthmore, Pa.

John Woolman journal. Microfilm, Friends Historical Library, Swarthmore, Pa.

Government Publications

GREAT BRITAIN

British and Foreign State Papers.

[Cobbett, William, ed.] Parliamentary History of England, from the Earliest Period to the Year 1803. 36 vols.

[Hansard, T. C., ed.] The Parliamentary Debates from the Year 1803 to the Present Time.

Historical Manuscripts Commission. Report on the Manuscripts of J. B. Fortescue, Esq., Preserved at Dropmore [William Wyndham Grenville Papers]. Vols. VII, VIII, IX. London, 1910–1915.

Journal of the House of Commons.

Parliamentary Papers. Vols. LXII (1862) and LXXII (1863). "Correspondence Relating to the Civil War in the United States of America."

Privy Council. Acts of the Privy Council of England. Colonial Ser., vol. V, 1766–1783. London, 1912.

———. Minutes of Evidence Taken before His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council at the Council Office, Whitehall, in the Matter of the Demerara and Berbice Manumission Order in Council. 1827.

———. An Order of the King in Council, for Consolidating the Several Laws Recently Made for Improving the Condition of the Slaves in His Majesty's Colonies of Trinidad, Berbice, Demerara, Saint Lucia, Cape of Good Hope and Mauritius. Feb. 8, 1830.

———. Proceedings before the Privy Council, on the Subject of Compulsory Manumission in the Colonies of Demerara and Berbice. 1827.

UNITED STATES

American Archives. 4th ser. Washington, D.C., 1837.

American State Papers, Foreign Relations. Vol. V. Washington, D.C., 1838–1861.

Annals of Congress, 1789–1825.

Burnett, Edmund C., ed. Letters of Members of the Continental Congress. 8 vols. Washington, D.C., 1921. Reprinted, Gloucester, Mass., 1963.

Congressional Globe, 1834–1873.

Elliot, Jonathan, ed. The Debates in the Several State Conventions, on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution, as Recommended by the General Convention at Philadelphia, in 1787. Together with the Journal of the Federal Convention, Luther Martin's Letter, Yates Minutes, Congressional Opinions, Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions of '98–99, and Other Illustrations of the Constitution. 5 vols. Philadelphia, 1836.

Farrand, Max, ed. The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787. 4 vols. New Haven, Conn., 1937.
Ford, Worthington C., ed. Journals of the Continental Congress, 1774–1789. 25 vols. Washington, D.C., 1904–1922.
House Documents, no. 86, 20 Cong., 1 sess.
House Executive Documents, no. 19, 20 Cong., 2 sess.; no. 34, 27 Cong., 1 sess.; no. 185, 26 Cong., 1 sess.
House Miscellaneous Documents, no. 212, 53 Cong., 2 sess.
House Reports, no. 283, 27 Cong., 3 sess.
Public Statutes at Large of the United States of America. Boston, 1861.
Register of the Debates in Congress, 1825–1837.
Richardson, James D., ed. A Compilation of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents, 1789–1902. 10 vols. Washington, D.C., 1896–1907.
Senate Documents, nos. 51, 137, 278, 27 Cong., 2 sess.; no. 125, 26 Cong., 2 sess.
Senate Executive Documents, no. 55, 39 Cong., 1 sess.

Newspapers and Periodicals

Abolition Intelligencer and Missionary Magazine (Shelbyville, Ky.).
Abolitionist (Boston).
African Repository and Colonial Journal (Washington, D.C.).
American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Reporter (New York).
Anti-Slavery Advocate (London).
Anti-Slavery Bugle (Salem, Ohio).
Anti-Slavery Examiner (New York).
Anti-Slavery Monthly Reporter (London).
Anti-Slavery Record (New York).
Anti-Slavery Reporter (London).
Anti-Slavery Reporter (New York).
British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Reporter (London).
British Emancipator (London).
British Friend (Glasgow).
Christian Observer (London).
Christian Times (London).
Colonizationist and Journal of Freedom (Boston).
Daily News (London).
Emancipator (Jonesboro, Tenn.).
Emancipator (New York).
Emancipator and Free American (Boston).
Emancipator and Journal of Public Morals (New York).
Emancipator and Weekly Chronicle (Boston).
Free Labor Advocate and Anti-Slavery Chronicle (New Garden, Ind.).
Friend (Philadelphia).

Friend of Man (Utica, N.Y.).
Genius of Universal Emancipation (Greenville, Tenn., and Baltimore).
Gentlemen's Magazine (London).
Glasgow Argus.
Glasgow Sentinel.
Liberator (Boston).
Liberty Bell (Boston).
Maryland Colonization Journal (Baltimore).
Morning Chronicle (London).
Morning Star and Dial (London).
National Anti-Slavery Standard (New York).
National Era (Washington, D.C.).
National Intelligencer (Washington, D.C.).
Niles Weekly Register (Baltimore).
Non-Conformist (London).
Non-Slaveholder (Philadelphia)
North American Review (Boston).
Patriot (London).
Philanthropist (Mt. Pleasant, Ohio).
Quarterly Anti-Slavery Magazine (New York).
Quarterly Review (London).
Sun (London).
Times (London).
West Indian Reporter (London).

Memoirs, Letters, Pamphlets, and Other Contemporary Materials

Abdy, E. S. Journal of a Residence and Tour in the United States of North America, from April, 1833, to October, 1834. 3 vols. London, 1835.

An Abstract of the Evidence Delivered before a Select Committee of the House of Commons, in the Years 1790 and 1791, on the Part of the Petitioners for the Abolition of the Slave Trade. Cincinnati, 1857.

An Account of the Interviews Which Took Place on the Fourth and Eighth of March, between a Committee of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, and the Committee of the Legislature. Boston, [1836].

Adam, William. The Law and Custom of Slavery in British India, in a Series of Letters to Thomas Fowell Buxton, Esq. London, 1840.

Adams, Charles Francis, ed. Memoirs of John Quincy Adams, Comprising Portions of His Diary from 1795 to 1848. 12 vols. Philadelphia, 1877.

———, ed. The Works of John Adams, Second President of the United States: With a Life of the Author, Notes and Illustrations. 10 vols. Boston, 1850–1856.

Adams, Henry, ed. The Writings of Albert Gallatin. 3 vols. Worcester, Mass., 1960.

Ady, John. The Case of Our Fellow-Creatures, the Oppressed Africans, Respectfully Recommended to the Serious Consideration of the Legislature of Great Britain, by the People Called Quakers. London, 1783.

African Institution. Foreign Slave Trade. Abstract of the Information Recently Laid on the Table of the House of Commons, on the Subject of the Slave Trade; Being a Report Made by a Committee Specially Appointed for the Purpose, to the Directors of the African Institution on the 8th of May, 1821, and by Them Ordered to Be Printed as a Supplement to the Annual Report of the Present Year. Tracts on Slavery, vol. XXXVII. London, 1821.

———. Reasons for Establishing a Registry of Slaves in the British Colonies: Being a Report of a Committee of the African Institution. London, 1815.

———. Report of the Committee of the African Institution, Read to the General Meeting on the 15th July, 1807. Together with the Rules and Regulations Which Were Then Adopted for the Government of the Society. London, 1807.

———. Seventh Report of the Directors of the African Institution, Read at the Annual General Meeting on the 24th of March, 1813. London, 1813.

———. Ninth Report of the Directors of the African Institution, Read at the Annual General Meeting Held on the 12th April, 1815. To Which Are Added, an Appendix and a List of Subscribers. London, 1815.

———. Eleventh Report of the Directors of the African Institution, Read at the Annual General Meeting Held on the 26th Day of March, 1817. To Which Are Added an Appendix and a List of Subscribers. London, 1817.

———. Thirteenth Report of the Directors of the African Institution; Read at the Annual General Meeting Held on the 24th Day of March, 1819. To Which Are Added, an Appendix and a List of Subscribers. London, 1819.

———. Seventeenth Annual Report of the Directors of the African Institution, Read at the Annual General Meeting, Held on the 16th Day of May, 1823. With an Account of the Proceedings of the Annual Meeting, and an Appendix. London, 1823.

Albree, John, ed. Whittier Correspondence from the Oak Knoll Collections 1830–1872. Salem, Mass., 1911.

[Allen, William]. Account of a Shooting Excursion on the Mountains near Dromilly Estate in the Parish of Trelawny, and Island of Jamaica in the Month of October, 1824!!! London, 1825.

Allen, William, and Thompson, T. R. H. A Narrative of the Expedition Sent by Her Majesty's Government to the River Niger, 1841. Under the Command of Captain H. D. Trotter. 2 vols. London, 1848.

Allen, William G. The American Prejudice against Color: An Authentic Narrative, Showing How Easily the Nation Got into an Uproar. London, 1853.

American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society. Annual Report of the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, Presented at the General Meeting, Held in Broadway Tabernacle, May 11, 1847, with the Addresses, Resolutions and Treasurer's Report. New York, 1847.

American Anti-Slavery Society. Second Annual Report of the American Anti-Slavery Society; with the Speeches Delivered at the Anniversary Meeting, Held in the City of New York, on the 15th May, 1835, and the Minutes of the Meetings of the Society for Business. New York, 1835.

———. Third Annual Report of the American Anti-Slavery Society; with the Speeches Delivered at the Anniversary Meeting, Held in the City of New York on the 10th May, 1836, and the Minutes of the Meetings of the Society for Business. New York, 1836.

———. Fourth Annual Report of the American Anti-Slavery Society; with the Speeches Delivered at the Anniversary Meeting Held in the City of New York, on the 9th May, 1837, and the Minutes of the Meetings of the Society for Business. New York. 1837.

———. Annual Report Presented to the American Anti-Slavery Society, by the Executive Committee, at the Annual Meeting, Held in New York, May 9, 1855. With an Appendix. New York, 1855.

———. Anti-Slavery Examiner, vol. I, no. 1 (Aug., 1836): To the People of the United States; Or to Such Americans as Value Their Rights, and Dare to Maintain Them. New York, 1836.

———. Letter to Louis Kossuth Concerning Freedom and Slavery in the United States. Boston, 1852.

American Convention for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery, and Improving the Condition of the African Race. Minutes of the Proceedings of a Convention of Delegates from the Abolition Societies Established in Different Parts of the United States, Assembled at Philadelphia, on the First Day of January, One Thousand Seven Hundred and Ninety-four, and Continued by Adjournments, until the Seventh Day of the Same Month Inclusive. Philadelphia, 1794.

———. Minutes of the Proceedings of the Second Convention. Philadelphia, 1795.

———. Minutes of the Proceedings of the Third Convention. Philadelphia, 1796.

———. Minutes of the Proceedings of the Fourth Convention. Philadelphia, 1797.

———. Minutes of the Proceedings of the Fifth Convention. Philadelphia, 1798.

———. Minutes of the Proceedings of the Sixth Convention. Philadelphia, 1800.

———. Minutes of the Proceedings of the Seventh Convention. Philadelphia, 1801.

———. Minutes of the Proceedings of the Eighth Convention. Philadelphia, 1803.

———. Minutes of the Proceedings of the Ninth Convention. Philadelphia, 1804.

———. Minutes of the Proceedings of the Tenth Convention. Philadelphia, 1805.

———. Minutes of the Proceedings of the Thirteenth Convention. Philadelphia, 1812.

———. Minutes of the Proceedings of the Fourteenth American Convention. Philadelphia, 1816.

———. Minutes of the Proceedings of a Special Meeting of the Fifteenth American Convention. Philadelphia, 1818.

———. Minutes of the Eighteenth Session of the American Convention. Philadelphia, 1824.

———. Minutes of the Nineteenth Session of the American Convention. Philadelphia, 1825.

———. Minutes of the Adjourned Session of the Twentieth Biennial American Convention. Philadelphia, 1828.

———. Minutes of the Twenty-second Session of the American Convention. Philadelphia, 1839.

———. To the Free Africans . . . January 6, 1795. [Philadelphia, 1796].

American Tract Society. The Enormity of the Slave Trade, and the Duty of Seeking the Moral and Spiritual Elevation of the Colored Race. Speeches of Wilberforce, and Other Documents and Records. New York, n.d.

Ansprache an die Bewohner Europas über die Moralische Bewerstiehkeit des Sklavenhandels von der Gesellshaft der Freunde in Gross-Britannien und Irrland, gewohnlich Quaker gennant. London, n.d.

Antidote to "West Indian Sketches" Drawn from Authentic Sources, No. VI. Observations on the Ameliorated Condition of the Negroes in the British West India Colonies, etc. London, 1817.

An Appeal, Not to the Government, but to the People of England, on the Subject of West Indian Slavery. London, 1824.

Arguments in Support of the Proposed Bill for the Registration of Slaves in the West Indian Colonies; Being a Reply to the Work of Mr. Chalmers, Entitled Proofs and Demonstrations How Much the Projected Registry of Colonial Negroes Is Unfounded and Uncalled For. London, 1817.

Armistead, Wilson. A Tribute for the Negro: Being a Vindication of the Moral, Intellectual and Religious Capabilities of the Coloured Portion of Mankind; with Particular Reference to the African Race. Manchester, 1848.

[———, ed.] Five Hundred Thousand Strokes for Freedom. A Series of Anti-Slavery Tracts. Of Which Half a Million Are Now Fresh Issued by the Friends of the Negro. London, 1853.

[Asbury, Francis]. An Extract from the Journal of Francis Asbury, Bishop of the Methodist-Episcopal Church in America; from August 7, 1771, to December 29, 1773. Vol. I. Philadelphia, 1792.

Association of Friends. Report of the Proeeedings of the Assoeiation of Friends, for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery, and Improving the Condition of the Free People of Color. Philadelphia, 1841.

[Association of Liverpool]. Negro Slavery; or A View of Some of the More Prominent Features of That State of Society, as It Exists in the United States of Ameriea and in the Colonies of the West Indies, Espeeially in Jamaiea. London, 1823.

[Bacon, Leonard]. Review of Pamphlets on Slavery and Colonization. First Published in the Quarterly Christian Speetator for Mareh 1833. 2nd ed. New Haven, Conn., 1833.

Baird, Robert. Impressions and Experiences of the West Indies and North Ameriea in 1849. Philadelphia, 1850.

Baker, George E., ed. The Works of William H. Seward. 3 vols. New York, 1853.

Balme, Joshua R. American States, Churehes, and Slavery. Edinburgh, 1862.

———. Letters on the Ameriean Republie, or, Common Fallaeies and Monstrous Errors Refuted and Exposed. London, [1863].

Barham, Joseph Facter. Considerations on the Abolition of Negro Slavery, and the Meaus of Practically Effeeting It. London, 1823.

Barnes, Gilbert H., and Dumond, Dwight L., eds. Letters of Theodore Dwight Weld, Angelina Grimké Weld, and Sarah Grimké, 1822–1844. 2 vols. New York, 1934; Magnolia, Mass., 1965.

Bassett, John Spencer, ed. The Correspondenee of Andrew Jackson. 6 vols. Washington, D.C., 1933.

Baxter, Richard. Baxter's Direetions to Slaveholders, Revived; First Printed in London, in the Year 1673. To Which Is Subjoined, a Letter from the Worthy Anthony Benezet, Late of This City, Deceased, to the Celebrated Abbé Raynal, with His Answer, Which Were First Published in the Brussels Gazette, Mareh 7, 1782. Philadelphia, 1785.

Beaumont, Augustus Hardin. Compensation to Slave Owners Fairly Considered in an Appeal to the Common Sense of the People of England. 2nd ed. London, 1826.

Beecher, Henry Ward. Ameriean Rebellion: Report of the Speeches of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Delivered at Publie Meetings in Manehester, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Liverpool, and London; and at the Farewell Breakfasts in London, Manehester and Liverpool. Manchester, 1864.

[Benezet, Anthony]. The Case of Our Fellow-Creatures, the Oppressed Afrieans, Respectfully Recommended to the Serious Consideration of the Legislature of Great Britain, by the People Called Quakers. London, 1783; Philadelphia, 1784.

———. A Caution and a Warning to Great Britain and Her Colonies, in a Short Representation of the Calamitous State of the Enslaved Negroes in the British Dominions. Colleeted from Various Authors, and Submitted to the Serious Consideration of All, More Espeeially of Those in Power. Philadelphia, 1766.

———. Observations on the Inslaving, Importing and Purchasing of Negroes with Some Advice Thereon Extracted from the Yearly Meeting Epistle of London for the Present Year. Also Some Reports on the Absolute Neecessity of Self-Denial, Renouncing the World, and True Charity for All Such as Sincerely Desire to Be Our Blessed Saviour's Disciples. Germantown, Pa., 1759.

———. The Potent Enemies of America Laid Open: Being Some Account of the Baneful Effects Attending the Use of Distilled Spirituous Liquors; and the Slavery of the Negroes; to Which Is Added the Happiness Attending Life, When Dedicated to the Honour of God, and Good of Mankind, in the Sentiments of Some Persons of Eminence near the Close of Their Lives, viz., the Earl of Essex, Count Oxeistern [sic], H. Grotius, D. Brainard, John Lock [sic], &c. Philadelphia, 1774.

———. Serious Considerations on Several Important Subjects; viz. On War and Its Inconsistency with the Gospel. Observations on Slavery. And Remarks on the Nature and Bad Effects of Spirituous Liquors. Philadelphia, 1778.

[———]. A Short Account of That Part of Africa, Inhabited by the Negroes; with Respect to the Fertility of the Country; the Good Disposition of Many of the Natives; and the Manner by Which the Slave Trade Is Carried On. Philadelphia, 1762.

[———]. Short Observations on Slavery, Introductory to Some Extracts from the Writing of the Abbe Raynal, on That Important Subject. [Philadelphia, 1781].

———. Some Historical Account of Guinea, Its Situation, Produce and the General Disposition of Its Inhabitants. With an Inquiry into the Rise and Progress of the SLAVE TRADE, Its Nature and Lamentable Effects. Also a Re-publication of the Sentiments of Several Authors of Note, on This Interesting Subject, Particularly an Extract of a Treatise, by Granville Sharp. Philadelphia, 1771.

[Benton, Thomas Hart]. Thirty Years' View, or, A History of the Working of the American Government for Thirty Years, from 1820 to 1850. 2 vols. New York, 1856.

Bevington, Merle M., ed. The Memoirs of James Stephen Written by Himself for the Use of His Children. London, 1954.

Bible Rights of the Slave or Jewish Servitude & American Slavery Compared by the Author of a Word on Behalf of the Slave. London, n.d.

Bickell, Rev. R. The West Indies as They Are; or A Real Picture of Slavery: But More Particularly, as It Exists in the Island of Jamaica. London, 1825.

Bigelow, John, ed. The Works of Benjamin Franklin. 12 vols. New York, 1904.

Birkbeck, Morris. An Appeal to the People of Illinois on the Question of a Convention. Shawneetown, Ill., 1823.

———. Letters from Illinois. London, 1818.

———. Notes on a Journey in America, from the Coast of Virginia to the Territory of Illinois. 2nd ed. London, 1818.

[Birmingham Anti-Slavery Society]. The Practical Defeat of the Abolition Act, by Colonial Legislation and Stipendiary Magistrates. 2nd ed. Birmingham, 1835.

[———]. Report of the Proceedings of the Great Anti-Slavery Meeting; Held at the Town Hall, Birmingham, on Wednesday, October 14th, 1835; with an Appendix Containing Notices of the Condition of the Apprenticed Labourers in the West Indies, under the Act for No Abolition of Slavery in the British Colonies. Birmingham, 1835.

Birmingham Female Society for the Relief of British Negro Slaves. The Second Report of the Female Society for Birmingham, West Bromwich, Wednesbury, Walsall, and Their Respective Neighborhoods, for the Relief of British Negro Slaves, Established, 1825. Birmingham, n.d.

———. The Fifth Report of the Female Society for Birmingham, West Bromwich, Wednesbury, Walsall, and Their Respective Neighborhoods, for the Relief of British Negro Slaves, Established in 1825. Birmingham, 1830.

———. "What Does Your Sugar Cost?" A Cottage Conversation on the Subject of British Negro Slavery. Birmingham, 1828.

Birney, James G. The American Churches the Bulwark of American Slavery. 3rd American ed. Newburyport, Mass., 1842.

[———]. "Christianus" (pseud.). Brief Statements and Arguments. . . . VIII. England and America. New York, 1857.

Birney, William. James G. Birney and His Times: The Genesis of the Republican Party with Some Account of Abolition Movements in the South before 1828. New York, 1890.

Blake, William O. The History of Slavery and the Slave Trade, Ancient and Modern. The Forms of Slavery That Prevailed in Ancient Nations, Particularly in Greece and Rome. The African Slave Trade and the Political History of Slavery in the United States. Columbus, Ohio, 1860.

Bluett, Thomas. Some Memoirs of the Life of Job, the Son of Solomon the High Priest of Boonda in Africa; Who Was a Slave about Two Years in Maryland; and Afterwards Being Brought to England, Was Set Free, and Sent to His Native Land in the Year 1734. London, [1734].

Bollen, William. Britannia Libera; or, A Defense of the Free State of Man in England, against the Claim of Any Man There as a Slave. London, 1772.

Bourne, George. The Book and Slavery Irreconciliable, with Animadversions upon Dr. Smith's Philosophy. Philadelphia, 1816. Microfilm, Cornell University Library.

[———]. Picture of Slavery in the United States of America. Middletown, Conn., 1834.

Bowditch, William I[ngersol]. Slavery and the Constitution. Boston, 1849.

Bradburn, Samuel. An Address to the People Called Methodists; Concerning the Evil of Encouraging the Slave Trade. Manchester, 1792.

Braithwaite, Joseph B., ed. Memoirs of Joseph John Gurney; with Selections from His Journal and Correspondence. 2 vols. Philadelphia, 1854.

Branagan, Thomas. A Preliminary Essay, on the Oppression of the Exiled Sons of Africa. Consisting of Animadversions on the Impolicy and Barbarity of the Deleterious Commerce and Subsequent Slavery of the Human Species; to Which Is Added, a Desultory Letter Written to Napoleon Bonaparte. Philadelphia, 1804.

———. Serious Remonstrances, Addressed to the Citizens of the Northern States, and Their Representatives: Being an Appeal to Their Natural Feelings, & Common Sense: Consisting of Speculations and Animadversions, on the Recent Revival of the Slave Trade, in the American Republic: With an Investigation Relative to the Consequent Evils Resulting to the Citizens of the Northern States from That Event. Interspersed with a Simplified Plan for Colonizing the Free Negroes of the Northern, in Conjunction with Those Who Have, or May Emigrate from the Southern States, in a Distant Part of the National Territory: Considered as the Only Possible Means of Avoiding the Deleterious Evils Attendant on Slavery in a Republic. Philadelphia, 1805.

Brett-James, Antony. Wellington at War, 1794–1815: A Selection of His Wartime Letters. London, 1961.

Brissot, J. P. (de Warville). Nouveau voyage dans les États-Unis de l'Amerique Septentrionale, fait en 1788; par J. P. Brissot (Warville), citoyen française. 3 vols. Paris, 1791.

Bristed, John. America and Her Resources; or A View of the Agricultural, Commercial, Manufacturing, Financial, Political, Literary, Moral and Religious Capacity and Character of the American People. London, 1818.

British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society. The First Annual Report of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society for the Abolition of Slavery and the Slave Trade, throughout the World. Presented to the General Meeting Held in Exeter Hall, on Wednesday, June 24th, 1840. London, 1840.

———. Second Annual Report. London, 1841.

———. Third Annual Report. London, 1842.

———. Fourth Annual Report. London, 1843.

———. Fifth Annual Report. London, 1844.

———. Eighth Annual Report. London, 1847.

———. Sixteenth Annual Report. London, 1855.

———. Copy of a Letter Addressed by the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society to the London Division of the Provisional Committee of the Proposed Evangelical Alliance. London, 1846.

———. The Export of Coolies from India to Mauritius. London, 1842.

———. London Anti-Slavery Conference. Papers Read and Statements Made on the Principal Subjects Submitted to the Anti-Slavery Confer- ence, Held at the London Tavern on the 29th and 30th of November, 1854. London, n.d.

———. Proceedings of the General Anti-Slavery Convention, Called by the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, and Held in London, from Friday June 12th, to Tuesday, June 23rd, 1840. London, 1841.

———. What the South Is Fighting For. Tracts on Slavery in America, no. 1. London, 1863.

British Colonial Slavery, Compared with That of Pagan Antiquity. London, 1830.

British Opinions of the American Colonization Society. Boston, 1833.

Brock, Robert Alonzo. The Fourth Charter of the Royal African Company of England, September 27, 1672, with Prefatory Note, Exhibiting the Past Relations of Virginia to African Slavery. Virginia Historical Society Collections, n.s., vol. VI.

Brougham, Lord [Henry]. Lord Brougham's Speech in the House of Lords, Monday, January 29, 1838, upon the Slave Trade, with an Abstract of a Discussion Which Ensued. Lindfield, 1838.

———. Opinions of Henry Brougham, Esq. on Negro Slavery. London, 1830.

Brown, William Wells. The Narrative of William W. Brown, a Fugitive Slave. With an introduction by Larry Gara. Reading, Mass., 1969.

Burgess, Thomas. Considerations on the Abolition of Slavery and the Slave Trade, upon Grounds of Natural, Religious and Political Duty. Oxford, 1789.

Burnley, William H. Opinions on Slavery and Emancipation in 1823; Referred to in a Recent Debate in the House of Commons, by Thomas Fowell Buxton, Esq. with Additional Observations, Applicable to the Right Hon. E. G. Stanley's Plan for the Extinction of Slavery. London, 1833.

Buxton, Charles, ed. Memoirs of Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton. London, n.d.

Buxton, Thomas Fowell. The African Slave Trade. 2nd ed. London, 1839.

———. Brief Memoirs of Thomas Fowell Buxton and Elizabeth Fry. London, 1845.

———. The Remedy. London, [1840].

Cadbury, Henry J. "Another Early Quaker Anti-Slavery Document." Journal of Negro History, XXVII (Apr., 1942), 210–215.

———, ed. "John Farmer's First American Journey, 1711–1714." Proceedings of the American Antiquarian Society, LIII (Apr., 1943), 79–95.

———. "John Hepburn and His Book against Slavery, 1715." Proceedings of the American Antiquarian Society, LIX (Apr., 1949), 89–160.

A Calm Inquiry into the Countenance Afforded by the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, to the System of British Colonial Slavery. By a Christian Minister. London, 1832.

[Candler, Isaac]. A Summary View of America: Comprising a Description of the Face of the Country, and of Several of the Principal Cities; and Remarks on the Social, Moral and Political Character of the People: Being the Result of Observations and Enquiries during a Journey in the United States. By an Englishman. London, 1824.

Canning, George. Speech of the Right Hon. George Canning, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, &c. &c. &c. on Laying before the House of Commons the Papers in Explanation of the Measures Adopted by His Majesty's Government with a View of Ameliorating the Condition of the Negro Slaves in the West Indies, on Wednesday, the 17th of March, 1824. To Which Is Added, an Order in Council, for Improving the Condition of the Slaves in Trinidad. London, 1824.

Carey, Henry C. The Slave Trade, Domestic and Foreign: Why It Exists and How It May Be Extinguished. Philadelphia, 1872.

Earl of Carlisle [George William Frederick Howard, Lord Morpeth]. Two Lectures, on the Poetry of Pope, and on His Own Travels in America. Leeds, 1850.

Carpenter, S. D. Logic of History. Five Hundred Political Texts: Being Concentrated Extracts of Abolitionism; also, Results of Slavery Agitation and Emancipation. Together with Sundry Chapters on Despotism, Usurpations and Frauds. 2nd ed. Madison, Wis., 1864.

Chace, Elizabeth Buffum. Anti-Slavery Reminiscences. Central Falls, R.I., 1891.

Chamerovzow, L[ouis] A[lexis], ed. Slave Life in Georgia: A Narrative of the Life, Sufferings, and Escape of John Brown, a Fugitive Slave, Now in England. London, 1855.

Channing, William Ellery. Emancipation. Boston, 1840.

———. Remarks on the Slavery Question in a Letter to Jonathan Phillips, Esq. London, 1839.

Child, Lydia Maria. The Right Way the Safe Way, Proved by Emancipation in the British West Indies, and Elsewhere. New York, 1862.

———, ed. The Oasis. Boston, 1834.

Christy, David. Ethiopia: Her Gloom and Glory, as Illustrated in the History of the Slave Trade and Slavery, the Rise of the Republic of Liberia, and the Progress of African Missions. Cincinnati, 1857.

Clarke, James Freeman. Anti-Slavery Days. A Sketch of the Struggle Which Ended in the Abolition of Slavery in the United States. New York, 1883.

Clarkson, Thomas. The Argument, "That the Colonial Slaves Are Better Off Than the British Peasantry," Answered, from the Royal Jamaica Gazette of June 21, 1823. Negro Slavery, no. XI. London, n.d.

———. The Cries of Africa to the Inhabitants of Europe; or, A Survey of That Bloody Commerce Called the Slave Trade. London, [1822].

———. An Essay on the Impolicy of the African Slave Trade. London, 1788.

[———]. An Essay on the Slavery and Commerce of the Human Species,

Particularly the African, Translated from a Latin Dissertation, Which Was Honoured with the First Prize in the University of Cambridge, for the year 1785, with Additions. London, 1786.

———. The History of the Rise, Progress, and Accomplishment of the Abolition of the African Slave Trade, by the British Parliament. 2 vols. London, 1808.

———. A Letter to the Clergy of Various Denominations, and to the Slave-Holding Planters, in the Southern Parts of the United States of America. London, 1841.

———. "Substance of a Conversation with the Emperor of Russia at the Ancient Prefecture, Aix la Chapelle, Octob. 9, 1818." Miscellaneous Manuscripts, Friends Historical Library, Swarthmore, Pa.

———. Thoughts on the Necessity of Improving the Condition of the Slaves in the British Colonies, with a View to Their Ultimate Emancipation; and on the Practicability, the Safety, and the Advantages of the Latter Measure. London, 1823.

———. "To the Christians and Well-Disposed Citizens of the Northern States of America." Liberty Bell, 1845.

"Clericus." Facts Designed to Exhibit the Real Character and Tendency of the American Colonization Society. Liverpool, 1833.

Condor, Josiah. Wages or the Whip: An Essay on the Comparative Cost and Productiveness of Free and Slave Labour. London, 1833.

Cooper, David. A Serious Address to the Rulers of America, on the Inconsistency of Their Conduct Respecting Slavery: Forming a Contrast between the Encroachments of England on American Liberty, and, American Injustice in Tolerating Slavery. Trenton, N.J., 1783.

Cooper, Thomas. Facts Illustrative of the Condition of the Negro Slaves in Jamaica. London, 1824.

———. Letters on the Slave Trade. Manchester, 1787.

[———]. Negro Slavery; or, A View of Some of the More Prominent Features of That State of Society, as It Exists in the United States of America and in the Colonies of the West Indies, Especially in Jamaica. London, 1823, 1824.

Corner, George W., ed. The Autobiography of Benjamin Rush: His "Travels through Life" together with His Commonplace Book for 1789–1813. Princeton, N.J., 1948.

Cowper, William. The Poetical Works . . . , with a Biographical Notice by the Rev. H. F. Cary, A.M. 2 vols. in 1. New York, n.d.

Crallé, Richard K., ed. Reports and Public Letters of John C. Calhoun. 6 vols. New York, 1856.

[Crevecoeur, Michael Guillaume St. Jean de]. Letters from an American Farmer, Describing Certain Provincial Situations, Manners and Customs, and Conveying Some Idea of the State of the People of North America. Written to a Friend in England, by J. Hector St. John, a Farmer in Pennsylvania. Philadelphia, 1793.

[Cropper, James]. The Correspondence between John Gladstone, Esq., M.P., and James Cropper, Esq., on the Present State of Slavery in the British West Indies and in the United States of America; and on the Importation of Sugar from the British Settlements in India, with an Appendix; Containing Several Papers on the Subject of Slavery. Liverpool, 1824.

———. The Extinction of the American Colonization Society the First Step to the Abolition of American Slavery. London, 1833.

———. Letters Addressed to William Wilberforce, M.P. Recommending the Encouragement of the Cultivation of Sugar in Our Dominions in the East Indies, as the Natural and Certain Means of Effecting the Total and General Abolition of the Slave-Trade. Liverpool, 1822.

———. A Letter to Thomas Clarkson. New York, 1833.

———. The Support of Slavery Investigated. Liverpool, 1824.

———. A Vindication of a Loan of £15,000,000 to the West India Planters, Shewing That It May Not Only Be Lent with Perfect Safety, But with Immense Advantage, Both to the West Indians and to the People of England. London, 1833.

Cuthbert, [Alfred]. Speech of Mr. Cuthbert, of Georgia, on the Petition of the Society of Friends of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, Praying for the Abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia. In Senate, March 7, 1836. Washington, D.C., 1836.

Cuttriss, William. Slavery Inconsistent with Christianity. London, 1825.

Dana, James. The African Slave Trade. A Discourse Delivered in the City of New-Haven, September 9, 1790, before the Connecticut Society for the Promotion of Freedom. By James Dana, D.D., Pastor of the First Congregational Church of Said City. New Haven, Conn., 1791.

Davis, Anthony. Copy of a Letter Addressed to a Member of the Legislative Assembly of Jamaica, by One of Its Members Now in England. London, 1832.

———. The West Indies: Comprising a Detail of Facts in Opposition to Theory. London, 1832.

Day, Thomas. The Dying Negro, a Poem by the Late Thomas Day and John Bicknell, Esquires. To Which Is Added, a Fragment of a Letter on the Slavery of Negroes. London, 1793.

Desultory Sketches and Tales of Barbados. London, 1840.

Dewey, Orville. American Morals and Manners. London, 1854.

Dickens, Charles. Pictures from Italy. And American Notes for General Circulation. London, 1862.

Dickson, William. Letters on Slavery, by William Dickson, Formerly Private Secretary to the Late Hon. Edward Hay, Governor of Barbadoes. To Which Are Added, Addresses to the Whites, and to the Free Negroes of Barbadoes; and Accounts of Some Negroes Eminent for Their Virtues and Abilities. London, 1789.

———. Mitigation of Slavery. London, 1814.

Donnan, Elizabeth, ed. Documents Illustrative of the History of the Slave Trade to America. 4 vols. Washington, D.C., 1930–1935.

Douglass, Frederick. Farewell Speech of Mr. Frederick Douglass, Previously to Embarking on Board the Cambria, upon His Return to America, Delivered at the Valedictory Soiree Given to Him at the London Tavern, on March 30, 1847. London, n.d.

[———]. Life and Times of Frederick Douglass Written by Himself. His Early Life as a Slave, His Escape from Bondage, and His Complete History to the Present Time . . . with an Introduction by Mr. George L. Ruffin of Boston. Hartford, Conn., 1882.

"Dr. [Benjamin] Rush to Dr. Price, Philadelphia, Oct. 15, 1785." American Museum, I (1787), 132–134.

"Dr. Franklin an Abolitionist." Broadside, n.p., n.d.

Drew, Samuel. The Life of the Reverend Thomas Coke, LLD., Including in Detail His Various Travels and Extraordinary Missionary Exertions, in England, Ireland, America, and the West Indies: With an Account of His Death, May 3, 1814, While on a Missionary Voyage to the Island of Ceylon, in the East Indies. Interspersed with Numerous Reflections; and Concluding with an Abstract of His Writings and Character. New York, 1837.

Dudley, Thomas H. Three Critical Periods in Our Diplomatic Relations with England during the Late War. Personal Recollections of Thomas H. Dudley, Late United States Consul at Liverpool. Reprinted from Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, XVII (1893), 34–54.

Dumond, Dwight L., ed. The Letters of James G. Birney, 1831–1857. 2 vols. New York, 1938.

Duncan, Henry. Presbyter's Letters on the West India Question; Addressed to the Right Honorable Sir George Murray, G.C.B., M.P. Colonial Secretary, &c. &c. London, 1830.

Dunn, Henry. Sketches: Part I Joseph Lancaster, on His Contemporaries; Part II William Allen, His Life and Labors. London, 1848.

Edgerton, Walter. A History of the Separation in Indiana Yearly Meeting of Friends, Which Took Place in the Winter of 1842 and 1843, on the Anti-Slavery Question: Containing a Brief Account of the Rise, Spread, and Final Adoption by the Society, of Its Testimony against Slavery; together with a Record of Some of the Principal Facts and Circumstances Relating to That Separation; Embracing the Documents Issued by Both Parties Relative Thereto; and Some Account of the Action of Other Yearly Meetings of Friends, Touching the Controversy & Especially That of London, etc. Cincinnati, 1856.

Edinburgh Emancipation Society. A Voice to the United States of America, from the Metropolis of Scotland; Being an Account of Various Meetings Held at Edinburgh on the Subject of American Slavery, upon the Return of Mr. George Thompson, from His Mission to That Country. Edinburgh, 1836.

Edinburgh Society for Promoting the Mitigation and Ultimate Abolition of Negro Slavery. Considerations on Negro Slavery; with a Brief View of the Proceedings Relative to It, in the British Parliament. Edinburgh, 1824.

———. First Annual Report. Edinburgh, 1824.

Edwards, Bryan. The History, Civil and Commercial, of the British Colonies in the West Indies. 3 vols. 3rd ed. London, 1801.

Edwards, Jonathan. The Injustice and Impolicy of the Slave Trade, and of the Slavery of the Africans. Illustrated in a Sermon Preached before the Connecticut Society for the Promotion of Freedom, and for the Relief of Persons Unlawfully Holden in Bondage, at Their Annual Meeting in New Haven, September 15, 1791. 3rd ed. New Haven, Conn., 1833.

[Emerson, George B.; May, Samuel; and Mumford, Thomas J.] Memoir of Samuel Joseph May. Boston, 1874.

An Enquiry Which of the Two Parties Is Best Entitled to Freedom? The Slave or the Slave Holder? From an Impartial Examination of the Conduct of Each Party, at the Bar of Public Justice. London, 1824.

Estlin, John B. A Brief Notice of American Slavery, and the Abolition Movement. Bristol, 1840.

Evidence upon Oath Touching the Condition and Treatment of the Negro Population of the British West India Colonies. Part I—Island of Jamaica Taken before a Select Committee of the House of Lords, Session, 1832. London, 1833.

Exposure of an Attempt Recently Made by Certain West-Indian Agents to Mislead Parliament in the Subject of Colonial Slavery. London, 1831.

[Farrer, Katherine Eufemia, ed.] Correspondence of Josiah Wedgwood, 1781–1794. London, 1906.

Faux, W. Memorable Days in America: Being a Journal of a Tour to the United States, Principally Undertaken to Ascertain by Positive Evidence the Condition and Probable Prospects of British Emigrants. Including Accounts of Mr. Birkbeck's Settlement in Illinois; and Intended to Shew Men and Things as They Are in America. London, 1823.

Fields, Annie [Mrs. James T.], ed. Life and Letters of Harriet Beecher Stowe. Boston, 1898.

Finney, Charles Grandison. Memoirs. New York, 1876.

[Fisher, Thomas]. The Negroes' Memorial, or Abolitionists' Catechism; by an Abolitionist. London, 1825.

Ford, Paul Leicester, ed. The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. 10 vols. New York, 1894.

Ford, Worthington C., ed. Writings of John Quincy Adams. 8 vols. New York, 1917.

[Fox, William]. An Address to the People of Great Britain, on the Utility of Refraining from the Use of West India Sugar and Rum. London, 1791.

Friends, Society of. To the Commons of Great Britain, in Parliament

Assembled. The Petition of the People Called Quakers. Philadelphia, 1784.

———. A View of the Present State of the African Slave Trade. Published by Direction of a Meeting Representing the Religious Society of Friends in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, &c. Philadelphia, 1824.

Friends' Tract Association. Levi Coffin, the Friend of the Slave. London, 1915.

Garland, [James]. Speech of Mr. Garland of Virginia, in the House of Representatives, December 23d, 1835, in Reply to Mr. Slade, of Vermont, on the Petition, Praying for the Abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia. Washington, D.C., 1836.

Garrison, George P., ed. Diplomatic Correspondence of the Republic of Texas. American Historical Association, Annual Report, 1908.

Garrison, Wendell Phillips, and Garrison, Francis Jackson. William Lloyd Garrison, 1805–1879: The Story of His Life Told by His Children. 4 vols. New York, 1885–1889.

[Garrison, William Lloyd]. "Letters of William Lloyd Garrison to John B. Vashon." Journal of Negro History, XII (Jan., 1927), 33–40.

———. Selections from the Writings and Speeches. Boston, 1852.

———. Thoughts on African Colonization, or An Impartial Exhibition of the Doctrines, Principles and Purposes of the American Colonization Society. Together with the Resolutions, Addresses and Remonstrances of the Free People of Color. Boston, 1832.

———, ed. Lectures of George Thompson, with a Full Report of the Discussion between Mr. Thompson and Mr. Borthwick, the Pro-Slavery Agent, Held at the Royal Amphitheatre, Liverpool (Eng.), and Which Continued for Six Evenings with Unabated Interest: Compiled from Various English Editions. Also, a Brief History of His Connection with the Anti-Slavery Cause in England. Boston, 1836.

Glasgow Emancipation Society. Address by the Committee of the Glasgow Emancipation Society to the Ministers of Religion in Particular and the Friends of Negro Emancipation in General on American Slavery. Glasgow, 1836.

———. Britain and America United in the Cause of Universal Freedom: Being the Third Annual Report of the Glasgow Emancipation Society: Containing Important Information Relative to the Working of the Apprenticeship System in the West Indies; Progress of the Emancipation Cause in the United States; History of the Revolution in Texas; Interesting Movements of Religious Bodies in Great Britain, during the Past Year; the Speeches Delivered at the Annual Meeting, &c. &c. &c. Glasgow, 1837.

Glasgow Ladies' Auxiliary Emancipation Society. Three Years' Female Anti-Slavery Effort, in Britain and America: Being a Report of the Proceedings of the Glasgow Ladies' Auxiliary Emancipation Society, since Its Forma- tion in January, 1834; Containing a Sketch of the Rise and Progress of the American Female Anti-Slavery Societies; and Valuable Communications Addressed by Them, Both to Societies and Individuals in This Country. Glasgow, 1837.

Godwin, Benjamin. The Substance of a Course of Lectures on British Colonial Slavery, Delivered at Bradford, York, and Scarborough. London, 1830.

Godwyn, Morgan. The Negro's & Indians Advocate, Suing for Their Admission into the Church or A Persuasive to the Instructing and Baptizing of the Negro's and Indians in Our Plantations. Shewing That as Compliance Therewith Can Prejudice No Mans Just Interest; So the Wilful Neglecting and Opposing of It, Is No Less Than a Manifest Apostacy from the Christian Faith. London, 1680.

Goodell, William. Slavery and Anti-Slavery; a History of the Great Struggle in Both Hemispheres; with a View of the Slavery Question in the United States. 3rd ed. New York, 1855.

———. Views of American Constitutional Law, in Its Bearing upon American Slavery. Utica, N.Y., 1844.

Grimké, Angelina E. Slavery in America. A Reprint of an Appeal to the Christian Women of the Slave States of America. By Angelina E. Grimké of Charlestown, South Carolina, with Introduction, Notes and Appendix by George Thompson. Recommended to the Special Attention of the Anti-Slavery Females of Great Britain. Edinburgh, 1837.

Grimshaw, Jacob. Remarks on the British West Indian System of Slavery. Haslingden, 1832.

"Guilty or Not Guilty?" A Few Facts and Feelings Regarding the Religious Bodies of America in the Matter of Slavery; Being a Report of an Anti-Slavery Meeting Held in Belgrave Chapel, Leeds, December 10th, 1855. Containing the Addresses of Parker Pillsbury, Esq., and the Rev. G. W. Condor. Leeds, 1855.

Gurley, R. R. Letter to the Hon. Henry Clay, President of the American Colonization Society, and Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, Chairman of the General Committee of the African Civilization Society, on the Colonization and Civilization of Africa. London, 1841.

———. Mission to England, in Behalf of the American Colonization Society. Washington, D.C., 1841.

Gurney, Joseph J. A Journey in North America, Described in Familiar Letters to Amelia Opie. Norwich, 1841.

———. A Winter in the West Indies, Described in Familiar Letters to Henry Clay, of Kentucky. London, 1840.

Hall, Benjamin F., comp. Official Opinions of the Attorneys General of the United States, Advising the President and Heads of Departments in Relation to Their Official Duties. 40 vols. Washington, D.C., 1852–1941.

Hamilton, Stanislaus M., ed. The Writings of James Monroe Including a Collection of His Public and Private Papers and Correspondence. 7 vols. New York, 1903.

Hamilton, Thomas. Men and Manners in America. Edinburgh, 1843.

[Hammond, James]. Governor Hammond's Letters on Southern Slavery: Addressed to Thomas Clarkson, the English Abolitionist. Charleston, S.C., [1845].

Hargrave, Francis. An Argument in the Case of James Somersett, a Negro. Wherein It Is Attempted to Demonstrate the Present Unlawfulness of Domestick Slavery in England. To Which Is Prefixed, a State of the Case. By Mr. Hargrave, One of the Counsel for the Negro. London, 1772.

The Heathen Institution; together with the Slaveholder's Straw; or, The Return of Onesimus. Second Part. Who Helps to Keep the Slaves in Chains? One Word More on the Free Labour Movement. London, n.d.

Henson, Josiah. An Autobiography of the Reverend Josiah Henson. With an introduction by Robin W. Winks. Reading, Mass., 1969.

[Heyrick, Elizabeth]. Apology for Ladies' Anti-Slavery Associations, by the Author of "Immediate, Not Gradual Abolition, etc." London, 1828.

[———]. Immediate, Not Gradual Abolition; or, An Inquiry into the Shortest, Safest, and Most Effectual Means of Getting Rid of West Indian Slavery. Philadelphia, 1836.

Hinton, John Howard. Memoir of William Knibb, Missionary in Jamaica. London, 1847.

Hoare, Prince, ed. Memoirs of Granville Sharp, Esq. Composed from His Own Manuscripts, and Other Authentic Documents in the Possession of His Family and of the African Institution. 2 vols. 2nd ed. London, 1828.

Hodgkin, Thomas. An Inquiry into the Merits of the American Colonization Society and a Reply to the Charges Brought against It. With an Account of the British African Colonization Society. London, 1833.

———. On Negro Emancipation and American Colonization. London, 1832.

———. On the British African Colonization Society. To Which Are Added, Some Particulars Respecting the American Colonization Society; and a Letter from Jeremiah Hubbard, Addressed to a Friend in England, on the Same Subject. London, 1834.

Hodgson, Adam. Letters from North America, Written during a Tour in the United States and Canada. 2 vols. London, 1824.

———. A Letter to M. Jean-Baptiste Say, on the Comparative Expense of Free and Slave Labour. 2nd ed. Liverpool, 1823.

Horton, R. Wilmot. First Letter to the Freeholders of the County of York, on Negro Slavery: Being an Inquiry into the Claims of the West Indians for Equitable Compensation. London, 1830.

———. Second Letter to the Freeholders of the County of York, on Negro Slavery: Being an Inquiry into the Claims of the West Indians for Equitable Compensation. London, 1830.

Houltain, Arnold. Goldwin Smith, His Life and Opinions . . . to Which Is Appended "U.S. Notes" Being Goldwin Smith's Journal during His First Visit to America in 1864. London, [1913].

Howick, Viscount. Corrected Report of the Speech of Viscount Howick, in the House of Commons, May 14, 1833, on Colonial Slavery, with an Appendix, Containing a Plan for the Abolition of Slavery. London, 1833.

Hunt, Gaillard, ed. The Writings of James Madison Comprising His Public Papers and His Private Correspondence, Including Numerous Letters and Documents Now for the First Time Printed. 9 vols. New York, 1900–1910.

Indiana Yearly Meeting of Anti-Slavery Friends. Address to the Members of the Society of Friends Individually Constituting London Yearly Meeting. [1844]. Microfilm, Friends House Library, Swarthmore, Pa.

The Injurious Effects of Slave Labour: An Impartial Appeal to the Reason, Justice, and Patriotism of the People of Illinois on the Injurious Effects of Slave Labour. London, 1824.

Jay, John. The Progress and Results of Emancipation in the English West Indies. New York, 1842.

[Jay, William]. The American Tract Society, Withdrawal from, by the Hon. Judge Jay, on the Ground of Its Alliance with the Slave Power; Proved by the Expurgation of All Anti-Slavery Sentiment from Its Publications, and Its Refusal to Bear Any Testimony in Opposition to the Sin of Slaveholding. London, n.d.

[———]. The Creole Case, and Mr. Webster's Despatch; with the Comments of the N.Y. American. New York, 1842.

———. A Review of the Causes and Consequences of the Mexican War. Boston, 1849.

———. A View of the Action of the Federal Government, in Behalf of Slavery. New York, 1839.

Jeremie, John. Four Essays on Colonial Slavery. London, 1831.

Johnson, John F. Proceedings of the General Anti-Slavery Convention, Called by the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, and Held in London, from Tuesday, June 13th, to Tuesday, June 20th, 1843. London, 1844.

Johnson, Oliver. William Lloyd Garrison and His Times; or, Sketches of the Anti-Slavery Movement in America, and of the Man Who Was Its Founder and Moral Leader. Boston, 1880.

Johnston, Henry P., ed. The Correspondence and Public Papers of John Jay. 4 vols. New York, 1890–1893.

[Jones, Absalom, and Allen, Richard]. A Narrative of the Proceedings of the Black People during the Late Awful Calamity in Philadelphia, in the Year 1793; and a Refutation of Some Censures, Thrown upon Them in Some Late Publications. London, 1794.

[Keith, George]. An Exhortation & Caution to Friends Concerning Buying or Keeping of Negroes. Philadelphia Monthly Meeting, Aug. 13, 1693.

Reprinted in Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, XIII (1890), 265–270.

Knutsford, Viscountess [Margaret Jean]. Life and Letters of Zachary Macaulay by His Granddaughter. London, 1900.

Ladies' Society to Aid Fugitives from Slavery. London, 1855.

The Latest Official Accounts from Sierra Leone. [London, n.d.]

Laws of the United States, the State of New York, and New Jersey, Relative to Slaves and the Slave Trade. New York, 1811.

Lay, Benjamin. All Slave-Keepers That Keep the Innocent in Bondage, Apostates Pretending to Lay Claim to the Pure and Holy Christian Religion; of What Congregation So Ever; but Especially in Their Ministers, by Whose Example the Filthy Leprosy and Apostacy Is Spread Far and Near; It Is a Notorious Sin, Which Many of the True Friends in Christ, and His Pure Truth, Called Quakers, Has Been for Many Years, and Still Are Concerned to Write and Bear Testimony against, as a Practice So Gross and Hurtful to Religion and Destructive to Government, beyond What Words Can Set Forth, or Can Be Declared Of by Men or Angels, and Yet Lived In by Ministers and Magistrates in America. The Leaders of the People Cause Them to Err. Written for a General Service, by Him That Truly and Sincerely Desires the Present and Eternal Welfare and Happiness of All Mankind, All the World Over, of All Colours, and Nations, as His Own Soul. Philadelphia, 1737.

[Lee, Arthur]. Extract from an Address in the Virginia Gazette, of March 19, 1767. N.p., n.d.

Leicester Auxiliary Anti-Slavery Society. An Address on the State of Slavery in the West India Islands. London, 1824.

A Letter from Lord Denman to Lord Brougham, on the Final Extinction of the Slave Trade. London, 1848.

Letter from the Secretary of the Navy, Transmitting Copies of the Instructions Which Have Been Issued to Naval Commanders, upon the Subject of Importation of Slavery Made in Pursuance of a Resolution of the House of Representatives, of the Fourth January, Instant. Washington, D.C., 1819.

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, Transmitting the Information Called for by the Resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 4th Instant, in Relation to Ships Engaged in the Slave Trade, Which Have Been Seized and Condemned, and the Disposition Which Has Been Made of the Negroes, by the Several State Governments, under Whose Jurisdiction They Have Fallen. January 21, 1819. Washington, D.C., 1819.

Letter to a Member of the Congress of the United States of America, from an English Clergyman; Including a Republication, with Considerable Additions, of the Tract Entitled 'Every Man His Own Property.' London, 1835.

Liverpool Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery. Declaration of the Objects . . . 25th March, 1823. Liverpool, [1823].

Lloyd, William. Letters from the West Indies, during a Visit in the Autumn of MDCCCXXXVI, and the Spring of MDCCCXXXVII. London, 1839.

London Anti-Slavery Society. Negro Apprenticeship in the British Colonies. London, 1838.

———. The Progress of Colonial Reform: Being a Brief View of the Real Advance Made since May 15, 1823, in Carrying into Effect the Recommendations of His Majesty, the Unanimous Resolutions of Parliament, and the Universal Prayer of the Nation, with Respect to Negro Slavery. London, 1826.

[Macarty, Capt.] An Appeal to the Candour and Justice of the People of England, in Behalf of the West India Merchants and Planters, Founded on Plain Facts and Incontrovertible Arguments. . . . London, 1792.

Macaulay, Kenneth. The Colony of Sierra Leone Vindicated from the Misrepresentations of Mr. Macqueen of Glasgow. London, 1827.

[Macaulay, Zachary]. East and West India Sugar; or, A Refutation of the Claims of the West India Colonists to a Protecting Duty on East India Sugar. London, 1823.

———. A Letter to His Royal Highness the Duke of Gloucester, President of the African Institution from Zachary Macaulay, Esq. Occasioned by a Pamphlet Lately Published by Dr. Thorpe, Late Judge of the Colony of Sierra Leone, Entitled "A Letter to Wm. Wilberforce, Esq." 2nd ed. enlgd. London, 1815.

[———]. A Letter to William W. Whitemore, Esq., M.P. Pointing Out Some of the Erroneous Statements Contained in a Pamphlet by Joseph Marryat, Esq. M.P. Entitled "A Reply to the Arguments Contained in Various Publications, Recommending an Equalization of the Duties on East and West India Sugars." London, 1823.

[———]. Review of Such Parts of Lieutenant Fr. Hall's 'Travels in Canada and the United States' and of Mr. Fearon's 'Sketches of America' as Have Respect to the Condition of the Negro Population. Extracted from the Christian Observer for Feb., 1819. London, 1819.

M[c]Donnell, Alexander. An Address to the Members of Both Houses of Parliament on the West India Question. 2nd ed. London, 1830.

———. Compulsory Manumission; or An Examination of the Actual State of the West India Question. London, 1827.

———. Considerations on Negro Slavery with Authentic Reports, Illustrative of the Actual Condition of the Negroes in Demerara. Also, an Examination into the Propriety and Efficacy of the Regulations Contained in the Late Order in Council Now in Operation in Trinidad. To Which Are Added, Suggestions on the Proper Mode of Ameliorating the Condition of the Slaves. London, 1824.

———. Emancipation of the Negro Slaves in the West India Colonies Considered, with Reference to Its Impolicy and Injustice; in Answer to Mr. Wilberforce's Appeal. By the Author of 'A Statement of the Claims of the West India Colonies to a Protecting Duty against East India Sugar.' No. I. London, 1824.

———. A Letter to Thomas Fowell Buxton, Esq., M.P. in Refutation of His Allegations Respecting the Decrease of the Slaves in the British West India Colonies. London, 1833.

McIntyre, J. W., ed. The Writings and Speeches of Daniel Webster. 18 vols. Boston, 1903.

Mackenzie, Charles. Notes on Haiti, Made during a Residence in That Republic. 2 vols. London, 1830.

McKitrick, Eric L., ed. Slavery Defended: The Views of the Old South. Englewood Cliffs, N.J., 1963.

Madden, R. R. The Island of Cuba: Its Resources, Progress, and Prospects, Considered in Relation to the Influence of Its Prosperity on the Interests of the British West India Colonies. London, 1849.

———. A Letter to W. E. Channing, D.D., on the Subject of the Abuse of the Flag of the United States in the Island of Cuba, and the Advantage Taken of Its Protection in Promoting the Slave Trade. Boston, 1839.

———. The Memoirs of Richard Robert Madden (Chiefly Autobiographical) from 1796 to 1886. Edited by Thomas More Madden. London, 1891.

———. A Twelvemonth's Residence in the West Indies, during the Transition from Slavery to Apprenticeship; with Incidental Notices of the State of Society, Prospects, and Natural Resources of Jamaica and Other Islands. 2 vols. London, 1835.

Man Stealing. An Appeal to Lord Denman on Occasion of His Recent Letter to Lord Brougham on the Slave Trade. London, n.d.

Marryat, Frederick. A Diary in America. With Remarks on Its Institutions. Reprinted, New York, 1962.

Marryat, Joseph. An Examination of the Report of the Berbice Commissioners, and an Answer to the Letters of James Stephen, Esq. Respecting the Crown Estates in the West Indies, Published in the Courier, under the Signature of "Truth." London, 1817.

———. More Thoughts, Occasioned by Two Publications Which the Authors Call "An Exposure of Some of the Numerous Misstatements and Misrepresentations Contained in a Pamphlet Commonly Known by the Name of Mr. Marryat's Pamphlet, Entitled Thoughts &c" and "A Defense of the Bill for the Registration of Slaves." London, 1816.

Martin, Bernard, and Spurrell, Mark, eds. The Journal of a Slave Trader (John Newton) 1750–1754. With Newton's "Thoughts upon the African Slave Trade." London, 1962.

Martineau, Harriet. A History of the American Compromises, Reprinted with Additions from the Daily News. London, 1856.

———. The Martyr Age of the United States. Boston, 1839.

———. Retrospect of Western Travel. 2 vols. London, 1838.

———. Views of Slavery and Emancipation; from "Society in America." New York, 1837.

Maryland Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery. At a Meeting . . . on the 4th of February, 1792. Baltimore, [1792].

Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society. Fourth Annual Report of the Board of Managers . . . , with Some Account of the Annual Meeting, January 20, 1836. Boston, 1836.

———. Thirteenth Annual Report, Presented . . . by Its Board of Managers, January 22, 1845. With an Appendix. Boston, 1845.

———. Twentieth Annual Report, Presented . . . by Its Board of Managers, January 28, 1852. Boston, 1852.

Massie, James W. America: The Origin of Her Present Conflict; Her Prospect for the Slave, and Her Claim for Anti-Slavery Sympathy; Illustrated by Incidents of Travel, during a Tour in the Summer of 1863, throughout the United States, from the Eastern Boundaries of Maine to the Mississippi. London, 1864.

———. The American Crisis, in Relation to the Anti-Slavery Cause. London, 1862.

May, Samuel J. Emancipation in the British W. Indies, August 1, 1834. An Address, Delivered in the First Presbyterian Church in Syracuse, on the First of August, 1845. Syracuse, N.Y., 1845.

———. Some Recollections of Our Antislavery Conflict. Boston, 1869.

Mill, John Stuart. "The Contest in America." Fraser's Magazine, LXV (Feb., 1862), 258–268.

Montgomery, James. The West Indies, by James Montgomery; and Other Poems, on the Abolition of the Slave Trade, by James Graham and E. Benger. New York, 1810.

More, Hannah. Slavery, a Poem. Philadelphia, 1788.

Morris, Capt. Thomas. Quashy, or The Coal-Black Maid. A Tale. London, 1796.

Morse, Jedidiah. A Discourse, Delivered at the African Meeting-House, in Boston, July 14, 1808, in Grateful Celebration of the Abolition of the African Slave Trade, by the Governments of the United States, Great Britain and Denmark. Boston, 1808.

Mortimer, G. F. W. The Immediate Abolition of Slavery, Compatible with the Safety and Prosperity of the Colonies in a Letter to the Representatives of the Southern Division of Northumberland, and of the Town and Country of Newcastle on Tyne. Newcastle upon Tyne, 1833.

Earl of Mulgrave. The Speech of the Earl of Mulgrave, etc., etc., etc. Delivered at Freemason's Hall, on Friday, the 1st of August, 1834. At a Public Dinner of the Anti-Slavery Society in Celebration of the Day. London, 1834.

Murray, Charles Augustus. Travels in North America during the Years 1834–1835, and 1836. Including a Summer Residence with the Pawnee Tribe of Indians, in the Remote Prairies of the Missouri, and a Visit to Cuba and the Azore Islands. 2 vols. London, 1839.

Needles, Edward, comp. An Historical Memoir of the Pennsylvania Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery; the Relief of Free Negroes Unlawfully Held in Bondage, and for Improving the Condition of the African Race. Philadelphia, 1848.

The New Annual Register, or General Repository of History, Politics, and Literature, for the Year 1814. To Which Is Prefixed the History of Knowledge, Learning, Taste, and Science in Great Britain, during the Reign of George III. London, 1815.

The New Annual Register, or General Repository of History, Politics, and Literature for the Year 1815. To Which Is Prefixed the History of Knowledge, Literature, Taste, and Science, in Great Britain, during the Reign of George III. London, 1816.

Newton, John. Thoughts upon the African Slave Trade. London, 1788.

New York State Anti-Slavery Society. Address of the Peterboro State Convention to the Slaves and Its Vindication. Cazenovia, 1842.

Nickolls, Robert Boucher. A Letter to the Treasurer of the Society Instituted for the Purpose of Effecting the Abolition of the Slave Trade. London, [1787].

Notions of the Americans: Picked Up by a Travelling Bachelor. 2 vols. Philadelphia, 1833.

O'Connell, Daniel. The Testimony of Daniel O'Connell the Liberator of Ireland, against the Infamous System of American Slavery. N.p., 1838.

Opie, Amelia. The Negro Boys' Tale; a Poem, Addressed to Children. London, 1824.

Owen, Robert Dale. The Wrong of Slavery, the Right of Emancipation, and the Future of the African Race in the United States. Philadelphia, 1864.

[Parsons, Theodore]. A Forensic Dispute on the Legality of Enslaving the Africans, Held at the Public Commencement in Cambridge, New-England, July 21st, 1773. Boston, [1773].

Penney, Norman, ed. The Journal of George Fox. 2 vols. Cambridge, 1911.

Pennsylvania Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery, and the Relief of Free Negroes, Unlawfully Held in Bondage. "Constitution. . . ." American Museum, I (1787), 460–462.

Peters, Richard, reporter. Reports of Cases Argued and Adjudged in the Supreme Court of the United States, January Term 1841. New York, 1903.

Phillips, Wendell. Can Abolitionists Vote or Take Office under the United States Constitution? Anti-Slavery Examiner, no. 13. New York, 1845.

———. The Constitution a Pro-Slavery Compact. Or Selections from the Madison Papers, &c. Anti-Slavery Examiner, no. 11. New York, 1844.

———. Speeches, Lectures and Letters. Boston, 1863.

Pierce, Edward L., ed. Memoir and Letters of Charles Sumner. 4 vols. Boston, 1877.

Plain Statement of the Rights &c. Claimed by Our Colonists, under the Charters Granted to Them by Our Sovereigns; and the Light in Which Those Rights &c. Have Been Viewed by the Parent State, in Various Statutes, More Especially in Those of the 18th Geo. III, Chap. 11, 12 & 13. London, 1833.

Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. General Assembly. Testimony . . . on the Subject of Slavery. Philadelphia, 1858.

Price, Rev. Thomas. Slavery in America: With Notices of the Present State of Slavery and the Slave Trade throughout the World. London, 1837.

Proceedings of the Anti-Slavery Meeting Held in Stacy Hall, Boston, on the Twentieth Anniversary of the Mob of October 21, 1835. Boston, 1855.

Proceedings of the State Disunion Convention, Held at Worcester, Massachusetts, January 15, 1857. Boston, 1857.

The Progress of Colonial Reform; Being a Brief View of the Real Advances Made since May 15, 1823, in Carrying into Effect the Recommendations of His Majesty, the Unanimous Resolutions of Parliament, and the Universal Prayer of the Nation, with Respect to Negro Slavery. London, 1826.

Quincy, Edmund. An Examination of the Charges of Mr. John Scoble & Mr. Lewis Tappan against the American Anti-Slavery Society. 2nd ed. London, 1852.

Ramsay, James. An Address on the Proposed Bill for the Abolition of the Slave Trade; Humbly Submitted to the Consideration of the Legislature. London, 1788.

———. An Essay on the Treatment and Conversion of African Slaves in the British Sugar Colonies. London, 1784.

Raynal, Guillaume Thomas François. Histoire philosophique et politique, des établissemens & du commerce des Européens dans les deux Indes. 7 vols. The Hague, 1774.

Reed, Andrew, and Matheson, James. A Narrative of the Visit to the American Churches, by the Deputation from the Congregational Union of England and Wales. 2 vols. London, 1835.

Remarks on an Address to the Members of the New Parliament, on the Proceedings of the Colonial Department, with Respect to the West India Question. By a Member of the Late Parliament. London, 1826.

Remarks on That Article in the Late Treaty of Peace, Which Permits a French Slave Trade for Five Years. From the Christian Observer for June last. July, 1814. Kendal, [1814].

Remarks on the Slave Trade and the Slavery of the Negroes. In a Series of Letters [from Africanus to Grenville [sic] Sharp]. London, 1788.

Report of a Public Meeting Held at Finsbury Chapel, Moorfields, to Receive Frederick Douglass, the American Slave, on Friday, May 22, 1846. London, 1846.

Report of the Agency Committee of the Anti-Slavery Society, Established in June, 1831, for the Purpose of Disseminating Information by Lectures on Colonial Slavery. London, 1832.

Report of the Twenty-third National Anti-Slavery Bazaar. Boston, 1857.

Requited Labor Convention. Address to Abolitionists. Philadelphia, 1838.

A Review of the Report of a Selcct Committee of the House of Commons, on the State of the West India Colonies, Ordered to Be Printed, 13th April, 1832; or, The Interests of the Country and the Prosperity of the West India Planters Mutually Secured by the Immediate Abolition of Slavery. Liverpool, 1833.

Reynolds, E. W. The True Story of the Barons of the South; or, The Rationale of the American Conflict. Boston, 1862.

[Rice, David]. Rice's Slavery Inconsistent with Justice and Good Policy; Proved by a Speech Delivered in the Convention, Held at Danville, Kentucky. London, 1793.

Richard, Henry, ed. Memoirs of Joseph Sturge. London, 1864.

Romilly, Sir Samuel. Memoirs of the Life of Sir Samuel Romilly, Written by Himself; with a Selection from His Correspondence. 3 vols. London, 1840.

The Rural Code of Haiti; in French and English. With a Prefatory Letter to the Right Hon. the Earl Bathurst, K.G. London, 1827.

Salley, A. S., ed. "Diary of William Dillwyn during a Visit to Charles Town in 1772." South Carolina Historical and Genealogical Magazine, XXXVI (1935).

Sanborn, F. B. Emancipation in the West Indies. Concord, Mass., 1862.

Scott, John A., ed. Journal of a Residence on a Georgia Plantation in 1838–1839 by Frances Anne Kemble. New York, 1961.

Senior, Nassau W. American Slavery: A Reprint of an Article on "Uncle Tom's Cabin," of Which a Portion Was Inserted in the 206th Number of the "Edinburgh Review"; and of Mr. Sumner's Speech on the 19th and 20th of May, 1856, with a Notice of the Events Which Followed That Speech. London, [1862].

Sewall, Samuel. "The Selling of Joseph." Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society, VII (1863–1864), 161–162.

Seward, Frederick W., ed. William H. Seward: An Autobiography from 1801 to 1834. With a Memoir of His Life, and Selections from His Letters, 1831–1846. New York, 1891.

Sharp, Granville. The Just Limitations of Slavery in the Laws of God Compared with the Unbounded Claims of the African Traders and British American Slaveholders. With a Copious Appendix: Containing, an Answer to the Rev. Mr. Thompson's Tract in Favour of the African Slave Trade. Letters Concerning the Lineal Descent of the Negroes from the Sons of

Ham. The Spanish Regulations for the Gradual Enfranchisement of Slaves in American Reports of Determinations in the Several Courts of Law against Slavery, etc. London, 1776.

———. The Law of Liberty; or, Royal Law, by Which All Mankind Will Certainly Be Judged! Earnestly Recommended to the Serious Consideration of All Slaveholders and Slave Dealers. London, 1776.

———. Letter from Granville Sharp, Esq. of London, to the Maryland Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery, and the Relief of Free Negroes and Others, Unlawfully Held in Bondage. Baltimore, 1793.

———. A Presentation of the Injustice and Dangerous Tendency of Tolerating Slavery; or of Admitting the Least Claim of Private Property in the Persons of Men, in England. London, 1769.

[———]. A Short Sketch of Temporary Regulations (Until Better Shall Be Proposed) for the Intended Settlement on the Grain Coast of Africa, near Sierra Leona. 2nd ed. London, 1786.

Sierre Leone Company. Substance of the Report Delivered by the Court of Directors of the Sierre Leone Company, to the General Court of Proprietors, on Thursday, March 27, 1794. Philadelphia, 1795.

Sismondi, J. C. L. Simonde de. De l'interêt de la France à l'egard de la traite des Negres, par J. C. L. Simonde de Sismondi. Paris, 1814.

Slave Law of Jamaica: With Proceedings and Documents Relative Thereto. London, 1828.

Smith, Goldwin. The Civil War in America: An Address Read at the Last Meeting of the Manchester Union and Emancipation Society. London, 1866.

———. Does the Bible Sanction American Slavery? Oxford, 1863.

———. War Ships for the Southern Confederacy: Report of a Public Meeting in the Free-Trade Hall, Manchester; with Letters from Professor Goldwin Smith to the "Daily News." Manchester, 1863.

[Society for the Mitigation and Gradual Abolition of Slavery throughout the British Dominions]. Account of the Receipts and Disbursements of the Anti-Slavery Society, for the Years 1823, 1824, 1825, & 1826: With a List of Subscribers. N.p., n.d.

———. Report of the Committee . . . , Read at the General Meeting of the Society, Held on the 25th Day of June, 1824, together with an Account of the Proceedings Which Took Place at That Meeting. London, 1824.

———. Second Report of the Committee . . . , Read at the General Meeting of the Society Held on the 30th Day of April, 1825. London, 1825.

———. Substance of the Debate in the House of Commons, on the 15th May, 1823, on a Motion for the Mitigation and Gradual Abolition of Slavery throughout the British Dominions with a Preface and Appendixes, Containing Facts and Reasonings Illustrative of Colonial Bondage. London, 1823.

Sparks, Jared, ed. The Writings of George Washington; Being His Correspondenee, Addresses, Messages, and Other Papers, Offieial and Private, Seleeted and Published from the Original Manuseripts; with a Life of the Author, Notes and Illustrations. 12 vols. Boston, 1834–1837.

Stanley, E[dward]. Journal of a Tour in Ameriea, 1824–1825. Privately printed, 1930.

Stanton, Elizabeth Cady. Eighty Years and More, 1815–1897; Reminiseenees of Elizabeth Cady Stanton. New York, 1898.

A Statement of the Claims of the West India Colonies to a Proteeting Duty against East India Sugar. London, 1823.

A Statement of the Deerease of the Slave Population in the Sugar Colonies. London, 1832.

Stebbins, G. B. Faets and Opinions Touehing the Real Origin, Charaeter, and Influenee of the Ameriean Colonization Soeiety: Views of Wilberforee, Clarkson, and Others, and Opinions of the Free People of Color of the United States. Boston, 1853.

Stephen, George. Antislavery Reeolleetions; in a Series of Letters, Addressed to Mrs. Beeeher Stowe, Written by Sir George Stephen; at Her Request. London, 1854.

[Stephen, James]. The Crisis of the Sugar Colonies; or, An Enquiry into the Objeets and Probable Effeets of the Freneh Expedition to the West Indies; and Their Conneetion with the Colonial Interests of the British Empire. To Whieh Are Subjoined, Sketehes of a Plan for Settling the Vaeant Lands of Trinidada. In Four Letters to the Right Hon. Henry Addington, Chaneellor of the Exehequer &e. London, 1802.

———. A Defense of the Bill for the Registration of Slaves . . . in Letters to William Wilberforee Esq. M.P. Letter the First. London, 1816.

———. England Enslaved by Her Own Slave Colonies: An Address to the Eleetors and People of the United Kingdom. London, 1826.

———. Extraets from a West India Plantation Journal, Kept by the Manager: Showing the Treatment of the Slaves and Its Fatal Consequenees. London, n.d.

———. The Slavery of the British West India Colonies Delineated, as It Exists Both in Law and Praetiee, and Compared with the Slavery of Other Countries, Antient and Modern. 2 vols. London, 1824–1830.

———. The Speeeh of James Stephen, Esq., at the Annual Meeting of the Afriean Institution, at Free-Mason's Hall, on the 26th Mareh, 1817. London, 1817.

———. West Indian Pretensions Refuted; Being an Extraet from the Prefaee of a Work Entitled "The Slavery of the British West-India Colonies Delineated, as It Exists in Law and Praetiee, and Compared with the Slavery of Other Countries, Aneient and Modern." London, 1824.

Stephens, Ann S. Vietor Hugo's Letter on John Brown, with Mrs. Ann S. Stephens' Reply. New York, 1860.

Story, William W., ed. Life and Letters of Joseph Story. 2 vols. Boston, 1851.

Stowe, Harriet Beecher. Uncle Tom's Cabin: A Tale of Life among the Lowly. With a Preface by . . . the Earl of Carlisle. N.p., n.d.

Stuart, C[harles]. A Letter to Thomas Clarkson by James Cropper. And Prejudice Vincible; or The Practicability of Conquering Prejudice by Better Means Than by Slavery and Exile; in Relation to the American Colonization Society. Liverpool, 1832.

———. Liberia; or, The American Colonization Scheme Examined and Exposed. A Full and Authentic Report of a Lecture Delivered by C. Stuart, Esq., at a Public Meeting in the Rev. M. Anderson's Chapel, Glasgow, 15th April, 1833. Glasgow, 1833.

———. "On the Abolition of Slavery by Great Britain." Quarterly Anti-Slavery Magazine, I (Oct., 1835), 3–21.

———. "On the Colored People of the United States." Quarterly Anti-Slavery Magazine, II (Oct., 1836), 9–22.

———. "On the Use of Slave Produce." Quarterly Anti-Slavery Magazine, II (Jan., 1837), 153–175.

———. Prejudice Vincible; or The Practicality of Conquering Prejudice by Better Means Than by Slavery and Exile; in Relation to the American Colonization Society. New York, 1833.

———. Remarks on the Colony of Liberia and the American Colonization Society with Some Account of the Settlement of Coloured People, at Wilberforce, Upper Canada. London, 1832.

———. The West India Question. Immediate Emancipation Would Be Safe for the Masters;—Profitable for the Masters;—Happy for the Slaves;—Right in the Government;—Advantageous to the Nation;—Would Interfere with No Feelings but Such as Are Disgraceful and Destructive;—Cannot Be Postponed without Continually Increasing Danger. An Outline for Immediate Emancipation; and Remarks on Compensation. New Haven, Conn., 1833.

Sturge, Joseph. A Visit to the United States in 1841. London, 1842.

Sturge, Joseph, and Harvey, Thomas. The West Indies in 1837; Being the Journal of a Visit to Antigua, Montserrat, Dominica, St. Lucia, Barbadoes, and Jamaica; Undertaken for the Purpose of Ascertaining the Actual Condition of the Negro Population in Those Islands. 2nd ed. London, 1838.

Substance of the Debates on a Resolution for Abolishing the Slave Trade, Which Was Moved in the House of Commons on the 10th June, 1806, and in the House of Lords on the 24th June, 1806. With an Appendix, Containing Notes and Illustrations. London, 1806.

[Talleyrand, Charles Maurice de]. Mémoires du prince de Talleyrand publies avec une preface et des notes par le duc de Broglie de l'Academie Française. 5 vols. Paris, 1891–1892.

Tappan, Lewis. Reply to Charges Brought against the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, &c &c &c. With an Introduction by John Scoble. London, 1852.

Taylor, John. Negro Emancipation and West Indian Independence the True Interests of Great Britain. 3rd ed. Liverpool, 1824.

Taylor, Tom, ed. The Autobiography and Memoirs of Benjamin Robert Haydon (1786–1846). 2 vols. New York, [1926].

Thome, James A., and Kimball, J. Horace. Emancipation in the West Indies. A Six Months Tour in Antigua, Barbadoes, and Jamaica, in the Year 1837. New York, 1838.

Thompson, George. Letters and Addresses by George Thompson, during His Mission in the United States, from Oct. 1st, 1834, to Nov. 27, 1835. Boston, 1837.

———. Speeches of Messrs. Thomson [sic] & Borthwick on the Question of Colonial Slavery. As Delivered in Dr. Wardlow's Chapel, Glasgow, on the Three Several Evenings in Which the Discussion Was Maintained. Glasgow, 1833.

———. Three Lectures on British Colonial Slavery, Delivered in the Royal Amphitheatre, Liverpool, on the Evenings of Tuesday, August 28, Thursday, 30, and Thursday, September 6, 1832. Liverpool, 1832.

Thompson, George, and Breckinridge, Robert J. Discussion on American Slavery, between George Thompson, Esq., Agent of the British and Foreign Society for the Abolition of Slavery throughout the World, and Rev. Robert J. Breckinridge, Delegate from the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, to the Congregational Union of England and Wales: Holden in the Rev. Dr. Wardlow's Chapel, Glasgow, Scotland; on the Evenings of the 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th of June, 1836, with an Appendix. Boston, 1836.

Thomson, Andrew. Substance of the Speech Delivered at the Meeting of the Edinburgh Society for the Abolition of Slavery, on October 19, 1830. Edinburgh, 1830.

Tolles, Frederick B., ed. Slavery and the "Woman Question": Lucretia Mott's Diary of Her Visit to Great Britain to Attend the World's Anti-Slavery Convention of 1840. Supplement 23 to Journal of the Friends Historical Society. Haverford, Pa., and London, 1952.

To the Right Honourable Charles Baron Glenelg, His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Colonial Department. London, n.d.

Trollope, [Frances]. Domestic Manners of the Americans. 2 vols. 4th ed. London, 1832.

Tucker, St. George. A Dissertation on Slavery: With a Proposal for the Gradual Abolition of It, in the State of Virginia. Philadelphia, 1796.

[Turnbull, Robert]. The Crisis: Or, Essays on the Usurpations of the Federal Government. By Brutus. Charleston, S.C., 1827.

Union and Emancipation Society. Speech of Mr. W. E. Forster, M.P., on the Slaveholders' Rebellion; and Professor Goldwin Smith's Letter on the Morality of the Emancipation Proclamation. Manchester, 1863.

[Vaux, Roberts]. The Injurious Effects of Slave Labour: An Impartial Appeal to the Reason, Justice, and Patriotism of the People of Illinois on the Injurious Effects of Slave Labour. London, 1824.

———. Memoirs of the Life of Anthony Benezet. Philadelphia, 1817.

———. Memoirs of the Lives of Benjamin Lay and Ralph Sandiford; Two of the Earliest Public Advocates for the Emancipation of the Enslaved Africans. London, 1816.

A Vindication of the Use of Sugar, the Produce of the West India Islands. In Answer to a Pamphlet Entitled Remarkable Extracts, etc., etc. 2nd ed. London, 1792.

Wadstrom, C. B. Observations on the Slave Trade, and a Description of Some Part of the Coast of Guinea, during a Voyage Made in 1787, and in 1788, in Company with Doctor A. Spaarman and Captain Arrehenius. London, 1789.

[Walling, R. A. J., ed.] The Diaries of John Bright. London, 1930.

Walsh, Robert, Jr. An Appeal from the Judgments of Great Britain Respecting the United States of America. Part First, Containing an Historical Outline of Their Merits and Wrongs as Colonies; and Strictures upon the Calumnies of the British Writers. 2nd ed. Philadelphia, 1819.

Ward, Samuel R. Autobiography of a Fugitive Negro: His Anti-Slavery Labours in the United States, Canada, and England. London, 1855.

Webb, Richard D. The National Anti-Slavery Societies in England and the United States: Or, Strictures on "A Reply to Certain Charges Brought against the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, etc., etc."; by Lewis Tappan of New York, United States: With an Introduction by John Scoble. Dublin, 1852.

———, ed. The Life and Letters of Captain John Brown, Who Was Executed at Charlestown, Virginia, Dec. 2, 1859, for an Armed Attack upon American Slavery; with Notices of Some of His Confederates. London, 1861.

Webster, Charles Kingsley, ed. British Diplomacy 1813–1815: Select Documents Dealing with the Reconstruction of Europe. London, 1921.

[Webster, Daniel]. Writings and Speeches of Daniel Webster. 18 vols. Boston, 1903.

Duke of Wellington, ed. Supplementary Despatches, Correspondence, and Memoranda of Field Marshall Arthur Duke of Wellington, K.G., Edited by His Son, the Duke of Wellington, K.G. 12 vols. London, 1858–1872.

Wesley, John. Thoughts upon Slavery. Philadelphia, 1774.

———. The Works of John Wesley. 14 vols. Grand Rapids, Mich., n.d. Reproduced by photo-offset from 1872 ed. by the Wesleyan Conference Office in London.

Whipple, Charles King. The Methodist Church and Slavery. Boston, 1859.

Whitely, Henry. Three Months in Jamaica in 1832: Comprising a Residence of Seven Weeks on a Sugar Plantation. London, 1833.

Whittier, John Greenleaf. Anti-Slavery Poems: Songs of Labor and Reform. Cambridge, Mass., 1888.

Wilberforce, Robert Isaac, and Wilberforce, Samuel. The Life of William Wilberforce. 5 vols. London, 1838.

Wilberforce, William. A Letter on the Abolition of the Slave Trade; Addressed to the Freeholders and Other Inhabitants of Yorkshire. London, 1807.

Wilks, Samuel Charles. The Duty of Prompt and Complete Abolition of Colonial Slavery: A Sermon, Preached at Bentinck Chapel, St. Mary-Le-Bone, on Sunday, September 26, 1830, with a Letter to His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, and an Appendix of Episcopal Testimonies. London, 1830.

Williams, Edwin, comp. The Addresses and Messages of the Presidents of the United States, Inaugural, Annual, and Special, from 1789 to 1846: With a Memoir of Each of the Presidents, and a History of Their Administrations; also the Constitution of the United States and a Selection of Important Documents and Statistical Information. 2 vols. New York, 1846.

[Williams, James]. A Narrative of Events since the 1st of August, 1834, by James Williams, together with the Evidence Taken under a Commission Appointed by the Colonial Office to Ascertain the Truth of the Narrative and the Report of the Commissioners Thereon: The Whole Exhibiting a Correct Picture of a Large Proportion of West Indian Society; and the Atrocious Cruelties Perpetrated under the Apprenticeship System. London, 1838.

[Windham, William]. The Windham Papers. The Life and Correspondence of the Rt. Hon. William Windham, 1750–1810, a Member of Pitt's First Cabinet and the Ministry of "All the Talents" Including Hitherto Unpublished Letters from George III, the Dukes of York and Gloucester, Pitt, Fox, Burke, Canning, Lords Grenville, Minto, Castlereagh and Nelson, Malone, Cobbett, Dr. Johnson, Dr. Burney, etc. 2 vols. London, 1913.

Woods, John A., ed. "The Correspondence of Benjamin Rush and Granville Sharp, 1773–1809." Journal of American Studies, I (Apr., 1967), 1–38.

Woolman, John. Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes; Recommended to the Professors of Christianity of Every Denomination. Philadelphia, 1754.

Wright, Thomas, ed. The Correspondence of William Cowper Arranged in Chronological Order, with Annotations. 4 vols. London, 1904.

Young, William T. Sketch of the Life and Public Services of General Lewis Cass. With the Pamphlet on the Right of Search, and Some of His Speeches on the Great Political Questions of the Day. Philadelphia, 1853.

Secondary Works

Abel, Annie Heloise, and Klingberg, Frank J., eds. A Side-Light on Anglo-American Relations, 1839–1858, Furnished by the Correspondence of Lewis Tappan and Others with the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society. Lancaster, Pa., 1927.

Adams, Alice Dana. The Neglected Period of Anti-Slavery in America (1808–1831). Radcliffe College Monographs, no. 14. Reprinted, Magnolia, Mass., 1964.

Adams, Ephraim D. British Interests and Activities in Texas, 1838–1846. Baltimore, 1910.

———. Great Britain and the American Civil War. 2 vols. London, 1925.

Allen, H. C. The Anglo-American Relationship since 1783. London, 1959.

Anstey, Roger T. "Capitalism and Slavery: A Critique." Economic History Review, 2nd ser., XXI (1968), 307–320.

Aptheker, Herbert. "Militant Abolitionism." Journal of Negro History, XXVI (Oct., 1941), 438–484.

———. The Negro in the Abolitionist Movement. New York, 1941.

———. "One Continual Cry," David Walker's Appeal to the Colored Citizens of the World (1829–1830): Its Setting and Its Meaning. New York, 1965.

———. "The Quakers and Negro Slavery." Journal of Negro History, XXV (July, 1940), 331–362.

———, ed. A Documentary History of the Negro People in the United States. New York, 1962.

Arbena, Joseph L. "Politics or Principle? Rufus King and the Opposition to Slavery, 1785–1825." Essex Institute Historical Collections, CI (1965), 56–77.

Bailor, Keith M. "John Taylor of Caroline. Continuity, Change and Discontinuity in Virginia's Sentiments toward Slavery, 1790–1820." Virginia Magazine of History and Biography, LXXV (July, 1967), 290–304.

Barnes, Gilbert H. The Antislavery Impulse, 1830–1844. New York, 1964.

Bell, Herbert C. F. Lord Palmerston. 2 vols. London, 1936.

Bemis, Samuel Flagg. Jay's Treaty: A Study in Commerce and Diplomacy. New Haven, Conn., 1962.

———. John Quincy Adams and the Foundations of American Foreign Policy. New York, 1949.

———. John Quincy Adams and the Union. New York, 1956.

Berger, Max. "American Slavery as Seen by British Visitors, 1836–1860." Journal of Negro History, XXX (Apr., 1945), 181–202.

———. The British Traveler in America, 1836–1860. Magnolia, Mass., 1964.

Bolt, Christine Anne. "British Attitudes to Reconstruction in the United States, 1863–1877." Ph.D. dissertation, University of London, 1966.

Booth, Charles. Zachary Macaulay: His Part in the Movement for the Abolition of the Slave Trade and of Slavery. London, 1934.
Boswell, James. Life of Johnson, together with Boswell's Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides and Johnson's Diary of a Journey into North Wales. Edited by George Birkbeck Hill. Revised and enlarged edition by L. F. Powell. 6 vols. Oxford, 1934.
Bourne, Theodore. "George Bourne, the Pioneer of American Anti-Slavery." Methodist Quarterly Review, LXIV (1882), 68–91.
Bowden, James. The History of the Society of Friends in America. 2 vols. London, 1850.
Bretz, Julian P. "The Economic Background of the Liberty Party." American Historical Review, XXXIV (1929), 250–264.
Brookes, George S. Friend Anthony Benezet. Philadelphia, 1937.
Brown, Arthur W. Always Young for Liberty: A Biography of William Ellery Channing. Syracuse, N.Y., 1956.
Brown, George W. "The Origins of Abolition in Santo Domingo." Journal of Negro History, VII (Oct., 1922), 365–376.
Bucke, Emory Stevens, ed. The History of American Methodism in Three Volumes. New York, 1964.
Buckley, James M. A History of Methodism in the United States. 2 vols. New York, 1897.
Burn, William L. Emancipation and Apprenticeship in the British West Indies. London, 1937.
Carroll, Kenneth L. "Religious Influences on the Manumission of Slaves in Caroline, Dorchester and Talbot Counties." Maryland Historical Magazine, LVI (1961), 176–197.
Christie, John W., and Dumond, Dwight L. George Bourne and "The Book and Slavery Irreconciliable." Baltimore, 1969.
Claussen, Martin P. "Peace Factors in Anglo-American Relations, 1861–1865." Mississippi Valley Historical Review, XXVI (Mar., 1939–1940), 511–522.
Collins, Edward D. "Studies in the Colonial Policy of England, 1672–1680: The Plantations, the Royal African Company, and the Slave Trade." American Historical Association, Annual Report for the Year 1900. Vol. I. Washington, D.C., 1901.
Cooke, Jacob E. Frederic Bancroft, Historian. Norman, Okla., 1957.
Coupland, Sir Reginald. Wilberforce. London, 1945.
Cox, John, Jr. Quakerism in the City of New York, 1657–1930. New York, 1930.
Crane, Verner W. "Benjamin Franklin on Slavery and American Liberties." Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, LXII (1938), 1–11.
Curti, Merle. The Learned Blacksmith: The Letters and Journals of Elihu Burritt. New York, 1937.

Davis, David B. "The Emergence of Immediatism in British and American Antislavery Thought." Mississippi Valley Historical Review, XLIX (Sept., 1962), 209–230.

———. "James Cropper and the British Anti-Slavery Movement, 1821–1823." Journal of Negro History, XLV (Jan., 1960), 241–258.

———. "James Cropper and the British Anti-Slavery Movement, 1823–1833." Journal of Negro History, XLVI (Jan., 1961), 154–173.

———. The Problem of Slavery in Western Culture. Ithaca, N.Y., 1966.

De Vinné, Daniel. The Methodist Episcopal Church and Slavery. New York, 1857.

Dillon, Merton L. "The Antislavery Movement in Illinois, 1809–1844." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Michigan, 1952. Microfilm, Morris Library, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale.

———. Benjamin Lundy and the Struggle for Negro Freedom. Urbana, Ill., 1966.

Donald, David. Charles Sumner and the Coming of the Civil War. New York, 1961.

———. Lincoln Reconsidered: Essays on the Civil War Era. New York, 1956.

Dowd, Jerome. "The African Slave Trade." Journal of Negro History, II (Jan., 1917), 1–20.

Drake, Thomas E. Quakers and Slavery in America. New Haven, Conn., 1950.

Duberman, Martin B. Charles Francis Adams, 1807–1886. Boston, 1960.

———, ed. The Antislavery Vanguard. Princeton, N.J., 1965.

DuBois, W. E. B. "The Enforcement of the Slave Trade Laws." American Historical Association, Annual Report 1891. Washington, D.C., 1892.

———. The Suppression of the African Slave-Trade to the United States of America, 1638–1870. Harvard Historical Studies, vol. I. New York, 1896.

Duignan, Peter, and Clendenen, Clarence. The United States and the African Slave Trade, 1619–1862. Hoover Institution Studies, Hoover Institution on War, Revolution, and Peace, Stanford University, 1963.

Dumond, Dwight L. Antislavery: The Crusade for Freedom in America. Ann Arbor, Mich., 1961.

———. A Bibliography of Antislavery in America. Ann Arbor, Mich., 1961.

Dunn, Jacob Piatt, Jr. Indiana, a Redemption from Slavery. Boston, 1888.

Elkins, Stanley. Slavery: A Problem in American Institutional and Intellectual Life. Chicago, 1959.

Ellison, Mary Louise. "The Reaction of Lancashire to the American Civil War." Ph.D. dissertation, University of London, 1968.

Engelder, Conrad James. "The Churches and Slavery. A Study of the Attitudes toward Slavery of the Major Protestant Denominations." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Michigan, 1964.

Filler, Louis. The Crusade against Slavery, 1830–1860. New York, 1963.

———. "Parker Pillsbury: An Anti-Slavery Apostle." New England Quarterly, XIX (1946), 315–337.

"The First Printed Protest against Slavery in America." Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, XIII (1889), 265–270.

Fladeland, Betty. "Abolitionist Pressures on the Concert of Europe, 1814–1822." Journal of Modern History, XXXVIII (Dec., 1966), 355–373.

———. James Gillespie Birney: Slaveholder to Abolitionist. Ithaca, N.Y., 1955.

———. "Who Were the Abolitionists?" Journal of Negro History, XLIX (Apr., 1964), 99–115.

Fletcher, F. T. H. "Montesquieu's Influence on Anti-Slavery Opinion in England." Journal of Negro History, XVIII (Oct., 1933), 414–425.

Foner, Philip S. Frederick Douglass. New York, 1964.

Ford, Worthington C. "Edmund Randolph on the British Treaty, 1795." American Historical Review, XII (1906–1907), 587–599.

Fox, Early Lee. The American Colonization Society, 1817–1840. Baltimore, 1919.

Freehling, William W. Prelude to Civil War: The Nullification Controversy in South Carolina 1816–1836. New York, 1965.

Freidel, Frank. "Francis Lieber, Charles Sumner and Slavery." Journal of Southern History, IX (1943), 75–93.

Gary, Anne T. "The Political and Economic Relations of English and American Quakers (1750–1785)." Unpubl. thesis, St. High's College, 1935. Microfilm, Friends Historical Library, Swarthmore, Pa.

Goldfarb, Joel. "The Life of Gamaliel Bailey prior to the Founding of the National Era: The Orientation of a Practical Abolitionist." Ph.D. dissertation, UCLA, 1958.

Greene, Lorenzo J. "Slaveholding New England and Its Awakening." Journal of Negro History, XIII (Oct., 1928), 492–533.

Greenleaf, Richard. "British Labor against American Slavery." Science and Society, XVII (Winter, 1953), 42–58.

Griggs, Earl L. Thomas Clarkson the Friend of Slaves. London, 1936.

Griggs, Earl L., and Prator, Clifford H., eds. Henry Christophe–Thomas Clarkson: A Correspondence. Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1952.

Gross, Bella. "Freedom's Journal and the Rights of All." Journal of Negro History, XVII (July, 1932), 241–286.

Hamer, Philip M. "British Consuls and the Negro Seamen Acts, 1850–1860." Journal of Southern History, I (1935), 138–168.

———. "Great Britain, the United States, and the Negro Seamen Acts, 1822–1848." Journal of Southern History, I (1935), 3–28.

Hamilton, J. C. "Slavery in Canada." Canadian Institute Transactions, I (1889–1890), 102–108.

Harrison, Royden. "British Labor and American Slavery." Science and Society, XXV (Dec., 1961), 291–319.

———. "British Labour and the Confederacy." International Review of Soeial History, II (1957), 78–105.

Harshbarger, Emmett Leroy. "The African Slave Trade in Anglo-American Diplomacy." Ph.D. dissertation, Ohio State University, 1933.

Hartley, Lodwick C. William Cowper, Humanitarian. Chapel Hill, N.C., 1938.

Harwood, Thomas Franklin. "Great Britain and American Antislavery." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Texas, 1959. Microfilm, Morris Library, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale.

Hibben, Paxton. Henry Ward Beecher: An American Portrait. New York, 1942.

High, James. "The African Gentlemen: A Chapter in the Slave Trade." Journal of Negro History, XLIV (Oct., 1949), 285–307.

Hodgen, Margaret T. "The Negro in the Anthropology of John Wesley." Journal of Negro History, XIX (July, 1934), 308–323.

Houston, G. David. "John Woolman's Efforts in Behalf of Freedom." Journal of Negro History, II (Jan., 1917), 126–138.

Howard, Warren S. American Slavers and the Federal Law, 1837–1862. Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1963.

Howse, Ernest M. Saints in Politics: The "Clapham Seet" and the Growth of Freedom. Toronto, 1952.

Hubbard, Geraldine Hopkins, comp. A Classified Catalogue of the Collection of Anti-Slavery Propaganda in the Oberlin College Library. Oberlin College Library Bulletin, II, no. 3 (1932).

Hughes, William R. Sophia Sturge, a Memoir. London, 1940.

Hunt, Gaillard. "William Thornton and Negro Colonization." Proceedings of the Ameriean Antiquarian Society, n.s., XXX (1920), 32–61.

Irvine, Dallas D. "The Abbé Raynal and British Humanitarianism." Journal of Modern History, III (1931), 564–577.

Jackson, L. P. "Elizabethan Seamen and the African Slave Trade." Journal of Negro History, IX (Jan., 1924), 1–17.

James, Sydney V. A People among Peoples: Quaker Benevolence in Eighteenth-Century America. Cambridge, Mass., 1963.

Jones, M. G. Hannah More. Cambridge, 1952.

Jones, Wilbur Devereux. "The Influence of Slavery on the Webster-Ashburton Negotiations." Journal of Southern History, XXII (1956) 48–58.

———. "Lord Mulgrave's Administration in Jamaica, 1832–1833." Journal of Negro History, XLVIII (Jan., 1963), 44–56.

Jordan, Donaldson, and Pratt, Edwin J. Europe and the American Civil War. Boston, 1931.

Julian, George W. The Rank of Charles Osborn as an Anti-Slavery Pioneer. Indiana Historical Society Publications, II, no. 6, 231–267. Indianapolis, 1891.

Ketring, Ruth Anna. Charles Osborn in the Anti-Slavery Movement. Ohio Historical Collections, vol. VII. Columbus, 1937.

Klingberg, Frank J. The Anti-Slavery Movement in England: A Study in English Humanitarianism. New Haven, Conn., 1926.

———. "The Evolution of the Humanitarian Spirit in Eighteenth-Century England." Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, LXVI (1942), 260–278.

———. "Harriet Beecher Stowe and Social Reform in England." American Historical Review, XLIII (1937–1938), 542–552.

Kraditor, Aileen. Means and Ends in American Abolitionism. New York, 1969.

Kraus, Michael. "Slavery Reform in the Eighteenth Century: An Aspect of Transatlantic Intellectual Cooperation." Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, LX (1936), 53–66.

Landon, Fred. "The Anti-Slavery Society of Canada." Journal of Negro History, IV (Jan., 1919), 33–40.

———. "The Negro Migration to Canada after the Passing of the Fugitive Slave Act." Journal of Negro History, V (Oct., 1920), 22–36.

Landry, Harral E. "Slavery and the Slave Trade in Atlantic Diplomacy, 1850–1861." Journal of Southern History, XXVII (1961), 184–207.

Latrobe, John H. B. Maryland in Liberia. A History of the Colony Planted by the Maryland State Colonization Society under the Auspices of the State of Maryland, U.S. at Cape Palmas on the South-West Coast of Africa, 1833–1853. Baltimore, 1885.

"Letters Showing the Rise and Progress of the Early Negro Churches of Georgia and the West Indies." Journal of Negro History, I (Jan., 1916), 69–92.

Levy, Claude. "Barbados: The Last Years of Slavery, 1823–1833." Journal of Negro History, XLIV (Oct., 1959), 308–345.

Lindsay, Arnett G. "Diplomatic Relations between the United States and Great Britain Bearing on the Return of Negro Slaves, 1783–1828." Journal of Negro History, V (Oct., 1920), 391–419.

Lipscomb, Patrick C. "William Pitt and the Abolition of the Slave Trade." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Texas, 1960. Microfilm, Morris Library, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale.

Lloyd, Christopher. The Navy and the Slave Trade: The Suppression of the African Slave Trade in the Nineteenth Century. London, 1949.

Locke, Mary Stroughton. Anti-Slavery in America from the Introduction of African Slaves to the Prohibition of the Slave Trade (1619–1808). Boston, 1910.

Lofton, John. Insurrection in South Carolina: The Turbulent World of Denmark Vesey. Yellow Springs, Ohio, 1964.

Lovejoy, David S. "Samuel Hopkins: Religion, Slavery and the Revolution." New England Quarterly, XL (June, 1967), 227–243.

Lynd, Staughton. Class Conflict, Slavery, and the United States Constitution. Indianapolis, 1967.

McColley, Robert. Slavery and Jeffersonian Virginia. Urbana, Ill., 1964.

MacInnes, C. M. England and Slavery. Bristol, 1934.

McManus, Edgar J. A History of Negro Slavery in New York. Syracuse, N.Y., 1966.

McMaster, John B. A History of the People of the United States, from the Revolution to the Civil War. 8 vols. New York, 1924–1927.

McPherson, J. H. T. History of Liberia. Vol. IX of Johns Hopkins University Studies in Historical and Political Science. Baltimore, 1891.

Mahan, Alfred T. "The Negotiations at Ghent in 1814." American Historical Review, XI (1905–1906), 68–87.

Mandel, Bernard. Labor: Free and Slave. Workingmen and the Anti-Slavery Movement in the United States. New York, 1955.

Mannix, Daniel P., and Cowley, Malcolm. Black Cargoes: A History of the Atlantic Slave Trade, 1518–1865. New York, 1962.

Martin, Thomas P. "Some International Aspects of the Anti-Slavery Movement, 1818–1823." Journal of Economic and Business History, I (1928–1929), 137–148.

———. "The Upper Mississippi Valley in Anglo-American Anti-Slavery and Free Trade Relations: 1837–1842." Mississippi Valley Historical Review, XV (1928–1929), 204–220.

Mathews, Donald G. Slavery and Methodism: A Chapter in American Morality, 1780–1845. Princeton, N.J., 1965.

Mathieson, William L. British Slavery and Its Abolition, 1823–1838. London and New York, 1926.

———. Great Britain and the Slave Trade, 1839–1865. New York, 1967.

Mayo, Bernard, ed. Instructions to the British Ministers to the United States 1791–1812. American Historical Association, Annual Report, 1935. Vol. III. Washington, D.C., 1936.

Mehlinger, Louis R. "The Attitude of the Free Negro toward African Colonization." Journal of Negro History, I (July, 1916), 276–301.

Meller, George R. British Imperial Trusteeship 1783–1850. London, [1951].

Merrill, Louis Taylor. "The English Campaign for Abolition of the Slave Trade." Journal of Negro History, XXX (Oct., 1945), 382–399.

Merrill, Walter M. Against Wind and Tide: A Biography of William Lloyd Garrison. Cambridge, Mass., 1963.

Mesick, Jane L. The English Traveller in America, 1785–1835. New York, 1922.

Milne, A. T. "The Slave Trade and Anglo-American Relations, 1807–1862." M.A. thesis, University of London, 1930.

Nelson, Bernard H. "The Slave Trade as a Factor in British Foreign Policy, 1815–1862." Journal of Negro History, XXVII (Apr., 1942), 192–209.

Nicolson, Harold. The Congress of Vienna: A Study in Allied Unity, 1812–1822. New York, 1946.

Nuermberger, Ruth Ketring. The Free Produce Movement: A Quaker Protest against Slavery. Historical Papers of the Trinity College Historical Society, ser. XXV. Durham, N.C., 1942.

Ogg, Frederic Austin. "Jay's Treaty and the Slavery Interests of the United States." American Historical Association, Annual Report, 1901, I, 273–298. Washington, D.C., 1902.

Owens, William H. Slave Mutiny: The Revolt on the Schooner Amistad. New York, 1953.

Owsley, Frank Lawrence. King Cotton Diplomacy: Foreign Relations of the Confederate States of America. Chicago, 1931.

Paterson, R. M. "Newmilns Weavers and the American Civil War." Ayrshire Archeological and Natural History Society Collections, 2nd ser., I (1947–1949), 98–105.

Pease, William H. and Jane H. Black Utopia: Negro Communal Experiments in America. Madison, Wis., 1963.

Penson, Lillian M. "The London West India Interest in the Eighteenth Century." English Historical Review, XXXVI (July, 1921), 373–392.

Perkins, Bradford. Castlereagh and Adams: England and the United States 1812–1823. Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1964.

———. The First Rapprochement: England and the United States 1795–1805. Philadelphia, 1955.

Petrie, Sir Charles. Lord Liverpool and His Times. London, 1954.

Phillips, Ulrich B. "A Jamaica Slave Plantation." American Historical Review, XIX (1913–1914) 543–558.

Pierre, C. E. "The Work of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts among the Negroes in the Colonies." Journal of Negro History, I (Oct., 1916), 349–360.

Pilgrim, Elsie I. "Anti-Slavery Sentiment in Great Britain, 1841–1854; Its Nature and Its Decline, with Special Reference to Its Influence upon British Policy towards the Former Slave Colonies." Ph.D. dissertation, Cambridge University, 1952.

Pitman, Frank Wesley. "Slavery on British West India Plantations in the Eighteenth Century." Journal of Negro History, XI (Oct., 1926), 584–668.

Pole, Jack R. Abraham Lincoln and the Working Classes of Britain. London, [1959].

Poole, William Frederick. Anti-Slavery Opinions before the Year 1800. Cincinnati, 1873.

Posey, Walter Brownlow. The Baptist Church in the Lower Mississippi Valley 1776–1845. Lexington, Ky., 1957.

Price, Glen W. Origins of the War with Mexico: The Polk-Stockton Intrigue. Austin, Tex., 1967.

Putnam, Mary Burnham. The Baptists and Slavery, 1840–1845. Ann Arbor, Mich., 1913.

Quarles, Benjamin. The Negro in the American Revolution. Chapel Hill, N.C., 1961.

Ragatz, Joseph Lowell. The Fall of the Planter Class in the British Caribbean, 1763–1833: A Study in Social and Economic History. New York, 1928.

Riee, C. Dunean. "The Anti-Slavery Interest and the Sugar Duties." In The Transatlantie Slave Trade from West Afriea. Center of Afriean Studies, University of Edinburgh, 1965. Privately distributed in duplieated form.

Rose, J. Holland; Newton, A. P.; and Benians, E. A., eds. The Cambridge History of the British Empire. Vol. II: The Growth of the New Empire, 1783–1870. Cambridge, 1940.

Ruehames, Louis. "Emerson's Second West Indian Emaneipation Address." New England Quarterly, XXVIII (Sept., 1955), 383–388.

St. Clair, Sadie Daniel. "Slavery as a Diplomatie Factor in Anglo-Ameriean Relations during the Civil War." Journal of Negro History, XXX (July, 1945), 260–275.

Sehutz, John A. "Thomas Pownall and His Negro Commonwealth." Journal of Negro History, XXX (Oct., 1945), 400–404.

Seeber, Edward D. Anti-Slavery Opinion in Franee during the Seeond Half of the Eighteenth Century. Extra vol. X of Johns Hopkins Studies in Romanee Literatures and Languages. Baltimore, 1937.

Sheppard, T. Wilberforee House: Its History and Collections. Hull, 1927.

Shepperson, George. "The Free Chureh and Ameriean Slavery." Scottish Historieal Review, XXX, no. 110 (Oet., 1951), 126–143.

———. "Harriet Beeeher Stowe and Seotland." Scottish Historieal Review, XXXII (Apr., 1953), 40–46.

Sherrill, P. M. "The Quakers and the North Carolina Manumission Soeiety." Trinity College Historieal Soeiety, Historieal Papers, ser. X (1914), 32–51.

Sherwood, Henry Noble. "Paul Cuffe and His Contribution to the Ameriean Colonization Soeiety." Proeeedings of the Mississippi Valley Historieal Assoeiation, VI (1912–1913), 370–402.

Shortreed, Margaret. "The Anti-Slavery Radieals: From Crusade to Revolution, 1846–1848." Past and Present, Nov., 1959, 65–87.

Silver, Arthur W. Manehester Men and Indian Cotton 1847–1872. Manchester, 1966.

Sires, Ronald V. "The Jamaica Slave Insurreetion Loan, 1832–1863." Journal of Negro History, XXVII (July, 1942), 295–319.

Smith, Timothy. Revivalism and Social Reform. New York, 1965.

Soulsby, Hugh G. The Right of Seareh and the Slave Trade in Anglo-Ameriean Relations, 1814–1862. Vol. LI, no. 2, of Johns Hopkins University Studies in Historieal and Politieal Seienee. Baltimore, 1933.

Spears, John Randolph. The American Slave Trade: An Account of Its Origin, Growth and Suppression. New York, 1900.

Spenee, Mary Lee. "British Interests and Attitudes Regarding the Republie of Texas and Its Annexation by the United States." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Minnesota, 1957.

Staiger, Bruee. "Abolitionism and the Presbyterian Schism of 1837–1838." Mississippi Valley Historieal Review, XXXVI (Dee., 1949), 391–414.

Staudenraus, P. J. The Afriean Colonization Movement, 1816–1865. New York, 1961.

Stewart, James B. "The Aims and Impaet of Garrisonian Abolitionism, 1840–1860." Civil War History, XV (Sept., 1969), 197–209.

Sturge, Elizabeth. The Sturges and Early Quakerism. Printed for private cireulation, 1930.

Swaney, Charles Baumer. Episeopal Methodism and Slavery, with Sidelights on Eeclesiastieal Polities. Boston, [1926].

Sypher, Wylie. Guinea's Captive Kings. Chapel Hill, N.C., 1932.

———. "Huteheson and the 'Classieal' Theory of Slavery." Journal of Negro History, XXIV (July, 1939), 263–280.

Temperley, Howard R. "The British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Soeiety, 1839–1868." Ph.D. dissertation, Yale University, 1961. Mierofilm, Morris Library, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale.

Thistlethwaite, Frank. The Anglo-Amerieaη Connection in the Early Nineteenth Century. Philadelphia, 1959.

Thomas, John L. The Liberator, William Lloyd Garrison. Boston, 1963.

Thompson, Ernest Trice. Presbyterians in the South, 1607–1861. Riehmond, Va., 1963.

Towner, Lawrence W. "The Sewall-Saffin Dialogue on Slavery." William and Mary Quarterly, 3rd ser., XXI (1964), 40–52.

Trendel, Robert. "Joshua Leavitt: Lobbyist for Abolition." M.A. thesis, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, 1969.

Trepp, Jean. "The Liverpool Movement for the Abolition of the English Slave Trade." Journal of Negro History, XIII (July, 1928), 265–285.

Trevelyan, George M. The Life of John Bright. London, 1925.

Van Alstyne, Riehard W. "The British Right of Search and the Afriean Slave Trade." Journal of Modern History, II (1930), 37–47.

Villiers, Brougham, and Chesson, W. H. Anglo-Amerieaη Relations, 1861–1865. London, 1919.

Ward, Sir A. P., and Gooeh, G. P. The Cambridge History of British Foreign Poliey, 1783–1919. 3 vols. New York, 1922.

Warren, Charles. The Making of the Constitution. Cambridge, Mass., 1947.

Washburne, Elihu B. Sketeh of Edward Coles, Seeond Governor of Illinois, and of the Slavery Struggle of 1823–4. Chieago, 1882.

Watson, J. Steven. The Reign of George III 1760–1815. Oxford, 1960.

Wax, Darold. "Georgia and the Negro before the Ameriean Revolution." Georgia Historieal Quarterly, LI (Mar., 1967), 63–77.

———. "Negro Import Duties in Colonial Virginia: A Study in British Commercial Policy and Local Public Policy." Virginia Magazine of History and Biography, LXXIX (Jan., 1971), 29–44.

———. "Negro Resistance to the Early American Slave Trade." Journal of Negro History, LI (Jan., 1966), 1–15.

———. "Quaker Merchants and the Slave Trade in Colonial Pennsylvania." Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, LXXXVI (1962), 143–159.

Wayland, Francis F. Andrew Stevenson, Democrat and Diplomat, 1785–1857. Philadelphia, 1949.

Webster, Charles Kingsley. The Congress of Vienna. London, 1934.

———. The Foreign Policy of Castlereagh, 1815–1822: Britain and the European Alliance. London, 1925.

———. The Foreign Policy of Castlereagh, 1815–1822: Britain and the Reconstruction of Europe. London, 1931.

Wedgwood, [Frances] Julia. The Personal Life of Josiah Wedgwood the Potter. Revised and edited by C. M. Herford. London, 1915.

Weeks, Stephen B. Southern Quakers and Slavery: A Study in Institutional History. Extra vol. XV of Johns Hopkins University Studies in Historical and Political Science. Baltimore, 1896.

Wesley, Charles H. "The Abolition of Negro Apprenticeship in the British Empire." Journal of Negro History, XXIII (Apr., 1938), 155–199.

———. "The Emancipation of the Free Colored Population in the British Empire." Journal of Negro History, XIX (Apr., 1934), 137–170.

———. "The Neglected Period of Emancipation in Great Britain, 1807–1823." Journal of Negro History, XVII (Apr., 1932), 156–179.

Whitney, Janet Payne. John Woolman, American Quaker. Boston, 1942.

———, ed. The Journal of John Woolman. Chicago, 1950.

Wilkinson, Norman B. "The Philadelphia Free Produce Attack upon Slavery." Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, LXVI (1942), 294–313.

Williams, Eric. "The British West Indian Slave Trade after Its Abolition in 1807." Journal of Negro History, XXVII (Apr., 1942), 175–191.

———. Capitalism and Slavery. Chapel Hill, N.C., 1944.

Willson, Beckles. America's Ambassadors to England (1785–1928): A Narrative of Anglo-American Diplomatic Relations. London, 1928.

Wilson, Forrest. Crusader in Crinoline: The Life of Harriet Beecher Stowe. Philadelphia, 1941.

Wilson, Henry. History of the Rise and Fall of the Slave Power in America. 3 vols. 3rd ed. Boston, 1875.

Winslow, Ola Elizabeth. Samuel Sewall of Boston. New York, 1964.

Woodford, Frank B. Lewis Cass, the Last Jeffersonian. New Brunswick, N.J., 1950.

Woodson, Carter G. "Anthony Benezet." Journal of Negro History, II (Jan., 1917), 39–50.

———, ed. The Mind of the Negro as Reflected in Letters Written during the Crisis 1800–1860. Washington, D.C., 1926.

Wyatt-Brown, Bertram. Lewis Tappan and the Evangelical War against Slavery. Cleveland, 1969.

Zilversmit, Arthur. The First Emancipation: The Abolition of Slavery in the North. Chicago, 1967.

Zook, George Frederick. "The Company of Royal Adventurers Trading into Africa." Journal of Negro History, IV (Apr., 1919), 134–231.

Index

Abolitionists: and the U.S. Constitution, 44-49; vs. colonization, 82, 91-93, 209-217, 276-279; and British gradualism, 173-174, 223; prospects and perspectives in U.S. and Britain compared, 223-225, 255-256, 257-258, 376-381; and credit for Union victory, 408-409. See also Antislavery

Abolition Intelligencer, 161

Abdy, E. S., 239

Aberdeen, George, Lord: and Texas, 310, 311, 312; and extradition of fugitives, 316, 318; and Seamen Acts, 319; and Amistad case, 329; and Creole case, 330-331; mentioned, 336

Adams, Benjamin, 149

Adams, Charles Francis, 105, 392, 393, 399, 401, 406-407

Adams, John, 30, 47, 52

Adams, John Quincy: on colonization, 95; opening of slave trade negotiations, 113-115; interpretation of Treaty of Ghent, 116; co-operation against slave trade, 125-141; responsibility for failure of Slave Trade Convention, 143-144; and Seamen Acts, 188; on British influence, 208; abolitionist connection, 224, 303; and J. J. Gurney, 235; and Andrew Stevenson, 242; and World Convention, 261, 310; and Texas, 310; and Webster-Ashburton Treaty, 318; Amistad case, 326, 328, 329; and gag laws, 331; petition for dissolution of Union, 335-336; mentioned, 118, 157, 160

Adams, Samuel, 86

Adams, William, 268, 274

Addington, Henry Unwin, 137, 139, 140, 141, 142, 187

Admiralty, British Courts of, 109

African Institution, 86-87, 88, 91, 94, 98, 106, 109, 112, 128, 148, 158, 162, 168, 196

African Observer, 184

African Repository and Colonial Journal, 215

African squadron, 337

Agency Committee, 196-197, 205; system in U.S., 223

Aix-la-Chapelle, Congress of, 115, 118, 125, 131, 136

Alabama, The, 404, 405, 406

Albert, Prince Consort, 389

Alexander I, of Russia, 100, 136

Alexander, C. W., 285, 343, 347, 348

Alexandra, 406
Allen, John, 291
Allen, Richard, 91
Allen, William, 86, 217
Allen, William G., 354
Alligator, The, 130
Allinson, Samuel, 23
Althorp, Lord, 206
Amedie, 109, 111, 131
Amelia Island, 117, 126
American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society: break from Am. Anti-Slavery Society, 258; affiliation with British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 275; and Sturge's visit to U.S., 281; and Hemming's agency, 361-362; demise, 363
American Anti-Slavery Society: rivalry with Am. Colonization Society, 105; as axis organization, 222; and Charles Stuart, 226; and Cox-Hoby affair, 231; and Methodist Conference, 233; and West Indian emancipation, 245-246, 247, 248, 249, 251; 1840 annual meeting and split, 258; and woman question, 258, 265; rejection of political parties, 259; and 1840 World Convention, 261; and Collins's mission, 279; and Anti-Slavery League, 299; petitions, 303; and Webster-Ashburton Treaty, 317; against violence, 381; mentioned, 200, 237, 240, 241, 242, 323
American Bible Society, 367
American Colonization Society: organization, 90-91; and abolitionists, 92-93, 105, 209, 211, 215, 216, 217, 229; federal backing, 94-96, 114; agency settlement, 96, 121, 122; opposition to, 91-92, 97, 151, 186, 190; on Haiti, 104; and Buxton plan, 276-278; and free produce, 370; in Civil War, 392; mentioned, 133. See also Cresson, Elliott; Gurley, R. R.
American Convention: boycott, 62; first meeting, 65; petitions, 68; role in antislavery movement, 68; study of violations of slave trade laws, 69; and Haitian colonization, 100; Quaker influence in, 158, 159; mentioned, 67, 93, 120, 122, 153, 207. See also Petitions
American Free Produce Association, 255
American Missionary Association, 367
American Missionary Board, 297
American Revolution: impact, 81; impact on colonization, 82; and ideals of, 166; Lafayette's disappointment, 350
American Sunday School Union, 367
American Temperance Society, 223
American Tract Society, 367
Amis des Noirs, Les, 34
Amistad case, 262, 270, 324-329
Amplett, William, 153
Anderson, Major Robert, 410
Andrews, Stephen Pearl, 304, 309, 311, 312, 313
Anglicans, 38-39. See also Church of England
Antigua, 148, 245
Antislavery: bazaars, 227, 228, 352, 358; "conspiracy," 123, 157, 159-160, 189; crusade, 185-186, 194-195; societies, 63, 238, 342-343; schism, 376, 378, 379. See also Abolitionists
Anti-Slavery Advocate, 346, 357, 359, 360, 362, 364, 375
Anti-Slavery Bugle, 359
Anti-Slavery Examiner, 250
Anti-Slavery League, 299
Anti-Slavery Monthly Reporter, 177, 184, 201, 205, 212, 241
Anti-Slavery Reporter (British), 360, 382, 392, 398, 400-401, 407
Anti-Slavery Reporter (New York), 292
Anti-Slavery Watchman, 361, 362
Arago, 410
Archbishop of Canterbury, 201
Archbishop of Dublin, 218
Articles of Confederation, 47
Asbury, Bishop Francis, 13, 36-37
Ashburton, Lord, 316-317, 330, 336, 338
Ashurst, William, 266, 267
Asiento, 8, 15

Association of Friends for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery, 265
Association of Centlemen, 208

Babington, James, 115
Babington, Thomas, 88
Bacon, John F., 330
Bacon, Samuel, 96, 122
Bagot, Charles, 125
Bahamas, 330, 331
Bailey, Gamaliel, 347
Baldwin, Roger, 325
Ball, William, 267, 285
Bangor Female Anti-Slavery Society, 268
Bangs, Nathan, 232
Bankson, John P., 96
Banneker, Benjamin, 42
Baptist Board of Missions, 231
Baptists, 39*n*, 50, 202, 231, 364
Baptist Union of Creat Britain and Ireland, 231, 232
Barbados, 148, 169, 271
Barbour, James, 138
Barclay, David, 16, 22, 31, 64, 198
Barclay, John, 64
Barea, Don Angel Calderon de la, 325
Barham, Joseph, 180
Bathurst, Earl, 94, 137, 148, 175
Bease, Jos., 12
Beaumont, A. H., 180
Beaumont, John, 238, 316, 331
Bedford, Duke of, 218
Beecher, Henry Ward, 364, 365, 403-404
Beehive, The, 402
Beesly, E. S., 402, 406
Bell, John, 8-9
Bell, Robert, 12
Bell, William, 264
Beman, Nathan S. S., 234
Benezet, Anthony: transatlantic correspondence, 3, 14; antislavery pioneer, 8; diplomat, 11; and Enlightenment, 14; fear of slave revolts, 15-16; publications, 16, 17, 19-20, 29, 31, 34, 49; and Franklin, 19-20; and Virginia petition, 22-23; and Rush, 24; and boycott, 26; and American Revolution, 27-34; and colonization, 28-29, 82; free school, 34; mentioned, 222, 235, 238
Bentham, Jeremy, 54
Benton, Thomas Hart, 317, 337*n*
Bermuda, 245
Bevan, John, 210
Bexley, Lord, 218
Bibb, Henry, 369
Bible and slavery, 367
Bickell, R., 180
Birkbeck, Morris, 31, 154-156
Birmingham Female Anti-Slavery Society, 165
Birney, James C.: constitutional interpretation, 48*n*, 288, 372; in England, 197, 262, 269, 270; and Harriet Martineau, 230; and Methodist Conference, 233; and Irish abolition, 241, 242, 272-273; and new organization, 258; and Am. churches, 272; anti-colonization, 277; and 1843 World Convention, 285; and Texas, 305, 306, 313; and Creole case, 331; and London Exhibition, 345
Bishop, Emeline, 264
Bishop of Oxford, 366, 391
Bishops of London, Durham, Bath, and Wells, 87
Blacks, free: discrimination against, 66, 89, 92, 118, 158, 214, 236, 239, 269, 285; against colonization, 91-92, 193-194; in Haiti, 98, 101-102; kidnapping of, 149, 150, 184; abolitionists, 214; lack of power in U.S., 223; celebration of West Indian emancipation, 243; to Canada after 1850, 343; citizenship, 391. See also Negroes, Free
Blackwoods' Magazine, 198
Blanchard, Jonathan, 285
Blane, William N., 171
Blockade, in Civil War, 384-385, 394
Borthwick, Peter, 200, 202
Boston Anti-Slavery Bazaar, 293
Bourne, George, 182-183, 208
Bowring, John, 266
Boycott of Slave-produced Goods, 26, 58, 60, 61-62. See also Free Produce Movement

Boyer, Jean-Pierre, 99, 103-105
Bradburn, Samuel, 58
Bradley, Stephen R., 72-73
Braithwaite family, 222, 285
Branagan, Thomas, 70
Brazil: and slave trade, 108, 117, 334, 338; and sugar, 162, 204, 286
Breckinridge, Robert J., 236-237
Bridges, G. W., 200-201
Bright, John, 394, 396, 398, 400, 401, 405, 406, 409
Briscoe, John I., 392
Brissot, J. P. de Warville, 34, 35, 45
Bristed, John, 153
Bristol and Clifton Ladies Anti-Slavery Society, 360
Bristol Anti-Slavery Society, 295
British African Colonization Society, 211, 217
British-American Institute, 344
British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Reporter, 313
British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society: formation, 255, 258; leadership and aims, 258-260, 343; publications, 263; 1840 annual meeting, 270-271; support for Am. and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 275; and Collins's mission, 279-280; and Sturge's visit to U.S., 282; and 1843 World Convention, 284, 285, 286; and Quaker mission to U.S., 291; and Cassius Clay, 294; and Scottish Free Church controversy, 296, 297; and Frederick Douglass, 300-301; and Texas, 305, 306; and Seamen Acts, 320-321, 348; and Amistad case, 326, 329; and Creole case, 330-331; and Brazilian slavery, 338; and Cuban slavery, 339; aid to American abolitionists, 344; and fugitive settlements in Canada, 344, 345; and American churches, 364-365, 367-368; and literary expurgations, 367; and free produce, 369, 370; and Kansas, 373, 374; support for Union in Civil War, 382-383, 388, 392; support of Lincoln, 399, 400; attempts at reconciliation of factions, 390; on war ships, 407
British and Foreign Bible Society, 233
British Emancipation Act, 218, 219, 250, 323
British Emancipator, 241, 250
British Female Anti-Slavery Society, 227, 230
British Friend, 290, 295, 350, 360
British Guiana, 247
British India Society, 255
British Religious Tract Society, 367
British travelers as slavery critics, 151, 152-157, 169-171, 229, 372
Broad Street Committee, 281, 288, 297, 300-301, 348, 361, 362. See also British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society
Brooks, Sir Joseph, 94
Brooks, Preston, 373, 374
Brougham, Henry, Lord: abolitionist M.P., 52, 204; against slave trade, 73, 108, 129, 333; and African Institution, 87-88; on registry, 147; on women, 178; on colonial reform, 192; immediatist, 195, 196; antislavery argument, 201; on apprenticeship, 245*n*, 250; leadership in British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 259; and 1843 World Convention, 285; and J. L. Brown case, 295; and Texas, 311, 312; and Creole case, 331; and sugar duties, 338; and Civil War, 390, 407
Brown, Henton, 12
Brown, John, 177, 301, 359, 375-376
Brown, John (escaped slave), 320, 321
Brown, John L., 295
Brown, Josias, 371
Brown, Moses, 39, 59, 86
Brown, William Wells, 345, 346, 353, 395
Browning, Robert, 407
Buchanan, James, 341, 374
Buffalo Convention of 1843, 346
Buffum, Arnold, 178, 285
Bunch, Robert, 320, 321
Burgess, Ebenezer, 94
Burke, Edmund, 23, 51, 52, 62, 146

Burnley, William H., 198, 247
"Burnt-over district," 222
Burr, James E., 343
Burrill, James, 115, 116, 117, 150
Burritt, Elihu, 354, 369, 370, 371, 375, 393
Butler, Benjamin, 395
Butler, Pierce M., 396
Buxton, Charles, 390, 407
Buxton, E. N., 356
Buxton, Thomas Fowell: on refugees in Canada, 158; leadership in Parliament, 171-172, 173, 204, 205, 206, 259; leadership in British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 259; on total emancipation, 168, 171; speech on gradual abolition, 173-174, 175, 176; on immediatism, 195; and Emancipation Act, 206; and colonization, 210, 217, 276-278; and Garrison, 219; publications, 240; on West Indies emancipation, 247, 250; 1843 World Convention, 285; and Cuba, 339; Maidstone speech, 390; and freedmen, 410; mentioned, 178, 222
Buzzard, 327
Byron, Lady, 267

Cairnes, John Elliott, 395
Caldwell, E. B., 94
Calhoun, John C.: on colonization, 95; on British search, 128, 139; and Gurney, 253; resolutions in Senate, 262, 270; and British interference in Texas, 312, 314; and extradition of fugitives, 318; and Seamen Acts, 319
Campbell, George W., 116
Canada as refuge for fugitives, 158, 198, 214, 315-319
Candler, Isaac, 157
Candler, John, 251, 347, 348, 365
Canning, George: and African Institution, 87; slave trade negotiations, 133, 138, 141, 142, 143; resolutions for gradual abolition, 174, 175, 176, 179; on psychology of slaveholding, 245
Canning, Stratford: slave trade negotiations, 125, 126, 127, 130, 132, 134, 135, 136, 137, 141, 142; support of colonization and abolition, 133; and Seamen Acts, 188
Cape Mesurado, 97
Carlisle, Earl of, 374. See also Morpeth, Lord
Castlereagh, Robert, Viscount, 73, 113, 115, 118, 119, 125, 126, 129, 133
Catholic emancipation, 205
Catholics, 272, 364
Central Negro Emancipation Committee, 250
Chalmers, Thomas, 298-299
Chamerovzow, Louis A., 343, 390, 392, 410
Chandler, Margaret, 265
Channing, William E., 254, 257, 261, 262
Channing, William H., 404
Chaplin, W. L., 343-344
Chapman, Maria Weston, 227, 265, 281, 293, 294, 300
Charleston, S.C., 319
Charleston Courier, 70
Charlotte, Queen, 18, 32
Chartists, 299
Chase, Salmon P., 342, 347, 392
Cheever, George B., 404
Chesson, F. W., 361, 362, 395, 410
Chester County (Pa.) Yearly Meeting, 8
Chickering, J. W., 366
Child, David Lee, 218, 246
Child, Lydia M., 246, 262, 265, 358, 373, 395
Christian Gazette, 242
Christian Observer, 75, 156, 185, 213
Christian Times, 351
Christophe, Henry, King of Haiti, 97-103, 271
Claiborne, William C. C., 70
Church of England, 262, 270, 272. See also Anglicans
Cinque, 324, 327, 329
Clapham Sect, 50, 82, 98. See also Saints
Clapp, Theodore, 364

Clarke, James Freeman, 354
Clarkson, John, 84
Clarkson, Matthew, 85
Clarkson, Thomas: on Phillis Wheatley, 19; on slave trade, 34, 40, 41, 50, 58, 136, 161, 179; works in France, 35; free vs. slave labor, 39-40; communications with Am. abolition societies, 40; and boycott, 60-61; antislavery leader, 68; and Sierra Leone, 85; and African Institution, 88; on American colonization, 92, 93, 94, 97, 216-217, 277; and Santo Domingo, 98-103; on colonial legislatures, 191; on compensated emancipation, 207; on Anglo-American co-operation, 257; president of British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 260; at 1840 World Convention, 267, 268, 269; at 1840 annual meeting, 271; Letter to Clergy, 271, 272; influence of name in U.S., 275; address to the president of the U.S., 282; and 1843 World Convention, 285; on Quaker antislavery activity, 290; on free blacks, 292-293; death, 295; and Texas, 310, 314; and Webster-Ashburton Treaty, 316, 318; quoted, 350
Clarkson, Mrs. Thomas, 268
Clay, Cassius, 294
Clay, Henry, 91, 235, 236, 253, 254, 313
Cobden, Richard, 346, 394, 396, 398, 401, 409
Coffin, Levi, 409
Coke, Thomas, 35-37
Coles, Edward, 154*n*, 155
Collins, John A., 279-281
Colonization: proposals in colonial period, 28-29, 82; in American West, 28-29, 70, 93, 97; abolitionist motivation, 81-82; opposition to, 91-92, 217, 218; constitutional issue, 94-95; argument for, 153; dangers, 189; failure, 193; significance of fight with abolitionists, 218; suggested in Trinidad, 247; and 1840 World Convention, 269; abolitionist attack, 276-279; in Mexico and Texas, 302; Lincoln's plan, 391. See also American Colonization Society; Cresson, Elliott; Gurley, R. R.
Colonizationists, 114, 236, 358, 392
Colored Free Produce Society, 166
Columbian United Abolition Society, 120
Colver, Nathaniel, 281
Committee for Relieving the Black Poor, 83
Compensated emancipation: Gerry's plan, 56; King plan, 186-187; in West Indies, 206-207; proposed in Texas, 309-310; Lincoln favored, 391; mentioned, 174, 194, 225, 375
Compromise of 1850, 332, 343, 347
Concert of Europe, 113, 115, 132, 158, 379
Concord, Mass., 229
Condor, Josiah, 204
Condorcet, Antoine, Marquis de, 35, 54
Confederate States of America: question of British recognition, 384, 386, 404-405; ships for, 387, 404, 405, 406, 407; pro-slavery, 387-388
Congregationalists, 295, 364
Congregational Union of Scotland, 233, 272, 347, 402
Congress: petitions to, 33, 35, 55, 63, 149, 224, 303; power over slavery and slave trade, 48, 56-58, 72-73; compared with Parliament, 55; plugging loopholes in slave trade laws, 69; abolition of slave trade, 78-79; and colonization, 89, 92, 95; introduction of amendment against more slave states, 118; lacking abolitionist leadership, 224; and Amistad case, 328
Connecticut Abolition Society, 58
Constitution of the United States: Constitutional Convention, 43, 44-48; argument over interpretation, 288-289, 372-373
Continental Congress, 26, 28
Cooper, David, 33
Cooper, Thomas, 60, 157, 180
Cornish, Samuel, 184
Corn Laws, 286, 287

Cotton: culture in Africa, 87; extension of cotton kingdom, 162, 368, 384; issue in Britain during Civil War, 372, 384, 385, 387, 409
Council of India, 287
Council of Protection (Jamaica), 200, 201
Cowper, William, 54, 60-61
Cox, F. A., 231
Cox-Hoby Affair, 231-232
Cox, Samuel H., 236
Craft, Ellen and William, 346, 353
Craften, William Bell, 60
Crampton, John, 365
Crandall, Prudence, 264, 327
Crawford, William, 91, 95, 126, 130, 135, 138, 140
Creole case, 316, 329-332, 335
Cresson, Elliott, 209-218, 225, 277, 278, 358, 370, 392
Crimean War, 339
Crittenden, John J., 388
Croom, Anna, 351
Cropper, James: correspondence with Lundy, 161; on the economics of slavery, 162-164, 204; on slavery in West Indies, 171; leadership in Liverpool, 177; support of world crusade, 186; agency committee, 196; and compensated emancipation, 207; on colonization, 212, 213, 215, 216, 217; correspondence with Garrison, 219; on British "interference" in U.S., 225; death, 259
Crowdson, W. D., 267
Crowe, John Finley, 161
Crowinshield, Benjamin, 127
Cuba: slave trade, 108, 338-340; competition in sugar, 162, 204, 286; American investments, 333-334, 339-340; and Amistad case, 325, 327; British "plot" to abolish slavery in, 339; issue of annexation to U.S., 339-340
Cuffe, Paul, 88-89, 93
Cunard Line, 300
Cuthbert, Albert, 244
Cuthbert, John A., 122, 152
Cuttriss, William, 180
Cyane, 96, 122, 123

Dana, Francis, 47
Darlington Ladies Anti-Slavery Society, 227
D'Arusemont, Fanny Wright, 171
Darwin, Charles, 407
Davies, Samuel, 13
Davis, Jefferson, 349, 388, 404, 408, 409
Dawes, William, 238, 261, 274
Dawn, Canada, 344, 345
Day, Mahlon, 251
Declaration of Independence, 25, 28, 29, 46, 155, 288
Demerara, 169, 176
Denman, Lord, 204, 295, 338
Denmark, 379
Dennison, Charles Wheeler, 401
Dewey, Loring, 103
Dillwyn, William, 18, 31, 69
Disciples of Christ, 364
District of Columbia, 120, 159, 224, 392
Disunionism, 300, 373, 374, 375, 383
Dolben, Sir William, 51
Dominica, 148, 169
Douglas, Stephen A., 383
Douglass, Frederick: and Free Church controversy, 298; English tour, 300-301; editor of North Star, 357, 359; and federal power, 372; in England (1859), 375; mentioned, 345
Douglass, Robert, 91, 263
Dred Scott decision, 342, 359, 374, 378
Dresser, Amos, 251
Dublin Anti-Slavery Society, 273. See also Hibernian Anti-Slavery Society
Dudley, Thomas, 401
Dundas, Sir Henry, 62-63

East India Company, 64, 76, 287, 368, 370
East Indian sugar, 162-166
Eastman, Zebina, 393
Eclectic Review, 210
Ecroyd, John, 371
Edina, Liberia, 211
Edinburgh Anti-Slavery Society, 362

Edinburgh Ladies Emancipation Society, 350, 373
Edinburgh petitions, 177
Edinburgh Review, 240
Edmundson, William, 3
Edwards, Jonathan, 58
Eliot, Philip, 12
Elliott, Charles, 308
Ellis, Charles, 174-175
Emancipation: in northern states, 29-30, 43; of slaves in England, 82-83; in District of Columbia, 120, 392; West Indian bill, 203, 206-207; as Civil War aim, 387
Emancipation Proclamation, 387, 397, 399, 408
Emancipator (New York), 217
Embree, Elihu, 161
Enlightenment, 13
Enterprise, 370
Episcopalians, 38, 364, 366
Esther, Queen, 32
Estlin, John B., 343, 359, 361
Evangelical Alliance, 297, 299, 402
Evangelical Magazine and Missionary Chronicle, 185
Everett, Edward, 309, 330, 332
Exeter Hall, 215, 244, 270, 354, 402
Expurgations of antislavery literature, 366-367
Extradition, 331. See also Fugitives

Fairfax, Fernando, 89
Falconbridge, Alexander, 50
Feneuil Hall, 349
Farmer, John, 26
Faux, William, 170, 185
Fearon, Henry B., 156
Female abolitionists, 177-178, 179, 220, 264-265
Fillmore, Millard, 317, 365
Finch, J., 171
Finley, Robert, 90
Finney, Charles Grandison, 238, 366. 404
Fitzgerald, Lieutenant (commander of brig Buzzard), 327
Florida, The, 406
Flower, George and Richard, 155
Follen, Mrs. Charles, 354
Foreign Relations Committee, U.S. Senate, 138
Forster family, 179, 222, 285
Forster, Josiah, 264, 291, 365, 392
Forster, Rachel, 240
Forster, William E.: and colonization, 277; to U.S., 291, 365; role during Civil War, 388, 389, 393, 405; Freedman's Aid, 409
Forsyth, John, 323, 325, 328
Forten, James, 91, 277
Fort Sumter, 229, 389, 410
Fortune, 109
Fothergill, John, 12, 20, 23
Fothergill, Samuel, 18
Founding Fathers, 116, 155
Fox, George, 3, 5, 235
Fox, Henry L., 326, 328, 330
Fox, William, 51, 52, 58, 60, 71
France: abolition of slavery, 67; and Haiti, 98, 99, 104, 190; and slave trade, 109, 111, 113, 130, 131, 142, 379; and Texas recognition, 306; and Civil War, 386
Franklin, Benjamin: association with Benezet, 14; agent of colonies, 18-19; attacks on slave trade, 23, 58; antislavery leadership, 32, 52; at Constitutional Convention, 44, 45, 46; and Wedgwood cameos, 49; aid to free blacks, 54; on free vs. slave labor, 154
Fraser's Magazine, 198, 396
Free Church of Scotland, 296-299
Freedman's Aid Society, 404, 409
Freemasons Tavern, 101, 269
Freedom's Journal, 184
Free Produce Movement, 146, 165-166, 254-255, 287, 368-372, 409
Free Soil Party, 284, 373, 374, 382
Free Trade, 284, 286
Free Trade Hall (Manchester), 403, 406
Fremont, John C., 373
French Revolution, 60, 81
Friend, The, 235, 240, 247, 360
Friends, Indiana, 289-291
Friends, Society of: capital investment in slave trade, 4, 8, 10; and slave trade, 4, 8, 10, 14, 31, 32, 55, 113, 114, 115, 173; impact of French and Indian War, 11; protest against Fugitive Slave Act of 1793, 65; on colonization, 92; and American antislavery projects, 158; represented in British antislavery families, 178, 179; and African Civilization Society, 276; and factional split, 289-292. See also Quakers

Friends of Universal Freedom, 233
Fry, Elizabeth, 171, 178
Fugitive Slave Act of 1793, 65, 117, 149, 150, 152
Fugitive Slave Act of 1850, 48, 346, 348, 349, 351, 374, 378
Fugitive slaves: discussed at World Convention, 269; extradition issue, 315-319; escape to Canada, 343-348; settlements in Canada, 344; in Great Britain, 345-347, 404; as part of disunion argument, 384
Fuller, James Cannings, 281, 344

Gabriel Conspiracy, 69, 79, 89
Gag laws, 244, 253, 261, 294, 303, 331, 378
Gallatin, Albert, 131, 132, 134, 187
Gambier, Lord, 94
Garnet, Henry Highland, 345, 346, 353, 369, 391
Garrison, William Lloyd: indebtedness to Bourne, 183; association with Thompson, 197, 226, 228; first trip to England, 209-220; and colonization, 212, 214-217, 277; liaison with British, 221, 222; and Gurney, 235; control of American Anti-Slavery Society, 259; in England for World Convention, 261, 263, 274, 275, 276, 277; relations with British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 270; and split, 281; and 1843 World Convention, 284, 285, 287; and Free Church controversy, 298-299; reconciliation with Clarkson, 299-300; and disintegration of organizations, 342; and Father Mathew, 349; criticized by Sheppard, 357; and attempt to reconcile factions, 360; to Ft. Sumter, 410
Garrisonians: position on issues, 259; and woman question, 264-265; and Hemming controversy, 361-362; and Civil War, 383, 389-390
Gates, Seth M., 270
Gedney, Capt. Thomas, 324, 325
Genius of Universal Emancipation, 161, 184, 190
Gentlemen's Magazine, 185, 210
George III, 39, 50, 74
Georgia Seamen Acts, 188, 320
Germantown, Pa., Memorial on Slavery, 4
Gerry, Elbridge, 56
Gettysburg, 408
Ghent, Treaty of, 94, 109, 110, 111, 112, 116, 139, 151
Gibbons, J. J., 280
Giddings, Joshua, 331-332, 347, 361
Gladstone, John, 163
Gladstone, William E., 389, 395
Glasgow Anti-Slavery Societies, 177, 284, 287, 353
Glasgow Emancipation Society, 233, 350, 362
Glasgow Female Anti-Slavery Society, 350
Glasgow, John, 320-321
Glasgow Ladies Auxiliary Emancipation Society, 227
Glasgow Sentinel, 394, 397
Glenelg, Lord, 244
Gloucester, Duke of, 74n, 88, 94, 148n
Goderich, Lord, 205
Godkin, E. L., 407
Godwin, Benjamin, 192
Godwyn, Morgan, 6
Goodell, William, 48n, 268, 288, 372, 373
Gorham, Benjamin, 134
Gough, John, 31
Gradual emancipation, 81, 186, 193, 201
Granja, Mexican vice-consul, 395
Grant, William, 131
Granville, Jonathan, 103
Gray, Earl, 204

Grayson, William J., 355
Great Awakening, 11, 12, 15
Great Britain: responsibility for American slavery, 25, 27, 151-152, 160, 352; motives for ending slave trade criticized, 76, 128, 151; influence on American public opinion, 123; responsibility for failure of Slave Trade Convention, 143; "interference" with American slavery, 152, 157; southern fears of, 187; strained relations with U.S. in 1850's, 340-341; and recognition of the Confederacy, 386, 388-389, 408
Great Revival, 5, 81, 224
Green, Beriah, 346
Green, Duff, 309
Greenfield, Elizabeth, 354*n*
Gregoire, l'Abbé, 35
Gregory, George, 38
Gregory of Galway, M.P., 389
Grellet, Stephen, 100, 240
Grenville, George, Lord, 50, 51, 52, 63, 74, 77, 147
Grew, Henry, 296
Griffiths, Julia, 357
Grimké, Angelina, 227, 234, 237, 238, 264
Grimké, Sarah, 283
Grimshaw, Jacob, 201
Grosvenor, Earl, 137
Grundy, Felix, 328
Gurley, R. R., 212, 214, 218, 277, 278
Gurney family, 18, 171, 178, 222, 285
Gurney, Joseph John, 178, 213, 235-236, 251, 252-254, 276, 283
Gurney, M., 59
Gurney, Samuel, 217, 276, 278, 310, 311, 356, 392, 410

Hackett, Nelson, 315-316
Haiti, 97-105, 184, 190, 246, 279, 391
Hale, John P., 314, 340
Hall, Francis, 156
Hall, Newman, 402, 410
Hall, Robert, 245
Hamilton, James (congressman from South Carolina), 188
Hamilton, James (Texan envoy to England), 306, 307, 308
Hammond, James, 294-295, 360*n*
Harpers Ferry, 342, 359, 375
Harrison, George, 31, 43
Harvey, Thomas, 245, 248
Hastings, Samuel, 296
Hatchard's Bookstore, 202
Haughton, James, 350, 362
Havana, 112, 332-334
Hayne, Robert Y., 186, 188
Hemming, Frederick, 361-362
Henry, Patrick, 24-25, 38, 47-48, 55
Henson, Josiah, 344, 345
Hepburn, John, 5, 181
Herald of Freedom, 246
Hewell, John, 331
Heyrick, Elizabeth, 165, 178, 179, 181, 183, 200, 203, 212, 267
Heywood, James, 165
Hibbert, George, 148
Hibernian Anti-Slavery Society, 273, 280, 284
Hicks, Elias, 62
Hicksites, 62, 213, 263, 289, 290
Higher-law doctrine, 196, 348, 352
Hildreth, Richard, 395
Hinton, J. H., 363
Hoar, Samuel, 189
Hoare, Samuel, 31, 41, 66, 67, 85, 178, 222
Hoby, J., 231
Hodges, Arthur, 147
Hodgkin, Thomas, 211, 216, 409
Hodgson, Adam, 153, 154, 163, 171, 210, 284
Holabird, William, 325
Holden, William, 64
Holland, 115, 118. See also Netherlands
Holmes, Isaac, 171
Holmes, William, 365
Holy Alliance, 142
Home Correspondence Committee (London), 156
Hopkins, Samuel, 28, 39, 82, 86
House of Commons: votes on slave trade bills, 59, 67, 74; influence of Irish votes, 71; George Thompson elected to, 198; and West Indian slavery, 202, 204; West Indian emancipation bill, 206; petitions on extradition, 317; and sugar duties, 338; and Cuban slave trade, 339. See also Parliament

House of Lords: votes on slave trade bills, 59, 74; influence of Grenville in, 74; investigation of West Indian slavery, 202-203; emancipation bill, 206; and John L. Brown case, 295; and sugar duties, 338. See also Parliament
House of Representatives: slave trade regulation, 117; slave trade resolutions, 121; and international co-operation, 127, 128, 129, 132, 134, 135; and compensated emancipation, 187; and southern power, 224; hears Gurney speak, 235; and Stevenson conduct, 242; and Creole case, 331; reception of G. Thompson, 410. See also Congress
Houston, Sam, 304, 305, 313
Howe, William, Lord, 28
Howick, Viscount (undersecretary for Colonies), 199
Howitt, Mary and William, 263-264
Hoy, Barlow, 304
Huggins, Edward, 147
Hughes, Tom, 395
Hugo, Victor, 346, 376
Hume, David, 153
Humphrey, Heman, 236
Hunter, David, 392
Huntingdon, Countess of, 32
Huskisson, William, 88, 136

Illinois, 154-156, 181, 193
Illinois Anti-Slavery Society, 287
Illinois Gazette, 155
Immediatism, 80-81, 144, 166-167, 193, 223, 228, 377-378
Impressment, 107
Indenture, 93, 156
Independents (religious), 50
Indiana Yearly Meeting, 235
Industrial Revolution, 81
Inglis, Robert, 338
International law, 131
Irish votes, 73, 205

Jackson, Andrew, 91, 92, 229, 277, 323
Jackson, Francis J., 107
Jackson, William A., 404
Jacobs, Harriet, 395
Jamaica: against regulation of slave trade, 63, 148, 149; overproduction problem, 76; plots and insurrections, 169, 190, 202-203, 323; slave treatment, 179, 200, 201; threat of secession, 192; apprenticeship in, 245; missionaries in, 247, 248; James Williams case, 249; emancipation, 251; memorial on, 271; seat of black army, 335
Jamaica Watchman, 201, 246
James, John Angell, 285
Jay, John, 41, 46, 47, 48, 52, 106, 107, 108
Jay, William, 239, 262, 270, 285, 289, 293, 366
Jefferson, Thomas: and Les Amis des Noirs, 35*n*; optimism for Virginia abolition, 42; plan for free blacks, 54-55; and free sugar, 62; on internal and external slave trade, 70-71; on prohibition in message to Congress, 72; and colonization, 86; embargo, 87; on equality of races, 89, 90; slave trade negotiations, 108; disappointment to abolitionists, 184; quoted by Buxton, 206; and miscegenation, 239; mentioned, 38, 52
Jeremie, John, 198
Jeune Engénie, La, 130-131, 328
Jocelyn, Simeon S., 208, 233, 329, 372
John Bull, 198
Johnson, James, 160
Johnson, Samuel, 25, 54
Johnston, Josiah, 140
Joint cruising, 128, 130, 136
"Jonathan Freeman," (pseud. of Morris Birkbeck), 155
Jones, Absolom, 91
Judson, Andrew J., 327

Kansas, 342, 373
Kansas-Nebraska Act, 359, 372, 374, 378
Keep, John, 237, 238, 261, 270, 274
Keith, George, 5
Kelley, Abby, 264, 265
Kellog, Hiram, 287
Kemble, Fanny, 396-397
Kennedy, John P., 319
Key, Francis Scott, 91, 93, 94
Kimball, J. Horace, 246, 249, 250
Kimber, Abby, 265
King, Rufus, 45, 52, 89, 90, 116, 138, 139, 140*n*, 160, 186
King, William R., 314
Kinnaird, A., 392
Kirkbride, Elizabeth, 254
Knibb, William, 202, 245, 248
Knowles, Thomas, 31
Knox College, Illinois, 287
Kossuth, Louis, 349-350

Ladies Emancipation Society (London), 393
Ladies' Society to Aid Fugitives (London), 347
Lafayette, Marquis de, 30, 35, 37, 350
Lambert, John, 171
Lancashire, 394-395, 401, 402, 408
Lane Seminary, 218, 237, 246
Latin America, 116, 120, 324
Lay, Benjamin, 8, 9-10, 61, 82
Leavitt, Joshua: Association of Gentlemen, 208; and O'Connell, 242; and new organization, 258; at 1843 World Convention, 284, 285, 286, 287, 292; and Texas, 311; and extradition, 317; and expurgations, 367
Lee, Arthur, 23
Lee, Richard Henry, 42
Leeds Anti-Slavery Society, 367
Leicester Anti-Slavery Society, 178, 179
Lettsom, John Coakley, 85, 86
Lewis, Enoch, 184
Lewis, Evan, 93, 221
Lexington (Va.) Presbytery, 182
Liberator, 215, 217, 219, 242, 248, 263, 359
Liberia, 96-97, 104, 210, 211, 212, 214, 218, 236, 277, 278, 279, 357, 370, 391
Liberty Bell, 281, 293, 294, 295, 300, 352*n*
Liberty party, 258-259, 272, 284, 286, 313, 342, 374, 382
Lieber, Francis, 238
Lincoln, Abraham, 104, 341, 381, 383, 384, 385, 387, 389, 391, 399, 403
Livermore, Arthur, 118, 149, 159
Liverpool, 32, 41, 88, 110, 177
Liverpool, Lord, 148
Livingstone, David, 370
Lloyd, John, 31
Lloyd, William, 245, 248
London Anti-Slavery Convention of 1840, 261-270
London Anti-Slavery Convention of 1843, 284-287. See also World Anti-Slavery Convention
London Anti-Slavery Society, 191, 192, 210, 250
London Committee to Abolish the Slave Trade, 31, 33, 39, 41, 43, 49, 53, 59, 61, 66, 68, 69
London Daily News, 407
London Emancipation Committee, 393, 400
London Meeting for Sufferings, 12, 22, 53, 158, 234
London Morning Chronicle, 241, 307
London Morning Herald, 242
London Patriot, 231, 376
London Star, 376, 393, 407
London Trades Council, 402, 405
London Yearly Meeting, 6-7, 8, 12, 15, 16, 62, 290-291
Lord, William, 232
Louis XVIII, 113
Louisiana Territory, 69-70, 95
Lucas, Samuel, 393
Lundy, Benjamin, 93, 105, 161, 166, 183, 302, 305
Lushington, Stephen, 129, 168, 204, 217, 259, 285, 304, 316, 331
Lyell, Sir Charles, 407
Lyon, Edward P., 77
Lyons, Lord, 386, 397*n*

McCarter, James, 252
Macaulay, Thomas Babington, 172
Macaulay, Zachary: abolitionist M.P., 52; and sugar issue, 61, 164, 204; and slave trade, 74, 75, 106; and Sierra Leone, 84; and African Institution, 87; and registry, 146; as editor, 156, 157, 184, 201; and total emancipation, 168, 169, 171, 173, 174; on women, 178; pamphlets, 179, 180; suit against John Bull, 198*n*; exposure of West Indian committee, 205; and compensated emancipation, 207; on colonization, 212, 213, 217; on slave breeding, 295
McDonnell, Alexander, 181, 198, 199
McDuffie, George, 243
McGill, Samuel, 357
McIlvaine, Charles P., 404
McKim, J. Miller, 354, 369
McLane, Louis, 323
McLeod, Donald, 355
Macon, Nathaniel, 139
Madden, R. R., 272, 287, 323, 325, 327-328, 333, 334
Madison, James, 38, 46, 47, 52, 56, 58, 70, 86
Mahan, Asa, 366
Manchester, England, 58, 60, 177, 270, 369
Manchester Anti-Slavery Union, 361, 362
Mann, A. Dudley, 389
Mann, Horace, 347
Mansfield, Lord, 3, 20, 21
Manumission Intelligencer, 161
Marryat, Joseph, 148
Martin, H. G., 305
Martin, Luther, 48
Martin, Sella, 404
Martineau, Harriet, 210, 229-230, 265-266, 281, 305, 395
Marx, Karl, 403, 405
Maryland Abolition Society, 65
Mason, George, 47-48
Massachusetts, 72, 188-189, 319
Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, 230, 265, 296, 300
Massie, James, 403, 410
Mather, Cotton, 5
Mathew, George, 320
Mathew, Theobald, 349, 350
Mathews, Edward, 364
Mathews, Phebe, 264
Mathison, Gilbert, 148
Mauritius, 203
May, Samuel J., 239, 375
Mendians, 324-329
Mercer, Charles Fenton, 90, 114, 121, 122, 134-135, 140-142, 278-279
Methodists, 12, 35-36, 58, 176, 232-233, 364
Mexico, 304, 305, 311, 312, 315
Mill, John Stuart, 396
Mills, Samuel J., 90, 94
Milnor, James, 75
Mirabeau, Comte de, 35
Miscegenation, 59
Missionaries, 181, 201, 202, 237, 247
Missionary Herald, 185
Missionary Register, 210
Missionary Review, 210
Missouri, 93, 100, 115, 117, 120, 121, 123, 126, 138, 159, 160, 184, 187, 323
Missouri Compromise, 103, 184, 372
Mixed Courts of Commission, 325, 326, 334, 341
Monroe, James: and colonization, 89, 90, 92, 95, 123; 1816 message to Congress, 113; and slave trade, 108, 117, 128, 135, 136, 138, 140, 141; La Jeune Eugénie case, 130; and Seamen Acts, 188
Monroe Doctrine, 95, 128
Montesquieu, Charles, 54
Montez, Pedro, 324, 325, 326
Monthly Review, 185
More, Hannah, 50, 178
Morpeth, George William Frederick Howard, Lord, 285, 335-336, 352, 356. See also Carlisle, Earl of Morrill, David, 116, 150
Morris, Gouverneur, 46, 52
Morris, Robert, 45
Morris, Thomas, 261
Mortimer, G. F. W., 201
Mott, James, 62

Mott, Lucretia, 227, 264, 265, 274, 285
Murray, Sir George, 158, 192, 218
Mutual search, 106, 108, 110, 115, 118, 119, 125-129, 131-136, 322, 389

Napier, Lord, 339
Napoleon, 98, 113
Napoleonic Wars, 81, 87, 111, 379
Nassau, 318, 330-332, 336
National Intelligencer, 129
National Anti-Slavery Standard, 279, 280, 358, 359
National Anti-Slavery Tract Society, 208
National Era, 347, 358, 366
Navy Department, 121, 329
Neall, Daniel, 276
Negroes, free: aid to, 32, 34, 41, 54, 64, 68, 109; achievements, 41-42; troops in Civil War, 408. See also Blacks, free
Negro Seamen Acts, 187-188, 319-321
Netherlands, 279. See also Holland
Nevis, 147, 148
New Association for the Abolition of Slavery (Glasgow), 353
Newell, David, 90
New England Anti-Slavery Society, 216, 220, 226, 234
New England Yearly Meeting, 9, 65
New Ladies Anti-Slavery Society (Glasgow), 353
Newman, F. W., 395, 406
Newton, John, 49
New York, 68
New York American, 331-332
New York Anti-Slavery Committee, 208
New York Colonization Society, 103
New York Manumission Society, 35, 41, 67, 69, 85, 102, 106, 108, 116, 117, 120, 154, 239
New York Yearly Meeting, 8, 62
Nickolls, Robert, 39
Non-Slaveholder, The, 359, 368
North American Review, 185
North Carolina, 38, 63
North Carolina Friends, 236
North, Frederick, Lord, 31
North Star, 301, 357, 359
Northwest Ordinance, 43, 70, 126
Norton, C. E., 399
Nova Scotia, 84, 90

Oberlin College, 237-238, 274
O'Connell, Daniel: delivers Irish votes for emancipation, 205; on colonization, 213, 214, 217; and Andrew Stevenson, 241-242; and apprenticeship, 245, 250; leader in British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 259-260; and Irish emigrants, 272, 349, 350; on Texas, 305, 310
Ogilby, William, 319, 320
Ohio, 186
Oneida Institute, 346
Opie, Amelia, 178, 220, 267, 285
Opie, John, 178
Osborn, Charles, 161, 214
Ostend Manifesto, 339
Ouseley, Sir Gore, 218

Pacifism, 369
Paine, John, 335, 337
Paisley Emancipation Society, 233
Pakenham, Richard, 312, 318, 319, 320
Palley, William, 38
Palmer, A. L., 250
Palmer, Walter C., 404
Palmerston, Henry, Lord, 278, 304, 306, 307, 323, 326, 333, 334, 348, 351, 389
Parliament: disallowance of colonial petitions, 25; petitions to, 33, 35, 50, 177, 195, 196, 220, 303, 334, 388; debates on slave trade, 53, 58, 62-63, 74, 78-79, 129, 137-139, 151; and Sierra Leone, 83; and registry, 149; on slavery, 175, 187, 191-192, 198, 199, 204, 205; Reform Bill of 1832, 205; West Indian emancipation, 248, 250; and Texas, 312; and sugar duties, 338; and cotton in India, 368; and free produce, 370
Partridge, Richard, 12
Paul, Nathaniel, 214, 215, 217, 231, 237, 248, 277, 344
Pease, Elizabeth, 238, 281, 283
Pease family, 227, 238, 264

Pemberton, James, 69, 85
Pemberton, John, 23
Penn, William, 7, 235
Pennington, James W. C., 285, 292, 347
Pennock, Abraham L., 296, 359
Pennsylvania Abolition Society, 43, 53, 55, 64-65, 67, 69, 85, 104, 107, 117, 149, 207-208, 384
Pennsylvania Assembly, 6, 14, 23, 64
Pennsylvania Freeman, 280
Pennsylvania Hall, 255
Pennsylvania Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery, 35, 40. See also Pennsylvania Abolition Society
Perceval, Spencer, 147
Personal liberty laws, 48, 150
Peters, Richard, 100
Peters, Thomas, 84
Pétion, Alexandre, 98
Phelps, Amos, 261, 285
Philadelphia Association of Friends, 240
Philadelphia Female Anti-Slavery Society, 265
Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, 4, 14, 31
Philanthropist, The (Cincinnati), 233
Philanthropist, The (Mt. Pleasant, Ohio), 161, 214
Phillips, James, 59
Phillips, Joseph, 219
Phillips, Wendell, 237, 267, 270, 285
Phillips, Mrs. Wendell, 265
Phips, Joseph, 15
Pillsbury, Parker, 363
Pinckney, Charles Cotesworth, 46, 100, 160
Pinckney, Thomas, 108
Pinkard, George, 171
Piracy: slave trade as, 126, 134, 136, 140
Pitt, William, 50, 51, 52, 67, 71, 74, 76, 78, 87, 151
Planters: American and West Indian contrasted, 175. See also West Indian planters Pleasants, Robert, 24, 38, 56
Poinsett, Joel, 188
Polk, James K., 270
Pope, Alexander, 54
Porteus, Beilby, 38
Portuguese slave trade, 109, 111, 113, 115, 118, 311, 379
Positive good theory, 150, 294, 367
Potter, Thomas Bayley, 394
Pownall, Thomas, 33, 70
Pratt, Josiah, 210
Presbyterians, 39*n*, 50, 58, 182, 364
Price, Richard, 40, 42, 44
Price, Sterling, 365
Priestly, Joseph, 54
Prigg vs. Pennsylvania, 150
Princeton Theological Seminary, 296
Pringle, Thomas, 161
Prison reform, 171-172
Privateers, 111
Privy Council, 6, 24, 50, 51, 192
Providence (R.I.) Abolition Society, 59, 65
Pugh, Sarah, 265, 354, 359, 360
Purvis, Robert, 237, 246

Quakers: on sinfulness of slavery, 4; merchants and slave trade, 4, 7-8; troubles in England, 7; opposition to slave trade, 30-31, 340; petitions to Congress, 33, 70, 133, 150; co-operation with Methodists, 35, 38; attacks on, 55-56, 57; and boycott, 61-62, 63, 165; concern for slaves, 63, 100, 101, 158; on colonization, 209; Anglo-American liaison, 221, 222; issue of mixed organizations, 234-236; Gurney visit, 252; Sturge visit, 281-283; Forster peace mission, 291-292; acceptance of Uncle Tom's Cabin, 351; British Friend's mission of 1853, 365; antislavery newspapers, 360. See also Friends, Society of Quant, E. T., 344
Quarterly Review, 184
Quintuple Treaty, 308

Raffles, Thomas, 210
Ralston, Gerard, 211*n*, 392
Ramsay, James, 38, 171
Randolph, Edmund, 46
Randolph, John, 73, 91, 114, 122, 152, 161

Raynal l'Abbé Guillaume, 14, 35, 40
Reform movement in U.S., 224
Registry: in Great Britain, 62, 146-149, 152, 160, 167, 169; in U.S., 122, 145
Remond, Charles Lenox, 263, 268, 274, 276, 277, 280, 285, 375
Remond, Sarah, 375, 394
Republican party, 241, 342, 374
Requited Labor Convention, 255
Rhoads, Samuel, 359
Rhode Island, 6
Rhode Island Friends, 6
Rice, David, 58-59
Rich, Charles, 149
Richards, Aaron, 88
Richardson, Ellen, 301
Richardson, Henry, 360
Roberts, Jonathan, 117, 149, 150
Robson, Mrs. (of Liverpool), 157
Rogers, Nathaniel P., 68, 274
Romilly, Samuel, 52, 87, 147
Roscoe, William, 88
Rousseau, Jean Jacques, 54
Royal African Company, 7, 31
Royal family, 74
Royal Jamaica Gazette, 179
Royal Society, 94
Ruiz, Jose, 324, 325, 326
Rush, Benjamin, 14, 24, 26, 27, 40, 41, 62, 65, 75, 106
Rush, Richard, 91, 92, 118, 119, 125, 129, 136, 142
Russell, John, Lord, 104, 271, 386, 389, 397*n*, 398, 402
Russell, W. H., 407
Russia, 142, 379
Russworm, John, 184
Rylance, J. H., 403

St. George's Bay Association, 83
St. Lucia, 169, 175, 198
Saint-Pierre, Bernadin de, 35*n*
Saints, 52, 82-83, 128, 169, 172. See also Clapham Sect
St. Vincent, 148
Sanders, Prince, 100-101, 102
Sandiford, Ralph, 10, 89
Santa Anna, 312
Santo Domingo, 60, 66, 69, 70, 76-79, 81, 89, 98, 100, 314. See also Haiti
Savage, Richard, 54
Say, Jean Baptiste, 153
Scoble, John: liaison with U.S., 197; on apprenticeship, 245; visit to U.S., 251-252; leader in British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 260, 343; and Collins affair, 279-280; at 1843 World Convention, 285; and church controversy, 297; and Texas, 306, 313; and extradition of fugitives, 316; and Creole case, 331; manager of Canadian settlement, 344; and Pennington, 347; denounced by Pillsbury, 363
Scot's Magazine, 185
Scott, Orange, 232
Scottish Church schisms, 297
Seamen Acts, 319-321, 332
Sedgewick, Theodore, 325
Senate (U.S.) and slave trade, 116, 123, 138-143, 323. See also Congress
Senior, Nassau, 374
Sergeant, John, 149, 190
Sewall, Samuel, 6
Seward, William H., 340, 341, 342, 347, 382, 393
Shaftesbury, Lord, 352, 395
Shakleton, Richard, 23
Sharp, Granville: and Somerset case, 3, 19-21; association with Benezet, 14, 17, 31, 238; correspondence with Rush, 26, 27; on colonization, 29, 83, 85, 86; honorary membership in American abolition societies, 41; on U.S. Constitution, 44, 47; aid to blacks, 64; on higher law, 65; and slave trade bill, 66; and African Institution, 88
Shawneetown, Illinois, 155
Sheppard, Moses, 357
Sherbro Island, 97
Sherman, Roger, 47
Sherriff, Emily, 394
Sherwin, John, 12
Sierra Leone, 61, 69, 83-90, 94, 96, 97, 112, 133, 165, 187
Sierra Leone Company, 83, 85, 90

Sieyes, l'Abbé, 35
Sinfulness of slavery, 4, 5, 27, 182, 194, 224-225. See also Slavery and churches
Slade, William, 261, 347
Slave, The, 360
Slave insurrections: fears of, 169, 190-191, 380
Slavery: issue of expansion into territories, 30, 146, 159, 167, 185, 193, 303, 372, 385; defense of, 57, 150-152, 189-190; amelioration, 62-63, 81, 145-146, 174, 175, 187, 189, 205; in northern states, 109; exposures of cruelty, 147, 157, 170, 171, 176, 181, 202; and federal power, 152, 185-186, 372; British guilt for, 157, 160; in West Indies, 159, 162, 189; and the churches, 173, 194, 230-236, 251, 269-270, 272, 297-299, 302, 354, 364-368
Slaves: stolen from Africa, 5; breeding of, 38, 44-45, 153, 171, 200; compensation for after Revolution, 107; compensation for after War of 1812, 109; registry of in Great Britain, 146-149; property rights in, 185
Slave states: question of admission, 115, 118
Slave trade: in colonial period, 5, 6, 8, 9, 26; state action against, 29, 53; revival at end of Revolution, 30; and Constitution, 45, 46; and Upper South, 46, 70; regulation, 51, 56-58, 59, 63, 65, 66, 71-79; evasions, 67, 69, 106-108, 111-112, 120, 121, 122, 148, 152, 333, 337; internal and intercolonial, 70, 137, 149-150, 162; laws against, 73, 74, 94, 108, 109, 117, 119, 121, 123; seizures, 109, 119, 122, 130, 187, 307-308; revival after War of 1812, 111; U.S. motives in unilateral action, 128; issue of reopening, 340-341
Slave Trade Committee (House of Representatives), 91, 114, 127, 129, 132, 134*n*-135*n*
Slave Trade Convention of 1824: proposed, 136-137; presented to Senate, 138; amendments, 139-140; votes on, 140*n*; failure, 143; mentioned, 181, 184
Sligo, Lord, 247
Smeathman, Henry, 83
Smith, Adam, 54, 153
Smith, Ashbel, 309, 310, 311
Smith, Gerrit, 247, 261, 262, 285, 292, 296, 315, 369, 371, 372, 375
Smith, Goldwin, 395, 399, 403, 406, 408, 410
Smith, James McCune, 372
Smith, John, 176
Smith, Sir Lionel, 249, 251
Smith, Samuel Stanhope, 91
Smith, William (abolitionist M.P.), 259
Smith, William (senator from Georgia), 150-152
Smyth, James Carmichael, 247
Society for Aboliton of Slavery throughout the British Dominions, 195
Society for Mitigating and Gradually Abolishing the State of Slavery throughout the British Dominions, 158, 168, 172, 177, 179, 184
Society for Promoting the Emigration of Free Persons of Colour to Haiti, 103
Society for the Civilization of Africa, 276, 277
Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, 38
Society for the Suppression of the Slave Trade, 133
Society of West India Planters and Merchants, 59, 60, 175, 176, 198
Somerset case, 3, 20-21, 82
South Carolina Association, 319-320
Southey, Robert, 203
Spanish slave trade, 108, 111, 113, 115, 118, 119, 122, 311, 324, 339, 379
Sparrow, Olivia, 173
Spooner, Lysander, 372
Spring, Gardiner, 236
Spurgeon, Charles H., 403
Stacey, George, 291, 311, 313, 317-318
Stafford House address, 352
Stanley, Edward, 205
Stanton, Elizabeth Cady, 265, 267

Stanton, Edwin M., 410
Stanton, Henry B., 197, 258, 261, 274, 285, 410
Staples, Seth, 325
Stephen, George, 169, 172, 196, 202
Stephen, James: abolitionist M.P., 52; and crisis in sugar colonies, 71, 76; and slave trade fight, 73; and African Institution, 88; and Haitian independence, 99; and law making slave trade piracy, 137; and registry system, 146, 147, 148; on sugar duties, 164; and total emancipation, 168, 169, 171; pamphlets, 179, 180; for immediate abolition, 196
Stephens, Alexander, 388
Stevenson, Andrew, 241-242, 278, 335
Stewart, Alvan, 48*n*, 372
Storch (Russian political economist), 153
Story, Joseph, 130-131, 328
Stowe, Calvin, 354, 364
Stowe, Harriet Beecher, 343, 350-358, 370, 373, 390
Stratheden, Lord, 405
Stuart, Captain Charles: as liaison with U.S., 197, 200; and colonization, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 219; association with Weld, 221, 226; visit to U.S., 225-226; to West Indies, 251; support for American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 276, 280; and fugitives, 316
Stuart, Sir Charles (British envoy to France), 133
Sturge, Joseph: and immediate abolition, 196; to West Indies, 245, 248, 249; against apprenticeship, 250; in British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 260; and 1840 World Convention, 267; visit to U.S., 281-283, 335; and 1843 World Convention, 285; despair over Quakers, 291; and Evangelical Alliance, 298; accused of hand-picking Birney for president, 313; donations in U.S., 348; and Harriet B. Stowe, 356; and Hemming, 361-362; and attempt at factional reconciliation, 363; and free cotton issue, 368, 369; mentioned, 179, 222
Sturtevant, J. M., 404
Suffield, Lord, 204
Suffolk, Duke of, 271
Sugar issue, 71, 203-204, 337-338
Sumner, Charles, 342, 373-374, 382, 398
Sunderland, LaRoy, 233
Sussex, Duke of, 217, 278
Sutherland, Duchess of, 354, 355

Tallmadge, James, 159, 160
Taney, Roger B., 253
Tappan, Arthur, 208, 219, 222, 258
Tappan, Juliana, 227
Tappan, Lewis: founder of Society for Suppression of Slave Trade, 133; and Mrs. Opie, 178; member of Association of Gentlemen, 208; and George Thompson's visit, 229; and Harriet Martineau, 230; leader of Am. and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 258; and 1840 World Convention, 262; to 1843 World Convention, 285-286, 287, 292; on Clarkson's publication, 292, 293; on J. L. Brown case, 296; and Texas, 308, 310, 311, 314; and Webster-Ashburton Treaty 317; and Amistad case, 325, 329; on Cuban slave trade, 338; and Pennington case, 347; and British resolutions against Fugitive Slave Act, 348; and Theobald Mathew, 349; and Hemming case, 361; and demise of Am. and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 363; contretemps with Chickering, 366; on expurgations of antislavery writings, 366-367; and federal power, 372; mentioned, 222, 342
Tariff, Morrill, 396
Taylor, George, 359
Taylor, John (British abolitionist), 180
Taylor, John of Caroline, 91
Taylor, P. A., 393
Taylor, Mrs. P. A., 394
Taylor, Zachary, 347
Texas, 224, 269, 284, 294, 300, 302-315
Thome, James A., 246, 249, 250, 261

Thompson, George: liaison with U.S., 197-198; debate with Borthwick, 200; visit to U.S., 225-229; censure of Hoby and Cox, 231; debate with Breckinridge, 237; introduction for A. Grimké's book, 238; on West Indian apprenticeship, 250; on Anglo-American co-operation, 257; and woman question, 265, 266-267; support of Garrison, 276, 343; trip contrasted with Sturge's, 283; and Evangelical Alliance, 299; and Texas, 304; second visit to U.S., 348-349; and reunion of factions, 360-364; elected to Parliament, 368; and cotton issue, 368; favored disunion in U.S., 384; lectures for North, 390; honored guest in U.S., 410
Thompson, George (American abolitionist), 343
Thompson, James, 54
Thompson, Smith, 127, 130, 131, 328
Thornton, Henry, 85, 90
Thornton, William, 85-86, 94, 277
Three-fifths clause, 45
Times (London), 210, 306, 307, 352, 392, 398, 399, 400, 406, 408
Tobago, 148
Tortola, 85, 86, 147
Tom, King, Sierra Leone, 83
Toombs, Alexander, 388
Torrey, Charles, 343
Treasury Department, 121
Trent Affair, 385, 387, 389, 392, 401, 402
Trinidad, 76, 147, 165, 169, 175, 198, 247
Trist, Nicholas, 112, 333, 334
Trollope, Anthony, 407
Trollope, Frances, 170-171
Troup, George M., 116, 186
Tucker (British captain), 335-337
Tucker, St. George, 38, 89, 91
Tucker, Thomas T., 55
Turnbull, David, 251, 333
Turnbull, Robert, 189-190
Turner, Nat, 190, 202, 323
Tweedie, William, 359
Tyler, John, 282, 309, 329, 337
Tyler, Mrs. John, 355, 355*n*

Uncle Tom Penny Offering, 356
Uncle Tom's Cabin, 350, 370, 395
Underhill, Walter, 347
Union and Emancipation Society (Manchester), 394, 400, 405
United Associated Synods, 233
United Brethren, 364
Upshur, Abel, 309, 312, 318

Van Buren, Martin, 235, 253, 325, 327
Vansittart, Lord, 148
Van Zandt, Isaac, 309
Varnum, Joseph B., 72
Vashon, John B., 217*n*
Vaughan, Charles, 144*n*, 323
Vaux, Roberts, 92, 97, 100, 108, 156, 159, 209
Verona, Congress of, 132, 136
Vesey, Denmark, 169, 170, 187, 188, 323
Vicksburg, 408
Victoria, Queen, 266, 354
Vienna, Congress of, 112, 131, 148
Virginia: petition on slave trade, 20, 22, 25-26; and manumission laws, 37, 43; and Methodist petition, 38; gradual emancipation bill, 68; internal slave trade, 73
Virginia Abolition Society, 56
Virginia Gazette, 24
Virginia Yearly Meeting, 8

Walker, David, 190, 215
Walker, Jonathan, 343
War of 1812, 88, 109
Ward, Henry G., 304
Ward, Samuel R., 321, 353, 354
Wardlow, Ralph, 285
Washington, Bushrod, 91, 94, 153, 209
Washington, George, 37, 42, 45, 46, 50, 52, 54, 91
Webb, Hannah, 359
Webb, Richard, 264, 343, 350, 359, 362, 375
Webb, Samuel, 284, 286
Webster-Ashburton Treaty, 315-319, 332, 336, 337

Webster, Daniel, 133, 235, 316, 317, 329, 330, 337
Wedgwood, Josiah, 49
Wedgwood cameos, 49, 201-202
Weld, Theodore, 208, 221, 222, 234, 237, 240, 241, 251, 261, 276, 285, 335, 366, 388
Wellington, Duke of, 110, 133, 204
Wesley, John, 11, 12, 13, 17, 35, 36, 37, 58, 233
Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, 185
West, Benjamin, 18
Westbury (N.Y.) Yearly Meeting, 62
Western Reserve, 231
West Indian emancipation, 141-142, 208, 243-255, 271, 314, 323, 335, 347. See also Emancipation
West Indian planters, 20-21, 30, 59, 66, 71, 76-78, 154, 162, 168, 172, 174-176, 185, 192, 204-206, 247
West Indian Reporter, 198
West Indies: attacks on slavery in, 171; absentee landlordism, 172, 204; economie power, 204; apprenticeship, 206-207, 223, 244-246
Westminster, Marquis of, 218
Westminster Abbey, 220, 267
Westminster Review, 185, 212, 240, 407
Wheatley, Phillis, 19
Whigs, 204
Whipple, George, 372
Whitefield, George, 12
Whitely, Henry, 202
Whiting, W. E., 372
Whittier, John Greenleaf: antislavery poet, 54; and G. Thompson visit, 229; and Gurney, 254; and 1840 World Convention, 262, 263, 264*n;* against Collins, 280; and Sturge visit, 281-282; and 1843 World Convention, 285; Creole case, 335; writer for National Era, 348
Wilberforce, Canada, 214, 248, 344
Wilberforce, Liberia, 211
Wilberforce, Samuel, 338, 391
Wilberforce, William: correspondence with Wesley, 40; leadership against slave trade, 50, 51, 52, 59, 61, 63, 66, 67, 71, 73, 76, 106, 110; and Sierra Leone, 83, 86, 90; and African Institution, 88; and African colonization, 92, 94; aid to Christophe, 98; meeting with Alexander I, 100-101; meeting with J. Q. Adams, 115; and registry, 146-148; and total emancipation, 168-173; yields leadership, 171; on women, 178; attack on, 189; and immediatism, 195-196; on compensated emancipation, 207; and Cresson debates, 210, 217; death, 220; as antislavery leader, 259; mentioned, 158, 244, 299
Williams, Eric, 76-77
Williams, James, 249
Williams, Peter, 90
Wilmington, Delaware, Abolition Society, 93
Wilson, Henry, 340
Wilson, Hiram, 261, 344
Wilson, James, 47
Winslow, Emily, 265
Wirt, William, 95, 119, 130, 131, 188
Wise, Henry A., 313, 335
Wistar, Gaspar, 31
Woman question, 258, 259, 263, 264-269
Woods, Joseph, 31, 43
Woodward, Jesse, 165
Woolman, John, 8, 10-11, 61, 222, 235, 291
Work, Alanson, 343
Working classes: conditions compared with slaves', 154-155, 160, 201-202, 355, 356, 365; and Civil War, 400-403, 405-406, 409
World Anti-Slavery Conventions: in 1840, 261-270, 273; in 1843, 284-287, 310-312, 314
Wray, Sir Cecil, 31
Wright, Fanny, 171. See also D'Arusemont
Wright, Henry C., 288-289, 298
Wright, Lucy, 264
Wythe, George, 42

Yancey, William, 388, 389
Yost, Pierre A., 389

Zion's Watchman, 232

DATE DUE

DE 19 '81

DE 14 96

GAYLORD

PRINTED IN U.S.A.

MARYGROVE COLLEGE LIBRARY
Men and brothers; Anglo-Americ
326.942 F61
3 1927 00008939 8

326.942
F61

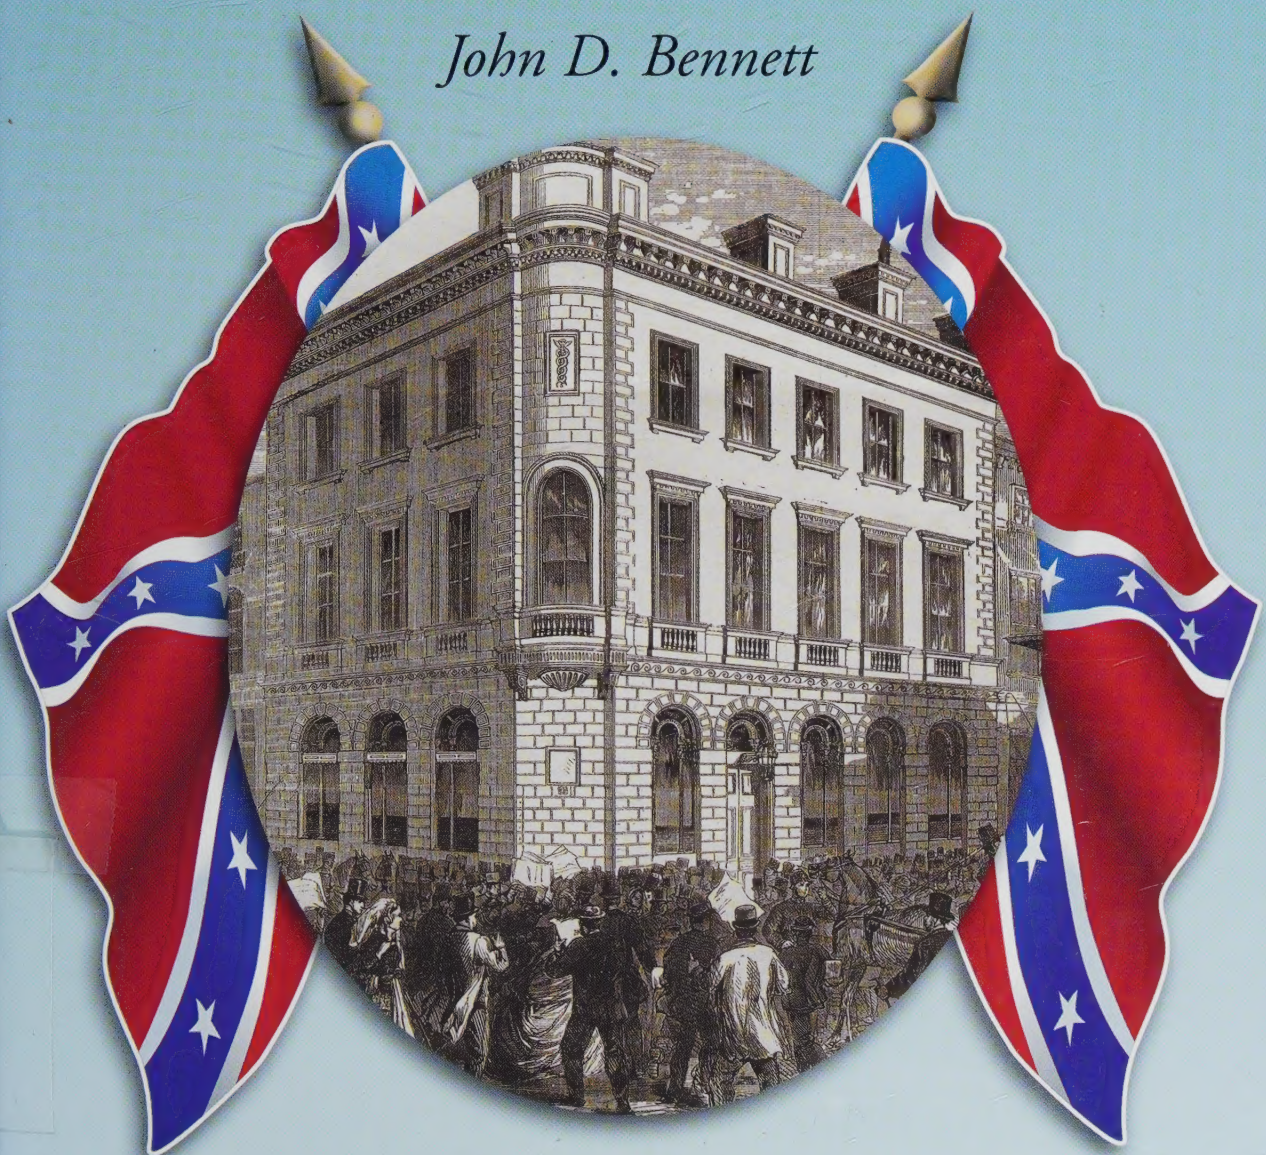
MARYGROVE
LIBRARY
DETROIT, MI

ISBN 0-252-00225-3

THE LONDON CONFEDERATES

The Officials, Clergy, Businessmen and Journalists Who Backed the American South During the Civil War

John D. Bennett



Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2022 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

https://archive.org/details/londonconfederat0000benn

FRANKLIN COUNTY LIBRARY SYSTEM
101 RAGGED EDGE ROAD SOUTH
CHAMBERSBURG, PA 17202

BESORE MEMORIAL LIBRARY
305 E. BALTIMORE ST.
GREENCASTLE, PA 17225

The London Confederates

The London Confederates

The Officials, Clergy, Businessmen and Journalists Who Backed the American South During the Civil War

JOHN D. BENNETT

McFarland & Company, Inc., Publishers
Jefferson, North Carolina, and London

Library of Congress Cataloguing-in-Publication Data

Bennett, J.D. (John D.), 1937–
The London Confederates : the officials, clergy, businessmen and journalists who backed the American South during the Civil War / by John D. Bennett.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN-13: 978-0-7864-3056-7
softcover : 50# alkaline paper ∞

1. Confederate States of America — Relations — England — London.
2. London (England) — Relations — Confederate States of America.
3. London (England) — History — 1800–1950. 4. Confederate States of America — Foreign public opinion, British. 5. Public opinion — England — London — History — 19th century. 6. Confederate States of America — Relations — Great Britain. 7. Great Britain —
Relations — Confederate States of America. 8. United States —
History — Civil War, 1861–1865 — Foreign public opinion, British.
9. United States — Foreign relations — 1861–1865. I. Title.
E488.B46 2008 973.7'1 — dc22 2007026097

British Library cataloguing data are available

©2008 John D. Bennett. All rights reserved

No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying or recording, or by any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publisher.

On the cover: foreground, the offices of Overend, Gurney & Company, who lent money to London shipbuilders for the construction of blockade runners and were themselves involved; background ©2007 Shutterstock

Manufactured in the United States of America

McFarland & Company, Inc., Publishers
Box 611, Jefferson, North Carolina 28640
www.mcfarlandpub.com

Table of Contents

Preface 1
Introduction 3

1 — London in the 1860s 5
2 — A Diplomatic Presence 25
3 — The Propaganda War 39
4 — Supplies for the Confederate Army 51
5 — Vessels Suitable for Our Purposes 62
6 — The Spying Game 78
7 — The Cotton Loan 87
8 — Business with the Southern States 95
9 — Artistic Reflections, Literary Echoes 110
10 — Support for the South? 135

Epilogue 152
Appendix A. London Firms with Confederate Links 161
Appendix B. Pro-Confederate Publications and Their Publishers 164
Appendix C. Confederate Music Published in London 166
Appendix D. The Southern Lobby in Parliament 167
Appendix E. The Southern Independence Association of London 168
Appendix F. The British Jackson Monumental Fund 169
Appendix G. A Note on British Currency 170
Chronology 171
Gazetteer 175
Chapter Notes 183
Bibliography 195
Index 199

Preface

In spite of the enormous interest in the American Civil War which exists on both sides of the Atlantic, there is relatively little awareness of Confederate activity overseas, especially the quest for diplomatic recognition by Britain and France, then the leading European powers, and the procurement of armaments and ships which Britain in particular could supply.

This study of Confederates in London grew out of my interest in the Confederate Navy. The Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies in the War of the Rebellion, Second Series, contain the published Confederate secret service correspondence, and I noticed that some of the letters bore London addresses. Wondering if any of these still existed, I went along to have a look.

It was to be the start of a long process of investigation and research, some of which was carried out in London — at the British Library, the Guildhall Library and the Institute of Historical Research — and elsewhere — at the libraries of Sussex University, Reading University, Leicester University, Cambridge University, John Rylands University, Manchester, and Sheffield Archives.

Although some of the activities described here — the efforts in the fields of diplomacy and propaganda, the purchasing operations for the Army, the attempts to obtain vessels for the Navy, and the raising of a foreign loan — have been previously chronicled by Frank L. Owsley in King Cotton Diplomacy, Charles P. Cullop in Confederate Propaganda in Europe, Richard I. Lester in Confederate Finance and Purchasing in Great Britain, and Warren F. Spencer in The Confederate Navy in Europe, I have taken a fresh look at them in the context of the London of the 1860s in which the Confederates found themselves, for one or two of them a relatively familiar place, but for most, a foreign environment. In addition, there are other aspects of the Confederate presence here which have so far received little or no attention. As far as I am aware, there has been no detailed examination of Federal surveillance and espionage operations, nor any recent account of British business relations with the Confederacy, and the cultural impact of the Civil War has gone largely unnoticed.

I owe a special debt of gratitude to the late Professor Peter J. Parish, formerly Director of the Institute of United States Studies, University of London, and subsequently Mellon Senior Research Fellow in American History at Cambridge University, who found time, in a very busy schedule, to read and comment on an earlier version of this manuscript; I was much encouraged by his remark, "there is plenty of scope for a book-length study of Confederate activity in London."

As well as reading several drafts of the text and making valuable observations, John G.

Cox helped me obtain two important university theses. I also had help from Undine Concannon, archivist at Madame Tussaud's; Tracey Earl, archivist at Coutts & Company; Tony Kelly, sales manager of Firmin & Sons plc; Ray L. Marshall, consultant archivist of De La Rue; the Rev. Prebendary Donald Barnes, formerly vicar of St. Peter's, Belsize Park; and the Manuscripts Department of the Wilson Library at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, which supplied a microfilm of the unpublished diary of James H. North, C.S.N., in the Southern Historical Collection.

Acknowledgments are also due those publishers and organizations that kindly gave permission to use material from their books, periodicals and manuscripts: Royden Harrison, "British Labour and the Confederacy," International Review of Social History, 2 (1957) © Internationaal Instituut voor Sociale Geschiedenis, Cambridge University Press; excerpts from The Education of Henry Adams: An Autobiography, Boston: Mariner Books, 2000; Douglas F. Forrest, Odyssey in Gray: A Diary of Confederate Service, 1863–1865, Library of Virginia; Murray's Modern London 1860, reprinted by Old House Books; Douglas H. Maynard, "The Forbes-Aspinwall Mission," and Harriet C. Owsley, "Henry Shelton Sanford and Federal Surveillance Abroad," from Mississippi Valley Historical Review, © Organization of American Historians http://www.oah.org/, reprinted with permission; Sir John Trelawney, Parliamentary Diaries, 1858–1865, Royal Historical Society; Head of Sheffield Libraries, Archives and Information for letters in the Wharncliffe Muniments, which have been accepted in lieu of Inheritance Tax by HM Government and allocated to Sheffield City Council; Colin Narbeth, Robin Hendy, and Christopher Stocker, Collecting Paper Money and Bonds, Stanley Gibbons Publications; James Heyward North Papers #862, Southern Historical Collection, Wilson Library, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill; Richard I. Lester, Confederate Finance and Purchasing in Great Britain during the American Civil War, © 1975 University of Virginia Press; C. Vann Woodward, ed. Mary Chesnut's Civil War, Yale University Press; extract from George Augustus Sala, Twice Around the Clock, by kind permission of Continuum International Publishing Group; Charles Shain, "The English Novelists and the American Civil War," American Quarterly 14:3 (1962), 420–421, © The American Studies Association, reprinted with permission of The Johns Hopkins University Press.

Introduction

The American war has of necessity occupied a large share of the attention of the people of this country, as was to be expected of two nations so closely connected as the English and the Americans in many of their sympathies and their institutions, as well as in their language, literature, race and religion.

— London Journal, August 22, 1863

The American Civil War was of great interest to the people of Britain, with their historical, cultural and linguistic links with the United States. The progress of the war occupied much space in the newspapers and magazines of the day, though public attention was inevitably distracted later by events in Europe — the Polish revolt of 1863, and the brief war between Denmark and Prussia over Schleswig-Holstein in 1864.

The war was also the cause of much concern to the British government. Should it intervene? Should it declare the Federal blockade of Southern ports illegal and break it? And most importantly, should it recognize the Confederate States? In the event, the Liberal government of Lord Palmerston declared its neutrality and declined to intervene in any way. Furthermore, it remained unwilling to recognize the Confederacy until the military course of the war became clearer. The events of September 1862 — the failure of Lee's invasion of the North at Antietam, followed by Lincoln's preliminary Emancipation Proclamation, which added a moral dimension to the original aim of saving the Union — postponed, and ultimately ended, the likelihood of intervention and diplomatic recognition. On more than one occasion there was also the possibility of armed conflict with the United States — at the time of the Trent incident in 1861 and over the building of the Laird rams in 1863.

Hopes that the war would leave the United States permanently weakened as a mercantile power were coupled with the willingness of British firms to supply both sides, and particularly the embattled Confederacy, with whatever they needed and could pay for. Support for the South came not only from the business community, but also most of the aristocracy, some of the professional middle classes, members of Oxford and Cambridge universities, Church of England clergymen, officers in the army and navy, and even some working men, who were by no means all pro–Union.

The port of Liverpool became a center for Confederate shipbuilding and blockade-running, and the base for the South's chief naval purchasing agent, as well as housing the offices of Fraser, Trenholm & Company, the Confederacy's bankers in Europe, and its importance should not be underestimated. But it was to London, the center of power and influence, that the Confederates inevitably looked. The home of Parliament and the government, London, with its diplomatic, commercial, industrial and financial significance, became a principal focus of Southern activity in Britain and Confederates began to arrive there within weeks of the outbreak of hostilities.

One problem they faced was how to avoid infringing, or at least being seen to infringe, the laws of the host country, particularly the Foreign Enlistment Act and the Proclamation of Neutrality; another was avoiding the attentions of Federal spies. As the war progressed, the Federals became increasingly proficient at the surveillance and infiltration of Confederate activities, particularly shipbuilding and blockade-running.

Another difficulty, for both Confederates and Federals, was the time it took to learn of events in America.[1] In the absence of a transatlantic telegraph — it was not successfully laid until 1866 — it took nearly a fortnight for news to reach Europe.[2] Telegrams, dispatches and newspapers came by mail steamer to Liverpool, Plymouth or Southampton, where newspaper and news agency representatives were waiting, and initial reports were then telegraphed to London, with other items forwarded by post. In 1863, to speed up news-gathering, Reuter's News Agency constructed a telegraph line from Cork to Crookhaven, some 60 miles away on the southwest tip of Ireland, where the mail steamers could be intercepted and the news telegraphed to Cork, and from there to London.[3]

There was also the problem of communicating with the Confederacy. Letters and dispatches were carried through the blockade by purchasing agents, naval officers and emissaries, and the regular mail service between Liverpool and New York was sometimes used by Confederate agents in disguise, but whichever method was resorted to, it was slow and hazardous, with no guarantee of safe receipt.[4] Several attempts were made to overcome the problem, but none were successful.

The men described in these pages served the Confederacy, not on the battlefield — although several of them did have military experience — but in other ways: seeking diplomatic recognition for the South, attempting to put across her point of view, and obtaining much-needed arms and equipment, even warships. Some of them became minor public figures, while others, particularly those involved in purchasing and propaganda activities, preferred to keep a much lower profile. Whatever their role, their task would not be an easy one.

1

London in the 1860s

There is not a more striking sight in London than the bustle of its great streets — the perpetually rolling tide of people, carts, carriages, gay equipages, and omnibuses, in its great thoroughfares.

—Murray's Modern London, 1860

In 1861 London was the greatest city in the world, both in extent and population. It was several times the size of New York, and many times that of New Orleans, the largest city in the Confederacy, as well as Richmond, its capital. In an area encompassing about 78,000 acres, or nearly 121 square miles, were upwards of 10,500 streets, squares, crescents, terraces, courts and alleys, containing 362,890 houses. Beyond the ancient cities of London and Westminster and the parliamentary boroughs of Marylebone, Finsbury, Tower Hamlets, Southwark and Lambeth, the suburbs stretched as far as Hampstead, Holloway, Highgate, Kilburn, Tottenham and Edmonton to the north; Camberwell, Brixton, Dulwich, Peckham, Norwood, Lewisham and Sydenham to the south; Limehouse, Poplar, Blackwall and Greenwich to the east; and Battersea, Wandsworth, Putney, Fulham, Hammersmith and Acton to the west.

The metropolis was indeed vast, and on October 9, 1863, James Glaisher, an astronomer and meteorologist who had made a number of previous balloon ascents over London, described what he saw as he passed over London Bridge at 7,000 feet in a particularly clear atmosphere:

> The scene around was probably one that cannot be equaled in the world at one glance — the homes of 3,000,000 people were seen, and so distinctly that every large building at every part was easily distinguished; while those almost under us — viz., the Bank and Newgate [Prison], the Docks and surrounding buildings, &c., in such detail that their inner courts were visible, and their ground-plans could have been drawn. Cannon Street was easily traced; but it was difficult to believe at first sight that small building to be St Paul's. Looking onward, Oxford Street was visible; the Parks, the Houses of Parliament, and Millbank Prison, with its radiating lines from the centre, at once attracted notice. In fact, the whole of London was visible, and some parts of it very clearly. Then all around there were lines of detached villas, imbedded as it were in shrubs; and beyond, the country, like a garden, with its fields well marked, but becoming smaller and smaller as the eye wandered further away.[1]

The census of London, taken on April 7, 1861, recorded a total population of 2,803,921, which included those in workhouses, hospitals and prisons, as well as an estimate of the numbers living in vessels on the river or sleeping under railway arches or in doorways. Out of a foreign population of 40,909, 4.68 percent (1,914) were American citizens.[2] Some of these no doubt went home when the Civil War began, to be replaced by new arrivals of the kind described here.

There had been an American presence in London since at least the eighteenth century. Benjamin Franklin first lived there in 1724–1726, and again in 1757–1775, as colonial agent and postmaster for the colonies, while John Adams served as the new republic's first "minister plenipotentiary" in 1785–1788. In the first half of the nineteenth century London attracted American writers like James Fenimore Cooper and Ralph Waldo Emerson, painters such as John James Audubon and George Catlin, and famous actors like Edwin Forrest and Ira Aldridge (who became a naturalized Englishman). In 1842–1845 the short-lived Republic of Texas maintained a legation in London. The Great Exhibition of 1851, held in the Crystal Palace in Hyde Park, had many Americans among its six million visitors. The exhibits included such famous products as Samuel Colt's revolvers and Cyrus McCormick's reaper, the display of which was subsidized by the London-based American banker George Peabody, after the United States Congress had declined to do so.

Some of the Confederates who came to London during the Civil War had been there before, but for many of them it was an unfamiliar place. At this particular time it must also have seemed like a city in turmoil, with the disruption caused by the building of London's main drainage system, as well as the new underground railway, both of which were under construction when the war began.[3] In addition, in 1864 work also started on the Victoria Embankment along the north bank of the Thames.

The metropolis was not only an enormous place, it was also a very confusing one, with many street names repeated in different areas. There were, for instance, no fewer than 37 King Streets, 27 Queen Streets, 22 Princess Streets, 17 Duke Streets, 35 Charles Streets, 29 John Streets, 15 James Streets and 21 George Streets, not to mention 24 New Streets, 16 York Streets, 14 Cross Streets, 16 Union Streets and 10 Gloucester Streets.

To help both strangers and natives find their way around this vast city, there were many pocket maps available. Mounted on linen and folded in covers, they were issued colored and uncolored, priced accordingly, and usually included a street index. Mapmakers copied each other shamelessly and up-to-dateness was not a matter of great concern; sometimes the only features revised were the title and date. The publication of street maps was greatly stimulated by the International Exhibition of 1862, which brought millions of British and foreign visitors to London. Charles Cheffins' Visitors' Railway Station Map of London and its Environs, Charles Smith's Exhibition Map of London, with Omnibus Routes and Cab Fares, William Tweedie's Picture Map of London, Ward & Lock's New Handy Pocket Map of London, containing all Railways and Proposed Lines, Railway Termini &c., and Josiah Whitbread's Map of London, extending Four Miles round Charing Cross all appeared in or about 1862, along with others published by George Cruchley, Benjamin Davies, James Dolling, George Philip and George Welland.

Two large-scale maps also appeared, the first proper surveys of London since the 1820s. The Environs of London, drawn and engraved by Edward Weller, at nine inches to the mile, was first issued in parts in 1861–1862 as supplements to the Weekly Dispatch newspaper and then reissued as the Dispatch Atlas in 1863. Edward Stanford's Library Map of London and Its Suburbs, at six inches to the mile, was also published in 1862. As well as in sheets, both maps were available on rollers or folded in a case.[4]

Although a street atlas of London had been produced in the late 1840s by James Wyld,

"Geographer to the Queen and H.R.H. Prince Albert," it was too large for use out-of-doors, and it was not until 1854 that the first pocket-sized one appeared. Collins' Illustrated Atlas of London was published by a little-known mapseller called Henry George Collins, and had specially drawn plates, a detailed index of streets, and supplementary lists of public buildings, museums and other places of interest. It covered most of the continuously built-up area, though not the sparsely populated outer suburbs. Collins had gone bankrupt by the time a second edition was issued in 1859, and it was brought out by another publisher, Thomas Hodgson. That, and the third edition, called London at a Glance. A Guide for Visitors to the International Exhibition, published by Darton & Hodge in 1862, also included a list of hotels, the new postal districts (introduced in 1856) and the railways.[5]

The difficulties faced by strangers trying to find their way around the capital were made worse by the dense winter fogs, caused by the burning of millions of coal fires. Fogs had been a feature of London for centuries but they had become progressively thicker and more frequent as the capital's population increased. Sometimes they appeared to be bottle-green in color, at other times pea-soup yellow, through which the street gas lamps at night could barely be seen. Charles Dickens described fog as a "London particular" and the yellow variety came to be known as a "pea-souper." The American historian John Lothrop Motley, who came to London in 1858, wrote to his mother in Massachusetts in November of the following year, describing a London fog:

> I do not object to fog always excepting a black, thick London fog. I was obliged to pass a day in town yesterday and to breathe unmitigated coal smoke for six hours. When the fog settles down in London the smoke from millions of chimneys settles down with it. It cannot escape upwards and so every breathing being is turned for the time into a chimney. I was a chimney all day yesterday and rejoiced that I was not born in that station in life in London, not finding it exhilarating. London is not attractive in November.[6]

Motley went back to America when the Civil War started, but he was to return to London in the late sixties as United States minister to Great Britain.

Where did people live in this great metropolis? Mayfair was still the traditional home of the aristocracy, but between about 1825 and 1850 a new aristocratic quarter — Belgravia — had come into being, "whose houses, palatial in character and size, denote the high social position of their occupants."[7] An attempt to create a second, or South, Belgravia a decade later — what we now know as Pimlico — was less successful. No sooner was it completed than the railway arrived: Victoria Station, opened in 1860, brought noise, dirt, greatly increased pedestrian and vehicular traffic, and the sort of undesirables who were attracted to London's railway terminals.

Another new area, north of Hyde Park, was Tyburnia, "principally inhabited by professional men, the great City merchants, and by those who are undergoing the transitional state between commerce and fashion."[8] Regent's Park and Marylebone were desirable middle-class areas, though further east, Bloomsbury was now chiefly occupied by lawyers, merchants and rooming house keepers, "its noble mansions no longer holding, as formerly ... the rank and fashion of the town."[9] Further out, once rural Islington was mostly inhabited by middle-class families.

The City of London, the center of trade and commerce, had already lost most of its resident population. "Teeming by day with its hundreds of thousands, its streets gorged by carriages, cabs, and carts, [it] presents at night ... the spectacle of a deserted city ... the railway carriage, the omnibus, and the steam-boat carry the clerks to the outskirts, and the merchants and principals to their villas and mansions at Clapham, Hackney or the West End."[10]

Map of central London in 1862. Present-day thoroughfares like Shaftesbury Avenue, Charing Cross Road, the Aldwych and Kingsway did not yet exist. (Routledge's Popular Guide to London and its Suburbs, 1862)

Those following a particular calling tended to favor certain areas. Authors, journalists and publishers often chose St. John's Wood; artists and engravers, Kensington and Camden Town; and musicians, singers, actors and dancers, Brompton; physicians and surgeons frequently set up their practices in Savile Row or Brook Street, Mayfair; printers could be found in Fleet Street and the Strand; medical students in Southwark, near to Guy's Hospital; Members of Parliament in Westminster; diplomats sometimes resided in Belgravia; stockbrokers and merchants inhabited Bayswater, Brixton and Clapham, as well as Tyburnia; and clerks, Islington and Highgate. At a less respectable level, large numbers of "pretty horse-breakers"—well-dressed courtesans who rode in Hyde Park—had taken up residence in Lower Brompton and the area between Sloane Street and the International Exhibition site in South Kensington.

And what of those who worked with their hands? Watchmakers and jewelers were concentrated in Clerkenwell; silk and velvet weavers in Spitalfields and Bethnal Green; and cabinetmakers and carvers around Old Street and Aldersgate Street; iron-founders, shipwrights and boilermakers could be found in Blackwall, Poplar, Millwall and the Isle of Dogs; sugar bakers and refiners in Whitechapel and Commercial Road; and tanners, parchment makers and skin dressers in Bermondsey; potters and glassmakers were located in Lambeth; tailors in Golden Square and Burlington Gardens; boot and shoemakers in Shoreditch and around Drury Lane; hatters worked in Southwark; carriage builders in and around Long Acre; boat builders in Lambeth and Chelsea; and toy makers and doll-dressers in Hoxton.

The writer of a guidebook aimed at visitors to the International Exhibition of 1862, and intended to show the metropolis in the best possible light, was obliged to admit that "it is not pretended that London is all fair to look upon and bright with cleanliness and godliness," and he went on to paint a suitably lurid picture of another London, inhabited by what the Victorians regarded as the dangerous poor:

> Of course we do not pretend that London has not its squalid quarters—its dens of poverty and its sinks of iniquity, its horrible lanes and fever-haunted courts, its close, unhealthy streets, and its dark wretched bye-ways, its misery-filled alleys and its sinful slums, where the ginshop and the pawnbroker's stand side by side; its Whitechapel and its St Giles, where thieves and costermongers herd with debased women, whose most familiar word is an oath, and children whose earliest education has been picked up in the streets; and its hundreds of squalid lurking-places, known only to their wretched degraded inhabitants.[11]

For anyone arriving in London, the first requirement was somewhere to live. Hotels where Confederates are known to have stayed included the Albemarle, the Berners, the Brunswick, the Burlington, the Euston, Fenton's, the Grosvenor, Hatchett's, Haxell's, Morley's, the Tavistock, the Westminster Palace and Wood's.

The Burlington Hotel, which was owned by James Breach, had its main entrance in Cork Street, just off Piccadilly, but there was another entrance in Old Burlington Street, which was parallel to Cork Street. It had been a hotel since about 1823, and one of its residents in 1861 was the celebrated Florence Nightingale, who had made it her base for her campaign to reform the Army's medical services. Even older was Fenton's Hotel in St. James's Street, which had been established since about 1800. It was now owned by Francis Fenton, and though it was still regarded as a fashionable establishment, its rooms were described as being "small and dark, furnished like a common lodging house." Hatchett's Hotel, on the corner of Piccadilly and Dover Street, run by Joseph Bowles, was a former coaching inn; a guidebook described it as "a long-established and most respectable house" and it claimed to have been "established 100 years."

"Happily placed in the centre of the West Strand, Haxell's Hotel is one of the most complete and comfortable in London," announced a contemporary advertisement.[12] "It comprises numerous suites of apartments ... spacious coffee rooms, ladies' or family coffee room, etc. The improvements ... comprise a new entrance, noble hall, wide, light and commodious staircases and passages throughout the building, and the establishment now consists of upwards of one hundred rooms ... The hotel is much patronised by families and gentlemen arriving from the Confederate States of America." Run by Edward Nelson Haxell, it now also incorporated the adjacent Exeter Hall Hotel, and was not expensive by West End standards. Single bedrooms cost two shillings and sixpence, double rooms, four shillings, and a drawing room, with bedroom en suite, ten shillings and sixpence.

The Tavistock was one of a number of hotels in Covent Garden. It was popular with sea captains on leave, and had a huge dining room occupying the whole of the first floor and as many as two hundred bedrooms, but was thought "a miserable concern for all its reputation" by one Confederate who stayed there. Wood's Hotel, "for families and gentlemen," was part of Furnival's Inn, on the north side of High Holborn, and was owned by William Wood.

Most of these hotels had been converted from one or more private houses, and sometimes provided rather indifferent accommodation, which impressed neither European nor American visitors. The difficulty experienced by strangers in finding good hotels in London, where the accommodation was satisfactory and the charges moderate, was alluded to by guidebooks and newspapers. Some Confederates, particularly those accompanied by their families, undoubtedly found the high cost of living in London's West End a worry, and one army purchasing agent is known to have moved from lodgings in Jermyn Street to cheaper and more spacious accommodation on the western outskirts at Notting Hill, probably following the arrival of his wife and family.

It was the new railways which pioneered hotels built for the purpose in the capital, as they began to provide them at the main railway stations to accommodate travelers. The Euston, one of a pair of hotels situated on either side of the entrance to Euston Station, was opened in 1839 by the London & Birmingham Railway. The Great Northern Hotel at King's Cross and the Great Western Hotel at Paddington both opened in 1854. The Grosvenor Hotel, built next to Victoria Station in 1861 by the London, Brighton & South Coast Railway, contained "every convenience for the comfort of visitors." These were followed by railway hotels at London Bridge (1862) and Charing Cross Stations (1865).

At least one hotel already existed in the West End. Morley's Hotel, at the corner of Trafalgar Square and the Strand, had opened in 1831. It had a hundred bedrooms and in the early 1860s was owned by Thomas and George James; one Confederate who stayed there pronounced it "an excellent house — the best I've seen in London." In 1859 the Westminster Palace in Victoria Street, London's first luxury hotel, was built to provide accommodation for members of Parliament, people frequenting the law courts, foreign visitors and the public at large. It had "thirteen sitting-rooms, gentlemen's and ladies' coffee rooms (the latter an exceedingly fine apartment), several committee and dining rooms, with one hundred and thirty bedrooms, besides servants. apartments."[13] Managed by William Cowell, it was also the first hotel in London to have an elevator, or "rising room" as it was called, and it was noted for its good

THE COSTER-GIRL.

"Apples! An 'aypenny a lot, Apples!"

[From a Daguerreotype by BEARD.]

A coster-girl. Costermongers were street sellers of vegetables and fruit, particularly apples. (Mayhew)

English food. Another impressive hotel was the Palace in Buckingham Gate, containing "costly and luxurious suites of rooms," which opened in 1861 and also belonged to James Breach, the owner of the Burlington Hotel.

The year the Civil War ended saw the opening of the magnificent Langham Hotel in Portland Place, which was inaugurated in June 1865 with a reception for 2,000 guests, including the Prince of Wales. The hotel cost £300,000, had forty private sitting rooms and three hundred bedrooms, and provided every conceivable facility. Its second manager was James M. Sanderson, a former hotel owner in prewar Philadelphia and a wartime Union lieutenant colonel, who while an inmate of Libby Prison in Richmond had endeavored to instill some order into its catering arrangements. The Langham soon became a firm favorite with Americans in London.

Other hotels which catered to Americans included the Arundel Private Hotel, off the Strand, the Cavendish Hotel, Jermyn Street, the New York Hotel and the Prince of Wales Hotel, off Leicester Square, the Queen's Family Hotel, Bayswater, the Royal Opera Colonnade Hotel, Haymarket, the Villafranca Hotel, Covent Garden, and Woodall's Commercial and Private Hotel, Euston Road.

As well as hotels, there were innumerable rooming houses, and visitors planning a long stay were advised to rent an apartment. Moderately priced ones could be found in suburbs like Islington and Kensington, while "at the West End, apartments may be obtained from ten shillings a week for a single bed-room, use of sitting-room and attendance, to two or even three guineas a day for accommodation of a more pretentious character," advised a guidebook.[14] The best places to look for these were the streets leading off Piccadilly, Oxford Street, Regent Street and St. James's Street. One rooming house in Bury Street, St. James's, advertised in the Index, the South's propaganda newspaper, and several Confederates stayed there.

In addition, many "persons of respectability" were only too happy to let spare rooms. These could usually be found through house agents, as well as advertisements in newspapers like the Times, which "will often open to the stranger the doors of very respectable families, where he will get all the quiet and comfort of a home, so difficult to be found in the noisy, and often extortionate ... lodging-house."[15] One of the Confederate commissioners found rooms with a hosier and glover in Half Moon Street, off Piccadilly, while another lodged with a wine and spirit merchant in Albemarle Street in the same area.

There were hundreds of dining rooms and coffeehouses where meals could be obtained, and London guidebooks of the early 1860s were full of advice on where to eat. "A good, plain, cheap dinner or lunch, quickly served" or "a capital dinner, well served" were available at many places. "The visitor may dine well and respectably for a shilling, or luxuriously for a guinea. He has all the choice between a quiet chop or dish of meat and vegetables ... for about a shilling or fifteen pence; and a 'three-course and dessert' spread..."[16] Writing a few years after the Civil War, the American journalist Daniel Joseph Kirwan, the London correspondent of the New York World, observed, "at Blanchard's [a well-known restaurant in Soho] you may dine for a pound upon the choicest variety of dishes, cooked by a French chef."[17] Many hotels and inns, particularly in the Strand, Fleet Street, Cheapside and Holborn, also had lunch-bars, where "a chop or a snack and a glass of ale for sixpence, or a plate of hot meat, with vegetables and bread, for about eightpence" could be found.[18]

Most of the important institutions were on the north side of the Thames. Linking the north and south banks were ten bridges, the oldest of which were Blackfriars Bridge (1769), which was replaced in the 1860s, and Battersea Bridge, a wooden structure dating from 1772.

Vauxhall Bridge (1816) and Southwark Bridge (1819) were the first iron bridges to be built over the Thames. Waterloo Bridge (1817) was appropriately named as it had been opened on the second anniversary of the battle. The medieval London Bridge was rebuilt in 1831 and the eighteenth-century Westminster Bridge in 1862. The first suspension bridge in London was constructed at Hammersmith in 1827; Chelsea Bridge (1858) and Lambeth Bridge (1862) were also suspension bridges.

The Grosvenor Bridge (1860), serving Victoria Station, was the first railway bridge to be built across the Thames. Further west, at Battersea, the West London Railway constructed a wrought-iron bridge in 1861, while other railway bridges were built in 1864 at Blackfriars, for the London, Chatham & Dover Railway, and at Charing Cross for the South Eastern Railway.

There were a number of ways of getting around this vast metropolis. Horse-drawn cabs had first appeared in the 1830s, and by 1860 there were 4,600 of them on the streets of London. "Travelling in that most rapid and convenient of London vehicles, the cabriolet — or cab, as it is now universally called — is very common," readers of a contemporary guidebook were told. "Remember that the fare for one or two persons is sixpence a mile, by day or night."[19] A reasonable quantity of luggage could be carried free of charge, and to avoid any dispute with the cabdriver, passengers were advised to purchase the Red Book of fares, published by the Metropolitan Police (price one shilling), which told them how much they should pay for a particular journey.

From Mondays to Saturdays, between 9:00 A.M. and 12:00 midnight, as many as 1,200 brightly colored horse buses connected central London with the inner and outer suburbs, running to Bayswater, Brompton, Camberwell, Chelsea, Clapham, Hammersmith, Hampstead, Holloway, Islington, Kensal Green, Kensington, Kilburn, Pimlico, Putney, Richmond and St. John's Wood. In central London they ran between places like Paddington and Charing Cross, and Regent's Circus (now Oxford Circus) and the Bank of England. Usually drawn by a pair of horses, they could accommodate twelve passengers facing each other inside, and ten more on the roof, sitting back-to-back. At busy times they ran every five minutes, with a flat-fare system of fourpence for part of the way and sixpence for the whole distance, and were compelled by law to have a table of fares inside the vehicle. Many of them belonged to the London General Omnibus Company and their fame spread abroad, though foreign visitors were sometimes disappointed:

> We had heard so much about the London omnibuses, with their velvet upholstery and veneered panelling, that we were anxious to see these wonderful conveyances. So our amazement was great on boarding one in the Strand to find it narrow, rickety, jolting, dusty and extremely dirty. The only advantage of these vehicles is that they are closed by a door. The conductor stands outside on a small footboard, incessantly hailing the passers-by.[20]

London's first horse streetcars appeared in 1861, introduced by the American entrepreneur George Francis Train. A line of track laid along the Bayswater Road, between Marble Arch and Notting Hill, opened in March, followed by a second line down Victoria Street, between Westminster Abbey and Victoria Station, in April, and a third, from Westminster Bridge to Kennington Park, south of the river, in August. The single-deck cars, drawn by two horses, had room for twenty sitting and twelve standing passengers. Promising as it seemed, Mr. Train's scheme proved to be short-lived. Not only did the rails project well above the level of the street, creating a hazard for other horse traffic, but Train also met with strong opposition from a body called the Metropolis Road Commissioners, who objected to the inconvenience the streetcars caused to other road users. His case cannot have been helped by a fatal accident which took place in August 1861, when one boy was killed and two others injured "by climbing on the projections." In February 1862 he was ordered to remove his streetcars and ended up being fined £500.

A cab driver. There were some four and a half thousand horse cabs plying for hire by the 1860s. (Mayhew)

The Thames, or "Silent Highway," still an important means of travel for many Londoners, was "traversed by a number of regular steamers. Eastward there are boats to ... Greenwich, Woolwich, Blackwall and Gravesend, from the piers at London Bridge. Westward, the Citizen [Steamboat] Company and the Iron Boat Company run steamers between London Bridge and Chelsea. These call at intermediate piers, and make a large number of trips daily, at fares varying between a halfpenny and sixpence."[21] There were the halfpenny boats, running between London Bridge and the Adelphi, the penny boats going to and from London Bridge, Hungerford Market and Westminster, and the twopenny and threepenny boats from London Bridge to Chelsea and Battersea. At times, the river could be almost as congested as the city streets themselves, not only with passenger steamers but also with merchant ships.

Work had begun on what was to be the world's first underground passenger railway in February 1860. It was built on the cut-and-cover system and caused enormous disruption, most of the trenches having to be dug along the main thoroughfares. Chancellor of the Exchequer W. E. Gladstone and his wife were among those who took part in the first trial trip on the steam-hauled trains in May 1862. The Metropolitan Railway ran from Paddington to Farringdon Street, with five intermediate stations, at Edgware Road, Baker Street, Portland Road (now Great Portland Street), Gower Street (now Euston Square) and King's Cross. In spite of the Times' disparaging observation that it was "an insult to common sense to suppose that people ... would ever prefer ... to be driven amid palpable darkness through the foul subsoil of London," it was an instant success when it opened in January 1863—30,000 passengers traveled on it on the first day—and it was soon extended, west to Hammersmith and east to Moorgate Street.[22] A Confederate naval officer sampled it in August 1863:

> Descended into the bowels of the earth, and tried this underground railroad. It passes through the city & when its proposed ramifications are completed, it will be as pervading as the upper highways ... The stations are lighted from above. The coaches are very nicely upholstered & arranged—each being supplied with two gas burners which in turn are supplied from a reservoir that runs along the top of the cars. Fare six pence to ride about 2½ miles.[23]

By the beginning of the 1860s London was connected by rail to all the main towns and cities in Britain. It then had eight railway terminals: London Bridge, Euston, Shoreditch, Fenchurch Street, Waterloo, King's Cross, Paddington and Victoria. London Bridge was built for the London & Greenwich Railway in 1836, but soon came to be used by the South Eastern Railway (with which it merged) and the London, Brighton & South Coast Railway as well. Euston was opened the following year by the London & Birmingham Railway (later part of the London & North Western Railway). As the station for Liverpool, it saw a number of Confederates coming and going during the war, while London Bridge was used by ones traveling to the Continent. Six years after it opened in 1840, the Shoreditch terminal of the Eastern Counties Railway was renamed Bishopsgate in an attempt to disguise the fact that it was situated in the wrong place—too far from the City and West End and in the middle of a festering slum. Fenchurch Street, the first railway terminal in London, was built in 1841 by the London & Blackwall Railway, which became part of the much larger London, Tilbury &

Southend Railway, and was also used by the Eastern Counties Railway and the North London Railway. Waterloo, the terminal of the London & South Western Railway and the station for Southampton, was opened in 1848. When it was built in 1852 by the Great Northern Railway, King's Cross was the largest station in England; the Midland Railway also used it until St. Pancras station was completed in the late sixties. Paddington, opened in 1854, was the Great Western Railway's London terminal. Victoria was a joint station for the London, Brighton & South Coast Railway and the London, Chatham & Dover Railway and was constructed in 1860–1862; like London Bridge, it was used by Confederates going across to the Continent. To these eight must be added Charing Cross, opened in 1864 as the West End terminal of the South Eastern Railway, and used by passengers wishing to travel to Europe.

London in the early 1860s was still mainly a city of small and medium-sized shops, often with their own speciality, though department stores, aimed at middle-class customers, were beginning to make their appearance. Many of these, such as Dickins & Jones in Regent Street, Swan & Edgar in Piccadily, James Shoolbred in Tottenham Court Road, and Peter Robinson and Marshall & Snelgrove in Oxford Street, were drapers who, by the 1850s, had started to expand by opening other departments. Shoolbred's, founded in 1817, added carpets and soft furnishings, groceries and toys, and by mid-century had several hundred employees who either lived on the premises or in nearby hostels. Between 1854 and 1860, Peter Robinson (established in 1833) acquired no fewer than five adjacent shop premises in Oxford Street, offering "court millinery, mantles, and dressmaking; widows', families' and children's mourning," among other commodities. The prices of the goods were clearly displayed in the windows of these new stores, which operated on a cash rather than credit basis, as was often the case with older, more traditional shops.

William Whiteley, a Yorkshire draper, opened a shop in 1863 selling ribbons, lace and fancy goods in the new suburb of Bayswater, which was now served by the Metropolitan Railway as well as by horse buses. He started with just two assistants, but within a year had eighteen staff; three years later he was starting to expand, adding linens, furs, drapery, millinery, gloves, jewelry and umbrellas to his stock, to become eventually the self-styled "Universal Provider." John Lewis, a Somerset man who had been a buyer for Peter Robinson, bought a job lot of silks and set himself up in a small shop in Oxford Street in 1864; working on the principle of "buying cheap and selling cheap," he never looked back, soon expanding into neighboring shop premises.

In the West End, many shops were open from 8:00 A.M. until 8:00 P.M., though by the mid-sixties a number of the larger ones were closing at 2:00 P.M. on Saturdays as a result of the efforts of the Early Closing Association, formed in 1842 to campaign for the earlier closing of shops and a Saturday half-holiday. Their windows, often now of plateglass, were lit by gas at night. Gas lighting had been introduced in London in the early nineteenth century, and shopkeepers had quickly realized its potential for window displays and storefronts. It was impossible not to be impressed by the appearance of London at night, with its countless gas lamps, its broad streets and its wonderful shops, full of every item that could possibly be imagined. And of all the shopping streets, Regent Street, said the journalist George Augustus Sala, who several years later was to report the Civil War for the Daily Telegraph, was "an avenue of superfluities — a great trunk-road in Vanity Fair. Fancy watchmakers, haberdashers and photographers; fancy stationers, fancy hosiers and fancy staymakers; music shops, shawl shops, jewellers, French glove shops, perfumery and point lace shops, confectioners and milliners: ... these are the merchants whose wares are exhibited in this bezesteen of the world."[24]

There were also a number of shopping arcades which contained clusters of small shops. The first of these was the Royal Opera Arcade (1817), which was originally built as an adjunct to the Italian Opera House (later Her Majesty's Theater) in the Haymarket. A place where patrons could leave their hats and coats, rent opera glasses, and stroll during intervals, it gradually assumed the character of a shopping arcade, its shops reflecting the masculine world of nearby clubland.

Writing in 1865, the journalist Henry Mayhew described the Burlington Arcade in Piccadilly (1819) as "one of the brightest, pleasantest, and most aristocratic provinces of modern Arcadia," and it has always been renowned for its luxury goods or "expensive knick-knacks," as he called them.[25] In the 1860s it was also a haunt of what Mayhew calls "Cyprians of the better sort," or high-class prostitutes, who could be seen parading there each day between 3:00 and 5:00 P.M. The Lowther Arcade in the Strand (1831) was equally famous, though for a more innocent reason: its toy shops. It was often thronged with ladies and children buying toys at the French, German and Swiss shops.

When it opened in 1850, the Lady's Newspaper called the Royal Arcade, in the recently constructed New Oxford Street, "one of the chief attractions to the resident and stranger among the many that grace our gigantic metropolis," but it seems to have declined fairly quickly.[26] The early optimism had certainly departed by 1865, when Mayhew described its "dreary collection of shops," selling such things as stoves, furniture, kitchen ranges and baby linen. Some of the other early shopping arcades were equally unsuccessful and correspondingly short-lived. The Hungerford Arcade in Hungerford Market, the site of Charing Cross Station, the Exeter Arcade in Wellington Street, on the fringes of Covent Garden, and the South Eastern Arcade at London Bridge Station all closed and were demolished in the early 1860s.

Another feature of London's West End, then as now, were the gentlemen's clubs of Pall Mall and St. James's. Standing in Waterloo Place, at the bottom of Regent Street, the visitor would see:

> On our right hand the Athenaeum, chiefly frequented by literary men; on the left, and exactly opposite it, the United Service Club, whose members are naval and military veterans. Next to the Athenaeum ... is the Travellers'. The Reform, which is observable from its great size and from its Italian architecture, stands next in order. To the Reform succeeds the Carlton, the headquarters of the Conservatives, a stately building, and the last erected. The Oxford and Cambridge and the Guards' club houses complete this side of clubland. On the north, or opposite side, turning into St James's Square, is the Army and Navy Club ... Ascending [St James's Street] on the left hand side are seen the Conservative Club, Arthur's, and Brooks's (the Whig headquarters), whilst near the top is the once famous or infamous Crockford's ... White's and Boodle's, once fashionable political clubs, but now principally resorted to by elderly country gentlemen, stand on the opposite side near the top ... The stranger should endeavour to procure orders (given by members) to see some of these clubs, especially the Reform, famous for its central hall, and its kitchens planned by M. Soyer. The staircases and apartments of the Carlton, Reform, Conservative and Army and Navy Clubs are very beautiful.[27]

Most London theaters at this time offered a mixed fare, which might include drama, tragedy, melodrama, comedy, farce, spectacle and pantomime, usually in a double or triple bill, and they were often managed by actors who were themselves also dramatists. Programs were long, usually starting at 7:00 P.M. (7:30 P.M. for opera) and ending about midnight. In the West End, the cheapest theater seats cost a shilling, the most expensive, five or six shillings; after 9:00 P.M. they were usually half price. Private boxes at Covent Garden and Her Majesty's, where opera and ballet were performed, however, were from two or three guineas upwards and even seats in the stalls cost twenty-one shillings. At Her Majesty's, gentlemen were not admitted unless in black or white neckcloths, black pantaloons and dress coats. Several Confederates who kept diaries described their theater visits, which included the Theater Royal, Haymarket; the Adelphi in the Strand; the Olympic, Wych Street; the Princess's, Oxford Street; and further out, the Britannia, Hoxton.

Regarded as the leading theater in London, the Theater Royal, Haymarket, was run by the comic actor and playwright John Baldwin Buckstone. The American actor Edwin Booth (brother of John Wilkes Booth) made his London debut at the Haymarket in 1861, the same year that Tom Taylor's Our American Cousin was staged there. The Adelphi Theater in the Strand was owned and managed by another actor-dramatist, Benjamin Webster, and had seating for 1,300 people. The famous American actor Joseph Jefferson appeared there in a new version of Washington Irving's Rip Van Winkle in 1865.

Reconstructed after its predecessor had burnt down, the Olympic Theater, Wych Street, had witnessed the first stage version of Uncle Tom's Cabin in 1852 and also saw the production in 1862 of Horace Wigan's A Southerner Just Arrived, a play inspired by the Civil War. Two years later its author took over the running of the Olympic on the sudden death of actor-manager Frederick Robson. The Princess's Theater, Oxford Street, also managed by Benjamin Webster, had originally been built for concerts, but came to be used for operas and plays, and the American actress Charlotte Cushman made her London debut there in 1845. Disturbances in theaters still sometimes occurred, and in 1865 it was the scene of a riot during the first night of Charles Reade's It's Never Too Late to Mend, caused by an over-realistic flogging scene.

Other West End theaters included the Theater Royal, Drury Lane, the oldest in London, where the nautical extravaganza The Alabama was staged in 1864; the Royal Lyceum, Wellington Street, renowned for its interior decorations; the St. James's, King Street; and the Strand Theater, Strand.

Outside central London, the Britannia Theater, Hoxton, where Colin H. Hazlewood's play, The Confederate's Daughter, was performed in 1865, was owned and managed by Sam and Sara Lane. It was extremely large, with a total capacity (seated and standing) of nearly 4,000, though this was later reduced to some 3,000. Sadler's Wells Theater, Finsbury, sometimes put on plays by Shakespeare and his contemporaries; the Royal Victoria Theater, Lambeth (the "Old Vic"), which had a huge gallery, and where the most expensive seat cost a shilling, presented lurid melodramas which tended to attract unruly audiences; and the Surrey Theater, Blackfriars Road, offered an intriguing mixture of melodrama, farce and pantomime, and occasionally tragedy, comedy and even opera.

Music halls, providing food and drink in the auditorium, along with singing acts and comedy turns, had originated in the inner suburbs in the 1840s. They appealed to audiences which the Observer newspaper described scathingly as "mixed crowds of folly and vice," while Punch wondered "whether the music hall was the place for a gentleman to go to, or even for a greengrocer, a chimney-sweep, or costermonger, or any man who entertained a liking to be thought respectable."[28]

By the early 1860s more sophisticated ones were starting to appear in the West End. Among the first were Weston's in High Holborn and the Oxford in Oxford Street. Another was the London Pavilion in Tichborne Street, near what is now Piccadilly Circus. It had a capacity of 2,000 and had only been open two years when a Confederate diarist went there in 1863. He described it thus:

> A great cafe, at the upper end a stage, a gallery too, fronting the stage and on the right side; but on the left a wall hung with mirrors ... The acting on the stage was capital — a sort of ballet — a burlesque opera ... Had nearly expired when some women came out with abbreviated dresses & much muslin & ankle who gyrated around ... The lower floor was filled with people sitting at tables with their hats on & their pipes & cigars alight, drinking beer or strong drink, eating Welsh rarebits & chatting...[29]

The same diarist found Evans' Supper Rooms in Covent Garden, an older establishment, to be more decorous than the London Pavilion. It was housed in a seventeenth-century building, which was now a hotel, whose basement dining saloon had been turned into a song-and-supper room. Run by a man called John Greenmore, better known as "Paddy Green," the entertainment there consisted of selections of madrigals, glees, choruses and songs, with an occasional comic turn, sometimes supplemented by contributions from members of the audience.

Among other London music halls were the Middlesex, Drury Lane; the Metropolitan, Edgware Road; Collins', Islington; the Grecian Saloon, City Road; Wilton's, Whitechapel; the Bedford, Camden Town; and the Canterbury, Westminster Bridge Road. The Alhambra Palace, Leicester Square, which started life as the Royal Panopticon of Science and Art, had been converted into the Great United States Circus in 1858, then became a music hall in 1860, where the following year Charles Blondin, who had recently crossed Niagara Falls on a tightrope, appeared.

Casinos in the 1860s were places for music and dancing rather than gambling. The two best-known ones were the Holborn Casino in High Holborn and the Argyll Rooms in Great Windmill Street, at the top of the Haymarket. One Confederate agent, visiting London in 1861, was taken after dinner to the Holborn Casino, whose real name was the Casino de Venise. It cost a shilling to gain admittance to a large, brilliantly lit hall, where people were dancing to polkas and quadrilles. Among its clientele were medical students, clerks, apprentice lawyers and young ships' officers, as well as a large number of prostitutes. In spite of its doubtful reputation, it was a surprisingly sober establishment, where the main drinks served were beer and soda water.

A day or two later, on his way home from the theater, the same agent stopped for a brandy and soda at one of the bars in the Haymarket. He found it crowded with rough and rowdy individuals and, as soon as he had swallowed his drink, realized that it had been drugged. Fortunately, one glass was not enough to stupefy him, and he wisely resisted the temptation of a second drink.[30]

During the daytime the Haymarket, with its theaters, hotels, restaurants, cigar divans, coffeehouses and shops selling shellfish, had a half-deserted air, but it took on a very different aspect once darkness fell, when it and the adjacent streets became the center of London's nightlife. It was a tourist sight in itself and a guidebook recommended that the visitor should see it "between ½ past 11 and 12 of a night in the thickest of the London season; when the crush of carriages and cabs, the crowd of orderly and disorderly people, the brilliant appearance of the taverns and shell-fish shops, form an extraordinary picture."[31] Henry Mayhew also observed: "A stranger on his coming to London ... seldom leaves the capital before he makes an evening visit to the Haymarket and Regent Street." He drew attention to "the brilliant illumination of the shops, cafes, Turkish divans, assembly halls and concert rooms," as well as "the troops of elegantly dressed courtesans, rustling in silks and satins ... promenading along these superb streets among throngs of fashionable people, and persons apparently of every order and pursuit, from the ragged crossing-sweeper and tattered shoe-black to the high-bred gentleman of fashion and scion of nobility."[32] When the theaters closed at midnight, many of their patrons helped to swell the jostling crowds heading for the bars and oyster shops, cafes where it was not difficult to get one's pocket picked, and high-class night houses like the Cafe Royal, off Leicester Square, better known as Kate Hamilton's.

For those in search of more refined pleasures, there were a number of places where concerts, advertised in the Times and some of the other daily papers, were held. These included the Hanover Square Rooms, Exeter Hall, in the Strand, which could easily accommodate 3,000 people, St. Martin's Hall, Long Acre, and Willis's Rooms, King Street; in addition, weekly concerts were held at the Crystal Palace, Sydenham, which could be reached by train from Victoria or London Bridge.

And there were other diversions. Burford's Panorama ("The Views are varied every Season") still lingered on in Leicester Square, where it had been since 1793, though it was about to close, as was also James Wyld's Great Globe, which had been there for the previous decade, "exhibiting the different divisions of the world on its concave or interior surface." Unusual sights could often be seen at the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly; John Banvard's moving "Panorama of the Mississippi, Missouri and Ohio Rivers," twelve feet high and 1,320 feet long, had caused a sensation when it was shown there in 1848–1849, and the Hall offered an ever-changing program of illustrated lectures and exhibitions. The evening was suggested as the best time to visit Madame Tussaud's Waxworks, which had been on Baker Street since the 1830s; admission cost one shilling and the Chamber of Horrors was sixpence extra.

Among London's other attractions were its parks. St. James's Park, its lake frequented by waterfowl, was the oldest, dating from the sixteenth century; Hyde Park, the largest of the London parks, had been opened to the public at the beginning of the seventeenth century; and Green Park was created by King Charles II in the second half of the seventeenth century. A notable feature of Hyde Park was Rotten Row (supposedly a corruption of the French Route du Roi), a carriage drive where, "from May to August ... may be seen all the wealth and fashion and splendid equipages of the nobility and gentry of Great Britain. As many as 800 equestrians ... have been seen assembled at Hyde Park in the height of the season."[33] For twenty-four weeks in 1851, Hyde Park had also been the setting for the Great Exhibition, held in the Crystal Palace, now moved to Sydenham.

Regent's Park, laid out in the early nineteenth century, housed the zoo. Kensington Gardens, next to Hyde Park and originally the grounds of Kensington Palace, had been opened to the public on a daily basis in the 1830s. Victoria Park was created in the 1840s to serve the people of the East End, and Battersea Park, south of the river, was opened in 1853. Further out, Greenwich Park and Richmond Park both dated from the seventeenth century and Kew Gardens, with its great variety of plants, was laid out in the eighteenth century.

Visitors to London in the early 1860s would have found the main streets extremely crowded. At certain times of day traffic congestion had reached epic proportions, with cabs, horse buses, private carriages, coal carts, railway vans, country wagons, drays and handbarrows all jostling for space, along with hordes of pedestrians. Until the introduction of cheap workmen's fares on the railways, many people walked to and from work; bus fares were simply too expensive for the thousands earning less than a pound a week. The situation was made even worse by the herds of cattle and flocks of sheep which were driven through the streets, bound for the Metropolitan Cattle Market at Islington. A few new thoroughfares had been built in an attempt to improve the traffic flow — Farringdon Road and New Oxford Street in the 1840s, Victoria Street and an extended Cannon Street in the 1850s, and Garrick Street in the early 1860s — but they had done little to alleviate the problem.

Central London was not only very congested, it was also remarkably noisy, with thousands of iron-rimmed wheels and iron-shod horses. hooves passing through streets laid with granite sets. The huge volume of horse traffic also made it very dirty, particularly in wet weather, hence the need for that legendary Victorian street character, the crossing sweeper.

Anyone visiting the metropolis for the first time would have been amazed by the street life. Hundreds of people made a living of sorts as street entertainers. A few years previously, Henry Mayhew had recorded a number of them in his London Labour and the London Poor. They included "Punch and Judy" men, exhibitors of mechanical figures, acrobats, strong men, jugglers, conjurers, snake, sword and knife swallowers, fire-eaters, clowns, jesters, tightrope dancers and stilt walkers, reciters, exhibitors of dancing dogs, "Ethiopian serenaders" (black-faced minstrels playing banjos, tambourines and fiddles), whistling men and ballad singers.

Even more numerous were the street vendors, who constituted about one-fortieth of the working population of the metropolis. An astonishing range of items could be bought on the streets of London, from fruit and vegetables, oysters, hot eels, fried fish, ham sandwiches, pea soup, roasted chestnuts, baked potatoes, ice cream, cakes, pastries and sweets, boiled puddings, milk, ginger beer, lemonade and coffee, to flowers, stationery, hardware, crockery, walking sticks, combs, matches, shoelaces, cigars, second-hand clothing and even birds and dogs.

Although there seems to have been no London equivalent of the gangs of the Five Points and the Bowery who plagued New York at this time, an outbreak of violent street robberies in 1862–1863 nevertheless spread alarm and panic throughout the metropolis. Attacks were being reported as early as March 1862 and were usually carried out by teams of three men using a technique known as garroting, whereby their victims were half-throttled with a rope or cloth from behind, while their pockets were rifled. At first the attacks took place at night, but soon they were occurring in the daytime as well, and in the heart of the capital. Garroting was not an entirely new phenomenon — there had been an outbreak of it in 1856 — but what made it different this time was its persistent and widespread nature.

No one, it seemed, was safe. In mid–July 1862, James Pilkington, M.P. for Blackburn in Lancashire, was garroted and robbed in an "open well-lighted place" while walking from the House of Commons to his club in Pall Mall, and on the same night Edward Hawkins, the former Keeper of Antiquities at the British Museum, was attacked in a similar manner between St. James's and Bond Street. Several of the garroters' victims were so badly injured that they died. Many attributed this ferocious crime wave to the ending of transportation (the sending of criminals to the penal settlements in Australia), and the ticket-of-leave system (the release of prisoners on license before their sentences were completed), which meant that London was full of former convicts.

The excitement and hysteria generated by the outbreak produced antigarroting collars, antigarroting societies and cartoons in Punch. There were some arrests: in November 1862, for instance, a number of men accused of garroting were tried at the Central Criminal Court, in the Old Bailey, and given sentences of penal servitude varying from four years to life. The public disquiet over the wave of garrotings led to the setting up of a government commission to inquire into the legislation relating to transportation and penal servitude. It recommended stricter penal discipline in the convict prisons and the surveillance of ticket-of-leave men by the police. Finally, in July 1863, there was what was known as the "Garroting Act," which amended the criminal law to make robbery with violence punishable by flogging.

Although Henry Mayhew refers to previous instances of garroting in his survey of London's criminal population (1862), the research for this probably took place before the main outbreak occurred.[34] In the course of his investigations he met and interviewed madams, pimps and prostitutes, thieves, swindlers, pickpockets, shoplifters, horse and dog stealers, burglars and housebreakers, receivers of stolen goods, forgers of banknotes and checks, embezzlers, card sharps, and many types of beggars, both real and sham; among this criminal fraternity were many juvenile thieves, who in due course graduated from stealing from stores to become pickpockets or burglars. They all had their own descriptions: "cracksmen" were housebreakers; "rampsmen" were footpads, criminals who rob pedestrians; "bludgers" were street thugs; "buzzers" were pickpockets; "snoozers" booked a room at a hotel, then burgled the rooms of the other guests; "area sneaks" called at the kitchen doors of big houses in the hope of finding something to steal; "skinners" were women who enticed children into their homes and then stripped them of their clothing; "shoful men" were counterfeit coiners, "smashers" those who passed the coins; and "drummers" were men who put knockout drops into their victims' drinks before robbing them.

Visitors to London certainly needed to be on their guard, and a guidebook which appeared in the year the garroting scare began advised its readers not to linger in crowded thoroughfares or relieve beggars, to avoid byways and poor neighborhoods after dark, to carry no more money than was necessary for the day's expenses, and to take care of their pockets at the entrances to theaters, exhibitions and churches, on buses and the streets. The interiors of buses, in particular, where people sat very close together, offered excellent opportunities for pickpockets. Many of these were well-dressed women, and Mayhew described in some detail the techniques they employed.

In spite of the best efforts of the police, the criminal underworld was still very active in the 1860s, and criminals were quick to seize the opportunities which new developments like railways presented. The railway terminals attracted swarms of prostitutes, pickpockets and confidence tricksters, and, in addition, London criminals could now travel all over the country, and even abroad, to pursue their particular callings.

London had had a uniformed police force since 1829, when the Metropolitan Police were established, though the City chose to be excluded from their jurisdiction and set up its own separate force a decade later, in 1839. The Metropolitan Police, whose headquarters were at Scotland Yard, were originally organized in seventeen divisions — in central London these covered the districts of Whitehall, Westminster, St. James's, Covent Garden, Marylebone and Holborn — and there were separate divisions to police the river and the shipyards. A major advance was the establishment of a detective branch in 1842.

In the early 1860s policemen in London still wore the dark blue, swallowtail coats and black top hats which had been their uniform since 1829, though these were replaced by short tunics and helmets in 1864, and they were issued with a baton, a whistle and a lantern. Average pay was about eighteen shillings a week, in addition to which officers were given a clothing and coal allocation. In 1863 the total establishment of the Metropolitan Police was 6,590, and the City Police, 743, or about one officer for every 382 inhabitants of London.

There was certainly no lack of prisons to accommodate criminals once they had been caught, tried and convicted; every year upwards of 30,000 prisoners were said to pass through London's jails and houses of correction (prisons for those serving short sentences, usually with hard labor). The oldest prisons were Newgate, in the City, Horsemonger Lane, Southwark, and Cold Bath Fields, Clerkenwell, which all dated from the late eighteenth century. By the 1860s Newgate was being used for prisoners awaiting trial or execution, which still took place in public just outside its walls; Horsemonger Lane, the Surrey County jail, housed mainly petty criminals; and Cold Bath Fields was a house of correction, notorious for its severe regime.

A number of London prisons were built or rebuilt in the nineteenth century. Millbank, the largest in London, was the first penitentiary, but now housed convicts awaiting transfer to other prisons. Pentonville, a "model prison" based on the Eastern Penitentiary, Philadelphia, was described as "bright and cheerful and airy." The Clerkenwell House of Detention, a remand prison used for prisoners awaiting trial, received unwelcome publicity in 1867 when, in an unsuccessful attempt to rescue Irish Fenian prisoners, part of it was blown up and six people were killed. The most remarkable feature of the City House of Correction, Holloway, was its appearance: it was built to resemble a medieval castle. Tothill Fields, Westminster, contained females and juveniles. Brixton, originally a house of correction, now housed only female convicts, whose tasks included washing all the clothes for Pentonville, Millbank and Brixton Prisons. Wandsworth was also built as a house of correction.

The early sixties were not uneventful years in London. In March 1861 Charles Spurgeon, one of the most popular preachers of the nineteenth century, opened the Metropolitan Tabernacle, near the Elephant & Castle in south London; it could accommodate 6,000 people. An American ship, the Hortense, caught fire in the London Docks in April; and a strike of London building workers, which had begun the previous month, ended with the men accepting the hourly system of payment and a Saturday half-holiday. One of the greatest fires London had ever seen broke out in June in a hemp warehouse in Tooley Street, Southwark, near London Bridge. It soon spread to neighboring warehouses containing tallow, cotton, sugar and saltpeter and continued for several days, attracting thousands of spectators. In the course of it, James Braidwood, the superintendent of the London Fire Engine Establishment Brigade, was killed when a wall collapsed on him. That same month the Royal Horticultural Society opened its ornamental gardens in South Kensington to the public. There was a huge meeting in Exeter Hall, Strand, in July to welcome the fugitive slave John Anderson, who had arrived in London the previous month. In September two trains collided at Gospel Oak, near Kentish Town, in north London, killing 16 people and injuring 321. Deerfoot, a Seneca Indian, ran a six-mile course against three Englishmen in December, before the Prince of Wales, and was declared the winner; he ran again later that month against a man called Mills at Hackney Wick. The death from typhoid fever of the prince consort, the husband of Queen Victoria, at Windsor Castle later that month caused "general gloom and consternation throughout the metropolis," and his funeral a week later took place "amidst universal demonstrations of mourning."

In January 1862 the queen was reported to be in a state of nervous collapse and her royal duties were carried out by her uncle, King Leopold of the Belgians, who was in temporary residence at Buckingham Palace. Deerfoot ran again in February, this time against Job Smith, of Hulme, near Manchester, at the Copenhagen Grounds, Wandsworth, for a purse of £50. The following month, to mark his twenty-five years in London, and "as a token of gratitude to the English nation," another American, the banker and philanthropist George Peabody, gave the enormous sum of £150,000 to improve the condition of the "artisan and labouring poor," a gesture which the queen described as a "noble act of more than princely munificence" and one "wholly without parallel." In May the International Exhibition opened in South Kensington; one of the more unusual exhibits was a mechanical bullfinch which later sang for the benefit of the Lancashire distress fund, in aid of victims of the Cotton Famine, "producing a considerable sum." A number of convicts escaped from London prisons in May and June: one from Newgate, three from Millbank and three more from Horsemonger Lane. George Peabody became the first American citizen to be given the Freedom of the City of London in July. That same month there was an explosion at a match factory in Bethnal Green, causing injuries and some fatalities. The International Exhibition closed in November after more than six million people had visited it, while the following month 20,000 people came to see the first cattle show held at the new Agricultural Hall, Islington.

There was "an immense demonstration" at Exeter Hall in the Strand "in favor of Negro Emancipation" in January 1863. Several persons were injured in an accident on the newly opened Metropolitan Railway in February. The following month there were celebrations to mark the wedding of the Prince of Wales and Princess Alexandra of Denmark, which took place at Windsor Castle. The day was observed as a general holiday but it was not without incident: eight women and a child were crushed to death in the crowds during the London celebrations in honor of the marriage. In April there was a crowded meeting at St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, organized by the Freedom Aid Society, to raise money to assist escaped slaves in the United States. The famous explorers John Speke and James Grant, discoverers of the source of the Nile, were present at a special meeting of the Royal Geographical Society at Burlington House, Piccadilly, in June.

The first dwellings built by the Peabody Trust for the industrious poor were opened in Whitechapel in February 1864. The Italian patriot, General Garibaldi, received an enthusiastic reception on his eleven-day visit to the capital in April and was granted the Freedom of the City of London. Work began on the Albert Memorial in Hyde Park in May, though it would not be completed until 1876. London's first railway murder took place in July when Thomas Briggs, a senior bank clerk, was killed in a carriage on the North London Railway, causing alarm among the commuting middle classes. In September Karl Marx helped to organize a meeting of the London Trades Council and the First International at St. Martin's Hall, Long Acre, which was attended by many European delegates. Franz Muller, the murderer of Thomas Briggs, was hanged outside Newgate Prison in November before an enormous and unruly crowd of spectators.

Savile House, Leicester Square, once a royal residence but in recent years used for a variety of miscellaneous entertainments, was destroyed by fire in February 1865. The metropolitan drainage system, begun in 1855 by Joseph Bazalgette, was finally completed, and opened by the Prince of Wales in April. Lord Palmerston died in October while still prime minister and was succeeded by Lord John Russell; at Queen Victoria's request, there was a public funeral later that month when he was buried in Westminster Abbey. Another funeral the following month, at Highgate Cemetery, also turned into a public event when an estimated 10,000 people attended that of the celebrated pugilist Tom Sayers, who in 1860 had fought the American John C. Heenan to a draw.

Much of the London the Confederates knew — the London of the 1860s — has inevitably disappeared, but there are still houses in Half Moon Street, Sackville Street and Savile Row where some of them lodged; nearby, the church in Piccadilly where one of them was married; and further afield, in Notting Hill, a house where a purchasing agent lived; and in Belsize Park, the church where a Confederate parson presided and houses where other Confederates stayed.

2

A Diplomatic Presence

Though with the North we sympathise,
It must not be forgotten,
That with the South we've stronger ties,
Which are composed of cotton.

—Punch, March 30, 1861

This rhyme might have been written for the leaders of the newly formed Confederate States of America, the cornerstone of whose foreign policy was the importance of cotton in the European economy. About 80 percent of the cotton used in British factories came from the South, and it was generally believed that withholding it would bring about British intervention and diplomatic recognition. In the event, an embargo on the export of cotton in the first year of the war was not the result of Confederate government legislation, but of voluntary action on the part of planters and shipowners, strongly supported by newspapers like the Charleston Mercury, which confidently assured its readers in June 1861: "The cards are in our hands, and we intend to play them out to the bankruptcy of every cotton factory in Great Britain and France or the acknowledgement of our independence." The power of King Cotton, however, would turn out to be illusory.[1]

In March 1861, Jefferson Davis, provisional president of the Confederate States of America, appointed three commissioners to represent the Confederacy's diplomatic interests in Europe. The men selected for this difficult mission were William L. Yancey, Pierre A. Rost and A. Dudley Mann.

They were not the first Southern representatives to be sent overseas. In January 1861, as soon as Georgia seceded, Thomas Butler King, a lawyer, planter and congressman, was appointed "Commissioner to the government of Queen Victoria, to the Emperor Napoleon III, and to the government of the King of the Belgians" by Governor Joseph E. Brown and sent to Europe to explain his state's new situation and gain recognition of her independence. King left for Europe at the beginning of March, but his role as a state commissioner, apparently a unique one, does not seem to have been particularly fruitful. His attempts, by means of negotiations in London and Paris, to establish a steamboat service between Savannah and European ports were thwarted by the blockade and he returned to Georgia early in 1862.

Jefferson Davis's emissaries were, meanwhile, on their way to London. The first to arrive was Dudley Mann, the only one of the three commissioners with any previous diplomatic experience. Born in Virginia in 1801, Ambrose Dudley Mann had attended West Point, but, deciding against a military career, had opted instead for the legal profession. Between 1842 and 1853 he had held a series of government appointments as consul or commercial agent in various European countries, then, back home, had served as assistant secretary of state from 1853 through 1855 during Franklin Pierce's administration. This seemed a promising background, and together with his known advocacy of states rights, Southern economic independence and the establishment of a Southern merchant marine, no doubt helped secure his appointment as one of the first Confederate commissioners.

Dudley Mann reached London on April 15, having traveled via New York, but did not get off to a good start. He caused astonishment when, three days later, he called at the U.S. legation in Portland Place, where the outgoing minister, George Mifflin Dallas, was an old friend. Though less well-known than his successor, Charles Francis Adams, George Dallas had actually had a more distinguished career, having served as U.S. minister to Russia in 1837–1839 and as vice president to James Polk in 1845–1849; in addition, Dallas, Texas, had been named after him.

Mann's appearance at the legation was recorded in his journal by Benjamin Moran, the assistant secretary there, who was well-placed to observe events. He noted disapprovingly:

> Dudley Mann is nearly 60 years of age. He is not more than 5 feet 5, is thick, short and rather heavy. His voice is soft and enunciation slow, with a decided Southern accent. He has a rather good head, but there is not much in him, being like most Southern men, a mere talker...[2]

Despite his previous experience, Dudley Mann was not a particularly good choice as a diplomat. Verbosity was not his only failing; he was tactless, as his presumptuous appearance at the U.S. legation demonstrated, credulous, indecisive and not overendowed with common sense. One historian has described him as "full of words and wind" and having "great vanity and ego."[3]

Benjamin Moran had further reason to exercise his disapproval when, nine days later, a telegram came, addressed to Mann, announcing that his colleagues, William Yancey and Pierre Rost, had also arrived. Yancey and Rost, who had left New Orleans at the end of March, reached London on April 29, where William Thompson, the American consul at Southampton, had obligingly engaged rooms for them, an act for which he was later to be severely censured.

William Lowndes Yancey was born in Georgia in 1814. Like Dudley Mann, he had studied law and in 1836 established a practice in Dallas County, Alabama, where he also rented a cotton plantation. In the 1840s he served in both the Alabama state legislature and the U.S. House of Representatives. Well-known for his support for states rights, he had advocated secession as early as 1858, and had come to be regarded as one of the most important orators in the South. At the inauguration of Jefferson Davis at Montgomery, Alabama, in February 1861, Yancey had introduced him with the words: "The man and the hour have met."

However, as a leading defender of slavery, he was an even worse choice than Dudley Mann, and certainly not the man to send to a country renowned for its dislike of the "peculiar institution." Robert Bunch, the British consul at Charleston, had met both Mann and Yancey; he dismissed the former as having no special merit of any kind, and described the latter as "impulsive, erratic and hot-headed, a rabid Secessionist."[4]

Pierre Adolph Rost was the oldest, but least well-known, of the three men. He was born in Lot-et-Garonne, in southwest France, about 1797, educated in Paris, and emigrated to Louisiana in 1816, then settled in Natchez, Mississippi. Like Mann and Yancey, he had also read law and after qualifying, practiced for a while in Louisiana, but by the 1850s was managing his plantation there. One of his fellow law students had been Joseph E. Davis, the brother of the future president of the Confederate States, and this, together with his French birth, appears to have been largely responsible for his appointment as a commissioner in 1861. He based himself in Paris, but found he could achieve very little there. The fact that he appeared to have turned his back on France in early life, coupled with his poor French accent, did not create a very good impression in Parisian society, and his boundless optimism and continual use of the phrase "tout va bien" (everything is going well) in answer to every question about the war, soon made him into a figure of fun.

A. Dudley Mann was the first Confederate commissioner to arrive in London. (Illustrated London News)

Back in London, one of the commissioners' first visitors was William H. Gregory, M.P. for County Galway, Ireland, through whom an unofficial meeting with Lord John Russell, the foreign secretary, was arranged for May 3, at his house in Chesham Place, Belgravia. William Yancey conducted the interview on their behalf; it lasted an hour, and Russell's response was cautious and noncommittal. A second meeting followed on May 9, which the foreign secretary terminated by saying that he would take up the matter of diplomatic recognition with the cabinet as soon as possible.

That same day Yancey was called on by Joshua Bates, the senior partner at Baring Brothers, an old, established merchant bank in Bishopsgate, which did business with both the Federal government and the Confederate government. Within the bank itself, Bates supported the North, while another partner, Russell Sturgis, favored the South. Bates, a Bostonian who eventually became a British citizen, had been with the bank since 1826 and directed its affairs with "great nerve, self-possession and self-confidence, with prudence and in the main, good judgement." Later that month a report appeared in an American newspaper that the commissioners had approached Barings in search of a loan, but had met with a frosty reception; Bates left them in no doubt about his low opinion of Jefferson Davis, and reminded them of the millions of dollars owed to the Federal government by the states of Alabama, Mississippi and Florida in prewar repudiated bonds. A second approach, made about the same time by Dudley Mann to another American banker, George Peabody in Old Broad Street, was equally unsuccessful, for much the same reason.[5]

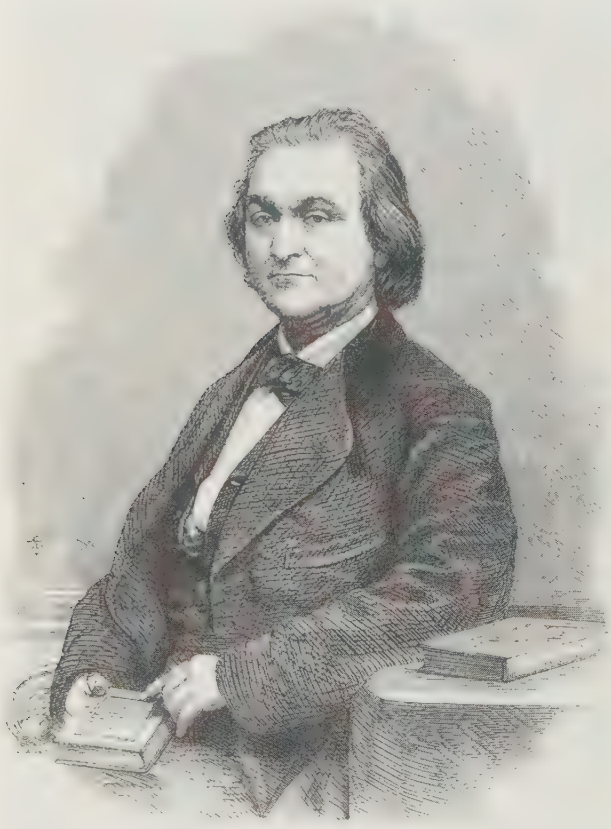
On May 4, William Yancey and Pierre Rost moved to a hotel in Victoria Street. "The Southern commissioners ... [have] recently taken up their quarters at the Westminster Palace Hotel," reported a London newspaper.[6] Twelve days later Yancey moved again, this time to 15 Half Moon Street, off Picadilly, where furnished rooms cost 3 1/2 guineas per week, including such extras as coal fires and gas lights.[7] Dudley Mann had been installed in lodgings in nearby Albemarle Street since at least May 1, and was joined there by his son, William Grayson Mann, who had arrived on May 17 with dispatches, and was to serve as his private secretary. Yancey's secretary, John Walker Fearn of Alabama, was already in London, having traveled with him and Rost. An experienced and able man, before the war Fearn had been secretary to the United States legation in Belgium and Mexico. Rost, meanwhile, proceeded to Paris.

Yancey had a letter of introduction to William S. Lindsay, another leading pro–Confederate M.P., by whom he was invited to the Houses of Parliament, where he met a number of members. Some sightseeing was not ruled out, and included visits to the Zoological Gardens in Regent's Park, the Tower of London, and trips downriver to Greenwich for a traditional whitebait supper, and Woolwich, with its great dockyard and arsenal. Early June saw him in Paris, where a number of Confederates were already living.



William L. Yancey was another of the Confederate commissioners sent to London. (Illustrated London News)

The new U.S. minister, Charles Francis Adams, reached London on May 13 and took over from George M. Dallas. The son of John Quincy Adams, sixth president of the United States, who was himself a former U.S. minister to Great Britain, he had practiced as a lawyer before being sent to London, and had been a congressman in the three years prior to the Civil War. His arrival coincided with the issue of a Proclamation of Neutrality, which granted belligerent status to the Confederate States, and did little to improve relations between Great Britain and the United States.

Five days after Adams' arrival, the U.S. legation moved from Portland Place to nearby Duke Street; at the beginning of June it moved again, this time to St. George's Place, Hyde Park Corner; then at the end of July, to

The house in Half Moon Street, Mayfair, where Yancey lodged in 1861–1862, during his time in London. (Author's photograph)

Mansfield Street, in the vicinity of Portland Place; finally, after all this upheaval, in April 1862 it relocated to Upper Portland Place, close to Regent's Park, where it was to remain until after the war.

The first reports of the Federal rout at Manassas (Bull Run), which appeared in the Times on August 5, caused a great stir. "The sensation produced by those great events both here and in Paris was profound, and has tended to produce a conviction that the Confederate States cannot be brought back into the Union by arms," Yancey wrote to Secretary of State Robert M.T. Hunter.[8] Rost, who was now in Paris, was telegraphed to rejoin his colleagues in London, with a view to another meeting with Lord John Russell about diplomatic recognition.

Russell refused to see them and asked them to put any further communication in writing.[9] This they did on August 14, in a long letter written from Half Moon Street, which embodied the Confederacy's desire for recognition by the British government. The foreign secretary's carefully worded reply, ten days later, was that Britain must wait until a military solution or a negotiated settlement resolved the present situation, and in the meantime must maintain her neutrality.

Benjamin Moran was disgusted by the way in which William Yancey and Dudley Mann were being made welcome in London, and wined and dined. On November 9 they were guests of honor at a dinner at Fishmongers' Hall, in London, and Yancey's speech, punctuated by cries of "hear, hear" and cheers, was reported in the Times:

> One thing is clear, and that is that the contest now going on is upon the people of the Confederate States for the right to govern themselves, and to resist subjugation by the North ... In defence of their liberties and sovereign independence, the Confederate States and people are united and resolute. They are invaded by a power numbering 20,000,000; yet for eight months has the Confederate Government successfully resisted — aye repelled — that invasion, along a frontier of 1,000 miles.[10]

He went on to deny any wish for foreign intervention. Earlier he had expressed his thanks for the granting of belligerent status to the Confederate States. He understood there might be delays in recognition, but that each nation would grant it when the time was right. Peace with the North would come, he felt, when it recognized the Confederate States as a belligerent power, and not as rebels.

By early autumn, the Confederate government having decided to disband the original commission, Pierre Rost had been appointed commissioner to Spain and Dudley Mann to Belgium; William Yancey, who had been reluctant to come to Europe in the first place, had concluded that the Confederates could never expect any sympathy or help there, and decided to resign and return to the Confederacy. Two new commissioners, James M. Mason and John Slidell, both states-rights Democrats, were appointed for London and Paris. Until they arrived, Yancey, Rost and Mann were to remain in their present posts.

Born in the District of Columbia in 1798, James Murray Mason was a lawyer who had practiced in Winchester, Virginia, before entering the realm of politics in 1826. He served at both local and national levels and became a senator in 1847. John Slidell was born in New York in 1793, but moved to New Orleans in 1819, where he also became a lawyer as well as a prominent figure in Louisiana politics; he was elected to the Senate in 1853. Unlike Mason, Slidell had previously traveled abroad, having been sent to Mexico on a diplomatic mission in the 1840s, and England in 1853, as a financial agent for the New Orleans & Nashville Railroad.

Fishmongers' Hall. William Yancey and Dudley Mann were guests at a dinner here given by the Fishmongers' Company in November 1861. (Author's photograph)

In October 1861 Mason and Slidell successfully ran the Union blockade of Charleston in the Theodora and sailed for Havana, Cuba. From here they were to travel in the British mail steamer Trent to St. Thomas, in the British West Indies, where they would catch a connecting steamer for England. The news of the stopping of the Trent by the USS San Jacinto, the forcible removal of the two commissioners and their secretaries, on the middle leg of their journey, and their subsequent imprisonment at Boston reached London on November 27.

It provoked a wave of indignation, and was almost universally condemned; only one London paper, the Morning Star, thought the action of the San Jacinto was justifiable.[11] This violation of the British flag created an international crisis, which threatened to erupt into war with the United States. Troops were dispatched for the defense of Canada — it was reported that as one troopship left the Mersey, a regimental band was playing "Dixie" — and a royal proclamation prohibited any further exports of arms, ammunition and military stores.

Pierre Rost was again in Paris when he learned of the incident and he returned to London at once. Further letters were sent by the commissioners to Lord John Russell about this, and the effectiveness of the blockade, to be answered by a tart little note stating, "in the present state of affairs, he must decline to enter into any official communication with them."[12] In the meantime, a false sense of optimism had been created in Confederate circles, both in London and elsewhere; South Carolina diarist Mary Chesnut thought that something good was bound to come from such a stupid blunder on the part of the United States, while Dudley Mann felt that recognition by the British government could not be far away, and said so in a letter to Richmond at the beginning of December.

The possibility of war, however, was averted when the American cabinet ruled the stopping of the Trent to be illegal, and the prisoners were released into British custody at the end of December to continue their journey to Europe. When news of Mason's release and imminent arrival in the metropolis became known, the humorous weekly magazine, Punch, marked the occasion with a rhyme:

Commissioner James M. Mason, who was sent to replace William Yancey and Dudley Mann. (Illustrated London News)

A Masonic Ditty

Sing high diddle diddle
The colleague of Slidell,
Released from the stone-jug, or basin,
And by England received,
May now be believed,
A free, and an accepted Mason.[13]

James M. Mason and John Slidell, together with their secretaries, James E. McFarland and George Eustis, finally arrived at Southampton on January 29, 1862 in the steamer La Plata. In spite of their recent fame as the focus of an international incident, "There was no demonstration whatever when these gentlemen, whose capture in the Trent has been the subject of so much discussion, landed at Southampton, there being nothing more than the ordinary assemblage on the arrival of the mail-steamers. A moderate crowd, as is usual, was collected outside the barriers which are always placed until the specie [coinage] and mails are landed," reported the Illustrated Times. "Mr Mason," it added, "is rather tall and stout, of tolerably well-formed figure, full colour, and determined and severe expression of countenance. Mr Slidell is a little shorter and stouter, with a round face, and white hair and beard." Confederate propagandist Henry Hotze, who came to England on the same ship as the commissioners, also noted the absence of comment on their arrival; attributing this to their earlier notoriety, he imagined that "it was thought necessary to discourage and prevent manifestations and demonstrations to which a political significance might be attached."[14]

The commissioners proceeded to London, Mason taking rooms at Fenton's Hotel in St. James's Street; from there he would subsequently move to addresses in Piccadilly, Devonshire Street and finally Upper Seymour Street. Slidell, meanwhile, made arrangements to continue his journey to Paris.

With the arrival of their replacements, the original commissioners departed. While abroad, William Yancey had been elected to the Confederate Senate and he returned to the South in February 1862 to take his seat. Disillusionment had set in. As early as July 1861 he had written to a friend: "The anti-slavery sentiment is universal. 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' has been read and believed"; and someone who knew him described him as "the most broken-up, demoralized, and wretched-looking man I ever saw."[15]

Pierre Rost, accompanied by John Fearn, departed for Madrid, but found no more success there than in Paris. The Spanish foreign minister refused to see him, and this, together with poor health, led to his resignation in May 1862. He retired to Fumel, a small town in southwest France, where he remained until the end of the war, and Fearn returned to the Confederacy.

Though appointed to Brussels, Dudley Mann decided to remain in London for the time being, thinking that, as Parliament was about to meet, he might be of more use there. When he did finally proceed to the Continent, he found the Belgian government also unwilling to receive or communicate with him, and he was equally unsuccessful when he visited Denmark; even his attempt to get the Vatican to impede the Federal recruitment of Irish and German Catholics was unsuccessful, though the pope received his request courteously. As a result, he seems to have spent much of his time contributing articles to English and Belgian newspapers and journals.

James Mason's ten years' experience as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and therefore presumably with some knowledge of European affairs, made him seem a better choice than his predecessors. But, like Yancey, he was also tainted by slavery, in his case as the author of the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850, and even someone as well disposed towards him as Mary Chesnut, who thought him "a manly old Virginian — straightforward, brave, truthful, clever," was appalled by his appointment:

> My wildest imagination will not picture Mr. Mason as a diplomat ... Well, this sending Mr. Mason to London is the maddest thing yet. Worse in some points of view than Yancey — and that was a catastrophe! ... You know it set all the world a-laughing when we sent Mr. Mason abroad as a diplomat! ... They say at the lordliest table Mr. Mason will turn round halfway in his chair and spit in the fire![16]

Further disparaging remarks came from Henry Adams, the son of Charles Francis Adams, and his unofficial private secretary, who in June 1862 wrote his brother, then serving with the Union Army: "I hear very little about our friend Mason ... He has little or no attention paid him except as a matter of curiosity, though occasionally we are told of his being at dinner somewhere or other."[17] Many years later, he expressed surprise that Jefferson Davis had chosen him: "The Confederacy had plenty of excellent men to send to London, but few who were less fitted than Mason. Possibly Mason had a certain amount of common sense, but he seemed to have nothing else, and in London society he counted merely as one eccentric more."[18] Benjamin Moran also thought Mason highly unsuitable, "the unfittest man they could have sent here ... an ignominious failure. His antecedents were bad, his associates were questionable, and his manners vulgar."[19]

Yet James Mason's mood at the start of his mission was remarkably optimistic. The day after his arrival, he wrote Secretary of State Robert M. T. Hunter: "Now with but a day's experience in London, my impressions decidedly are that, although the ministry may hang back in regard to the blockade and recognition ... the popular voice, through the House of Commons, will demand both."[20]

He lost no time in arranging an unofficial meeting with the foreign secretary, Lord John Russell. They met on February 10, but Lord Russell was not encouraging, and Mason concluded, wrongly as it happens, that his personal sympathies were not with the Confederates and that he was pursuing a policy of inaction; it was to be their only meeting. In the following months, he would liaise with purchasing agents, cooperate with propagandists, be involved in the raising of money for the Confederate cause, and correspond with the British government about the blockade, recognition and ironclads.

In addition, Mason greatly enjoyed the social life of the metropolis and cultivated the friendship of leading figures in the world of politics and commerce. His private memorandum book, in effect his diary, shows he dined with various members of the Southern lobby in Parliament, such as William H. Gregory, Sir James Fergusson, Sir Edward Kerrison and Lord Campbell; bankers like John S. Gilliat; John W. Cowell, "a retired gentleman of family," who had published a pro–Confederate pamphlet; and the veteran radical M.P. Richard Cobden, "decidedly Northern in his sympathies, but deploring the war." He met the Marquess of Bath, "an intelligent and accomplished young gentleman," whom he later visited at his seat at Longleat, in Wiltshire, attended a reception at Stafford House, the Duke of Sutherland's London residence, and had meetings with people as diverse as royal physician Sir Henry Holland, novelist Mrs. Caroline Norton and Prince Oscar of Sweden, who "expressed himself earnestly on the Southern side."[21]

He certainly did not lack for invitations, and on February 11, 1863, was a guest at the Lord Mayor's banquet at the Mansion House in London, where, in response to calls from the assembled gathering, he made an impromptu speech:

> I am a stranger in London — or, rather, I was a stranger; but I have learnt since I came to London that none of English blood from my own Southern land are strangers among you. (cheers) I speak this from my heart (cheers), for I have been by every circle in England and by every class of society a welcomed and honoured guest. (cheers) ... The day will come (great cheering) — and it is not far off — when the relationship between that Government which is now in its infant fortune and yours will be one of close and intimate alliance. (renewed cheers)[22]

A member of the audience wrote a friend the following day: "I was at the Mansion House last night and heard the Lord Mayor virtually recognize the South in the quietest and most inoffensive way that could be imagined. The Times gives a very good report of what Mr. Mason said, but no description can picture the effect of his calm and dignified delivery of these simple sentences."[23]

The home of Foreign Secretary Lord John Russell in Chesham Place, Belgravia. William Yancey, Pierre Rost and Dudley Mann visited him here in May 1861 and James Mason in February 1862. (Author's photograph)

At the beginning of March 1863 yet another Confederate commissioner arrived in London. He was Lucius Quintus Cincinnatus Lamar, who came from an old, established Georgia family. Born there in 1825, he moved to Mississippi after training as a lawyer and in the 1850s was elected to Congress. At the outbreak of the Civil War he served for a while in the Confederate Army until ill health forced his resignation in October 1862. The following month he was appointed commissioner to Russia. He was accompanied as secretary by John Fearn, who had previously worked with William Yancey in London and Pierre Rost in Madrid. Lamar and Fearn moved to Paris in April, but while there it was learned that their mission to Russia was unwelcome and it was terminated in June. For several months Lamar assisted with propaganda activities in London before returning to the Confederacy with Fearn towards the end of 1863.

Lucius Lamar seems to have been a more able and talented man than James Mason, and Henry Adams, who came to know him in the 1880s, concluded, "he would have done better in London, in place of Mason. London society would have delighted in him; his stories would have won success; his manners would have made him loved; his oratory would have swept every audience."[24]

A curious correspondence between James Mason and the Rev. Moncure Daniel Conway appeared in the Times in June 1863. Though he was the son of a Virginia slave-owner, Conway was an antislavery agitator and had arrived in England that year to lecture on behalf of Northern abolitionists. He proposed that, if the Confederate States would emancipate their slaves, "then the Abolitionists and Anti-slavery leaders of the Northern States shall immediately oppose the prosecution of the war ... and since they hold the balance of power, will certainly cause the war to cease by the immediate withdrawal of every kind of support from it."[25] Mason questioned Conway's authority for this sweeping claim, confirming that in any case the South would never negotiate with the North, and his unauthorized proposal also caused some embarrassment in abolitionist circles, from whom an overture of this kind would have been highly unlikely. Conway chose to remain in London, becoming pastor of South Place Chapel, Finsbury, a post he was to hold for more than twenty years.

In September 1863 James Mason informed Foreign Secretary Lord John Russell that he was "directed to withdraw at once from the country," the Confederate government having decided that their commissioner would never be recognized in London. "Mr. Mason has been very solemnly withdrawn from here on the grounds that Lord Russell treats him with hauteur," the U.S. minister wrote his soldier son that month.[26] On September 30 Mason left London for Paris, where he would now be based as a commissioner-at-large, or as he described it, "Commissioner on the Continent."

In Paris, his colleague, John Slidell, whose knowledge of the French language and customs had helped secure his appointment, had made a better impression than Pierre Rost. On his arrival in February 1862 he had been warmly welcomed by Confederate sympathizers, and had set up home in the Avenue d'Antin, with an office in the Rue de Marignan. He had two interviews with Napoleon III, at Vichy in July and at St. Cloud in October, though neither produced any material results, as the emperor was unwilling to act without Britain in recognizing the Confederacy. Slidell's proposal for a Franco-Confederate treaty came to nothing, and arrangements made in conjunction with naval purchasing agent James Bulloch in 1863 for the construction of two ironclads at Bordeaux and four wooden corvettes at Nantes were thwarted, following protests from the U.S. minister in Paris, William L. Dayton. He did, however, make an important contribution to the negotiations for the Confederate Cotton Loan earlier that year.

James Mason returned to London briefly about mid-October 1863 to clear up some outstanding matters, and he made a number of subsequent visits to London, during one of which, on July 14, 1864, there was an unofficial meeting with the prime minister, Lord Palmerston, at his residence, Cambridge House, Piccadilly. Towards the end of that month he embarked on a tour of Scotland and Ireland, stopping at Leamington Spa, Warwickshire, where a number of Confederate families were living, on the way back to London in September. The following month he paid a visit to the Confederate Bazaar held in St. George's Hall, Liverpool, in aid of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund.

News of the Confederate defeats at Franklin and Nashville reached London during December 1864, together with that of Sherman's occupation of Savannah. Even worse was to follow: on January 31, 1865, the Times reported the capture of Fort Fisher, at the mouth of the Cape Fear River in North Carolina, effectively closing Wilmington, the last major Confederate port, which surrendered within weeks.

When reports of the Hampton Roads Peace Conference were received in London in the middle of the following month, they caused consternation of a different kind:

> The public funds fell ... You would have thought that a great calamity had befallen the good people of England ... Happily for the distressed nerves of our friends, the next day brought them a little relief. A steamer had come with ... later news. It was not so bad as they had feared ... There would be no peace. Hurrah. The papers this morning are all congratulating the public that the war will go on indefinitely.[27]

The abandonment of Fort Sumter, where the war had started, and the evacuation of Charleston, reported on March 4, had an even more dramatic effect: "The news of the fall of Charleston has made a profound impression here. It is greater, perhaps, than any other event of the war," Charles Francis Adams wrote the secretary of state.[28]

As far back as the autumn of 1863 there had been rumors that the South was planning to arm and liberate some of its slaves for military and perhaps diplomatic reasons, while more recently similar ideas were being openly discussed in the Confederate press. "Richmond papers assert," stated the Times in January 1865, "that England and France would recognize the South upon conditions of negro emancipation, and urge that a proposition to that effect should be made to those Powers." Gladstone was no doubt expressing the feelings of many when, a few days after Appomattox, he wrote a friend that, had the Southerners been able to dissociate their cause from slavery by actually or virtually abolishing it, then his sympathies would have been with them.[29] The Index, previously a supporter of slavery, now prepared to support the proposal, arguing: "If it be necessary to convince the world that we are fighting for the self-government of the whites, that we should liberate the negroes, and if that liberation can be made to secure our independence, we believe that the people of these [Confederate] States would not hesitate to make the sacrifice."[30]

It was against this background that Duncan Farrar Kenner, a wealthy Louisiana sugar planter and horse breeder, and a member of the Confederate Congress, arrived in London at the end of February 1865. Traveling in disguise via New York, he had been sent as a special envoy by President Davis, and with him he carried the secret proposal to emancipate the slaves in return for diplomatic recognition.[31] Born in New Orleans in 1813, Kenner was himself a major slave-owner, but had long been convinced that European recognition was vital for Confederate success, and that it would only come if slavery was abolished.

Finding that James Mason was in Paris, Duncan Kenner proceeded there. Mason was initially reluctant to heed the instructions contained in Kenner's dispatch, in view of the deteriorating military situation, and the firm stand the British government had so far taken against recognition, but he eventually agreed to return to London. Here, Kenner and Mason obtained an interview with Lord Palmerston, who told them that their proposition could not be considered without the agreement of the emperor of the French. Kenner accordingly went back to Paris and secured an interview with the emperor; France, he was told, would do what England was willing to do in this matter, but would do nothing without her. By the time Kenner returned to London for a second meeting with Palmerston on March 14, news had arrived of Sherman's march through the Carolinas. The prime minister's reply was unequivocal: at no time had his government been convinced that Confederate independence could be achieved beyond all doubt, and now it was too late to grant recognition, whatever the terms might be.

Almost exactly a month later, on April 15, 1865, Benjamin Moran wrote in his diary: "Early this morning I got news of the capture of Richmond and Petersburg. This has staggered the English rebel sympathizers here. They give the rebels up now."[32] The Times purported to think otherwise, claiming: "The event has been anticipated not only in America, but in this country for some time past."[33] Three days later, in a letter to Secretary of State William H. Seward, Charles Francis Adams nevertheless confirmed: "The disappointment is undisguised. One of the daily journals correctly affirms of the higher circles that few expected, and still fewer desired the result."[34] In the early hours of April 23, 1865, a Reuter's telegram was received in London: General Lee had surrendered. "We this day received the grand news of Lee's surrender," noted Moran triumphantly in his journal.[35]

In what was to be his last dispatch as Confederate commissioner, James Mason wrote Secretary of State Judah Benjamin (a letter he was destined never to receive): "The evacuation of Richmond and surrender of Lee has produced the confident belief here, and throughout Europe generally, that further resistance is hopeless and that the war is at an end, to be followed on our part by passive submission to our fate. I need not say that I entertain no such impression and endeavor as far as I can to disabuse the public mind."[36] Writing many years after the war, James Bulloch echoed that view, observing: "Even in Europe it was not universally thought that the surrender of General Lee would immediately end the war," though he added that it was soon obvious to Confederates abroad who knew the real state of affairs in the South that the end had come; there could be no recovery.[37]

The Confederate government was unfortunate in the men it chose to represent it in London, but would it have made any difference, had it been a wiser choice? The answer is, probably not. Although for a brief period in the late summer of 1862, the British cabinet was indeed considering the possibility of extending diplomatic recognition to the Confederate States, the news of Antietam raised doubts in their minds and Lincoln's preliminary Emancipation Proclamation a few days later ended the possibility.

3

The Propaganda War

Few suspect, none know, the silent, unobtrusive agency through which it [the Index*] has operated upon its contemporaries.*

—Henry Hotze, August 27, 1863

Henry Hotze was to be the key figure in Confederate propaganda activities in London, and indeed in Europe, but books and pamphlets supporting the Confederacy were already being published before he appeared on the scene. One of the earliest and most important of these was James Spence's The American Union (1861). According to its author, a wealthy Liverpool tin and iron merchant, it was written in fourteen weeks, and it argued the right of the Southern states to secede, and the inevitability of secession, given the differences between North and South. It was seen as a major piece of Confederate propaganda, in spite of its condemnation of slavery. "It has attracted more attention and been more generally read both here and on the Continent than any production of like character of the many that have appeared," observed James Mason to Secretary of State Judah P. Benjamin.[1]

That was not an exaggeration, as favorable reviews in publications like the Quarterly Review, the Athenaeum and the Times demonstrated. On December 21, 1861, All the Year Round, the weekly magazine edited by Charles Dickens, commented: "Mr. Spence has assembled facts and authorities in support of his reasoning, and has grouped them with a temperate and logical clearness that cannot fail to convince. He writes with the discretion of a judge who has all the evidence before him, strong and honest in his own convictions." The American Union went through four editions in six months, and was translated into French and German.[2]

John W. Cowell's Southern Secession: A Letter addressed to Captain M. F. Maury, Confederate Navy (1862) attributed the war to Northern attempts to rob the South through protective tariffs, and described "the genuine Yankee nature" as "that amalgam of hypocrisy, cruelty, falsehood ... insensibility to the opinions of others, utter callousness to right, barbarous delight in wrong, and thoroughly moral ruffianism."[3] John Welsford Cowell, an economist who had served on both the Poor Law Commission and the Factory Commission, had been sent to the United States in 1837 as a representative of the Bank of England to collect money owed by American firms. He remained there until 1839, during which time he met many important Americans and came home convinced that Southern secession was inevitable.

Particularly influential was Alexander James Beresford Hope's The American Disruption, which also appeared in 1862. It contained the texts of three lectures—"A Popular View of the American Civil War," "England, the North and the South" and "The Results of the American Disruption"—which had been published separately the previous year, the overriding theme of which was that Confederate independence was in Britain's best interests. Like James Spence, Beresford Hope was opposed to "the abominable institution of slavery," but this did not affect his support for the South. The American Disruption was a remarkably successful book, with no fewer than six editions in one year.

Alexander James Beresford Hope was an important figure in London Confederate circles. Born in 1820, he was a man of considerable wealth and culture and had commissioned the famous London church of All Saints', Margaret Street (built during 1850–1859 and designed by William Butterfield), as well as founding the influential Saturday Review. He was also the brother-in-law of Lord Robert Cecil, a leading member of the Southern lobby in the House of Commons. Beresford Hope himself had been an M.P. from 1841 through 1852 and again from 1857 through 1859, but he was not to return to Parliament until 1865 when the Civil War was over.

The steamer which brought Mason and Slidell to England on January 29, 1862, also carried Henry Hotze, the newly-appointed commercial agent for the Confederate States of America. Henry Hotze was born in Zurich, Switzerland, in 1834 and emigrated to the United States in early life, settling in Mobile, Alabama, where he became a naturalized citizen in 1856. After an appointment as secretary at the U.S., legation in Brussels in 1858–1859, he served as associate editor of the Mobile Register from 1859 to 1861. Following a short spell of service in the Confederate Army, as a member of the Mobile Cadets, which became part of the Third Alabama, he was sent to London in September 1861 by Secretary of War Leroy P. Walker to check on the purchase of arms and munitions; he also carried dispatches for William Yancey and Dudley Mann. The experience convinced him of the need for a Confederate propaganda offensive.

Alexander Beresford Hope, a Confederate supporter and early propagandist for the Southern cause. (Cassell's Illustrated Family Paper)

On his return to Richmond in November, he was appointed to the post of commercial agent, with a subsidiary role of organizing Southern propaganda. His instructions from Robert M. T. Hunter, the secretary of state, stated: "You will be diligent and earnest in your efforts to impress upon the public mind abroad the ability of the Confederate States to maintain their independence, and to this end you will publish whatever information you possess calculated to convey a just idea of their ample resources and vast military strength and to raise their character and Government in general estimation."[4] What Hotze regarded as his real mission was largely self-instigated; propaganda had not yet assumed a very high priority with his political masters, who probably had little understanding of what was required. It would be the greatest challenge of his career.

The need to counteract the "official," i.e., U.S., version of events in America, and so help promote the Confederate cause, had become considerably more pressing in the autumn of 1861, when Secretary of State William H. Seward had sent Thurlow Weed to Europe as a propaganda agent, and John Bigelow, who had been appointed U.S. consul general in Paris, had been given the job of coordinating Northern propaganda in Europe. Both were capable and experienced former journalists.

The prospect before Henry Hotze was daunting: "I confess that the nearer I approached the scene of my labors the more the difficulties of my position loomed up before me, and on arriving here as the advocate of our case through the most fastidious press in the world, a stranger with barely a few friends or introductory letters, with no extensive political or literary reputation to precede me and smooth my way, I felt almost disheartened," he wrote the secretary of state on 23 February 1862.[5] He took rooms initially in Bury Street, St. James's, before setting up his commercial agency in Savile Row.

Hotze lost no time in making contact with newspapers thought to be sympathetic to the Confederate cause and offering to write for them. His first contribution, on February 22, was a leader in the Morning Post (the mouthpiece of the Liberal prime minister, Lord Palmerston), describing the inauguration of Jefferson Davis as president of the Confederate States, a copy of which he sent to Richmond. It was published largely unaltered, "only one or two expressions being somewhat enfeebled," he observed, and "produced a deep impression in the clubs."[6] This was followed by others in the Standard and the Morning Herald, which represented the views of Lord Derby, leader of the Conservative opposition.

He was pleased with the result: "Now the most formidable obstacles are overcome. The columns of the journals to which I most desired access are open to me, and with this I have acquired the secret of the 'open sesame' of the others I may need." The next stage of his plan was to present his articles to professional "leader writers," the freelance journalists who wrote regularly for those papers, "thus conciliating friendly goodwill where otherwise annoying jealousies might arise."[7]

One of his earliest allies was Thomas Hamber, chief editor of the Morning Herald and the Standard, a colorful character who was known in Fleet Street as "Captain Hamber" or the "Swiss Captain." He was so called because he had been an officer in the British Swiss Legion, three regiments of light infantry which were raised as mercenaries to fight in the Crimean War (1854–1856). Having only got as far as the Turkish town of Smyrna (present-day Izmir) by the end of the war, he apparently did not see active service, though one of his foreign correspondents thought that he "looked every inch a fighting soldier."[8] He was a staunch supporter of the South, and during the Civil War the Standard became renowned for its "Manhattan Letters," written by the paper's New York correspondent, Joseph A. Scoville. So critical were they of the Federal government that at one stage their author was arrested and imprisoned. The effect of them in London was to increase the paper's circulation dramatically.

Addressing the new secretary of state, Judah P. Benjamin, on April 25, 1862, Hotze was able to write: "Two more newspapers, the Herald ... and the Standard ... have voluntarily placed themselves at my disposal. The editor-in-chief of both called on me and offered the use of the columns of both, including the editorial columns, of which offer I have, though guardedly, availed myself."[9] Thereafter, the Standard was assured of a regular supply of news items about the Confederacy.

The offices of the Confederate States Commercial Agency in Savile Row, Mayfair. (Author's photograph)

There was certainly no lack of demand for what Hotze had to offer. "All information concerning the South, and especially the material and organisation of our armies, is eagerly sought by the leader writers who find a profitable market for it in the journals and magazines with which they are connected. One writer usually writes for several publications, and I have thus the opportunity of multiplying myself, so to speak, to an almost unlimited extent."[10]

In spite of his success with his fellow journalists, Hotze felt that something more was needed to promote the Confederate cause. Accordingly, he wrote Judah Benjamin:

> I have now ... concluded to establish a newspaper wholly devoted to our interests, and which will be exclusively under my control, though my connection with it is known only to a few initiated and will not be suspected by the public at large ... The assistance of two personal friends, Mr H. O. Brewer of Mobile, and Mr A.P. Wetter of Savannah, together with my private resources, enabled me to overcome the pecuniary difficulties of the enterprise and to place its publication for at least three months ... beyond the possibility of failure.[11]

The Index, "A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, and News devoted to the Exposition of the Mutual Interests, Political and Commercial, of Great Britain and the Confederate States of America," first appeared on Thursday, May 1, 1862, and in his first leader Hotze set out its aims:

> The manners and customs of the Confederate States, their resources and capabilities, and the real status of their people in the work of civilization, are still a sealed book to the intelligence of Europe ... If to this sealed book, which contains much worth studying, "The Index" can act that humble part which is intended to awake the interest of an indifferent reader, and induce him to turn over the pages, we shall have attained the highest reward of our labors...[12]

Each issue consisted of sixteen pages, containing events of the week, at home and abroad, the latest direct intelligence from the South, correspondence from Richmond, Charleston and New Orleans, leaders, extracts from Northern and Southern newspapers, cotton market news, Confederate state papers, book reviews and advertisements. Such topics as the Lancashire cotton famine, statistics on blockade-running, and the peace movement in the North were also featured from time to time. On May 15, Hotze sent copies of the first three issues to Judah Benjamin: "Nearly all of Southern talent available in Europe is rallied to its intellectual assistance," he wrote enthusiastically.[13]

While conveying the Confederate viewpoint, the Index was able to provide its readers with a much-needed Southern news service. As early as July 1861, Commissioner William Yancey, aware of the lack of information about events in the South, had suggested that files of the leading Richmond, Charleston and New Orleans papers should be kept and forwarded to the commission as opportunity allowed, and in April 1862 James Mason was told that this would be done "if possible." Some Southern newspapers were by then apparently available at Gun's American Agency and Reading Room in the Strand.

Henry Adams, the son of the U.S. minister, was inevitably unimpressed: "A Southern newspaper called the Index lately started here, contains numbers of Southern letters, all of which are so excruciatingly 'never conquer' in their tone, that one is forced to the belief that they think themselves very near that last ditch," he wrote his brother in June 1862.[14]

Index,

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, and News devoted to the Exposition of the Mutual Interests Political and Commercial, of Great Britain and the Confederate States of America.

Published every Thursday Afternoon. Price 6d. Subscription 26s.

Office---13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London, E. C.

The INDEX contains the Events of the Week at Home and Abroad. Latest Direct Intelligence from the South. Correspondence from New York. Correspondence from Richmond, Charleston, and New Orleans. Leaders on topics of Interest. Gleanings from the Northern and Southern Press. The Cotton and Dry Goods Market. Affairs, Financial and Commercial. Confederate State Papers. Reviews of Books. Magazine Articles. Southern Statistics, &c.

The INDEX enjoys an extensive and influential circulation in Great Britain, the Continent, the West Indies, and the Northern and Southern States of America. It goes into the hands of Shippers, Merchants, Members of both Houses of Parliament, &c. and all who, through business interests, political pursuits, or personal sympathy, are concerned in the great Transatlantic questions now in process of solution.

Money Orders to be made payable to J. B. Hopkins, 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, E. C.

A contemporary description of the Index. (Mitchell's Newspaper Press Directory, 1864)

The Index was first published by William Freeman at 102 Fleet Street and printed by Henry F. Mackintosh in nearby Crane Court, but from October 30, 1862 it was issued from 13 Bouverie Street, where Mackintosh became both publisher and printer. On March 10, 1864 the journalist John Baker Hopkins, who had been engaged originally as the paper's business manager, became the publisher, with George A. Spottiswoode as the printer. Observing that "our offices in Bouverie Street [two rooms] have long been too confined for the transaction of our business," it moved later that year to 291 Strand, from where it was published from October 27, 1864 until it ceased publication the following year.

Although it claimed an extensive circulation in Great Britain, the Continent, the West Indies, and the Northern and Southern states of America, it was in fact fairly small — 2,250 copies at the end of 1864, according to the Newspaper Press Directory of that year, of which 400 were sent to the Northern states and 150 to France. This was approximately half that of other small-circulation London papers, like the Morning Post (4,500), the Morning Star (5,500) and the Daily News (6,000). (Newspapers like the the Times [70,000], the Standard [130,000] and the Daily Telegraph [150,000] were, of course, in a different league.)[15] The chief consideration was that the Index should reach the people who were thought to matter, and this seems to be borne out by the Newspaper Press Directory's comment: "It goes into the hands of shippers, merchants, Members of both Houses of Parliament, etc, and all who ... are concerned in the great transatlantic questions now in process of solution."

From the outset, the Index went out of its way to emphasize the social, cultural and economic ties that were thought to exist between the Confederate States and Great Britain. The economic relationship received particular attention, and it was pointed out that the abolition of slavery would seriously curtail the production of cotton for the British market. The paper never set out to apologize for slavery, which was portrayed as being advantageous to both races; indeed, it was asserted, the South "had been the friend and benefactor of the negro race."[16] Late in the war, it accepted that arming some of the slaves, in conjunction with partial emancipation, might be required in order to secure Southern independence; total emancipation, as embodied in the Kenner mission, was seen as neither necessary nor desirable.

Following the usual journalistic practice of the time, none of the contributions to the Index was signed. Apart from those written by Henry Hotze himself, which included almost all those relating to slavery, some were presumably by John Hopkins, "my manager and assistant ... an Englishman who has zealously and successfully applied himself to the study of the great question involved in the independence of the South."[17] In addition, material came from a small group of American and English contributors in London, correspondents in Europe and America, private letters, and other newspapers, both English and foreign. "At least half the articles in the Index," wrote Hotze, "are written by Englishmen, who, only a few months ago, had but imperfect knowledge of and little active sympathy with the South."[18]

Among the American contributors were Robert B. Campbell, Albert T. Bledsoe, James Williams, Hiram Fuller and John L. O'Sullivan. Robert Blair Campbell, a South Carolinian and former congressman, had been U.S. consul in Havana, Cuba, from 1842 until 1850, and in London, from 1854 until 1861. When the administration changed, he was recalled, but returned to London to assist Henry Hotze. His death in July 1862, however, meant that his contribution to the propaganda war was short-lived.[19]

Albert Taylor Bledsoe was from Kentucky. A former college professor and lawyer, he had served in the Confederate War Department, first as Head of the Bureau of War, then as assistant secretary of war, before coming to London in October 1863. His mission there was to research and write the definitive justification of secession and he wrote President Davis: "After reading all the speeches in Congress, on both sides, I was profoundly ignorant of the transcendent merits of our cause ... No cause, in my humble opinion, so great and so glorious, has ever been so feebly advocated by the pen, or so nobly advocated by the sword."[20]

A native of Tennessee, James Williams had had experience of journalism as well as diplomacy, having founded and edited the Knoxville Post in the 1840s and served as U.S. minister to Turkey from 1858 through 1860. In 1861 he came to London, where he wrote influential articles about the slavery question for the Times and the Standard, as well as the Index. Some of Williams's essays, published in America in 1861 under the title Letters on Slavery from the Old World, were reissued the following year in an expanded English edition as The South Vindicated, with an introduction by John Hopkins, and were also translated into German. Benjamin Moran, who recorded seeing him with James Mason at the House of Commons one day in July 1863, described them both in distinctly unflattering terms as coarse, gross, ponderous, vulgar-looking men.

A New York newspaper editor from Massachusetts, Hiram Fuller's increasingly pro-Southern views made it advisable for him to leave America when the Civil War started. In London, in December 1861, he gave a lecture about secession and its causes at the St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, at the time of the Trent incident; it was published the following year as The Causes and Consequences of the Civil War in America. Between July 1862 and February 1863, under the pseudonym "A White Republican," he also contributed a series of articles to Fraser's Magazine which were reissued under the title North and South (1863).[21]

Like Hiram Fuller, John Louis O'Sullivan was a Northerner who identified with the Southern cause. He had been educated in France and England as well as America, and also had both journalistic and diplomatic experience. A founder and editor of the United States Magazine and Democratic Review, he is credited with the invention in 1845 of the famous phrase "manifest destiny," meaning the right of the United States to expand across the North American continent, and had also served as U.S. minister to Portugal in 1854–1858.

His Union, Disunion and Reunion, published in London in 1862 and favorably reviewed by the Times and the Athenaeum, set out what he saw as the main reasons for the breakup of the Union. It was intended to secure support in the North for the South's actions, but his efforts to get it published there were unsuccessful. The following year two more tracts appeared: Peace the Sole Chance Now Left for Reunion urged the Northern Democrats to end the war, because the North would never defeat the South, while Recognition. A Letter to Lord Palmerston, published to coincide with the parliamentary debate on Confederate recognition in July 1863, tried to persuade the British government to recognize the Confederacy. O'Sullivan's publications were subsidized by the Confederate propaganda fund; there is also a suggestion that he may have been on the Confederate secret service payroll. Certainly, in 1864, he began negotiations with a Copenhagen banker for the building of Confederate ironclads in Sweden, and though initially very promising, they ultimately proved fruitless.[22]

One of the first English contributors to the Index was James Spence, the author of The American Union, who was invited by Henry Hotze to write for his new paper. Though he declined any remuneration for this, he suggested to Commissioner James Mason that, as a businessman of many years' standing, with overseas experience, he might instead be considered for appointment as financial agent to the Confederate government.

It was Spence's uncompromising stance on slavery that was partly to blame for the rift with Hotze that occurred shortly after the Index began to appear. As he indeed became the Confederacy's European financial agent, excuses were found, though it was already clear in October 1862 that there were problems. In a letter Hotze wrote to Judah Benjamin he commented: "Mr Spence, I regret to say, has of late rendered the idea of ultimate emancipation unduly conspicuous," adding that, while "Mr Spence is sincere to our cause ... at this juncture of affairs I almost dread the direction his friendship and devotion seem about to take." Not until a year later, when Spence was about to be replaced, was the real reason for the dispute made plain:

> I have differed from Mr Spence on almost all essential points relating to the manner and the means of recommending our cause to the public. For instance I was naturally prone to place perhaps an exaggerated estimate upon the value of The Index; he, after the third number, could scarcely bring himself to believe in its usefulness at all ... The fault then that I found with Mr Spence ... was that he assumed to occupy at one and the same time two opposite and irreconcilable positions — that of a high official [financial agent] of our government ... and that of a disinterested alien friend.[23]

It would not be the only time that James Spence would be criticized by prominent Confederates.

As well as writing for the Index, Spence also contributed a series of articles to the Times. Presented in the form of letters, under the heading, "American Affairs," and signed "S," they were a commentary on the war from a Southern viewpoint. Their author was undoubtedly well-informed about military events, though they contained some wishful thinking and wrongful prognostications. They appeared between February 1862 and January 1865 and were apparently commissioned by the paper. Spence also refused payment for his Times articles, but instead accepted a specially-bound set of the Encyclopedia Britannica when they were concluded.[24]

Another English contributor was the journalist and novelist Percy Greg, "one of the most talented leader writers of London, who, besides being a valuable contributor to the Index, is one of our most efficient supporters in the columns of the Saturday Review and other literary and political periodicals of high standing"; he also wrote for the Standard and the Manchester Guardian.[25] He, too, was to cause problems: after being turned down for the new post of assistant editor in 1864 because of ill health, he submitted a spate of increasingly spiteful and bitter articles which required drastic editing, resulting in even more acrimony.

These instances were not typical, however, and relations with other English contributors such as Thomas Colley Grattan, a travel writer and novelist, who had been British consul at Boston in 1839–1846, were much more harmonious. He was the author of England and the Disrupted States of America (1861), which suggested that England should prepare for war and encourage Spain to take the lead in recognizing the South. His work for the Index was terminated by his death in 1864.

In addition, there were those "professional leader writers" whom Hotze had been supplying with material for their London newspapers, who now also became contributors to the Index. "I have given partial employment by means of the Index up to the present time ... to seven writers on the daily London press," he wrote to Benjamin in March 1863. Four of them were "colleagues of one editorial corps" [possibly the Standard], and one of them, "the Chief Editor of one of the leading daily journals — for obvious reasons I omit the name."[26] It seems likely that this was Thomas Hamber. Among the others was Thornton Hunt, assistant editor of the Daily Telegraph and son of the famous Regency essayist Leigh Hunt. Hotze encouraged them with "little personal compliments such as boxes of cigars imported from Havana ... American Whiskey, and other articles which not being generally procurable, form acceptable presents."[27]

It was a cunning move: the ideas and information which they absorbed as writers on the Index would carry over into the articles they supplied to the other papers for which they wrote. The journalists employed by the Index were among the leading members of their profession, and through them Hotze was able to infiltrate the columns of some of the most influential publications in the country. His success in this was certainly helped by the fact that, before the Index began publication, or even before Hotze himself arrived in London, many journalists had already adopted a pro–Southern stance.

The Index received a subsidy from the Confederate government: from May through October 1862 it was $2,206, and from October 1862 through December 1863, $9,675.[28] It was not enough, however, and had to be supplemented by loans and donations from private individuals in Europe and America, and by Hotze himself. When he was first sent to London, he was given an annual contingency budget of only $750, an indication of how relatively unimportant his mission was then seen to be, though this was increased a number of times, and eventually reached $30,000.

Northerners in London also had a weekly newspaper called the London American. Established in May 1860, it was published by John Adams Knight and edited by George Haseltine and later by A.W. Bostwick. Each issue usually contained eight pages, and included U.S. and Canadian news, correspondence, details of American arrivals in London, literary notices, American inventions, commercial and shipping news and advertisements. It had not, of course, been founded for propaganda purposes, but with the outbreak of the Civil War it inevitably assumed that additional role with the introduction of a new feature, "Progress of the Great Rebellion." It was published on Wednesdays from a building in Fleet Street, where for some months in 1862 its close neighbor was the Index.

Unlike the Index, the London American received no government support, though it did get some financial assistance from the American George Train, who also made speeches in support of the North, and by October 1862 it was clearly in trouble. The following month, announcing itself as "the only American organ in Europe"— no doubt a dig at the Index, which it never actually deigned to mention by name — it appeared under new ownership, and published now from an address in the Strand.

Somewhat surprisingly, Benjamin Moran had a low opinion of it. At the end of January 1863 he noted in his diary that J.A. Knight and A.W. Bostwick, the publisher and editor, had called at the U.S. legation in an attempt to raise money to carry on their paper. It was, he thought, a hopeless scheme and, for all the good it did, their journal might as well cease to exist.[29] The London American did indeed die, ceasing publication with the issue of March 4, 1863.

Hotze drove himself hard, and admitted: "My physical as well as intellectual powers sometimes flag from sheer exhaustion from the unremitting strain upon them. My eyes have suffered most, and I am now unable to read small print or to write by artificial light, forced therefore to depend on the aid of a private secretary." In August 1862 he traveled to Germany "to consult oculists of eminence about my eyes, the condition of which from over-exertion had become alarming."[30] While there, he took advantage of the opportunity to arrange for the publication of a cheap edition of a German translation of "Mr Spence's celebrated book" (The American Union).

In his diary for July 30, 1862, William Ewart Gladstone, Chancellor of the Exchequer, recorded that he had dined at Lord Campbell's residence and had an interesting conversation with a "Mr Hotze, a Southern [sic] in office."[31] The talk was about the most suitable border between North and South, when Lincoln finally gave up his attempt to force the South back into the Union, and Gladstone sent a memorandum about it to Lord Palmerston; it was useful information for a government then considering mediation. The meeting took place at Stratheden House, Knightsbridge, and Hotze reported it to Secretary of State Benjamin:

> I met, a few days ago, by arrangement, Mr Gladstone, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at a private dinner table, and had several hours' conversation with him. He is, of all the members of the cabinet, supposed to be the most friendly to us, and his manner and language certainly so impressed me ... The ... other salient feature of Mr Gladstone's conversation was an emphatic prediction that the war would speedily end in the acknowledged independence of the South.[32]

In the spring of 1862 a new propaganda agent appeared on the scene. Born in South Carolina in 1818, Edwin De Leon had been editor of several Southern newspapers before becoming U.S. consul general in Egypt in 1854. He resigned from this post in 1861 to offer his services to the Confederacy, and was appointed chief European propaganda agent by President Davis early the following year. The post carried with it a generous contingency allowance of $25,000, demonstrating the importance that was now being attached to propaganda. At this stage, neither Davis nor De Leon knew of the progress Henry Hotze was already making in this field.

When he reached London at the end of June 1862, De Leon had an interview with Lord Palmerston and also met with James Spence and Henry Hotze. His instructions were to base himself in Paris and conduct propaganda operations from there, with a view to influencing French public opinion, and although he collaborated with Hotze when necessary, the two men disagreed about policy, and criticized each other on a number of occasions. De Leon, like Spence, also thought the Index was a waste of time and advised Hotze to discontinue it.

Although De Leon did have some success in influencing the French press, contributed an article to the Cornhill Magazine about the ineffectiveness of the blockade, and wrote a pamphlet called Three Letters from a South Carolinian Relating to Secession, Slavery and the Trent Case, his contribution to the Confederate propaganda war was relatively short-lived. It came to an end when letters from him containing adverse comments about the French press, and Commissioner John Slidell, with whom he had a very acrimonious relationship, were intercepted on their way through the blockade in November 1863 and published in the New York Daily Tribune. His mission was terminated by Secretary of State Judah Benjamin the following month.

Henry Hotze's reponsibility increased considerably after this and now took on a European dimension. Through the Havas News Agency in Paris, he was able to control material about the war which appeared in French newspapers, and he supplied articles to the Italian and German press as well. "Some twenty newspapers in England, the Continent and the North are furnished through me with regular newspaper correspondence," he wrote Judah Benjamin in December 1864.[33]

His most spectacular propaganda initiative was the campaign he orchestrated in June 1863, prior to the debate in the House of Commons about diplomatic recognition of the Confederate States by Great Britain and the other European powers. Colored posters showing the new Confederate flag (the second national flag of 1863) in conjunction with the British flag, appeared in London and the principal towns and cities, as well as at railway stations throughout the country. "I have taken measures to placard every available space in the streets of London with representations of our newly adopted flag, conjoined to the British national ensign," he wrote.[34] In conjunction with the posters, the Morning Herald and the Standard were persuaded to print leading articles every other day between June 6 and July 1 in support of recognition; and all over London barrel organs could be heard playing the well-known Confederate tune, "The Bonnie Blue Flag." Efforts to combat his poster campaign, at least in the metropolis, were made by the London Emancipation Society and the Ladies' London Emancipation Society.

BESORE MEMORIAL LIBRARY
305 E. BALTIMORE ST.
GREENCASTLE, PA 17225

This was the high-water mark of Confederate hopes in London, and it was all in vain. The motion, introduced to the House of Commons on June 30, was withdrawn on July 13 without ever coming to a vote. Recognition would never again receive serious attention in Parliament, Hotze complained to the secretary of state.

In July 1864, the staff of the Index was augmented with the arrival in London of John R. Thompson, formerly the paper's Richmond correspondent, and the appointment in September of that year of John G. Witt as assistant editor. John George Witt, who had a legal background, is not thought to have had much influence on the way the paper was conducted, but John Reuben Thompson was to become its chief writer. He stayed at Haxell's Hotel in the Strand for a few days before moving to Savile Row on August 3, where the Confederate States Commercial Agency was located.

Before the war, Thompson, a Virginian, had been editor of the influential Southern Literary Messenger, and more recently of the short-lived Southern Field and Fireside, the Richmond Record and the Southern Illustrated News. He was considered a useful advocate for the Confederate cause, and his "gentlemanly presence, pleasant manners and intimacy with the Confederate leaders secured him entrance in both aristocratic and literary society."[35] On a previous visit to London in the 1850s he had been acquainted with such literary celebrities as Edward Bulwer-Lytton, William Makepeace Thackeray and Robert and Elizabeth Browning, and now he met well-known authors like Thomas Carlyle, Charles Dickens, Alfred Tennyson and Wilkie Collins, though not all of these were neccessarily sympathetic to his views.[36]

In March 1865, Hotze informed him that Confederate funds in Europe "were in a state of bankruptcy, and the Index would probably be discontinued in two or three months"; Thompson's connection with the paper ended in June.[37] The Index ceased publication on August 12, 1865 and in his final leader its founder concluded:

> To suppose that the continued publication of "The Index" has a political significance and that it must needs be hostile to the United States is natural, and almost inevitable. We have then no choice. We have sought to do the South good, and we cannot harm her to further our own views. We therefore suspend publication. "The Index" shall not be the excuse, the plausible excuse, for perpetuating a contest which can only aggravate the miseries of the conquered and disarmed.[38]

Henry Hotze was undoubtedly one of the most remarkable Confederates to be sent to Europe. Talented, able and hardworking, and in many ways ahead of his time, he employed the suave, subtle and silent methods of an experienced diplomat. Yet at the same time he had a blind spot: he never really understood the English dislike of slavery. He referred to the Index as "that little kingdom of mine," and as a source of Southern news it was certainly a success, though he probably exaggerated its influence; sympathy for the Southern cause already existed among journalists before the Index was established. And in spite of his best efforts, he ultimately failed in his mission to persuade England to recognize the Confederacy.

4

Supplies for the Confederate Army

I knew how dependent the South had been in almost everything upon the North. But little reflection was needed to present the whole matter clearly before my mind ... almost every article that can be mentioned, needed for the protection and comfort of an army, had to be obtained from a foreign source.

— Caleb Huse, July 3, 1862

These words were written by the Confederacy's principal army purchasing agent about a year after he first arrived in London. From the outset it had been apparent to the new Confederate government that, given the South's lack of resources and manufacturing capability, it would need to buy most of its armaments abroad. The most obvious source was Great Britain, then the world's leading industrial nation. The government acted remarkably quickly, and within weeks of the bombardment of Fort Sumter, Confederate purchasing agents began arriving in Britain. Many difficulties lay ahead: imprecise instructions, overlapping responsibilities, poor communications, problems with funds, competition with other agents and Federal surveillance of their activities. All these handicaps faced men representing a government not yet recognized abroad.

Captain Caleb Huse was the first to arrive. Born in Massachusetts in 1831, Huse was a graduate of the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, where he was an assistant professor of chemistry, mineralogy and geology in 1852–1859. He then took a year's leave of absence in 1859–1860 to travel abroad and study the European arms industry, experience which would prove to be of great value in the future. When the Civil War broke out, he was commandant of cadets at the University of Alabama.

Huse, who had a Southern wife, had chosen to serve the Confederacy, but his Northern background was to cause problems, and he was to be suspected of disloyalty, suffer from jealousy among his fellow agents and be accused of financial irregularities. In early April 1861, now a captain in the Confederate Army, he was sent to Europe by Colonel Josiah Gorgas, Head of the Ordnance Bureau, to buy arms and munitions.

He arrived at Liverpool on May 10, and recalled: "On arriving in London I went to what was then a favorite hotel for Americans — Morley's in Trafalgar Square ... My orders were to purchase 12,000 rifles and a battery of field artillery, and to procure one or two guns of large caliber as models."[1] His first visit was to the London Armory Company in Bermondsey, in south London, where he encountered a Federal purchasing agent. Although the firm was under contract to the U.S. government, Huse persisted, and within a few days had succeeded in obtaining an agreement under which he was to have all the arms the company could manufacture after it had fulfilled its present obligations. "This company," he recalled, "during the remainder of the war, turned all its output of arms over to me for the Confederate Army."[2] He later expressed great satisfaction with the quality of their arms, commenting that the rifles manufactured by the company were far superior to those obtained from almost every other source.

For the moment, however, Huse found that the small arms market in England had been largely swept clean: "Everything has been taken by the agents from the Northern States, and the quantity they have secured is very small," he reported.[3] In spite of that, he succeeded in buying a substantial number of Enfield rifles. Later, Colonel Gorgas was to write: "He succeeded, with very little money, in buying a good supply, and in running my department in debt for nearly half a million sterling, the very best proof of his fitness for his place."[4]

Huse and the other purchasing agents made extensive use of commission merchants. One of them was Sinclair, Hamilton & Company, whose offices were in St. Helen's Place. Founded in the 1840s by Alexander Sinclair and Archibald Hamilton, by the time of the Civil War the firm was being run by Archibald Hamilton, who also happened to be a director of the London Armory Company.

Another was Isaac, Campbell & Company of Jermyn Street. This had been founded about 1852 by Samuel Isaac, an army contractor, who first appears in the London directories in 1848, and Alexander Campbell, an outfitter. Campbell had either retired or died by 1861 and the firm was then being operated by Samuel Isaac and his younger brother, Saul. Between 1852 and 1863 Isaac, Campbell are described as army contractors, but after that, simply as merchants. They had a far from unblemished reputation: there were scandals dating back to the time of the Crimean War (1854–1856), and in 1858 both brothers had been witnesses at an official enquiry concerning irregularities at the Army Stores and Clothing Depot at Weedon, Northamptonshire.[5] Huse, of course, knew nothing about this, and his close connection with the firm, which was later found to be overcharging the Confederate government, was to undermine his own position considerably.

The War Department had doubts about Huse's abilities, as well as his loyalties, and in June 1861 sent Major Edward Clifford Anderson to London. Born in 1815, Anderson was a Georgia businessman, planter and former officer in the U.S. Navy, and as well as buying weapons for the Confederate army he was to investigate Huse's trustworthiness and, if circumstances demanded it, take his place. Anderson met Huse in Liverpool on June 25 and the following day they traveled to London. Taking rooms at Hatchett's Hotel in Piccadilly, they called on Commissioner Yancey in Half Moon Street; Anderson met him again two days later, together with fellow commissioners Rost and Mann.

> My first duty on arrival in England," recorded Major Anderson in his diary, "was to comply with the instructions which I had received ... to scrutinize very closely the operations and sentiments of Capt. H[use]. To this end I conferred very fully with ... Capt. Bulloch, whose closer intimacy with H would enable him to afford me correct information ... I received the most satisfactory assurances of the fidelity and loyalty of Mr H. My own intercourse confirmed this, and I took the earliest opportunity to relieve the minds of the Confederate authorities....[6]

Though Anderson thought Huse lacked discretion and judgment, he clearly liked him and described him in his diary as honest, kind-hearted, and untiring in his duties, and the two men worked well together. Huse, for his part, apparently never suspected Anderson's real purpose, or the government's misgivings about his fidelity. The doubts about his loyalty now banished, Huse was given complete authority in July to purchase whatever he thought necessary for the Confederate war effort. At Colonel Gorgas's request, a special messenger was sent to London with new orders sewn between the layers of one of his boot soles. They informed Huse that he was to disregard all former instructions and act in accordance with his own judgment, based on the state of affairs indicated by the newspapers and other sources of information, and forward supplies and equipment as rapidly as possible.[7] In addition, "political agents of the Government" were to have no authority over him, something which would cause trouble later with Commissioner Mason.

The house in Clarendon Road, Notting Hill, where purchasing agent Major Caleb Huse lived in 1862–1863. (Author's photograph)

On July 16, after returning from a visit to Liverpool, Major Anderson wrote in his diary: "Drove to 58 Jermyn Street where I found that Huse had secured me very comfortable quarters, consisting of a parlor, bedroom, bathroom, water closet &c, all on one floor."[8] Three weeks later he recorded: "We have a very pleasant mess composed of Huse, Bulloch, Fearn, George Jones and myself. Our rooms are on the second floor. Our sitting room is a large apartment, trenching on the yard and covered in overhead with glass so as to admit light and air."[9]

They had a number of visitors, including Charles Green, manager of the Savannah branch of a Liverpool firm who had been sent to London to help with purchasing operations; future propagandist Edwin de Leon, who would soon be on his way back to the Confederacy; James Kerr, of the London Armory Company; Mr Britton, "manufacturer of the Blakely shell"; and Major Charles J. Helm, on his way to Havana to take up his appointment as Confederate agent for the West Indies, who breakfasted with them one morning.[10]

There were many visits to London firms. From Isaac, Campbell, Major Anderson ordered 500 cavalry sabers, 10,000 muskets ("old army pattern"), a lot of Enfield rifles, and 11,000 English muskets. On another occasion he went with James Bulloch to Isaac, Campbell's packing establishment "to look after certain matters." At Sinclair, Hamilton's premises he inspected samples of Enfield rifles and pistols, and a storeroom which he referred to as "our warehouse," where Captain Huse proposed depositing future purchases of arms; from them he bought 12,000 Genoese muskets and gunpowder. While at the London Armory Company's works, he encountered Mr. C. McFarland, the Federal purchasing agent whom Captain Huse had met on his first visit to that firm. He also called on Curtis & Harvey, gunpowder manufacturers, in Lombard Street, and Alexander Ross & Company, the Bermondsey leather merchants and army accoutrement makers.

It was a busy time, with frequent trips to Liverpool, and others to places as far apart as Birmingham, Falmouth and Paris. Nevertheless, Major Anderson found time to visit the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich, "the largest in the world, covering more than 100 acres, and containing about 25,000 pieces of ordnance, besides other warlike stores ... everything that can attract the attention of military ... inquirers is abundant."[11] Admission was free on Tuesdays, by letter from the under secretary of war, or tickets from the master-general of Ordnance or "certain officers of artillery ... To be admitted through the interior, an order must be obtained from the Royal Board of Ordnance. Foreigners must apply for these orders through their respective ambassadors."[12]

Traveling down the Thames by steamer, in the company of naval purchasing agent James Bulloch, Anderson's first visit on July 9, was a failure, the two men arriving too late to be admitted. Two days later, accompanied this time by Captain Huse and John Fearn, as well as James Bulloch, he tried again. Although the party had a letter of introduction provided by one of the Isaac brothers, it proved insufficient to gain admittance, but they finally got in by a combination of bribery and subterfuge.

The London Armory Company supplied many weapons to the Confederates. (Kelly's Post Office London Directory)

There was also a trip to Wimbledon Common on July 12 to see a grand review of 10,000 members of the Volunteer Force (the forerunner of the Territorial Army), which left Anderson unimpressed; an excursion with William Yancey and Samuel Isaac on September 17 to Greenhithe, Kent, where HMS Warrior, the Royal Navy's first ironclad warship and a vessel much admired by the Confederates, was at anchor in the Thames; and a visit to see the celebrated Crystal Palace at Sydenham in south London.

Major Anderson seems to have been fond of the theater, and while in London he paid a number of visits. At the Haymarket Theater on August 12, in company with James Bulloch and Charles Green, he saw a new comedy called My Lord and My Lady; or It Might Have Been Worse, by J.R. Planché, and paid a second visit there with Green about a month later to see another comedy, called The Soft Sex, by Charles Matthews. When he went to the Olympic Theater, Wych Street, on August 24, where the program included John Oxenford's drama, The Porter's Knot, and Henry Mayhew's farce, The Wandering Minstrel, starring the famous actor Frederick Robson, he found that Mr. Isaac had provided the tickets and obtained a stage box for them.

Samuel Isaac was undoubtedly generous; so was Archibald Hamilton. On September 15 Major Anderson was a guest at Mr. Hamilton's country house in Kent, to which he traveled by train from London Bridge station. "Our dinner was sumptuous, the costliest wines being lavished upon us ... his hospitality is princely," he noted.[13] Anderson remarked on the generous hospitality of some of the firms with whom he was doing business, particularly Isaac, Campbell and Sinclair, Hamilton. At the same time, he was under no illusions, observing, "Friend Isaac is a most useful man to us, but he never loses sight of his profits," while "Mr. Hamilton is the business man in the London Armoury Company contracts, and in trade haggles over a ha'penny [halfpenny]."[14]

Major Anderson's last few days in London were spent mainly in social activities. He dined at Richardson's Hotel in Covent Garden, an old-fashioned establishment, both dingy and dark, but where the major and his companions were served an excellent dinner, with copious amounts of good wine. This was followed by a visit to the Holborn Casino, a somewhat dubious establishment in High Holborn, where people went to dance and listen to the music. They remained there until quite late, enjoying the festivities and watching the dancers.[15] There was also time for the Zoological Gardens in Regent's Park and a final visit to the theater, this time to the Adelphi in the Strand to see Dion Boucicault's The Colleen Bawn. Unfortunately, on this occasion his visit was marred by the inability of one of his companions, Richard Meade, a former U.S. minister to Brazil, to understand the plot and his persistence in continually asking for explanations. On the way home they stopped for refreshment at one of the "gin houses" in the Haymarket, where Anderson realized that his brandy and soda had been drugged.

On October 2 Major Anderson left for Liverpool, on his way to Holyhead, to join the Fingal, the ship that would take him and James Bulloch and a cargo of much needed munitions and supplies back to the Confederacy. While in Liverpool Anderson met "a German [sic] gentleman by the name of [Henry] Hotze, sent over by the Govt. as a special bearer of dispatches, with instructions to return as soon as practicable."[16] Hotze would be returning to England the following January to undertake a much more demanding role.

The first shipment of arms bought by Huse left West Hartlepool in August 1861 in the steamer Bermuda, the first vessel to run the blockade. On board were field pieces, seacoast guns, rifles and cartridges, as well as large quantities of shoes and blankets. The steamer's safe arrival at Savannah in September was recorded in an angry note in Benjamin Moran's diary on October 17: "It appears the pirate Bermuda has actually run the blockade and safely landed all her warlike stores."[17] Another consignment, consisting of rifles and ammunition, blankets, surgical equipment and medicine, was in the Gladiator, which cleared London in November 1861, bound for Nassau. Confederate purchases made in London in January 1862 of Enfield rifles, percussion caps, blankets, shoes and other military equipment were sent in the blockade-runner Economist, which arrived at Charleston in March.[18] All three vessels belonged to Fraser, Trenholm & Company of Liverpool, who played a major role in shipping goods to the Confederacy.

Not all runs were so successful. One blockade-runner, carrying a shipment of goods sent by Huse and captured on its inward journey in May 1862, included a report from him to Colonel Josiah Gorgas, detailing the arms, munitions and military supplies he had dispatched. This reached the hands of the U.S. State Department, and was also published in a New York newspaper. Huse refers to this in a letter to William Yancey, written in July 1862. He also refers to allegations of financial misconduct, fueled no doubt by jealousy and resentment of his Northern background. These were to surface again.[19]

By the end of 1862 Huse had bought and shipped some 131,000 rifles and muskets, with another 23,000 in store in London awaiting shipment. To these must be added some 16,000 cavalry sabers, 139 pieces of heavy artillery, 484,000 pounds of gunpowder, 4 million cartridges, 10 million percussion caps, 1,000 hundredweight of saltpeter, and 100,000 pounds of lead. There were also sets of armorers', saddlers' and farriers' tools, knapsacks, greatcoats, boots, socks, trousers, shirts, and quantities of leather, cloth and flannel, some $5 million worth in all.[20] How much of this reached its destination is impossible to say.

Until then Huse, who had now been promoted to major, had acted on behalf of all War Department bureaus, but it had become apparent that additional agents were needed. One of them, Major James B. Ferguson, a Virginian, was sent to London in December 1862 by the Quartermaster's Bureau. Supplying the clothing needs of the armies of the Confederacy was a never-ending problem, and as late as September 1864 he was being instructed: "Purchase woollen cloths, or flannels or felt hats in lieu of socks, as we can manufacture the latter from cotton yarn. A cheap and serviceable felt hat would be very acceptable to the army. Also wanted, best quality of blankets, and gray cloths, with a fair proportion of trimmings."[21]

Earlier that year Ferguson was joined by his wife, Emma, who, together with their two children and a nursemaid, had run the blockade in the Lynx, another vessel belonging to Fraser, Trenholm. The passage from Wilmington to St. George's, Bermuda, was arranged by Major Benjamin Ficklin, "a government shipper of cotton," for whom Mrs. Ferguson carried dispatches for James Mason and John Slidell.[22] She also brought a letter from General Robert E. Lee, revealing that a box containing a uniform and blanket sent him by her husband had failed to get through the blockade.

In July 1864 Major Ferguson proposed to make another attempt, and Mrs. Irvine, "the wife of a Scotch manufacturer, and an ardent admirer of Gen. Lee," Lady Florence Eardley, the American-born wife of Sir Eardley Eardley, a Confederate sympathizer, and Mrs. Ferguson made up another box for Lee, with "a very fine uniform, cavalry boots, gauntlets, and the handsomest lieutenant general's scarf to be found in London." There was also cloth to make a uniform for General James Longstreet, whose measurements they did not have. It was sent from Liverpool in August and this time arrived safely at Wilmington. Lee expressed his thanks to Major Ferguson in a letter written from Petersburg in October, adding: "The army appreciates your zealous and self-sacrificing efforts in promoting their comfort, and hail with pleasure the arrival of every cargo you send. May you continue to be able to supply their wants!"[23]

Captain William Graves Crenshaw was a Richmond merchant who had formed an artillery company called Crenshaw's Battery. In the late autumn of 1862 he was sent to London to organize a blockade-running company and also supervise the purchase of commissary stores. When Huse returned from a visit to Paris in April 1863, he found that Crenshaw, in conjunction with Commissioner James Mason, had signed an agreement with Alexander Collie & Company, a firm of merchants, to buy and operate four blockade-runners for the War and Navy Departments, to be built by John & William Dudgeon at their yards at Cubitt Town, on the Thames. At a cost of £14,000 each, they were to be completed by July 1863.

Huse had already purchased several steamers for the Ordnance Bureau, and Crenshaw's demands that some of Huse's purchases should be carried in the Collie-Crenshaw steamers, and that he should also provide money to help pay for them, were refused. Friction over purchasing operations now reached a serious level, with Captain Crenshaw and Major Ferguson, supported by Commissioner Mason, pressing for Major Huse's recall on the grounds of lack of cooperation, as well as financial misconduct involving the firm of Isaac, Campbell.

News of this highly unsatisfactory situation reached John B. Jones, a clerk in the Confederate War Department in Richmond, who noted in his diary in August 1863:

> Letters from Mr. [W.G.] Crenshaw, in England, and the correspondence forwarded by him, might seem to implicate Major Caleb Huse, Colonel J. Gorgas's ordnance agent, in some very ugly operations. It appears that Major H. has contracted for 50,000 muskets at $4 above the current price, leaving $200,000 commission for whom? And that he really seems to be throwing obstacles in the way of Mr. C., who is endeavoring to procure commissary stores in England. Mr. C. has purchased £40,000 worth of bacon, but Major Huse, he apprehends, is endeavoring to prevent its shipment. Can this be so?[24]

The War Department, alarmed at this development, partly resolved the matter by making Huse responsible for medical and ordnance supplies only, while Crenshaw was to deal with quartermaster and commissary goods. At the same time, it was decided to examine Huse's accounts.

The man assigned to this task was Colin John McRae, the leading negotiator for the Seven Per Cent Cotton Loan (see chapter 7), who was now being sent back to Europe to manage it.[25] McRae was born in North Carolina in 1812, but subsequently moved to Mississippi and then to Alabama, where he settled in Mobile. He had become a highly successful businessman, with a wide range of interests which included coastal shipping, railroad promotion and real estate, and had already made a major contribution to the Confederate war effort with the establishment of the Selma Ordnance Works, the second largest ironworks in the South. In terms of what he achieved, he would prove to be one of the most important Confederates to come to London.

McRae reached Southampton on May 13, 1863, and after a visit to Paris, arrived in London at the beginning of June, staying at the Burlington Hotel in Cork Street. An assistant, M. Hildreth Bloodgood, was sent to help with the investigation of Huse's accounts and arrived at the end of August. A firm of accountants, Quilter, Ball, Jay & Company, was also employed to assist in the matter. No evidence of financial irregularities was found, and McRae concluded that although Huse "has made some very serious mistakes, I think there is no good reason to suspect his integrity, and that he has always sought what seemed the best interests of the government, and has with all his mistakes really been of great service and done great good."[26]

He soon had the measure of Isaac, Campbell, whom he suspected of fraudulent bookkeeping. His suspicions proved correct: it was found that the firm was keeping two sets of books, one showing the real price, and the other the price quoted to the Confederate government. As a result, all further dealings with them were terminated. They were almost certainly not the only ones guilty of unethical practice in dealings with the Confederacy.

Until the autumn of 1862, purchases of military supplies abroad had been made with coin shipped to Fraser, Trenholm in Liverpool, letters of credit and bills of exchange. As the volume of purchases increased, the Treasury Department then resorted to the issue of bonds, cotton certificates and warrants, backed by cotton stored in the Confederacy, as well as money from the Seven Per Cent Cotton Loan. To supplement these, the government also made a number of agreements with shipowners to purchase and deliver war materials, to be paid for with cotton at Confederate ports.[27]

These agreements often proved anything but satisfactory, with contractors competing with each other as well as with purchasing agents, and often supplying goods of inferior quality. Henry Hotze noted "the clashing interests, the rivalries and hostilities, sometimes the disgraceful public squabbles of contractors," as well as "the lax manner in which, in many instances, contracts appear to have been granted," in a letter to Richmond.[28]

In October 1863 Colin McRae suggested to Christopher Memminger, secretary of the treasury, that in order to rationalize these haphazard arrangements and restore Confederate credit abroad, all commission-based agreements with contractors should be canceled; that there should be one purchasing agent each for the War and Navy Departments; that one person should be put in overall charge of Confederate finances in Europe, with authority over government purchasing agents and their spending; and that the government should requisition all cotton and transport it to Liverpool, where it would be sold to finance the war effort.

James Spence, who had served as the Confederacy's financial agent in Europe since October 1862, was replaced in December 1863 by Colin McRae. Spence's antislavery views, which he had never attempted to hide, almost certainly influenced the decision to replace him. Though he was paid for his services, Spence had only acted in an advisory capacity, whereas McRae was an official of the Treasury Department and had authority over Confederate purchasing agents. The following February, his recommendations — what became known as the New Plan — were adopted by the Confederate government, bringing order into what had become a confused financial situation, centralizing purchasing operations, and largely ending the competition and friction between agents.

Not all Confederate purchasing agents came to buy arms and equipment. Major Norman Stewart Walker was a Virginian who had served in the Confederate Army before joining the Ordnance Bureau in 1862 and being appointed resident disbursing agent at Bermuda. Here his duties included the transshipment of goods to the Confederacy and the procurement of coal for Confederate vessels. He was sent to London in November 1862 with $2 million in Confederate bonds, partly to clear some of Major Huse's debts and partly to purchase steamers for the Bureau.

His business concluded, Major Walker was back in Bermuda by February 1863, but in August 1864, having moved his base to Halifax, Nova Scotia, because of a yellow fever outbreak, he returned to London. His wife and family were already there, having arrived the previous month in the blockade-runner Index. Conditions on board the vessel had been poor, with a shortage of sheets, towels, tablecloths and food, and a head steward whom Mrs. Georgiana Gholson Walker described as "the filthiest beast ... which it has ever been my misfortune to encounter." She was highly relieved when the voyage was over:

> On Monday afternoon about six, Capt. Horner raised the Confederate flag, & we entered one of the docks of London. Our party immediately took a boat & came on shore, determined not to spend another night on board ship. The baggage had to be left for the inspection of custom house officers — as if poor Confederates had any contraband goods![29]

Mrs. Walker had come to England to take her little daughter, Georgie, to see William Bowman, the leading ophthalmic surgeon in London, and "handsome apartments" had been found for her in Sackville Street, just off Piccadilly. Here, the first familiar face she saw was that of Mrs. Rose Greenhow, the Confederate spy and emissary, whom she had previously encountered in Bermuda, and who had rooms in the same house. Mrs. Walker was visited by James Mason, James McFarland, his secretary, and Major Huse, among others, before moving to Leamington Spa, where there was a small Confederate community. At the beginning of September the Walkers returned to London for a few hectic days — "Norman finds himself overrun with business engagements with the various officers of the Confederate Government"—before leaving for Paris.[30] They went back to Leamington for a few weeks, but in October sailed from Liverpool for Halifax.

Captain John Moncure Robinson, former superintendent of the Seaboard and Roanoke Railroad, who was sent to England in February 1863 on behalf of the Engineer Bureau, was also authorized to act as a purchasing agent for five Virginia railroad companies, for whom he bought badly needed iron. A proposal that he should repeat the operation on behalf of the other railroads in the South, who were all in dire need, was rejected, the secretary of war refusing to become involved in what he regarded as private business matters.[31]

As well as Confederate purchasing agents, state agents were also sent to England. Major Anderson took on a dual role when he was informed, while on a visit to Liverpool in July 1861, that Governor Joseph E. Brown of Georgia had appointed him a state agent, with authorization to spend up to $100,000 acquiring arms and war material. "This will enable me to take up many muskets that are at this time being offered...," he remarked in a letter to Secretary of War Leroy P. Walker, "added to which is the advantage presented me of going continuously on with our purchases, without being compelled to stop for the arrival of additional means from Richmond."[32] In his diary in late September he noted that he had paid Sinclair, Hamilton in full for the Georgia muskets.[33]

Another state agent was Colonel John Lewis Peyton. Born near Staunton, Virginia, in 1824, Peyton was a former lawyer, and, though opposed to secession, had helped raise a regiment for Virginia, but was prevented by ill health from serving with it. Instead, he accepted an appointment by Governor Henry T. Clark as a state purchasing agent for North Carolina. Judah P. Benjamin, Leroy P. Walker's successor, asked Major Anderson and Captain Huse to assist Colonel Peyton in buying arms, but he warned them to give preference to government purchases; in the event, Anderson had departed before Peyton arrived. Accompanied by his wife, Peyton left Charleston in the CSS Nashville in October 1861, and arrived at Southampton in November. Proceeding to London, he spent a few days at a hotel near Charing Cross before moving to a suite of rooms in Jermyn Street, which cost three guineas a week, plus meals. "Nothing could exceed the snug and cosy character of my Jermyn Street abode, with its blazing coal fires, and its massive furniture, all selected with reference to convenience and comfort," he recalled.[34]

One of his first acts was to call on Messrs. Yancey and Mann in Half Moon Street, who were waiting for their replacements to arrive. He also wrote to the Times; his letter, headed "A Voice from the South," assured its readers that recent newspaper reports of disaffection towards the Confederate government in states like North Carolina were quite untrue.[35] While in London he was made an honorary member of the Reform Club in Pall Mall, and visited the House of Commons, as well as attending a soirée at Bath House, Piccadilly, the residence of Lord Ashburton.

He had only limited success with his purchasing mission, but was able to buy a consignment of 1,760 long Enfield rifles for the use of North Carolina troops, which left London in February 1862 on board the steamship Southwick, bound for Nassau. Though their safe arrival there was acknowledged, he was never informed whether they reached their final destination. Writing from Paris at the beginning of 1863, he complained about this to Governor Zebulon B. Vance, Henry Clark's successor, and reminded him that his services were still available if required: "A letter will always reach me addressed to the care of John Wilson Esq., 93 Great Russell Street, Bloomsbury, London."[36] He had had an unofficial interview with Lord Palmerston in May 1862 which had convinced him of Britain's determination to remain neutral and he reiterated this point in his letter to Vance.

In November 1862 Governor Vance appointed two more purchasing agents for North Carolina. They were John White and Thomas M. Crossan. John White, a Scotsman, was born in Fifeshire in 1814 and had emigrated to North Carolina in the late 1820s, where he had become a highly successful dry goods merchant at Warrenton; Thomas Morrow Crossan, also of Warrenton, was a former officer in the U.S. Navy and now a lieutenant in the Confederate Navy.

The two men left Charleston in November 1862 and reached London at the beginning of January 1863. With them they had $1.5 million in state cotton bonds, the proceeds from the sale of which were to purchase blankets, shoes, leather and clothing for North Carolina troops serving with the Confederate armies. The two men dealt with Alexander Collie, through whom they also acquired a steamer, the Lord Clyde, renamed the Advance, the only blockade-runner to be owned by an individual Confederate state. For its first few trips it was commanded by Lieutenant Crossan. A part interest in three other vessels was obtained, and during the rest of the war large quantities of supplies were purchased on behalf of North Carolina and taken through the blockade.[37]

Captain Crenshaw observed that John White had also been to see Isaac, Campbell: "Mr White ... sent here by the State of North Carolina, who has had some opportunity of seeing something of Isaac, Campbell & Co., informs me that he entertains of them the same opinion that I do; nor have I seen any man since my arrival here who would say a good word for them except Major Huse."[38]

Major Anderson had returned to Georgia at the end of 1861, but other purchasing agents from that state came to London to buy blankets, clothing and shoes for its troops, and early in 1864 Governor Joseph E. Brown chartered steamers to export cotton and import supplies.[39] Louisiana and Texas also sent agents to England, as apparently did Virginia, South Carolina and Alabama. Governor Thomas O. Moore of Louisiana appointed a Mr. Tilton as a state agent; Major Anderson encountered him in Piccadilly in August 1861 and seems to have formed a poor opinion of him, though his diary does not tell us why. The Texas State Military Board, set up to purchase supplies for Texas troops, sent John Swisher, an Austin merchant, to London in April 1862 to negotiate the sale of some 300 prewar U.S. bonds. Some were sold to George Peabody & Company, the well-known American banking house, but the result was far from satisfactory and ended in a lawsuit.

Nelson Clements, another Texas state agent, arrived in London at the end of March 1863 to buy supplies to be paid for with cotton. Dealing with Isaac, Campbell, he sent out rifles and muskets, blankets, flannel shirts, shoes and gray army cloth. He was also introduced to the firm of Sinclair, Hamilton by Edgar Stringer, a ship and insurance broker, and through them he purchased 7,000 long Enfield rifles, 1853 pattern, with bayonets, at a cost of £3 each, in May 1863.[40] For this service, Mr Stringer charged a commission of 5 percent, or £1,000.

Useful as it was, the work of the state agents was peripheral to that of the purchasing agents working for the Confederate government. Given the circumstances, theirs was a remarkable exercise in logistics, probably without precedent. It has been estimated that War Department agents spent more than $12 million, of which Caleb Huse alone accounted for at least $10 million. It was indeed a crucial role: for four years, their efforts helped the Confederacy maintain its armies in the field, and without them the South would almost certainly have been defeated much sooner.

5

Vessels Suitable for Our Purposes

I regard the possession of an iron-armoured ship as a matter of the first necessity. Such a vessel at this time could traverse the entire coast of the United States, prevent all blockades, and encounter, with a fair prospect of success, their entire Navy.

— Stephen R. Mallory, May 8, 1861

At its inception, the Confederate Navy had virtually no ships of any kind, ironclad or otherwise, and, as the secretary of the navy indicated, the purchase or construction of them was clearly of the utmost priority. At the beginning of the war, the Confederate government was offered the opportunity to purchase ten vessels belonging to the East India Company, then in the process of disposing of its assets, following the transfer of authority to the British crown. The ships, iron-hulled steamers of recent construction, capable of being fitted with guns, were available for £2 million, and the company was willing to accept Confederate government bonds in payment, backed by 40,000 bales of cotton. This proposition was put to the government by influential businessman George A. Trenholm, but it was turned down, partly because the ships were thought unsuitable for most Southern harbors.[1]

Although approximately twenty ironclads were built and launched in the South during the war, these were for coastal and river defense; they were not oceangoing vessels. These, it was very quickly realized, would have to be obtained abroad, and in May 1861 James D. Bulloch was sent to England as a purchasing agent for the Confederate Navy Department. His mission was threefold: to initiate the construction of ironclads; to buy or have built cruisers or commerce raiders to prey on enemy merchantmen; and to purchase weapons and equipment for the Navy and Marine Corps.

James Dunwody Bulloch was born near Savannah, Georgia, in 1823 and, after serving in the U.S. Navy from 1839 until 1853, resigned to work for a New York shipping company operating between there and New Orleans.[2] When the Civil War broke out, he was captain of the steamer Bienville, which he felt morally bound to return to her owners before offering his services to the Confederate government at Montgomery, Alabama.

To avoid the blockade, he traveled by train to Detroit and Montreal, where he took passage in the steamer North America, and arrived at Liverpool on June 4. Here he called on Fraser, Trenholm & Company, who were to be the Confederacy's overseas financial agents, then proceeded to London to see the Confederate commissioners. Though he was to be based in Liverpool, James Bulloch's work inevitably involved many visits to London, including liaison with his army counterparts, with whom at times he shared accommodations. In August 1861 he was able to report to Secretary of the Navy Mallory: "Major Anderson, Captain Huse and myself consult freely together upon our duties and are now engaged in sending forward a quantity of munitions."[3]

Like his army counterparts, Bulloch did not find his task an easy one. "There were at that date," he recalled, "numerous agents of the United States in England, who seemed in no way desirous to conceal their operations. They went about their business with the air of men who were sure of their position, and who neither anticipated nor feared interference or opposition. They were well provided with money, or satisfactory bank-credits, and they rapidly swept the gun market of well-nigh every weapon, whether good or bad."[4] Confederate agents, on the other hand, were often embarrassed by lack of funds.

By the end of June 1861 a contract had been signed at Liverpool with William C. Miller & Sons and Fawcett, Preston & Company for a ship to be called the Oreto, supposedly destined for the Italian government. Though Thomas H. Dudley, the U.S. consul at Liverpool, was highly suspicious, and conveyed those suspicions to U.S. minister Charles Francis Adams and Foreign Secretary Lord John Russell in London, searches of the vessel found nothing to prove she was intended for Confederate service. James Bulloch had found a loophole in the Foreign Enlistment Act by making sure that when his commerce raiders put to sea they were not yet equipped for war.

The Oreto was ready to be launched by January 1862, and on March 22 she sailed for Nassau, where she was joined by her new captain, Lieutenant John N. Maffitt, and a cargo of arms brought out separately in the steamer Bahama. In August the Oreto was commissioned as the CSS Florida. After capturing or sinking thirty-seven U.S. merchant ships, her career as a commerce raider came to an end in October 1864 when she was rammed and captured in the Brazilian port of Bahia by the USS Wachusett.

Work on a second commerce raider began in August 1861 at John Laird & Sons' shipyard across the Mersey at Birkenhead. She was the No. 290, destined to be the largest of the Confederate cruisers, and her construction was watched closely by Federal spies, and the Foreign Office in London kept abreast of developments.

When launched on May 15, 1862 she was named the Enrica to foster the impression that she was being built for the Spanish government. Informed privately in late July that she was about to be impounded by the British government, Bulloch arranged for her to sail from the Mersey, on the pretext of a trial run, on July 29.[5] Successfully eluding the USS Tuscarora, which was lying in wait, she set course for the Azores. Here the bark Agrippina, purchased in London in May as her tender, and loaded with ordnance, ammunition, stores and coal, joined her, and armed and provisioned, she was commissioned as the CSS Alabama in August 1862, under the command of Captain Raphael Semmes. She had captured or destroyed sixty-five merchant ships by the time she was sunk off Cherbourg by the USS Kearsarge in June 1864.

Both these cruisers or commerce raiders were wooden vessels, but in July 1862, the month that the Alabama sailed, Bulloch signed another contract with John Laird, this time to build two ironclads. They were powerful vessels, 230 feet long, with twin revolving turrets and capable of speeds of up to ten knots. Designed by Captain Cowper Coles, R.N., a leading naval architect who was related to the Laird family, they were fitted with underwater rams which could stave in the hull of any wooden ship, and might be used to break the blockade or threaten cities like New York and Washington. Ostensibly for the pasha of Egypt, and known at one stage as El Tousson and El Mounassir, they were to be ready by the spring of 1863. The Laird rams were to prove the most contentious of all the Confederate ships built in Britain.

As their true purpose could not be disguised, Bulloch, all too aware that the British government might try to prevent their departure, transferred ownership to a French citizen. The Foreign Office, informed of developments, at first refused to act for lack of hard evidence, but U.S. minister Charles Francis Adams, knowing that at least one of the rams was ready for sea, was determined to prevent a repetition of the escape of the Florida and Alabama. On September 5, 1863, he indicated to Foreign Secretary Lord John Russell, in the strongest terms, that it would be superfluous of him to point out that allowing them to sail would mean war with the United States. His letter had the desired effect, and on September 8 it was reported that the rams were being detained. Impounded by the British government, they were later purchased for use by the Royal Navy.

As well as the vessels built on Merseyside, Bulloch also contracted late in the war for a number of gunboats for the Confederate Navy. Four of these were to be built in Scotland, at Denny & Company's yards at Dumbarton, on the Clyde, and two more in London, by John & William Dudgeon at Cubitt Town, on the Thames; all were to be iron-hulled, twin-propeller steamers. Only one of Denny's vessels, the Ajax, was completed in time to go into service, but, unable to reach the South, it returned to Liverpool in June 1865. Another, the Hercules, attracted unwelcome attention from the authorities, but they found nothing to connect her with the Confederates.[6]

The two vessels built by Dudgeons were the Louisa Ann Fanny and the Mary Augusta. These appear to have been named after the wives of John Gilliat, head of J.K. Gilliat & Company, and his younger brother, Algernon, perhaps because the firm was financially involved in their construction or in recognition of previous services rendered to the Confederacy. The Louisa Ann Fanny was completed on January 18, 1865. The Federals were well-informed about her, the Dudgeons' foreman, Mr Cooper, having obligingly supplied one of their agents with a detailed description. When she made her trial trip down the Thames, from Gravesend to Maplin Sands later that month, under the command of her nominal master, William Pinchon, a Times correspondent who was on board had this to say:

> The engines are amply protected by the arrangements of the coal bunkers from shot if the ship in her future career should ever come within range of hostile guns. The Louisa Ann Fanny has been built for purely commercial purposes, but as she may not improbably some day cross Wilmington bar, this protection afforded to her machinery by the arrangement of her coal bunkers is a very necessary precaution.[7]

Commanded now by Lieutenant William F. Carter, the Louisa Ann Fanny left Victoria Docks on February 9, 1865, with seven passengers, and delivered dispatches to the CSS Stonewall at Lisbon before departing for Bermuda. From there, in March 1865, she took Major Norman Walker to Nassau and Havana. She never ran the blockade, and in May brought the major and his family back to England.

The war was nearing its end when the Mary Augusta embarked on her sea trial on March 14, 1865. It consisted of a race from Dover to Calais with the London, Chatham & Dover Railway Company's new mail steamer La France, which was described by the Times as "the most exciting and interesting contest that has ever yet occurred since steam was first applied for the propulsion of ships."[8] The Mary Augusta emerged as the winner, but the Confederates never took delivery of her. She was laid up in Victoria Docks, and at the beginning of May 1865 was reported for sale, to be joined later that month by the Louisa Ann Fanny.

The Sea King, which Commander Bulloch purchased in September 1864 as a replacement for the Alabama, was a merchant ship, built on the Clyde in 1863 by Alexander Stephen and Sons and constructed of wood and iron. She would become the CSS Shenandoah, the last Confederate raider. Lieutenant William Conway Whittle, Jr., her future executive officer, was in Liverpool when he received his orders from Commander Bulloch, written in an uncharacteristic, cloak-and-dagger style:

> You will proceed to London by the 5 o'clock train this afternoon and go to Wood's Hotel, Furnival's Inn, High Holborn ... It has been arranged for you to be in the coffee room of the hotel at 11 o'clock a.m. precisely tomorrow, and that you will sit in a prominent position, with a white pocket handkerchief ... through a buttonhole of your coat, and a newspaper in your hand ... you will be recognized by Mr. Richard Wright, who will ... ask you if your name is Brown. You may say yes, and ask his name; he will give it, and you will then retire with him to your room, hand him the enclosed letter of introduction, and then ... discuss freely the business in hand....[9]

Richard Wright, the father-in-law of Charles K. Prioleau, the head of Fraser, Trenholm, had inspected the Sea King prior to its purchase and was her nominal owner. He would introduce Lieutenant Whittle to Captain Peter Corbett, who was to sail the Sea King to Madeira. Corbett was later arrested for attempting to enlist men to serve on the CSS Shenandoah and tried under the Foreign Enlistment Act, but was acquitted.

The Sea King, which sailed from London in October 1864 to become the CSS Shenandoah, the last Confederate raider. (Illustrated London News)

On October 8, 1864, the Sea King left the Port of London with Lieutenant Whittle, and early on the following day the steamer Laurel left Liverpool. The Sea King's departure was noted by Federal spies and reported to Washington by U.S. consul Freeman Morse together with details of her history and previous and present owners. At Madeira she rendezvoused with the Laurel, and was fitted out and commissioned as the CSS Shenandoah. Her captain was Lieutenant Commander James Iredell Waddell, who, together with his officers and the ship's guns and ammunition, had traveled out in the Laurel. She would remain at sea long after the surrender of all Confederate land forces, capturing or destroying no fewer than thirty-eight ships, and not finally returning to Liverpool until November 1865.

Another purchasing agent to be sent to Europe by the Confederate Navy Department in the spring of 1861 was Lieutenant James Heyward North, C.S.N. Born in 1813 into a seafaring family in Charleston, North had spent many years in the U.S. Navy before the secession crisis forced him to resign. His orders were to buy, or have constructed, an ironclad in England or France, of which he would then take command. In addition, he was to consult with naval experts like Captain Cowper Coles, R.N., and also assist and collaborate with James Bulloch in any way he could.

Together with his wife and daughter, Lieutenant North left Savannah for Liverpool on May 25, 1861, in the Camilla (the former racing yacht America, which had won the first cup race against England in 1851 and had now been acquired by the Confederate government). It proved to be a trying voyage — the Camilla rolled excessively and most of those on board were ill. Among the other passengers was Major Anderson, on his way to buy munitions for the Confederate Army and investigate Captain Huse's progress.

Exactly a month later, on June 25, 1861, they finally reached their destination.[10] There, North met James Bulloch, then in company with Major Anderson and Captain Huse, who happened to be visiting Liverpool, he took the train to London the next day. He had important papers for Commissioners Yancey and Mann, with whom he had a long talk before returning to Liverpool.

On this first visit to London, James North stayed at Hatchett's Hotel in Piccadilly, but when he returned with his family on July 16, they lodged in less expensive accommodations in nearby Jermyn Street, found for them by Major Anderson. Over the following weeks, North had several more meetings with the commissioners, made two trips to inspect the exterior of HMS Warrior, the new British ironclad nearing completion on the Thames, and had a talk with a Mr. Pritchard, of the firm of Henry S. Pitcher, wood and iron shipbuilders, of Tokenhouse Yard.

Much of his time, however, was spent in sightseeing: St. James's Palace, the Houses of Parliament, Westminster Abbey, Hyde Park, Madame Tussaud's waxworks, the Tower of London, St. Paul's Cathedral, Covent Garden, Regent Street and Oxford Street, and, further afield, the Crystal Palace at Sydenham and the Botanical Gardens at Kew. In his diary he expressed some concern at this inactivity: "I have been so much worried at the news from America that it has almost made me sick, especially when I think how little I am doing for my poor country. The only consolation that I have is, that the fault is not mine, and I am ready and willing to do any thing in the world for her." Nevertheless, he left London at the beginning of August for Cowes, and after a fortnight spent in the yacht Camilla, off the Isle of Wight, proceeded to Paris, where sightseeing again seemed to be a principal occupation.[11]

North's stay in Paris was interrupted by a hasty trip to Liverpool in early October, when he learned that Bulloch and Anderson were about to return to the Confederacy in the blockade-runner Fingal. This was a fast, iron-framed steamer which had been purchased jointly by the army and navy in September to transport war supplies back to the Confederacy. The Colletis, a Thames freighter, was hired to carry some of the supplies from warehouses in London up to Greenock, in Scotland, where the Fingal was waiting; the rest went by train. The cargo consisted of rifles, cartridges, percussion caps, revolvers, cavalry sabers, four pieces of naval ordnance, lead shot and shells, gunpowder, medicines, blankets, clothing and leather; because the Colletis was delayed in the Thames by fog, Anderson arranged for Sinclair, Hamilton to put an additional amount of gunpowder onboard.[12] It would be the largest consignment of war materials ever sent to the Confederacy. On October 15, Bulloch, and Anderson, whose task in England was now complete, joined the Fingal at Holyhead, for her voyage to Savannah; Bulloch returned to England the following March in the blockade-runner Annie Childs.

North's requests, both verbal and written, that as a precautionary measure, Bulloch should hand over all drawings, contracts and specifications to him, as "the only agent of the Navy Dept. left out here," were refused. "It is nothing more than I expected," he concluded. "Sorry! but so much for sending a naval officer and civilian on the same duty."[13] This encounter marked the beginning of the animosity which was to mar their relationship for the rest of the war.

In January 1862, while he was still in the Confederacy, James Bulloch was commissioned a commander in the Confederate States Navy. Officers who had resigned from the U.S. Navy to join the Confederate Navy had usually done so in their original rank. Bulloch had left the U.S. Navy in 1853 after fifteen years' service, but with less than a year in the rank of lieutenant, and realized that such a senior appointment might not be well received in Confederate naval circles. An astute man, he was all too aware of the trouble it might bring.

The trouble was not long in coming. James North, who had served in the U.S. Navy for thirty-three years, more than twice as long as Bulloch, including twelve years in the rank of lieutenant, was incensed by it, and took it as a personal slight. "I am not aware of anything that I have done to merit such treatment from the department," he complained to Secretary of the Navy Stephen Mallory in March 1862. "Rank to a military man is everything and that rank has been taken from me."[14] His own promotion to the rank of commander in May 1862, news of which unfortunately did not reach him until August, did little to pacify him, and he then insisted that Secretary Mallory should inform him who was now the ranking officer. The matter of rank, he was told, was of no great importance among agents serving abroad, but in fact Commander Bulloch was the senior officer. The fact that, as a result of confusion, North did not get command of either of the cruisers Bulloch was having built on Merseyside — the Florida and the Alabama— caused even more resentment.

James North was really not suited for the admittedly difficult job he had been sent to do. Lacking initiative and persistance, rather dilatory, with limited imagination and short on tact, he was also inflexible and stubborn. His complaints and inactivity soon irritated the secretary of the navy, who several times considered recalling him, and their correspondence was often acrimonious and aggravated by the problem of poor communications.

In September 1861, North reported to the Navy Department that he had not yet made any progress in acquiring an ironclad in France. This news was not well received by Secretary Mallory, and North was ordered to remain in England to investigate the purchase or building of an ironclad there. The Norths returned to London in mid–November and were soon installed in lodgings in Russell Square, Bloomsbury.

The following spring, North was introduced to Glasgow shipbuilders James & George Thomson by Edgar Pinchback Stringer, a member of the firm of William S. Lindsay & Company, shipowners and insurance brokers. In spite of Bulloch's reservations about its suitability, North signed a contract with the Thomsons on May 21, 1862, for an armored frigate, which he hoped to command, and on June 7 he reported to the Navy Department that work had now commenced on his ironclad. Negotiations were then started with Joseph Whitworth & Company in Manchester for cannon, gun carriages and ammunition.

The Confederate Navy, however, was to receive no benefit from his belated efforts. Fears that the ship might be seized led to the contract for "Number 61" or "Lieutenant North's ironclad" being terminated in December 1863 and its subsequent sale to the Royal Danish Navy. "It has been a sad, sad disappointment to me after so many months of labor to find it was necessary to part with so noble a ship when I felt confident she would have done us most valuable service," he wrote to Mallory.[15] After that, North moved to France, where he hoped to take command of one of the ironclads which Bulloch was having built there.

In the spring of 1863, the Federal government, greatly concerned about Confederate shipbuilding in England, sent two agents, John Murray Forbes and William H. Aspinwall, with instructions to buy any ships which were thought to be potentially dangerous in order to keep them out of Southern hands. When they arrived, they not only found that the newly launched Cotton Loan had seriously reduced the likelihood of their being able to purchase ships from cash-starved Confederates, but also that their "secret" mission was already public knowledge, with a report in the Times describing the large sums they had at their disposal to buy up "the gunboats now building in England for the rebels."[16] Forbes and Aspinwall liaised with Freeman Morse and Thomas Dudley, the U.S. consuls in London and Liverpool, from whom they obtained lists of suspicious vessels, and decided to concentrate on those rather than the ones being constructed for the Confederates. In the end, they found that their mission of purchasing ironclads or potential commerce raiders was not feasible and it was terminated at the end of June 1863.

It is difficult to believe that they were unaware of the large commerce raider then being built on the Clyde, in Scotland, for Lieutenant George T. Sinclair. Born in Norfolk, Virginia, George Terry Sinclair also came from a family with a long naval tradition; six of his relatives were officers in the Confederate Navy and like James North, of whom he was an old friend, he had served in the U.S. Navy for many years. Major Anderson formed a poor opinion of him, though he was apparently well regarded by Secretary of the Navy Mallory. Sent to England in May 1862 as a naval purchasing agent, Sinclair's instructions were to consult Commander Bulloch about the design, as well as the funding, of a commerce raider, of which, when complete, he was to take command. Bulloch gave him details of the Alabama, but as he had no spare funds at that time, Sinclair was obliged to look elsewhere. With the help of Confederate commissioner James Mason, finance was arranged with William S. Lindsay, who agreed to accept cotton certificates worth £51,000 for the ship, also to be built by J. & G. Thomson. The contract was again arranged by Edgar Stringer and signed in August 1862.[17]

While their respective vessels were being built, Sinclair lodged with North near Glasgow, but in February 1863, while on a visit to London, he stayed at a house in Buckland Crescent, Belsize Park, belonging to the Rev. Francis W. Tremlett, a well-known Southern sympathizer. He wrote to North: "We have a grand dinner party here today, to all the Confederates. Chapman and Evans are here." Bulloch was also present on that occasion.[18]

Though it was completed, his ship, known as the Canton or Pampero, never reached the Confederates. In November 1863, its seizure becoming ever more likely, Sinclair, who had also now been promoted to commander, was advised to leave the Glasgow area; the vessel was impounded by government officials the following month.[19] After being ordered to Paris to join Flag Officer Barron's staff, Sinclair traveled to Cherbourg in June 1864, where the engagement between the CSS Alabama and the USS Kearsarge was imminent, but his request to be allowed to join the Alabama for the battle was refused. Both he and North were ordered back to the Confederacy early in 1865.

Most of the Confederates who came to London during the Civil War were quite unknown. One exception was Commander Raphael Semmes, who arrived in April 1862 after relinquishing command of the CSS Sumter. The most famous Confederate naval officer of the war, Raphael Semmes was born in 1809 in Maryland, and joined the U.S. Navy in 1826. As well as serving in the Mexican War, he also found time during long leaves of absence to study law, and had reached the rank of commander by the time he resigned from the U.S. Navy in 1861 to offer his services to the Confederacy. After being sent north to buy naval supplies, he was given command of the Sumter, the Confederate Navy's first commerce raider.

Semmes was accompanied by Lieutenant John McIntosh Kell. Born at Darien, Georgia, in 1823, Kell, a graduate of the Naval Academy at Annapolis, had joined the U.S. Navy in 1841 and like Semmes had seen service in the Mexican War; he had also taken part in Commodore Perry's expedition to Japan in 1852–1854.

The two men now found rooms in Euston Square, "our windows looking out, even at this early season, upon well-grown and fragrant grasses, trees in leaf, and flowers in bloom." Semmes lost no time in calling on Commissioner James Mason, whom he found "a great favorite with everybody. In his company I saw much of the society of the English capital, and soon became satisfied that Mr Davis could not have intrusted the affairs of the Confederacy to better hands. English hearts had warmed towards him and his name was the sesame to open all English doors."[20] He learned from Mason that the Florida had sailed the previous month and that the Alabama would soon be launched, and subsequently had discussions with Bulloch and North. Semmes and Kell returned to the Confederacy in the latter part of May on board the Melita, one of Isaac, Campbell's steamers.

On his second visit in June 1864, after the loss of the CSS Alabama, Semmes, by now a captain, and accompanied as before by Lieutenant Kell, found himself a considerable celebrity. A group of naval officers at the Junior United Service Club in Charles II Street presented him with "a magnificent sword, which was manufactured to their order in the City of London," to replace the one lost when the Alabama was sunk. "To keep company with this sword, a noble English lady presented me with a mammoth Confederate flag, wrought with her own hands from the richest silk," he wrote.[21] He was also offered a public dinner by the Army & Navy Club in Pall Mall, an honor he declined. Kell went back to the Confederacy in early July, and Semmes, after a recuperative tour in Europe, began his own journey back to the Confederate States in October.

Another Confederate who was extremely well-known was Commander Matthew Fontaine Maury. Born near Fredericksburg, Virginia, in 1806, Matthew Maury had joined the U.S. Navy in 1825 and taken part in three long cruises, including that of the USS Vincennes on her famous four-year voyage around the world. After being crippled in a stagecoach accident in 1839, he had been restricted to shore duties and was subsequently appointed superintendent of what became the U.S. Naval Observatory and Hydrographic Office in Washington, D.C. He had already begun to make his name as a scientific author with his New Theoretical and Practical Treatise on Navigation (1836), but it was as the founder of the new science of oceanography that he secured an international reputation, becoming the recipient of many foreign honors and awards. His Physical Geography of the Sea (1855), one of the most famous scientific textbooks of the nineteenth century, went through many editions and was translated into a number of languages. His great knowledge of the sea also helped in planning the laying of the first transatlantic cable.

At the start of the Civil War, as a commander in the Confederate States Navy, Maury was given responsibility for Virginia's harbor and river defenses. He had divided his time between superintending the construction of small wooden gunboats and experimenting with electric torpedoes (floating mines) before being ordered to England in September 1862 on special service, partly as a spokesman for the Confederate cause.[22] It was also, recalled James Bulloch, "to investigate the subject of submarine defences, and he gave much time to researches into electricity, the manufacture and use of gun-cotton, torpedoes, magnetic explosives and insulated wire. In addition, he had general authority to buy and despatch a vessel to cruise against the commerce of the United States whenever he thought the attempt practicable."[23]

It was October 9 before Commander Maury finally left for England, accompanied by his son, 13-year-old Matthew, Jr., and Midshipman James Morris Morgan, who had been at the U.S. Naval Academy at Annapolis when the war broke out. From Charleston, they traveled via Bermuda and Halifax, Nova Scotia, and finally reached Liverpool in the steamer Arabia on November 23, 1862. After several days, during which he met Commander Bulloch, who was to pay his salary and expenses, Commander Maury, his son and Midshipman Morgan proceeded to London.

"When we reached London I found that a house in Sackville Street had already been engaged for the commodore, who kindly invited me to be his guest," recalled Midshipman Morgan.[24] The rooms in Sackville Street cost about £10 a week and Matthew, Jr., in a letter to his mother and sisters, later described their maid, somewhat unkindly: "Pa calls her the donkey engine because she is so small and darts about so quick and like a little engine."[25]

Maury had been to London several times before — most recently in 1860 — and he conferred with Commissioner Mason about Confederate recognition and purchasing activities. In addition, there were visits from friends like Lord Wrottesley, a former president of the Royal Astronomical Society, Rear Admiral Robert Fitzroy, the inventor of the Fitzroy barometer, Sir Henry Holland, the eminent physician, and Captain Marin H. Jansen, of the Royal Netherlands Navy. Maury, it seemed, was more appreciated in Europe than he was in America: "All day long there would be in front of the house a string of carriages with coronets on their doors, while their owners were paying their respects to the celebrated Lieutenant Maury."[26]

At the beginning of February 1863 Lieutenant William Lowndes Maury, a distant cousin of Commander Maury, arrived in London with $1.5 million in cotton certificates, and authorization to buy and equip a commerce raider. The Japan, an iron-propeller steamer being built in Scotland, had already been selected on Commander Maury's behalf by Captain Jansen; in March 1863 she was purchased for him by Thomas Bold, another cousin, in conjunction with the banking firm of J. Henry Schroder. The outfitting of the ship was supervised at great personal risk by Captain Jansen, who was a serving Dutch naval officer, and in April 1863, off the coast of France, the vessel was commissioned as the CSS Georgia.

After brief spells of duty in Liverpool and Paris, Midshipman Morgan was ordered to return to London and await instructions at the Westminster Palace Hotel. "On the 4th of April, 1863," he recalled, "I received an order to go to a house in Little St James's Street and inquire for a 'Mr. Grigson,' who would give me further instructions. When I found the house the door was opened by a pleasant-faced, middle-aged woman who seemed much amused when I asked for 'Mr. Grigson.' She replied, laughing, 'You will find them in there,' pointing to a door. From her language I inferred that the mysterious Mr. Grigson was not so singular a man after all; evidently there must be more than one of him."[27]

Premises in New Bond Street where Maury lodged in 1863. (Author's photograph)

Among the assembled naval officers, Morgan found Lieutenants Robert T. Chapman and William E. Evans, who had both served on the CSS Sumter. They had arrived in London the previous August, lodging in Bury Street, but following the murder of an acting midshipman in the Sumter in October 1862, Chapman had been ordered back to Gibraltar to take temporary command of the ship.

Morgan was instructed to go back to his hotel, get his belongings and return to Little St. James's Street. Then, in company with his fellow officers, he took the train "for a little seaport about an hour's ride from London" (Newhaven, Sussex), to meet his future captain, Lieutenant William L. Maury, and join the steamer Alar, which would rendezvous with the Georgia.[28] Although she remained at sea for seven months and captured or destroyed a number of American merchant ships, lack of sail power and the consequent need for frequent recoaling rendered the Georgia unsuitable as a cruiser and in May 1864 she was taken to Liverpool, decommissioned and sold.

Meanwhile, the search for ships went on. In May 1863 Commander Maury went to France to negotiate for a twin-turreted ironclad, but it was decided not to proceed with this, and in July he ordered Lieutenant William F. Carter "to visit the ship yards on the Thames, examine the vessels there for sale, and report such as may be suitable for our purposes."[29]

Maury's first ship, the CSS Georgia, which proved unsatisfactory as a commerce raider. (Illustrated London News)

In November 1863, as a replacement for the Georgia, Maury arranged to buy an ex–Royal Navy wooden gunboat called HMS Victor. The purchase, also with cotton certificates, was made by the firm of Gordon Coleman & Company, acting as agents for Thomas Bold, but the vessel was to prove even less successful than the Georgia. After an initial refit at Sheerness Dockyard, where she was known as the Scylla, she quietly departed on November 24, towed by a tug, and headed for Calais for further necessary repairs. At sea she was commissioned as the CSS Rappahannock, under the command of Lieutenant William P.A. Campbell and later of Lieutenant Charles M. Fauntleroy. After she had arrived at Calais, the French authorities refused to let her leave, and she was obliged to remain there as a depot ship; to her officers she became known as the "Confederate White Elephant." Her crew was discharged and her officers detached at the end of March 1865 and she was sold four months later.

One of the officers assigned to the Rappahannock was Assistant Paymaster Douglas French Forrest. The son of Captain French Forrest, Head of the Bureau of Orders and Detail in the Navy Department, he was born in Baltimore in 1837 and had spent a year in the Confederate Army before transferring to the Navy and receiving his commission. In May 1863 he was sent abroad, and arrived in London at the end of July in company with several other naval officers. He spent the first two nights at the Berners Hotel in Berners Street, "a very quiet house, staid & respectable ... Very nice room, regularly English — no gilt, all solid, substantial, pure bed linens ... & the never failing bed-curtains."[30] In his first couple of days in

The CSS Rappahannock, Maury's second ship, which got no further than Calais. (Illustrated London News)

London, Forrest made several calls, including one on Commissioner Mason, who "rec[eive]d us kindly & gave us every aid & offer of aid." He also found time to visit Madame Tussaud's Waxworks on Baker Street, and the Princess's Theater on Oxford Street for a performance of Romeo and Juliet, which failed to impress—"indifferent theatre, very moderate acting"—though he was amused by the women who came around selling soda water, lemonade, bottled ale and stout during the intermissions.

Following a brief visit to Liverpool, Forrest spent a further ten days in London in the early part of August. After three nights, again probably at the Berners Hotel, he and his companions moved to lodgings in New Bond Street, premises occupied at street level by a tailor. "I've a small room in the upper story but it's neat & pleasant & our mess, consisting of the Senacs, Graves, Morris & myself have a nice sitting room for our company. Our first dinner was plain but substantial," he recorded.[31]

While awaiting orders, much of his time was spent in sightseeing: the Zoological Gardens, the Old Bailey, the Monument, Westminster Abbey, the Burlington Arcade and several of the London parks. One of his acquaintances, Lieutenant Charles L. Hobson, who had come to London with Captain Crenshaw earlier that year, and was now involved in blockade-running, accompanied him on a visit to the Bank of England, "a rare privilege."[32] Another novelty was a ride on the underground Metropolitan Railway, which had opened at the beginning of that year. He also saw something of the nightlife of the metropolis, with visits to two music halls—the London Pavilion, on Tichborne Street, which he entered only after being persuaded that it was "perfectly respectable," and Evans' Music-and-Supper Rooms in King Street, Covent Garden, where he tried to have "Dixie" sung, to annoy a Federal naval officer who was present, and Cremorne Gardens at Chelsea. On August 12 Douglas Forrest departed for Scotland.

By late November 1863 he was in Calais awaiting the arrival of the Rappahannock. No sooner had it arrived than he was sent back to London "to see Mr. Maury & get money etc." On this occasion he stayed at the Grosvenor Hotel, by Victoria Station, "one of the finest in London." Commander Maury, he found, was out of town, but he called on Major Huse at Isaac, Campbell's offices in Jermyn Street, and Zachariah Pearson, "who is largely concerned in the fitting out of our ship," and who was lodging in Hereford Road, Bayswater. On subsequent visits to London, in February and April 1864, he stayed at the Tavistock Hotel in Covent Garden, "a miserable concern for all its reputation," and at Morley's Hotel in Trafalgar Square.

The Rappahannock, which had already been the subject of news reports when the British authorities failed to prevent her leaving Sheerness, was to become even better known to the public as the focus of two trials involving the attempted recruitment of men to serve in her.[33] The first involved John Seymour, a shipping agent and roominghouse keeper, of Wellclose Square, Whitechapel, who was known to his associates as "John the Greek." On July 14, 1864, he pleaded guilty at the Central Criminal Court, Old Bailey, to a violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act, by attempting to recruit a number of seamen and firemen "for a ship in Calais" (the Rappahannock). Probably because he was acting on instructions from the shipping broker Gordon Coleman, Seymour was discharged, on condition that he refrain from repeating the offense.

Seymour was not the only boardinghouse keeper engaged in this activity. According to his deposition made on December 2, 1863, William Wynn, of Lower Berners Street, Stepney, procured eleven seamen for "a ship to run the blockade." The seamen went to London Bridge Station to meet a man calling himself "Captain Brown," where tickets for Calais were purchased for them and about twenty-eight others. After an overnight stay at Dover, the seamen crossed to Calais, where they went onboard "a ship then called the Rappahannock," where they were told by the captain: "You are now going privateering, the same as the Alabama and the Florida. You men are going to fight for money, and I am going to fight for glory." Within three days, unhappy at the arrangements, twenty-one of the men had been allowed to leave and were sent back to London.[34] The remainder were discharged in August 1864.

The case against William Rumble, the chief inspector of machinery afloat at Sheerness Dockyard, who was an Admiralty official, was rather more serious. Not only had he been involved in the refit of the Rappahannock, both there and at Calais, he had also engaged in recruiting activities. Indeed, it was viewed so seriously by the U.S. minister that he made a representation to the British government about it.

The preliminary hearing took place at the Court of Queen's Bench, Westminster, on April 25, 1864, and resumed on December 5, 1864, and February 1, 3, and 4, 1865. During the proceedings it appeared that, although the registered owner was Gordon Coleman, the real owner was actually Zachariah Pearson of Hull, "the partner of Coleman (and a bankrupt to the amount of some £600,000 during the past summer)" as a result of his involvement in blockade-running. "Mr. Pearson who does not deny that he has sent the Confederates ships — of what kind he does not specify — complains piteously that while the Federals robbed him of the ships, the Confederates refused to pay for them."[35]

At the beginning of the trial, Charles Francis Adams made a remarkably accurate prediction of the outcome: "It is ... rather doubtful whether Mr. Rumble, though unquestionably guilty of all and more than all that is charged, will be convicted."[36] William Rumble was seen by the court as "the tool of others" and was indeed acquitted. As a result of this trial, Adams felt that the United States could expect no justice from British courts for prosecutions brought under the Foreign Enlistment Act. "Their rebel sympathies got the better of their oaths," Benjamin Moran noted disgustedly in his journal. Though acquitted, Rumble was placed on half pay, "as an officer in whom [their lordships] can no longer place any confidence."

In April 1863 a volunteer navy — a modified version of privateering — was authorized by the Confederate Congress. The man behind this idea was Bernard Janin Sage, who came from Connecticut, but had later settled in New Orleans, where he studied law and also became the owner of a sugar plantation. He now set about finding investors in Richmond to form the Virginia Volunteer Navy Company, then in 1864, now a master in the Confederate Navy assigned to special duty, traveled to England in a fruitless attempt to raise enough money to purchase a ship for the company. He was still in London in September of that year, when he wrote to Commander Maury about the misfortunes of another volunteer navy company in Tennessee.

The Virginia Volunteer Navy Company, meanwhile, had chosen its own purchasing agent in the person of Lieutenant Edward C. Stiles, C.S.N., who was commissioned a commander and given leave-of-absence to go to Europe to buy a steamer. The vessel chosen, the Hawk, "one of the finest steamers of her class to be found in England, perfectly strengthened and thoroughly fitted in every respect, for immediate advance against the enemy," had been built on the Clyde in 1863, and was owned by Thomas Begbie.[37] After changing hands, she was modified, with strengthened decking, increased storage for coal, and additional living quarters, and sailed from Glasgow to London in April 1864. The Federals were very aware of her presence in Victoria Docks, and there is a note of exasperation in the dispatch about her which Freeman Morse sent to Charles Francis Adams in June: "Owing to the extreme prudence and reticence of those who direct and execute rebel operations in this country, and the skill in evading the laws which three years' experience has taught them, I have found it quite impossible to procure such legal evidence as is here required for her detention."[38] By the time that was written, the Hawk had left for Bermuda, under the command of Lieutenant Knox.

The Hawk was bought partly on credit, and until the debt was discharged, Commander Stiles and a colleague, Assistant Paymaster Daniel Talley, agreed to remain in England. As no funds had arrived from Richmond by the autumn of 1864, Stiles turned for assistance to Commissioner Mason and Commander Bulloch, but none was available from those quarters. After several months lying idle in Bermuda, the Hawk returned to London about the end of 1864, by which time Commander Robert B. Pegram, C.S.N., former captain of the CSS Nashville, had also arrived there. On his instructions, the ship was put up for auction in January 1865 and sold. His debts settled, Commander Stiles and his fellow officers returned to the Confederacy, only to be captured when they attempted to land on the Louisiana coast. Commander Pegram abandoned any attempt to buy another steamer.

Many of the vessels offered to the Confederate Navy Department during the war were referred to Commander Bulloch for further investigation. Some of the offers came from speculators looking for a quick profit, while others were from "honest men, really desirous to do the South a service, but having no technical knowledge of ships, and no faculty for estimating the essential requirements of a Confederate cruiser."[39] The latter included two large, outdated and overpriced paddle steamers from the Indian navy, a number of redundant steamers belonging to the banking house of Overend, Gurney & Company laid up in the London docks, which would have been very costly to operate, and vessels from foreign navies, which turned out to be defective or otherwise unsuitable. There was an offer from a firm of English shipbuilders to build another Alabama, which was subsequently withdrawn, as well as another from a foreign banker to buy an ironclad frigate and deliver her at sea to anyone appointed by Bulloch to receive her; this was also withdrawn, perhaps because of the financial conditions attached.[40]

The most senior Confederate officer to visit London during the Civil War was Samuel Barron. Born in Hampton, Virginia, in 1809, he had had more than forty years' service in the U.S. Navy. After secession he had been placed in charge of the naval defenses of Virginia and North Carolina, and then been a prisoner-of-war for eleven months before being exchanged. His substantive rank was captain, but with the temporary one of commodore, and the impressive-sounding title of Flag Officer Commanding Confederate States Naval Forces in Europe, he was now being sent to take command of the ships being built for the Confederacy in Britain and France. Accompanied by Lieutenant William C. Whittle, Jr., he left Richmond at the end of August 1863 and from Wilmington traveled to Bermuda, where there was a wait of ten days before he could join the British steamer Florida. Both the weather and the food onboard were bad, and the "unpleasant passage" to England took more than three weeks. Barron finally reached Liverpool on October 12, and following a visit to Glasgow to inspect the two Confederate ships under construction on the Clyde, arrived in London four days later. After a week, during which he stayed at the Burlington Hotel in Cork Street, he left for Paris and set up his headquarters in the Rue Drouot, where he was to remain until the early part of 1865.

Flag Officer Barron's assignment to Europe, however, was to prove an empty one. The ships which he was to command were all seized or sold, and even the rams built at Bordeaux for Commander Bulloch were acquired by foreign navies. One of these, however, was repurchased from Denmark, to become, in January 1865, the CSS Stonewall. It was to be commanded by Captain Thomas Jefferson Page, a Virginian who had originally been sent to Europe to command one of the Laird rams, then to relieve Captain Semmes on the Alabama, though in the event he had done neither. A London-built blockade-runner, the City of Richmond, belonging to Captain Crenshaw, was lent to Commander Bulloch to carry the crew, who were from the Rappahannock and the Florida, to a rendezvous with the Stonewall off the French coast.[41] The City of Richmond, commanded by Lieutenant Hunter Davidson, left Greenhithe, on the Thames, on January 11, 1865, and met the Stonewall thirteen days later. The only Confederate ironclad ever to put to sea, the war had ended by the time it finally reached Cuba in early May.

On February 28, 1865, Flag Officer Barron relinquished his command as senior Confederate naval officer in Europe, and on April 3, together with Commanders North, Sinclair, Pegram and Barney (the former captain of the Florida), Lieutenant Holcombe, Assistant Paymaster Forrest and Midshipman Dyke from the Rappahannock, he left Southampton in the steamer Tasmanian, en route for Havana and the Confederacy.

Commander Maury, who had latterly concentrated chiefly on his torpedo experiments, both in London and at Bowdon, near Manchester, where his son was in school, sending torpedo supplies and equipment back to Richmond in August and October 1864, also attempted to return to the Confederacy in the closing weeks of the war. He was probably not sorry to be leaving; he had regarded his wartime duties in England as a form of banishment by enemies in high places, in particular Jefferson Davis and Stephen Mallory, to keep him from any further role in Confederate affairs at home.

Before his departure, a dinner in his honor was planned, and a circular dated March 30, 1865, was issued by the honorary secretary of the testimonial fund.[42] The dinner was to be held on April 26. Six days later, on May 2, 1865, together with his son, he left for Havana. When he arrived on May 22 he found the war was over; waiting there was the CSS Stonewall, which had surrendered to the Spanish authorities, and Commodore Barron and his party, who had arrived a month previously, officers in a navy which no longer existed. Dispatching his son to New York, Maury departed for Mexico.

The Confederacy's attempts to procure ships in Britain had only limited success, and most of that was attributable to one man, the resourceful Commander Bulloch. The commerce raiders built or purchased by him — the Florida, the Alabama and the Shenandoah — did at least put to sea to do the job for which they were intended, and the vessels he had constructed in London — the Louisa Ann Fanny and the Mary Augusta — were completed, though the Confederates never took delivery of the latter; given the political implications, the seizure of the Laird rams built at Birkenhead was a foregone conclusion. The ironclads constructed on the Clyde for Commanders North and Sinclair were sold abroad or impounded, while the two vessels acquired by Commander Maury as commerce raiders — the Georgia and the Rappahannock — proved unsuitable or downright disastrous.[43]

6

The Spying Game

A system of espionage of the most extensive and searching character has been for some time going on in England, and every move of a warlike character has been immediately reported to the Government of the United States.

—Morning Chronicle, December 1861

The activities of Confederates, in both London and elsewhere, were already under observation by the middle of 1861. Henry Shelton Sanford, the newly appointed U.S. minister to Belgium, who had been made responsible for the Federal secret service in Europe, was soon writing to Secretary of State William H. Seward, asking for more agents to be sent to "aid in routing up this nest of secessionists ... London & Paris are the keys of the position & ... I do hope you will provide sufficient secret service funds when Congress meets."[1] Every Confederate purchasing agent, he thought, should be shadowed night and day by one or more Federal agents.

In June 1861, with the assistance of Freeman H. Morse, the United States consul in London, Sanford engaged the services of Ignatius Paul Pollaky, who had a "private continental inquiry office" near the Mansion House in London. Though Pollaky seemed to be "just the man," Morse admitted that he knew nothing about Pollaky, "& there may be some risk in dealing with him. But it is a 'risky business' anyway & I think we had better engage him at once."[2]

According to his own newspaper advertisements, Pollaky had been employed for some years by Charles Frederick Field, usually known as "Inspector Field of the Detective Force," during which time he had been entrusted with "the most delicate and confidential inquiries in this country and abroad."[3] Field, who had joined the Metropolitan Police when it was established in 1829, was the most famous British police officer of his day, chiefly because of his appearance in Charles Dickens' magazine Household Words, and when he left the force in 1852 he set up his own private inquiry office.[4]

Once engaged, Pollaky lost no time in setting up a surveillance system, which he claimed, would "leave no room for any further improvement." Known Confederates were pointed out to his agents; the rendezvous of Confederates in London were watched, and daily reports made of their comings and goings; warehouses, where goods waiting to be shipped through the blockade might be stored, were placed under observation; postmen were bribed to supply details of postmarks on letters delivered to Confederates, with a view to identifying ports where ships might be preparing to run the blockade; and the telegraph offices were watched.

PRIVATE INQUIRY OFFICE, established 1852,

20, Devereux-court, Temple, under the direction of CHARLES FREDERICK FIELD (late chief Inspector of the Detective Police of the Metropolis). Confidential inquiries made for noblemen, gentlemen, solicitors, railway and insurance companies. Evidence collected in divorce and other cases. This office is unconnected with the police.

PRIVATE CONTINENTAL INQUIRY OFFICE.

--- Mr. POLLAKY, formerly superintendent of the foreign department in Mr. Field's office, and who has been entrusted during the last 12 years with the most delicate and confidential inquiries in this country and abroad, has OPENED the above ESTABLISHMENT with the view of protecting the interests of the British public in its social, legal, and commercial relations with foreigners. Inquiries of every description, which do not come within the province of the regular police authorities can be made through this office on any part of the continent. Offices at 14, George-street, Mansion-house, E. C.

Ignatius P. Pollaky, who was engaged in 1861 to spy on the Confederates, learned his craft with the famous "Inspector Field of the Detective Force." (Times, 23 January 1862)

In addition, one of the clerks in Isaac, Campbell's office was paid to provide details of contracts with the Confederate government.

In September the resourceful and zealous Sanford suggested an even more ambitious surveillance operation to Seward: officials of the steamship companies and clerks of the main business houses might be bribed to provide details of transactions with the Confederates, and a contact at Lloyd's marine insurance office could supply useful information about ships sailing to Confederate ports. They might then either be seized, or delayed by court action; if that proved impossible, details could at least be sent to the Federal blockading squadrons, so they might be intercepted. It was even proposed that an entire blockade-runner loaded with war materials could be purchased from its owner, thus depriving the Confederates of a quantity of arms and ammunition. It would all cost a great deal of money.

Early in October Pollaky's men traced crates of guns from warehouses in London to the Scottish port of Greenock. Large amounts of arms, ammunition and military equipment had been transported there by freighter, and were being loaded on board the steamer Fingal. "I fortunately observed the cases. There is no mistake about them as in addition to the marks ... they also have a card on each Isaac, Campbell & Co.... depend upon it, I will keep a bright look out on them," reported one of the detectives.[5] It proved impossible, however, to detain the Fingal, and she sailed from Greenock on October 9, bound for Savannah.

The following month Sanford was annoyed to discover that Charles Francis Adams and Freeman Morse had in the meantime set up their own surveillance operation and complained about this to William H. Seward.[6] Adams, who considered Sanford a meddler who was encroaching on his domain, also protested to Washington about the unsatisfactory double system that now prevailed. As a result, it was decided that Sanford's responsibilities should be restricted to mainland Europe, and by January 1862 his arrangements with Pollaky had been terminated. At the end of that month, Benjamin Moran, who appears to have had little faith in Ignatius Pollaky, referring to him dismissively as "a German Jew ... who is acting as a detective, and whom S[anford] was so silly as to employ," nonetheless met with him and was presented with his bill for work done for both Henry Sanford and also Freeman Morse.[7]

From then on, operations in London were under the day-to-day control of Freeman Morse, who had taken over as U.S. consul in London in May 1861. Freeman Harlow Morse, a former congressman from Maine, was to play an increasingly important part in Federal espionage activities in London. As the war progressed, his workload at the consulate in Gracechurch Street increased so much that he found it necesssary to ask for the appointment of a deputy consul to assist him; his chief clerk, Joshua Nunn, was recommended for the post and appointed in April 1863.

Federal surveillance work was also considerably enhanced about this time as a result of the visit of John M. Forbes and William H. Aspinwall, who had been sent to England to attempt to buy up Confederate ironclads and commerce raiders. They recommended that for espionage purposes Morse and his Liverpool counterpart, Thomas H. Dudley, should divide the country between them, Morse having overall responsibility for the South of England and the Midlands, and Dudley for the North and Scotland, and also made additional money available for surveillance work from their own funds.[8]

There was an enormous amount of correspondence with the State Department in Washington, much of it concerned with ships thought to be carrying war supplies for the Confederates. "The iron screw steamer Gladiator has been purchased by the Confederates and is now in the Thames loading with arms and ammunition, and those who control her here say she can and will run the blockade...," Morse reported to Secretary of State Seward on November 1, 1861.[9] The following day he went to have a look at the ship: "I have just returned from a short trip down the river to see the Confederate steamer Gladiator ... She will take out a large quantity of Enfield rifles, besides ammunition, clothing, &c."[10] The Gladiator sailed on November 10 with a cargo which included more than 22,000 Enfield rifles.

Towards the end of January 1862, intelligence concerning another vessel was sent to Washington:

> The steamer Economist is now loading with Enfield rifles, blankets, socks, army cloths, made-up clothing etc ... She is loading in ... the Thames, a few miles below London Bridge ... The Economist is managed here by I[saac], Campbell & Co. This house has acted as agents for the rebels in most of their transactions here ... I do not think there is a question about her cargo being destined for the South and as she is perhaps the largest steamer yet sent out by the insurgents and their friends here it must be valuable, but especially so to the rebels.[11]

The Economist left London on January 30, 1862, and within a few days of her departure Morse was informed that yet another steamer, the Southwick, was in the Thames, loading with a similar cargo. The information came from a man called Thomas H. Chase, whom Morse occasionally refers to as "my chief agent." He was also sometimes called Captain Chase, and his familiarity with nautical matters — he was adept at supplying details and sketches of ships under investigation — suggests he was probably a former merchant seaman. With an assistant he traveled down the river and through the docks every day and made frequent visits to the shipyards.

The U.S. legation, Upper Portland Place (now Portland Place), where Minister Charles Francis Adams received many reports of Confederate activity in London. (Author's photograph)

There were to be reports on many more ships. In March 1862, for instance, 200 cases of Enfield rifles were reported as "shipped on board the Minna within the last three days," while "the side-wheel steamer Pacific continues taking in cargo of a similar description to that going into the steamer Minna. I learn that 5,000 Enfield rifles are expected to be shipped on her."[12] The Minna, it was discovered, carried tea, coffee, blankets, leather, boots and shoes, swords, knapsacks, gunpowder, saltpeter and revolvers, as well as at least 8,580 rifles.

The Princess Royal, which cleared London on December 8, 1862, carried quantities of semimilitary equipment supplied by William S. Lindsay & Company, it was reported, but she was captured while trying to enter Charleston harbor the following month. The Harriet Pinckney, destined for Bermuda, was observed in May 1863 loading in the Thames with rifles, artillery and carbines; when she returned to England the following September she carried a number of passengers, among them the Confederate spy and emissary, Mrs. Rose Greenhow.

In a report on ships loading in the Thames in June 1863, Chase observed that "the clothing is coming up from more directions than usual — Manchester, Leeds, Dewsbury, York, etc and by different routes, viz, Great Northern Railway, North Western, and also by the old-fashioned canal boats direct from Manchester."[13]

Occasionally Chase reported on matters unconnected with shipping, such as the public meeting held near Fitzroy Square in November 1862 which was attended by some four hundred people, all of them seemingly respectable. At it, the conduct of the press, especially the Times, was condemned, and hopes were expressed that the U.S. government would prevail.[14]

He was one of several men whose services were paid for out of the Federal secret service account and who reported to Consul Morse. There was also J.G. Bunting, who spent a considerable amount of time in Calais observing the Rappahannock, and the man who usually signed himself "G" (C.W. Geddes), who enjoyed the confidence of Confederates in both London and Paris. "He is still considered by most or all of them who know him as one of their number and they speak as unreservedly to him about their doings as they do to each other," Morse observed in a note accompanying a report from him in July 1864.[15] "I ... get an occasional inside view," he had commented in an earlier letter, and it is evident from other remarks in the consular dispatches that more than one confidant of leading Confederates in London was passing information to the U.S. consulate, presumably in return for money. No wonder Commander North remarked to "G", during a visit to Paris in July 1864: "We have almost given up in despair ever being able to do anything in England, the Federals have so many spies and they are so active that it is impossible to do anything, no matter how secret we may act, or how few we have engaged in it."[16] For once, it was a realistic assessment of the situation.

Information came to the Federals from other sources, too, though it was not always very reliable. Occasionally it was from firms who had dealings with the Confederates, such as Bennett & Wake, ship and insurance brokers, who sent details to the U.S. consulate in late 1862, though some doubts were expressed as to the authenticity of the letter.[17] There was also the inevitable defector, or supposed defector, and as Benjamin Moran found, there was no shortage of people willing to sell information, both genuine and bogus.

One such was John Magoffin, supposedly a captain in the Confederate Army, who in July 1864 came to the U.S. consulate to take the oath of allegiance and give information about rebel sympathizers in the United States. This turned out to be of dubious value, and its bearer was later thought to have reverted to his original allegiance. Dealings with W.F. Gray, a Virginian long resident in Texas, and a Union sympathizer, proved equally unsatisfactory for the Federals. He claimed to have the confidence of many Confederate agents, and on the strength of that obtained money from the London consulate in January 1864; he was later found to have done the same thing at U.S. consulates in France, Germany and Italy.

Particularly notorious was "the infamous traitor," Clarence R. Yonge, who had been dismissed from his post of assistant paymaster on the CSS Alabama. In April 1863, having arrived in London, he gave information to the U.S. minister about his previous duties as private secretary to Commander Bulloch, as well as providing details about the two Laird rams and the Alexandra, a ship being built for Fraser, Trenholm as a present for the Confederate government. As a crown witness in the trial in June 1863, at the Court of Exchequer, Westminster, which followed the seizure of the Alexandra, Yonge was completely discredited, being referred to on one occasion as "this specimen of humanity," and the court found in favor of the defendants.

Morse received many reports about a warehouse at St. Bride's Wharf, Wapping, where goods supplied by Sinclair, Hamilton were believed to be stored. These were eventually removed by Pickford's vans and taken by barge to the Hawk, a steamer owned by Thomas Begbie, and thought to be intended as a privateer. She had come from Glasgow, where she had been under observation, and after arriving near the mouth of the Thames about April 19, 1864, had remained there for some three weeks before proceeding to Victoria Docks. However, Morse admitted, in a letter to Charles Francis Adams, "owing to the extreme prudence and reticence of those who direct and execute rebel operations in this country, and the skill in evading the laws which three years' experience has taught them, I have found it quite impossible to procure such legal evidence as is here required for her detention."[18]

Various alterations had been made to the vessel before she left the Clyde. "These alterations and her equipment and fittings," reported Morse, "were done by the direction of Captain Bulloch, of the so-called Confederate Navy. This Captain Bulloch visited her several times while in the process of completion and ... made a thorough examination of her and directed various alterations to be made ... Bulloch was undoubtedly the chief superintendent and director in the purchase and fitting out of the Hawk ... yet she stands registered in Mr Begbie's name ... until she can be placed safely in Confederate hands."[19]

As a result of Morse's intelligence, Adams registered a complaint with the British Foreign Office, and the Hawk was examined by customs officers, but nothing unusual was found. The "officers had no difficulty in going over every part of the ship, and ... in so doing, they saw nothing whatever to arouse any suspicion of the vessel; she appeared to be a very fast merchant ship ... not fitted for war purposes, her iron plates being so thin and light," Adams was told.[20] Her cargo consisted of iron, bar steel and "divers articles of merchandise." In spite of this, Morse concluded, "I am satisfied that she belongs to the so-called Confederate government, and that said government intends to use her for purposes of war, or for committing depredations against the commerce of the United States."[21] The Hawk left Victoria Docks on June 13, 1864 and, after anchoring in the Thames off Woolwich, sailed for Bermuda two days later.

As early as July 1862 Morse had reported to Washington: "Rifles in considerable quantities have been sent this week from here to Liverpool. Three hundred cases, with 20 in each case, have gone down within three days." A week later he added: "About 700 cases of Enfield rifles containing 20 in each case have gone from the London Armoury and Barnett's establishment within a week or ten days past to Liverpool to be shipped from there for the Confederates."[22] This may have been the beginning of a trend, because in September 1864 he remarked: "For the last two or three months the rebels seem nearly to have abandoned this port as a place from whence to forward supplies. Even the rifles manufactured here for them have lately been sent to Liverpool to forward from that port."[23]

The Federals took a keen interest in arrivals from the Confederacy. One Confederate who was singled out for special attention was James Bulloch, whose supposedly secret mission was known about almost before he arrived at Liverpool. He was astonished to discover that full details of his assignment had appeared in a New York newspaper which had now reached England, and he found himself under surveillance from the outset. "This man is here and his movements are observed," Consul Morse reported to Secretary of State Seward on July 19, 1861.[24] Seward was told by Henry Sanford that he had "doubled the force upon Bulloch's surveillance ... He is the most dangerous man the South have here and fully up to his business. I am disbursing at the rate of £150 a month on this one man which will give you an idea of the importance I attach to his movements."[25] Adams thought, quite correctly, that Bulloch was one of the most efficient agents the Confederacy had in Europe.

It was not just in Liverpool that Bulloch was a marked man. On one occasion, towards the end of the war, he remarked that he thought it best not to go to London, "as I am so well known there." In his memoirs he recalled: "The consular agents of the United States had already begun to practise an inquisitive system of espionage, and it was soon manifest that the movements of those who were supposed to be agents of the Confederate Government were closely and vigilantly watched."[26]

Bulloch commented on this several times in letters to the Confederate Navy Department, remarking, for instance, in November 1863:

> The extent to which the system of bribery and spying has been and continues to be practised by the agents of the United States in Europe is scarcely credible. The servants of gentlemen supposed to have Southern sympathies are tampered with, confidential clerks, and even the messengers from telegraph offices, are bribed to betray their trust, and I have lately been informed that the English and French Post Offices, hitherto considered immaculate, are now scarcely safe modes of communication...[27]

He returned to this theme the following February:

> The spies of the United States are numerous, active and unscrupulous. They invade the privacy of families, tamper with the confidential clerks of merchants, and have succeeded in converting a portion of the police of this country into secret agents of the United States, who have practised a prying watchfulness over the movements and business of individuals ... which has excited the disgust and openly expressed indignation of many prominent Englishmen...[28]

Sanford's description of Bulloch as "the most dangerous man the South have here" was not an exaggeration. His strategically placed agents included a "mole" in the Foreign Office, thought to have been a certain Victor Buckley. Adams had seen a note from Buckley to Caleb Huse, warning him of danger to his "protégé" (the Alabama) when there was a likelihood of its being impounded by the British authorities, and in his diary Adams noted: "This Victor Buckley is a clerk in the Foreign Office."[29]

Naval purchasing agent Cdr. James D. Bulloch was singled out for special attention by the Federals and eventually became reluctant to come to London because he was so well-known there. (Battles and Leaders of the Civil War)

Another Confederate agent who was "closely and vigilantly watched" was Major Edward Anderson. For some time he had no idea he was under surveillance, until one morning one of the Isaac brothers came over to his lodgings and asked him if he knew he was being watched. Through the window Mr. Isaac then pointed out a rough-looking man standing on the corner of the street; he was one of the detectives employed by Charles Francis Adams, the U.S. minister. "These men are indefatigable in their attentions," Anderson noted in his diary, "following me specially wherever I go, even into the shops in cases where I have purchases of the most trivial kind to make."[30]

Anderson went out into Jermyn Street to take a closer look at his "shadow," "a plain, countrified-looking man, roughly clad & by no means bearing about him the appearance of a detective officer."[31] He was to see him again many times during his stay in London, in many different disguises. "I never failed however to recognize my shadow. Assisting him were one or two others, employed in like manner in the pay of the American minister."[32]

Later, Anderson discovered that "a well dressed man" (one of Adams' detectives) had made an unsuccessful attempt to obtain a copy of a telegram he had recently sent from the telegraph office in St. James's Street, and that he had offered a telegraph boy a bribe to open one addressed to him. Although Anderson instructed the boy to accept the bribe and employed a plainclothes policeman to watch the telegram being handed over, his ploy failed, the Federal detective probably recognizing the plainclothes police officer.[33]

When he left his lodgings in Jermyn Street for the last time on October 2 to catch the Liverpool train, Anderson was followed to Euston station. As soon as his luggage had been put on board his hansom cab and he got in, he saw his shadow run to the corner of St. James's Street and jump into another one which he had ready waiting for him. As he passed out of Jermyn Street into St. James's Street, Anderson saw his shadow seated in his cab, which trailed him as far as the railway station, then carried on past it, suggesting that the detective had merely satisfied himself that he was leaving for Liverpool. However, inside Euston station, as Anderson was counting his change after buying his railway ticket, he happened to turn around and who should be there, standing within a foot of him, but "my friend of Jermyn St." That was to be his final encounter with this particular shadow, but another detective followed him onto the train, to watch him during his remaining days in Liverpool before he joined the Fingal at Holyhead.[34]

Even on the Continent, Confederate agents were not free from the attentions of the Federals. When Captain Huse went to Hamburg to superintend the loading of ten batteries of field artillery purchased in Vienna, onboard the Bahama, a steamer belonging to Fraser, Trenholm, he found he was being watched by "spies sent from London by the United States minister, as well as by the United States consulate in Hamburg."[35] That, coupled with the fact that the ship was not large enough to accommodate all the batteries, and that it also seemed likely that it would be seized, caused him, after taking legal advice, to decide to abort that particular mission. He was fortunate in finding a ready buyer for his artillery in the person of Captain Alexander Blakely of the Blakely Cannon Company.

It was not just leading figures like Commander Bulloch, Major Anderson and Major Huse who were under observation; minor players were also being watched, and Morse reported on two of these in March 1864:

> A Mr. Archer from Virginia is ... here. He is an engineer in the rebel navy and has come to look into the construction of ships of war ... and to purchase machinery for the Tredegar iron works at Richmond. He has gone to Sheffield to examine the machinery for rolling armor plates. A man by the name of Talley who is connected with the Tredegar works is with him.[36]

Archer and Talley were to cause Consul Morse further annoyance a year later when it was discovered that they, along with Lieutenant John McGill of the Virginia Volunteer Navy, had obtained British passports in order to return to the United States.

Federal surveillance of Confederate activities in London — whether of ships loading with war supplies, vessels being built in the shipyards, or the movements of Southern agents — was thorough and well-organized, though it had no dramatic results as it did at Liverpool, with the seizure of the Laird rams and the Alexandra. The Federals were unable to prevent the departure of the Sea King (the future CSS Shenandoah) or the Louisa Ann Fanny, but much information about cargoes intended for the South was sent to Washington and passed to the blockading squadrons. At the same time, Confederate agents involved in procurement and purchasing activities found their work increasingly hampered by the attentions of Federal spies.

7

The Cotton Loan

The loan is attracting much attention, and it is certain that it will be readily placed.
—Economist, March 21, 1863

To raise more money to pay for the arms and supplies being purchased in Europe by the Confederate government, a twenty-year foreign loan, based on cotton, was proposed in the autumn of 1862. The proposal is believed to have originated with a man called Felix Carteret, a former French civil servant with Confederate connections, who put the idea to Emile Erlanger, the German-born head of a Paris banking house, with branches in Frankfort and Amsterdam, and he in turn discussed it with John Slidell, the Confederate commissioner in Paris.

Erlanger was a confidant of Napoleon III, and Slidell thought that political as well as financial advantages might result from such a loan. He wrote about it to his colleague James Mason in London, pointing out that Erlangers' was "one of the richest ... banking houses in Europe, having extensive business relations throughout France and free access to some very important men about the Court. They will ... exert themselves in our favor and enlist ... persons who will be politically useful."[1]

Mason was not so enthusiastic; he had been considering another scheme for a loan from William S. Lindsay & Company, shipowners and insurance brokers, which appeared to offer more favorable terms.[2] In the event, however, the matter was referred to Secretary of State Judah P. Benjamin in December 1862, and after intense discussions in Richmond, London and Paris, agreement was reached, and the Seven Per Cent Cotton Loan, or Erlanger Loan, was authorized by secret act of Congress on January 29, 1863.

Bonds to the value of £3 million would be issued.[3] They would carry 7 percent interest, payable half-yearly, but the real attraction for investors was that they could also be exchanged for cotton at a fixed price of sixpence per pound, at sixty days' notice, at any time up to six months after a treaty of peace between the belligerents had been concluded. Every six months, starting on March 1, 1864, one-fortieth of the bonds would be drawn by lot and redeemed at face value, by means of a sinking fund, with the intention of extinguishing the loan in twenty years. Investors would pay for the bonds in eight installments, and Erlanger would pay the money raised to the Confederate government in the same way.

John K. Gilliat & Company had been asked to act as English agents for the loan, but had declined to do so, and J. Henry Schroder & Company, one of the leading merchant banks in London, was appointed instead. Schroder's was an Anglo-German concern, originally founded in 1818 as the London branch of a Hamburg firm of merchants; there was also a Liverpool branch, established in 1840 to provide finance for the cotton trade. Acting for Erlanger was the old established firm of Freshfields & Newman, who had been solicitors to the Bank of England since 1743, while Crowder, Maynard, Son & Lawford represented Schroder's. Negotiations were conducted chiefly by John Slidell and Treasury Department agent, Colin McRae; others involved included James Mason, Henry Hotze and the firm of Fraser, Trenholm.

James Spence, who had been the Confederacy's financial agent in Europe since October 1862, and who would later be replaced by McRae, was not involved in the negotiations. He had been unimpressed by the conditions of the loan, which he thought a very hard bargain, and that far better terms might have been procured from "an old-established banking house" — perhaps a reference to John K. Gilliat or William S. Lindsay.[4] His criticisms and suggested amendments to the terms of the loan were not appreciated by Erlanger or Slidell, who both resented his interference.

Rumors about the Confederate Cotton Loan began to circulate in London financial circles in February 1863, though the exact details were not yet known. When they were, they caused a sensation. On March 19, 1863, the bonds went on sale in London, Amsterdam, Paris, Frankfurt and Liverpool, and subscriptions were open for three days. In London and Amsterdam they were handled by Schroder's, in Paris and Frankfurt by Erlanger, and in Liverpool by Fraser, Trenholm. Working in conjunction with Schroder's in London were the bankers Jones, Loyd & Company and the brokers Laurence, Son & Pearce.

The loan proved to be heavily oversubscribed; many of the buyers and would-be buyers had London addresses. "The Confederate Loan has constituted the sole topic of conversation today in the Stock Exchange," commented the Times on the first day of trading.[5] Some others, however, were less enthusiastic. The Stock Exchange had declined to give it official recognition, and a member of the London banking house of Rothschild, writing to their agent in New York, commented: "The Confederate Loan was of so speculative a nature that it was very likely to attract all wild speculators ... It was brought out by foreigners, and we do not hear of any respectable people having anything to do with it ... We ourselves have been quite neutral and have had nothing to do with it."[6]

"It may appear somewhat startling that the Confederates should be able to borrow money in Europe, while the Federal Government has been unable to obtain a shilling from that usually liberal and enterprising quarter," observed the Economist. "But the terms of the loan are peculiar, and at first look attractive, as proposals involving a gambling element often do; and they merit full consideration." It assured its readers that the Confederate States would have enough cotton to pay all the subscribers, should they so demand, but was unwilling to offer an opinion on the chances of getting the cotton across the Atlantic while the war was still in progress, and thought the likelihood of the South being defeated "so slight that, of itself, it need not deter any man," just as it considered the possibility of it repudiating the debt and evading payment, after the establishment of its independence, most unlikely.[7]

Noting that the legality of the loan had been questioned, the Economist reminded its readers that the Corporation of the City of London had lent money to the Greek insurgents at the time of their War of Independence (1821–1827), and concluded: "If the greatest Corporation in England may subscribe in aid of rebellion, unquestionably mere individuals may be so bold as to lend to rebels."[8] Fears that the loan would have an unfavorable effect on the

7 PER CENT COTTON LOAN OF THE
Confederate States of America.
FOR 3 MILLIONS STERLING OR 75 MILLIONS FRANCS.

27.6.63

Series A

№ 777

£1000

F25000

40,000 lbs. COTTON

THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA are indebted to the Holder of this Bond in the Sum of One Thousand Pounds Sterling, with Interest at the rate of Seven per Cent. per Annum, payable on the First Day of March and the First Day of September in each Year, in Paris, London, Amsterdam, or Frankfort °/M against delivery of the corresponding Coupon, until redemption of the Principal.

THIS BOND forms part of an issue of Seventy-five Millions of Francs, equal to Three Million Pounds Sterling, with Coupons attached till first September, 1883, inclusive, and redeemable at par in the course of twenty years by means of half-yearly drawings, the first of which takes place first March, 1864, the last first September, 1883.

At each drawing, one-fortieth part of the amount unredeemed by Cotton as indicated below is to be drawn; and all Bonds then drawn will be repaid at the option of the holder, in Paris, London, Amsterdam, or Frankfort °/M.

The Holder of the Bond, however, will have the option of converting the same at its nominal amount into Cotton, at the rate of sixpence sterling per pound—say 40,000 lbs. of Cotton in exchange for a Bond of £1000—at any time not later than six months after the ratification of a Treaty of Peace between the present belligerents. Notice of the intention of converting Bonds into Cotton to be given to the representatives of the Government in Paris or London, and sixty days after such notice the Cotton will be delivered, if peace, at the ports of Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, or New Orleans; if war, at a point in the interior within 10 miles of a railroad or stream navigable to the ocean. The delivery will be made free of all charges and duties, except the existing export duty of one-eighth of a cent per pound. The quality of the Cotton to be the standard of New Orleans middling. If any Cotton is of superior or inferior quality, the difference in value shall be settled by two Brokers, one to be appointed by the Government, the other by the Bondholder: whenever these two Brokers cannot agree on the value, an Umpire is to be chosen, whose decision shall be final.

The said issue and the above conditions are authorised by an Act of Congress, approved 29th January, 1863, a certified copy of which is deposited with Messrs. Fruhinfields & Newman, in London, the Solicitors to the Contractors, and the faith of the Confederate States is pledged accordingly.

In Witness whereof, the Agent for the Loan of the Confederate States in Paris, duly authorised, has set his hand, and affixed the Seal of the Treasury Department, in Paris, the first day of June, in the year of Our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Sixty-three.

CONTRACTORS.

AGENTS TO THE CONTRACTORS IN LONDON.

AGENT FOR THE LOAN.

(Countersigned.)

COMMISSIONER.

LES ÉTATS CONFÉDÉRÉS D'AMÉRIQUE doivent au Porteur de cette Obligation la somme de Mille Livres Sterling ou Vingt-Cinq Mille Francs, portant intérêt à raison de Sept pour Cent l'an, payable le premier Mars et le premier Septembre de chaque année à Paris, Londres, Amsterdam et Francfort s/M, contre le Coupon respectif jusqu'à remboursement du Capital.

CETTE OBLIGATION fait partie d'une émission de Soixante-et-Quinze Millions de Francs, égale à Trois Millions de Livres Sterling, avec Coupons jusqu'au premier Septembre 1883 inclus, et remboursable au pair dans l'espace de vingt années moyennant des tirages semestriels, dont le premier aura lieu le premier Mars 1864, et le dernier le premier Septembre 1883.

Chaque tirage comprendra la quarantième partie du capital non-remboursé selon le mode indiqué ci-après, et chaque Obligation sortie sera remboursée au choix du Porteur à Paris, Londres, Amsterdam et Francfort s/M.

Le Porteur de l'Obligation aura le droit de réclamer le remboursement du montant nominal en Coton, au prix de sixpence sterling par livre de Coton, soit 40,000 livres par Obligation de £1000 (Frs. 25,000), et ceci, en tout temps, jusqu'aux six mois qui suivront la ratification d'un Traité de Paix entre les belligérants. La déclaration de convertir l'Obligation en Coton devra être faite aux représentants du Gouvernement à Paris ou à Londres, et soixante jours après le Coton sera délivré, en cas de paix, dans les ports de Charleston, Savannah, Mobile ou de la Nouvelle-Orléans, et, en cas de guerre, dans l'intérieur du pays, à une distance de dix milles au plus d'un chemin de fer ou d'une rivière navigable jusqu'à la mer. La livraison sera faite libre de tous frais et impôts, à l'exception du droit d'exportation actuellement en vigueur de ⅛ cent américain par livre. La qualité du Coton devra être le type de "New Orleans middling." Si tout ou partie du Coton est de qualité supérieure ou inférieure, la différence en valeur sera réglée par deux Courtiers, l'un désigné par le Gouvernement et l'autre par le Porteur de l'Obligation. Dans le cas où ces deux Courtiers ne pourraient s'accorder, un Arbitre sera choisi et sa décision sera définitive.

Ladite émission et les conditions ci-dessus indiquées sont autorisées par un Acte du Congrès approuvé le 29 Janvier 1863, dont une copie légalisée est déposée chez Messrs. Fruhinfields & Newman, à Londres, Solicitors des Contractants: en conséquence les États Confédérés sont engagés.

En Foi de quoi, l'Agent pour l'Emprunt des États Confédérés à Paris, dûment autorisé, a signé et apposé le Sceau du Trésor à Paris, le premier Juin l'an mil huit cent soixante-et-trois.

On 1st SEPTEMBER, 1863, a further Sum of £35 will be paid by Messrs. J. Henry Schröder & Co., London; or Frs. 875 by Messrs. Emile Erlanger & Co., Paris; or the equivalents at the Exchange of the day by Mr. Raphael Erlanger, Frankfort o/M, and Messrs. B. H. Schröder & Co., Amsterdam; together with the principal Sum of £1000, or Frs. 25,000, on surrender of this BOND and WARRANT.

J. HENRY SCHRODER & Co

EMILE ERLANGER & Co

A bond-holder's certificate for the Seven Per Cent Cotton Loan. (C. Narbeth, R. Hendy & C. Stocker, Collecting Paper Money and Bonds) money market, with a drain on bullion, were also thought to be unfounded: "It is probable that most of the loan will be spent here in paying outstanding debts, and in purchasing new warlike stores and arms for the Confederate States."[9]

"Last night Mason ... and Erlanger had a great carnival at Morley's Hotel, at the expense of the English dupes who have taken up the Loan," wrote Benjamin Moran caustically in his journal on March 26.[10] His comment was to prove remarkably prophetic, as events were soon to demonstrate.

By early April the price of the bonds had fallen, and to sustain the confidence of investors, as well as the credibility of the loan, it was agreed that Erlanger should buy back some of the bonds, using loan money. As a result of this rescue operation, prices recovered somewhat, but fell dramatically when news of Lee's defeat at Gettysburg and the surrender of Vicksburg reached Europe in the second half of July 1863. "If the battle of Gettysburg had been won by the Confederates," remarked the Times, "the loan ... would probably have experienced a rise nearly as great as the fall now witnessed ... Those who now suffer, therefore, are not to be reproached for want of sagacity, however much they may have exhibited a want of caution. The example furnished is simply a confirmation of the fearful uncertainties that must beset all investments that depend upon military successes or reverses ... the sudden retreat of Lee and the simultaneous fall of Vicksburg ... constituting an accumulation of disaster rarely paralleled."[11]

After this, the value of the bonds fluctuated considerably, reaching one of their lowest points in December 1863, when reports of the Confederate defeat at Chattanooga arrived.[12] Prices remained depressed until the spring of 1864, though hopes for Confederate independence were still high among English investors. The market had recovered by the summer, and was strengthened in August by rumors that peace negotiations were a probability, and further reinforced in September by news that General George B. McClellan had been chosen as the Democratic Party's presidential candidate on a peace ticket. At the beginning of that month the Times reported that nearly one-sixth of the entire loan had already been redeemed — £340,800 by cotton and £137,800 by the sinking fund.

Though prices fell back in October, they remained fairly steady until the beginning of March 1865, when optimism among bondholders received a serious blow with reports that Charleston had been evacuated. Then, on April 15, came news of the fall of Petersburg and Richmond: "The Confederate Loan during the earlier hours was totally unmarketable," reported the Times, though a low price was eventually established, but there were further falls in its value on successive days. The market was further affected when President Lincoln's assassination was reported in the Times on April 27. The last payment of interest and redemption of bonds was made on March 1, 1865, but they continued to be quoted on the London market at nominal prices as late as November.

Post-war attempts by subscribers to the Cotton Loan to recover some of their investments were to prove unsuccessful. Of the £3 million worth of bonds originally issued, some £581,000 had been exchanged for cotton certificates or redeemed by the sinking fund before the war ended, leaving approximately £2,419,000 in circulation. Erlanger and Schroder indicated that there was no money to pay any more interest, but the bondholders, encouraged by a decision of the vice-chancellor, Sir W. Page Wood, clung to the hope that sooner or later the U.S. government, or some of the former states of the Confederacy, would redeem the loan.[13] This was in spite of a statement by Secretary of State William H. Seward that there was no likelihood that any of the debt would be assumed or recognized by his government.[14]

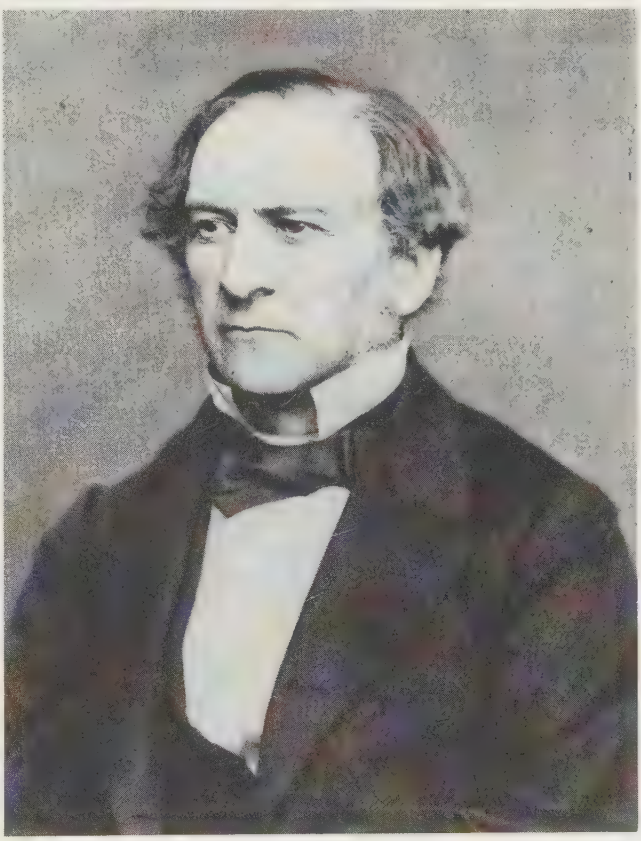
Meanwhile, the situation was further clouded by the publication, in various American and English newspapers, of a list of alleged bondholders. On September 30, 1865, the Times announced that a list of some of the English holders of the Confederate Cotton Loan had been published in the New York papers. That same day, copies of the New York Times containing the list reached London, and it was not long before it was being reprinted in the English press. The Morning Star, not noted for its Southern sympathies, published it on October 3:

The Rebel Loan
List of the English Victims

The New York papers of the 19th September have the following dispatch:

Many of the holders of the Confederate Cotton Loan in England avoided the recent meeting in London, evidently for fear of an exposure of their individual complicity in the ridiculous transaction. As the London journals therefore seem at a loss to know who the happy speculators are, they will be enlightened by the following list of some of the British subjects who have thus invested, with an estimate of the losses sustained by them respectively.

The list which followed contained some well-known names, including Isaac, Campbell & Company (£150,000), the Marquess of Bath (£50,000), John Laird, M.P. (£20,000), Alexander Collie & Partners (£20,000), Lord Wharncliffe (£5,000) and owner of the Morning Post, W.J. Rideout (£4,000). The most astonishing name was that of Chancellor of the Exchequer William E. Gladstone (£2,000), who telegraphed the Morning Star, stating that his name had been included in error and asking to have it removed. Gladstone said nothing further to the press about it, and though John Morley, his biographer, later considered it to be a malicious misrepresentation, contemporary observers like Dudley Mann and Lord Houghton both thought that he was indeed a subscriber.[15]



Chancellor of the Exchequer William E. Gladstone may also have been a subscriber to the Confederate Cotton Loan. (Author's collection)

The paper included a long, incredulous editorial and followed it with a scathing attack on John T. Delane (£10,000), the editor of the Times, and M.B. Sampson (£15,000), its city editor, whose names were also on the list. It singled out "Mr. James Spence, the Liverpool correspondent and prophet ... What a charming arrangement it was! The prophet with £50,000 opposite his name in the books of the Loan, wrote letters from Liverpool depicting the hopes of the Confederacy in the most glowing colours." Other known Confederate supporters on the list who came in for abuse were Alexander Beresford Hope (£40,000), William S. Lindsay, M.P. (£20,000), William H. Gregory, M.P. (£4,000) and Lord Campbell (£1,000).[16]

Apart from the Morning Star, the attitude of the London papers was generally skeptical. The Times was suspicious from the start and declined to publish it, calling it "The Lying List," and even journals like the Spectator, which had supported the North, dismissed it as a forgery which had been planted on the Federal government, probably by a Confederate wanting to earn a reward and provoke W.H. Seward. The list had been passed to the New York press by the State Department and this had inevitably given it official status. "Yet," commented the Daily News, another pro–Northern paper:

> No American journal assumed any responsibility for its accuracy. None of them pretended to have spent any pains in verifying it. The New York journals did not even know what it was — whether it was a list of the original subscribers to the loan or of actual holders. Some of them wrote upon the latter supposition, though how the names of the holders of a stock that was frequently changing hands could be ascertained has never been suggested.[17]

The Saturday Review admitted: "Most likely it does include the names of some capitalists who have invested, and of course lost, in the Confederate Loan; but the principal persons concerned ... have denied that they ever held a shilling of the loan."[18] People whose names appeared on the list were indeed writing to the newspapers, denying all connection with it. Between October 4, 1865 and January 17, 1866, twenty-one individuals wrote to the Times to protest; the only one to admit having invested in the loan was William Lindsay, who commented (October 7, 1865) that "the small [£20,000!] investment I held in the Confederate Loan was made long after the loan was issued, and years after my opinion in regard to the War in America had been expressed in and out of Parliament." This gave the Morning Star ammunition for another attack:

Wealthy shipowner, Member of Parliament and Confederate supporter William S. Lindsay was one of the investors in the Cotton Loan. (Cassell's Illustrated Family Paper)

> Why, some of the men who are now as indignant when accused of having subscribed to the Confederate Loan as if they had been accused of ... burglary or murder — some of these very men used to rave and rhapsodise about the glory of the Confederate cause and invincibility of the Confederate arms only one little year ago ... It would have been accepted as a graceful compliment a twelvemonth back if a man ... were alluded to as a subscriber to the Southern loan — and now hint that such a man did such a thing and he foams over in the indignation of his denial.[19]

On December 9 the New York papers printed a second list of English subscribers to the loan, "some doubt having been expressed as to the authenticity of the list previously published," showing the number of bonds held, and whether their owners had received any interest on their investments. This was a very long list of approximately three hundred names, of whom some two-thirds turned out to have London addresses, and included titled persons, Members of Parliament, naval and military men, clergymen and a number of firms; about forty were known Confederate sympathizers. It was followed by "Personal Sketches of Some of the Rebel Bondholders," containing various biographical details.[20] Though the publication of this second "Lying List" was reported in the Times, it attracted less attention than its predecessor and seemingly went unnoticed by papers like the Morning Star.[21]

By this time some information about the origins of the list had started to come to light, via the Times' New York correspondent. According to William H. Seward, it had been obtained from Confederate agents in Paris: "The Confederates are poor now, and are willing to sell all their secrets. Besides ... we are entitled to their papers." Shown the list, "foolscap sheets, fastened together by a piece of blue riband in the corner," the correspondent recognized the handwriting of John Bigelow, the U.S. minister in Paris. "Of this ... there is not the slightest doubt ... I think it right to add that, in my belief, Mr Seward was as much deceived as anyone by the imposture, and that Mr Bigelow is the person chiefly responsible for putting it in circulation."[22]

John Bigelow had been U.S. consul general in Paris during the war, involved in planning Federal surveillance and counterespionage activities, and U.S. minister in 1865–1866. In 1905 he published a book called Lest We Forget. Gladstone, Morley and the Confederate Loan of 1863, which still maintained that the "Lying List" was genuine, but presented a somewhat different version of the story. Some months after the war, Bigelow maintained, he was approached by a man called Dugald Forbes Campbell, who was a holder of Confederate bonds. Campbell, who was acting as attorney for the firm of Isaac, Campbell in the Springbok affair, offered to supply Bigelow with lists of the principal subscribers to the Confederate Loan, as well as the members of the Southern Independence Association of London. His offer was taken up, but the responsibility for giving the list of subscribers to the loan to the public, Bigelow wrote, was destined not to devolve upon him. Before he could forward the list to Washington, another copy of it had been obtained and published by the New York papers, and subsequently reached London.[23]

The commencement in 1866 of negotiations by the U.S. government for compensation for the damage done to her merchant shipping by the Alabama resulted in a counterclaim by Confederate bondholders, which the Morning Star described as "certainly the most wonderful step ever yet adopted by those unfortunate gentlemen."[24] The fact that the cotton stockpiled in connection with the loan had been forcibly seized by the Federal government seemed to reinforce their case, which was supported by the opinion of no less a person than Sir Robert Collier, the former solicitor-general, though there seem to have been no further developments.

The unfortunate bondholders were to be sadly disappointed, though their efforts to obtain compensation were to continue, on and off, for many years. As Judah Benjamin observed in a letter to a correspondent in New York as late as 1881: "If anything can ever be recovered by the bondholders, it can only be done through government action in the United States, and you can judge better than I if there is the remotest hope of any such action."[25]

Various attempts have been made to calculate how much money the Confederate government actually received from the Cotton Loan. One estimate, based on surviving records, is £1,759,894 or $8,535,486.[26] Whatever the final amount, the real losers were not the Confederate States but the speculators who invested in the loan and found that, on the defeat of the South, their bonds were just worthless bits of paper. The extent of Emile Erlanger's profits seems uncertain, though it is generally agreed that they were considerable. According to a report in the Richmond Sentinel in 1864, they amounted to 13.5 million francs (about £540,000).[27] J. Henry Schroder made a more modest, but still handsome, profit of £37,637.

Was the Confederate Cotton Loan a success? Writing to Secretary of the Treasury Christopher Memminger, less than three months after it was launched, Fraser, Trenholm were already of the opinion that it was "more successful as a political demonstration than as a source of revenue"; some forty years later John C. Schwab (1901) also thought that, while the loan itself was perhaps unsuccessful as a source of revenue, it had political significance, "a moral recognition of the Confederacy by the commercial world"; while more recently Judith F. Gentry (1970) has stated that "the Erlanger loan must be considered a success."[28]

8

Business with the Southern States

There is a numerous class of enterprising mercantile men and speculators here who are always on the watch for trading and money making. They are energetic, have great wealth at their command and are not at all particular as to the kind of trade they engage in [provided] that it bring a handsome return. They appear to think it is an Englishman's right to trade where and with whom they please, whatever may be the state of the countries with which they desire to trade.

—Freeman Morse, April 24, 1863

British businessmen were not slow to see the opportunities which the American Civil War presented. The Proclamation of Neutrality issued in May 1861, after the establishment of the Federal blockade of Southern ports, recognized both the United States and the Confederate States as belligerents. Though there was a warning against assisting either side, British firms soon found they could deal with them with impunity. It was the Confederacy which had most need of British manufactured goods and there was no shortage of people willing to supply them. Not all were entirely honest and substandard goods at inflated prices were not unknown.

At the beginning of the war, the Confederacy's prime need was for armaments. The South's manufacturing capability was limited: it was able to produce a certain amount of gunpowder, but a great deal of it had to be imported and, though some small arms were made there, most came from abroad. London was an important center of gun making, and housed such firms as John E. Barnett & Sons, the London Armory Company, Benjamin Beasley, Robert Adams, Thomas Bissell and Charles W. Lancaster, all of whom supplied weapons to the Confederates.

One of the most important of these was the London Armory Company in Bermondsey, on the south bank of the Thames. Founded in 1856 to supplement the output of the Royal Small Arms Factory at Enfield, Middlesex, the London Armory Company had imported "costly and elaborate machinery ... direct from America." They were, proclaimed their advertisements, "wholesale manufacturers of firearms and contractors to Her Majesty's War Department," and, in particular, "sole manufacturers of Adams' Patent Revolvers, which have obtained a world-wide celebrity," and which, two years later, they were producing at the rate of three hundred a week. Robert Adams, who had been a partner in the firm of Deane, Adams &

Deane, had first patented his five-chamber, self-cocking, percussion revolver in 1851, and when that firm was dissolved in 1856, Adams sold his patents to the London Armory Company and became their first manager. They also manufactured Enfield rifles, as well as Kerr rifles and revolvers, designed by James Kerr, who was foreman of the gun factory.[1] Through their contacts with Captain Huse, the London Armory Company was to become the leading supplier of small arms to the Confederacy.

Robert Adams left the London Armory Company in 1858, and taking over Deane, Adams & Deane's former premises in King William Street, he set up on his own as a gun, rifle and pistol manufacturer. One of "Adams' Revolving Pistols, made and sold by the patentee only," was presented to General Thomas J. "Stonewall" Jackson and another to General Robert E. Lee; a letter of thanks from Lee, dated October 30, 1863, was brought to London by Colonel Josiah Gorgas, head of the Ordnance Bureau, in January 1864.[2] When the London Armory Company moved to Victoria Park Mills in Hackney in 1863, Robert Adams took over their Bermondsey factory, but went bankrupt two years later.

Another London manufacturer was Charles W. Lancaster, who had a shop and factory in Mayfair. Between 1850 and 1869 he registered a number of firearms patents, including ones for an oval-bored barrel, and was also patentee of the British Lancaster short rifle. In the 1860s he claimed to be the "inventor and maker of the first central fire breech-loading gun."[3]

A number of firms whose factories were in the North of England also had offices in London. They included the rival firms of Whitworth & Company of Manchester and Armstrong & Company of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, as well as Greenwood & Batley of Leeds. Joseph Whitworth, engineer and machine tool manufacturer, had spent some years working in London before setting up on his own in Manchester in 1833 as a toolmaker. In the 1850s, he began to conduct experiments for the War Office and produced successful designs for both rifles and cannon, which he started making in 1858. By the time of the Civil War, the firm was famous for its long-range rifles equipped with telescopic sights, and in July 1861 two of these were bought by Major Anderson as samples and sent to Colonel Gorgas in Richmond for his consideration. As a result, in the autumn of 1861, Major Anderson and Captain Huse were instructed to place an order for a consignment of them. Whitworths was equally renowned for its field guns, which included both breechloaders and muzzle-loaders.

In 1847 William George Armstrong had founded a company at Newcastle to produce hydraulic machinery, but in 1855, at the time of the Crimean War, he developed a superior field gun. Armstrong's breechloading gun was accepted by the War Office in 1858, and the following year its designer was appointed superintendent of the Royal Gun Factory at Woolwich Arsenal, as well as being knighted. A separate ordnance company, set up to manufacture both breechloaders and muzzle-loaders for the British government, as well as for export, was merged with the original engineering firm in 1863. Armstrong guns were not cheap, ranging in price from £120 for a six-pounder to £650 for a 100-pounder. A number of them were imported by the Confederates.

Greenwood & Batley, "constructors of special tools for making rifles, rifled artillery and ammunition," had been established in 1856 by Thomas Greenwood and John Batley, two former partners of Peter Fairbairn, a Leeds manufacturer of heavy machine tools. Among their earliest customers were the Royal Small Arms factory at Enfield, Middlesex, and the Birmingham Small Arms Company, and they soon acquired an excellent reputation, going on to supply many arsenals in Europe and beyond. In June 1863 they were visited by James Henry Burton, superintendent of armories in the Confederacy. Before the war, Burton had spent some years at the Harpers Ferry Armory, then worked at Enfield as the chief engineer. He had been instrumental in the building of the Macon Armory, Georgia, in 1862, and was now authorized by Colonel Gorgas to return to England to buy much-needed machinery for it. On his arrival there, he conferred with James Mason and Major Huse, who was in Paris, before visiting Greenwood & Batley, with whom he placed an order for machinery for the manufacture of a rifle-musket.[4] There were problems with the funding of this order, but Fraser, Trenholm came to the rescue, and Burton was able to return to the Confederacy at the beginning of September.

The Trent incident resulted in a ban on the export of armaments, and within days the Times was bemoaning the "injurious effect" on ordnance manufacturers. Captain Alexander T. Blakely, formerly of the Royal Artillery, and manufacturer at his Southwark works of the highly regarded, muzzle-loading Blakely gun, "for which he had orders from different foreign governments," was particularly singled out, "in view of the many guns of large calibre ... nearly ready for delivery ... besides numerous smaller guns ... just the thing for a merchant ship to be armed with."[5] Before 1864, when Captain Blakely was able to expand his operation, his guns were also made under license by other manufacturers as well as by the original patentee. Captain Huse is known to have bought at least nine of them.

The ban on exports, in fact, proved to be short-lived and, with the resolution of the crisis surrounding the Trent incident, it was lifted within seven weeks. "The revocation of the order prohibiting the exportation of arms and munitions of war ... will probably renew the activity of the Confederate emissaries in forwarding supplies to the insurgents," wrote U.S. minister Charles Francis Adams towards the end of January 1862.[6] As if to confirm this, Secretary of State William H. Seward, writing to him in June of that year, referred to a captured report by Caleb Huse which listed "purchases of arms, munitions of war, and military supplies which have been shipped by him in England," and "the real abuses of neutrality which have been committed in Great Britain in the very face of Her Majesty's government."[7] "The Blakely Cannon Co. pretend they have some cannon for Peru and Hayti, and ... want a licence for their exemption from seizure by our cruisers," noted Benjamin Moran in his journal in November 1862. "This is a trick ... these guns are for the rebels. They have furnished them more ordnance than any other concern in England...."[8] Two giant, muzzle-loading Blakely guns, each weighing twenty-seven tons and costing more than £11,000, were imported by the state of South Carolina in 1863 for the defense of Charleston, but were not very successful, one of them bursting when fired for the first time.

Fort Fisher, at the mouth of the Cape Fear River in North Carolina, was defended by Blakely guns, as well as a 150-pounder Armstrong and a battery of six Whitworths presented by British merchants. They were not the only things found when the fort was finally captured by Federal forces in January 1865. There were also some Abel fuses, named after their inventor, Professor Frederick Abel, who was director of ordnance at Woolwich Arsenal in London and the chief official authority on explosives. Abel fuses were used for exploding charges of gunpowder and their discovery caused a furor: they had, alleged U.S. consul Freeman Morse, been "bought through English agents directly from the government arsenal at Woolwich" for rebel agents.[9] Their appearance at Fort Fisher seemed to be a particularly blatant breach of neutrality, and the matter was deemed so important it was referred to General Ulysses S. Grant himself, and by him to the secretary of state, who wrote the U.S. minister in London, asking him to take it up with the British foreign secretary.

In his report Professor Abel firmly denied that any of the fuses had come from Woolwich

Arsenal. He went on to explain that William Ladd, a man who was to play an important part in the practical application of electricity in the 1860s, had been authorized to manufacture and sell the fuses, but that none had knowingly been sold to the Confederates. However, he admitted, "I need hardly point out that it would be impossible for Mr Ladd to guard against supplying Confederate agents at second or third hand with my fuses, as is proved by the discovery in Fort Fisher of some of these, which, from their nature, must have been manufactured about two years and a half ago."[10]

Later it transpired that behind the whole affair was a man called Taliaffero P. Shaffner, an American inventor known to both Freeman Morse and Benjamin Moran. The latter, who referred to him disparagingly as a "scamp" and a "trickster," noted in his diary in May 1865 that Shaffner had accused Professor Abel of selling his fuses to the rebels as an act of revenge, after he had failed to obtain the formula for the fuses to sell to the Federal government.[11]

The firm of Thomas & Charles Hood of Blackfriars, "contractors for iron ordnance and munitions of war," sold cannon to the Confederate Navy. In July and August 1863 they were corresponding with Commander North about gunsights, shells and fuses, and in June 1864 he sent them an order which included: "10 x 68-pounder guns; 1,680 x 8" naval shells; 400 shell boxes; 50 spare fuses; 18 rammers and staffs; 14 patent sponges and staffs; 12 gunners' shoulder belts and haversacks; 30 ships' hatchets; 84 rounds 8" grapeshot; 84 shrapnel shells, 8"; and 10 sliding carriages for 68-pounders."[12]

In May 1864 the prize medal-winning firm of Negretti & Zambra supplied equipment to the Signal Bureau, which had been established in 1862 as part of the Confederate War Department. Insulated wire, made by the firm of Stephen W. Silver & Company and originally intended for the electric telegraph, could be adapted for use with torpedoes (electrically discharged floating mines). Commander Maury had a particular interest in this, and a report was sent to Washington in November 1864 by Consul Morse:

> Silver, at his works at Silvertown, has already manufactured and delivered to Fraser, Trenholm & Co from 300 to 400 miles of wire insulated by india rubber, and has an order from them for more. A manufacturer has also made and delivered to them 12 electric batteries and a great many fuses to go with the same. The batteries were delivered between three and four weeks ago, and he has six more that will be ready for delivery in about two weeks. Maury has contracted directly with the same man for 20,000 fuses.[13]

In August 1862, in a paragraph headed "English Cannon in the South," the London American quoted a report in the Richmond Enquirer that twenty-two pieces of Russian artillery, captured in the Crimean War, had been presented to the Confederate government by a group of British merchants and taken over in the CSS Nashville. Their arrival at Macon, Georgia, was reported in the paper, which went on to say that thirty-eight more pieces were expected at the same place.[14]

This remarkably generous act was perhaps intended to foster business relations between Britain and the Confederacy. As a further move in that direction, the London Confederate States Commercial League was formed in September 1863. Meetings were to be held every Wednesday in St. Mildred's Court, Poultry; perhaps significantly, the honorary secretary, James Yeomans, was a member of a firm of wholesale small arms and sword manufacturers.[15] There were long advertisements for it in the Index between October and December 1863, but no further mention after that, suggesting it failed from lack of support.

There was also the proposal, about the same time, to establish the Confederate States Exchange Rooms:

> The want of some rallying point at which the friends of the Confederate cause and those interested in business with the Southern States might meet, exchange views, and discuss matters of common concern, has been long and severely felt in this metropolis. It is proposed to supply this want by opening in some central and convenient locality a set of rooms, to be called "The Confederate States Exchange Rooms" ... Arrangements will be made to ensure a regular supply of late Southern papers ... The principal American journals will be kept on hand...[16]

John Hopkins at the Index office in Bouverie Street was to be the temporary secretary, but again nothing more was heard of the project after the initial announcement in October 1863.

Confederate army and naval officers who visited London could order uniforms from firms like Goody & Jones, who advertised in the Index:

> GOODY & JONES, MILITARY AND NAVAL OUTFITTERS
> AND ACCOUTREMENT MANUFACTURERS, 40 PALL MALL
>
> Begs to inform officers of both Services, and Gentlemen, that theirs is the only Establishment at which the Confederate Grey Cloth can be obtained, having already made a great number of outfits according to the Regulations issued by the War Department of the Confederate States.[17]

Although some buttons were made in the South, particularly in Richmond, large numbers were imported from England. One of the leading London makers was Firmin & Sons, "wholesale army and navy button manufacturers," whose origins went back to 1677. Assistant Paymaster Forrest recorded a visit to their offices and showroom in the Strand in April 1864.[18] Infantry and cavalry buttons were also supplied by Isaac, Campbell & Company.

In February 1864 Turner Bros, Hyde & Company, a London firm which had taken over Isaac, Campbell's old factory at Northampton, were advertising their boots and shoes in "American shapes and styles" in the Index, while as late as January 1865 William Wilson & Sons, "export boot merchants," were announcing "boots manufactured as worn in the Confederate States of America."[19]

In the early months of the war Confederate postage stamps were being printed by the Richmond firm of Hoyer & Ludwig, but the results, though acceptable, were not outstanding. Consequently, in October 1861, Postmaster General John H. Reagan asked Major Benjamin F. Ficklin, in London on Treasury Department business, to find a source of stamps, stamp-making equipment and materials. He approached Thomas De La Rue & Company, of Bunhill Row, Finsbury, printers of playing cards, visiting cards, railway tickets and, more recently, banknotes and stamps for the British and foreign governments. The firm had been established in 1837 and though it had suffered financial setbacks in its early days, was now highly successful. Its founder had retired in 1859, and it was now being run by his two sons, Warren and William Frederick De La Rue.

An order was placed with them for a one-cent orange stamp, showing the Southern statesman, John C. Calhoun, and a five-cent blue, bearing a portrait of President Jefferson Davis; both stamps were designed by the French-born artist, Jean Ferdinand Joubert de la Ferté, and were supplied unperforated and ungummed.[20]

In February 1862 the first consignment from De La Rue, consisting of 5 million five-cent blue stamps, together with a supply of glazed postage paper and printing ink and a

The former premises in Pall Mall of Goody & Jones, military and naval outfitters, allegedly "the only Establishment at which the Confederate Grey Cloth [could] be obtained." (Author's photograph) perforating machine, was dispatched in the blockade-runner Bermuda, whose cargo also included tea, coffee, drugs, surgical instruments, saddlery, cutlery engraved "Jeff Davis, Our First President, the Right Man in the Right Place," artillery pieces, shells, small arms and saltpeter. Additional postal stationery was sent in the CSS Nashville, which left Southampton the same month. The Bermuda, which had successfully transported Major Huse's first arms shipment the previous year, was to be unlucky this time: it was captured by the USS Mercedita off the Bahamas in April 1862, while en route for Nassau, and those stamps not thrown overboard were pulped by the Federals.

In spite of this initial setback, large quantities of stamps, as well as printing plates, presses, ink and paper were subsequently supplied by De La Rue and brought through the blockade. Not everything went smoothly: in June 1863 the firm recorded that a printing press obtained in March 1862 and probably sent out in the blockade-runner Giraffe in November, had been "accepted and subsequently declined" by the Confederate Post Office Department, "so that this item of value in 1862 becomes a loss in 1863." Major Ficklin, it was noted, was "to sell it for our account."[21]

In March 1863 Major Ficklin was joined in London by another Confederate agent, Major J.A. Weston, and both men seem to have enjoyed a close, and at times unusual, business relationship with De La Rue. For Ficklin, for instance, the firm obtained twelve copies of James Spence's American Union in February 1862, and the following month purchased, through their Paris agents, 180 pairs of ladies' kid gloves (presumably a private business speculation), and their account books show that they also lent him money on occasion, in various amounts from £5 upwards. For Weston, they supplied whiskey and copies of the Index. They also purchased a canteen of cutlery for General Pierre G.T. Beauregard, though whether as a present or on request is not clear.

There was also a need for skilled engravers, lithographers and printers for the Confederate treasury note printing works at Charleston. These were recruited by Major Ficklin from Samuel Straker & Sons of Bishopsgate, a firm of printers, lithographers and stationers which had been established about 1820. The terms offered were generous: $20 a week in gold and between £40 and £60 to cover the expenses of the journey.[22]

Major Ficklin's dealings with Samuel Straker seem to have been rather less happy than those with De La Rue. Mr. Straker complained bitterly to the Confederate government about the major, who "served me very shabbily and ungentlemanlike. I had many interviews with him and gave him all necessary information; furnished him with a list of requirements, compromising myself with several workmen and put myself to many inconveniences. He admitted my price being proper and correct and led me to believe that he would give me his order, but having got out of me all he could, he then entrusted the order with another house" (De La Rue).[23] Straker's letter was being carried in the Bermuda when she was captured, and so never reached the eyes of the Confederate government.

By the beginning of 1863, even the most common, everyday necessities were in short supply in the Confederacy. They included ink, candles, matches, pins and needles, cutlery and soap, as well as basic foodstuffs such as tea, coffee, bacon, canned meat, biscuits and salt, which were all brought in through the blockade, while medicines and medical equipment were in constant demand.

Bibles, which before the war had been printed mostly in the North, were among the more unexpected imports. In August 1862 the Rev. Moses D. Hoge, who had been a volunteer chaplain to Confederate soldiers in Richmond, ran the blockade from Charleston with a letter from the Bible Society of the Confederate States, requesting help from the British and Foreign Bible Society in London. As a result, 10,000 Bibles, 50,000 New Testaments and a large quantity of miscellaneous religious books were eventually supplied, the first consignment on interest-free credit. They were forwarded via Fraser, Trenholm in Liverpool for transshipment to the Confederate States and distribution among Southern soldiers. This was particularly important in the light of the religious revivals which swept the armies of the Confederacy in 1863 and 1864.[24]

The Great Seal of the Confederacy was authorized by Congress in April 1863 and the following month Secretary of State Judah Benjamin instructed Commissioner James Mason to have it made in London. Accordingly, he asked Dublin-born John H. Foley, a leading sculptor, and Joseph S. Wyon, "Chief Engraver of Her Majesty's Seals," to design and produce it. Made of silver with an ivory handle, it shows the equestrian statue of George Washington, which stands in Richmond, encircled by a wreath of the main agricultural products of the Confederacy; the Latin motto, Deo Vindice, means "God our Defender," and the date, 22 February 1862, is that of Jefferson Davis's inauguration, as well as being Washington's birthday.

The Great Seal, together with the iron press for making impressions, and a supply of wax and other necessary materials, was carried from London to Richmond by Lieutenant Robert T. Chapman, C.S.N., in August 1864. He traveled in a blockade-runner via Halifax, Nova Scotia, and Bermuda, where the iron press had to be left because of its weight, and where it apparently still remains. After Richmond was evacuated in April 1865, the Great Seal passed through several hands, until in 1912 it was presented to the Museum of the Confederacy, where it now resides.

In April 1863 James Mason sent the secretary of state "a box containing the model of a railroad with its appropriate car," together with "all the explanatory papers connected with it, which I hope will make its structure and use sufficiently intelligible." The inventor of this new type of railroad, which used guide wheels and wooden rails, was William Prosser, who had not only registered several patents in connection with it, but in 1845 had built a full-scale trial version on Wimbledon Common, at a cost of "some six or seven thousand pounds." On the two occasions he had attempted to construct an actual working line, in England and Ireland, however, he had been bought off by rival interests. Mason met Mr. Prosser, "a very intelligent man ... thoroughly versed in mechanics," and clearly felt his invention was worth a trial. Although the railroads in the South were in a sorry state, partly because of the desperate shortage of iron, nothing further was heard of "Prosser's patent railway guide wheels" and their wooden rails.[25]

Fraser, Trenholm & Company, a branch of a wealthy Charleston importing and exporting firm, had been established in Liverpool since at least 1853. During the Civil War they acted as the Confederacy's overseas bankers or depositories, but remained Liverpool-based, apparently never finding it necessary to have a London office. Another financial institution with Confederate links was John K. Gilliat & Company of Crosby Square, an old London firm with pre-war connections in the Southern states. James Mason referred to them as "my bankers," and at one stage they advanced the Confederate government £150,000, with cotton bonds as collateral.

Several firms in London traded in Confederate and state bonds. They included M. Kramer ("Dealer in Confederate securities"); Thomas Bensusan ("The 6, 7, and 8 per cent bonds purchased or sold"); Joseph Buckley ("Goods purchased payable in Confederate bonds"); and J.

H. Ashbridge & Company, a Liverpool firm with a London office, which dealt in bonds issued by South Carolina, Alabama, Tennessee and Georgia.[26] Joseph Buckley's advertisement, in November 1864, suggests that few in England at that time realized how close to collapse the Confederacy really was.

Forged Confederate bonds also made their appearance. In June 1864 the Times reported that a large quantity of $100 bonds had been sent from New York to London and put into circulation, and that samples shown to an engraver of genuine ones were pronounced to be counterfeit.[27]

As well as dabbling in blockade-running themselves, the banking house of Overend, Gurney & Company, in Lombard Street, lent money to shipbuilder James Ash to enable him to build more blockade-runners, and sold several vessels on credit to shipowner Zachariah Pearson, who also became heavily involved in blockade-running, though in his case with disastrous consequences.[28]

There were at least two proposals for a Confederate bank in Europe. In 1863 it was reported that "Mr Soutter of Virginia ... who is engaged in blockade-running ... intends (it is said) to establish a Confederate Bank with branches in [the] States of [the] Confederacy." In June of the following year a similar scheme, with a capital of £10 million was proposed by a group of English and French bankers and sent to Christopher Memminger, the secretary of the treasury. Memminger's successor, George A. Trenholm, was sent further details in December 1864.[29] Plans to raise a further foreign loan of £15 million, based on this proposal, were overtaken by events in the early part of 1865.

As a result of the Confederate Cotton Loan, several companies were formed to bring out cotton through the blockade. These included the Albion Trading Company, the European Trading Company, the Mercantile Trading Company and the Universal Trading Company. The Albion Trading Company owned the Ivanhoe, the Lady Sterling, the Marmion and the Talisman, the first two of which were operated for them by Thomas Stirling Begbie. The European Trading Company was established in October 1863 by J. Henry Schroder, Emile Erlanger and H. O. Brewer, a Mobile businessman who had helped Henry Hotze establish the Index; their steamers included the Denbigh, which made a large number of runs between Mobile and Havana. The Mercantile Trading Company, formed by Edgar Stringer and Edward Pembroke, of the firm of William S. Lindsay & Company, owned the Atalanta, the Charlotte and the Juno. Of these, the Atalanta was the most successful; the careers of the other two were brief. The Universal Trading Company owned the Helen and the North Heath, which were also operated by Thomas Begbie.

In addition, there was the Atlantic Trading Company, "formed for the purchase of first-class paddle-wheel steamers, of light draught, great speed, and an average capacity of 800 bales of cotton, which forms the basis of the business to be transacted" (blockade-running), with a capital of £200,000 in £100 shares, with power of increasing to £500,000. The promoters were Isaac, Campbell, and T. & J. Johnston and George Wigg, both of Liverpool. Wigg, formerly of Nassau, was an experienced blockade-running agent who had been a cotton merchant in New Orleans before the war, and had worked with both the Albion Trading Company and the European Trading Company. Arrangements were put in hand with Colin McRae "to carry in merchandise, and to bring out on the return journey full cargoes of cotton." The company planned to have five steamers in operation, starting in April 1864, and a copy of its prospectus, which came into the hands of U.S. minister Charles Francis Adams, indicated the remarkable profits that might be expected — perhaps as much as £750,000 for five trips.[30]

The offices in Lombard Street of Overend, Gurney & Company, who lent money to London shipbuilders for the construction of blockade-runners and were themselves involved in the traffic. (Illustrated Times)

Though many of the blockade-runners were built in Scotland and the North of England, some were constructed in London, where shipbuilding was still an important industry. Writing in 1862, Charles Capper, who was manager of the Victoria Docks, commented:

> There are a considerable number of building yards upon the Thames, at which first-class vessels are built; and the trade of shipbuilding has been increasing of late years in consequence of iron > vessels having come more and more into use, and the skilled labour always to be obtained in London making the Thames very available for the construction of these vessels. At the present time there are more iron than wooden vessels constructed on the river...[31]

John & William Dudgeon, engineers and boilermakers, had begun making marine machinery at the Sun Ironworks at Millwall, but between 1859 and 1862 they also established a shipyard at Cubitt Town, where they eventually employed a workforce of some 1,500 men. Here, according to their own account, written just after the war, they constructed twelve twin-screw steamers as blockade-runners between 1862 and 1865. Some of their steamers made a dozen runs, though the average was five.[32] One of them, the Flora, built in 1862, caused a sensation at her trials, being described by the Illustrated London News as "the fastest screw steam-ship afloat," being capable of fourteen knots. She was highly successful and made the Dudgeons' reputation; her twin screws made her highly maneuverable and she was soon snapped up by Alexander Collie for blockade-running.

Another vessel, the Edith, launched in March 1864, was built for Alexander Collie. Sold to the Confederate Navy in September 1864, she was commissioned as the CSS Chickamauga, commanded by Lieutenant John Wilkinson. As a commerce raider, she accounted for seven U.S. merchantmen, but was burnt by her crew in the Cape Fear River in February 1865, after the fall of Wilmington.

The Atalanta, designed by Captain T.E. Symonds, R.N., for the London, Chatham & Dover Railway and launched at the same time, was purchased by Edgar Stringer and Edward Pembroke as a blockade-runner for their Mercantile Trading Company. In July 1864 she was sold to the Confederate Navy for conversion into a commerce raider and commissioned as the CSS Tallahassee. The Illustrated London News described the ship as "a most efficient instrument of maritime warfare" and in August 1864, in the space of ten days, it captured or destroyed no fewer than thirty-three U.S. merchant ships. Renamed the CSS Olustee, she destroyed another six ships in November, before being converted back into a blockade-runner called the Chameleon. She was seized on her return to Liverpool in April 1865 and subsequently turned over to the U.S. government.

The Flora, built in London by John & William Dudgeon, was snapped up by Alexander Collie for use as a blockade-runner. (Illustrated London News)

In 1862, James Ash, who had been a naval architect for the important shipbuilding firms of C.J. Mare and the Thames Ironworks, also established an extensive yard at Cubitt Town. It had the most impressive set of offices and works of any of the Thames shipyards, and here he built vessels for the P. & O. Company, as well as a sumptuous yacht for its chairman. A blockade-runner he built for Edgar Stringer was called the Nutfield, and, when she was launched in September 1863, it was alleged that "this splendid iron screw steam-vessel" was intended for use as a passenger steamer in Australia, though it is unlikely that many actually believed this.[33] In the event, her career was brief, and she was destroyed on her first attempt to run the blockade in February 1864.

The Lady Sterling was built by John Scott Russell at Blackwall in 1864; she was captured on her second attempt to run the blockade in October of that year.[34] The firm also had a shipyard at Northfleet, some twenty-five miles downriver, where vessels could be repaired away from prying eyes. The Index, built at Deptford for Alexander Collie in 1863, possibly by Charles Lungley, proved to be too slow, and was retired from blockade-running after only six trips.[35] On the other hand, the Syren, built at Greenwich in the same year, ran the blockade no fewer than thirty-three times before being captured early in 1865, a record apparently unmatched by any other vessel.

The purpose for which these vessels were being built was an open secret, and there was no lack of people eager to supply information to the Federals in return for a reward. Benjamin Moran recorded one such instance in January 1863, when "a half-frantic Irishman in shabby clothes came in in a hurried manner and for a consideration wanted to supply the particulars of a blockade breaker fitting out in the West India Docks."[36]

The CSS Tallahassee, which started life as the London-built blockade-runner Atalanta. (Illustrated London News)

To bring out government cotton under the terms of the New Plan, Colin McRae needed to acquire a number of steamers, and in April 1864 he began negotiations with the Mercantile Trading Company. These proved fruitless, and in July Fraser, Trenholm agreed to provide eight vessels, to be built on Merseyside. In addition, the banking firm of John K. Gilliat undertook to have six more steamers built for the Confederate government, also on Merseyside. They were to be delivered by December 1864, though in the event the war had ended before they were finished.

Until the Fraser, Trenholm and John K. Gilliat vessels were ready, McRae arranged for Alexander Collie to supply four steamers. The ones chosen, the Condor, Falcon, Flamingo and Ptarmigan, were large and powerful sidewheelers, recently built on the River Clyde and thought to be the best blockade-runners afloat.

Alexander Collie & Company were one of the largest owners of blockade-runners. Originally based in Manchester, the firm soon found Liverpool to be a more convenient location once blockade-running started; they also had a London office in Austin Friars and later in Leadenhall Street. At one time or another they owned, or had an interest in, more than twenty vessels, some of which were operated for them by other firms. Huge profits could be made out of blockade-running, and in 1864 Alexander Collie himself bought a house in Kensington Palace Gardens, then as now a private road lined with opulent mansions, and once known as "Millionaires' Row." Collie paid £25,000 for it, which was a bargain as it had originally cost between £45,000 and £50,000 when it was built twenty years before. In addition, its new owner spent several thousand pounds on alterations which were carried out by the celebrated architect Matthew Digby Wyatt, including a new breakfast room and a billiard room decorated in the "Moorish" taste.[37]

Like Alexander Collie, Isaac, Campbell & Company were also major operators of blockade-runners. In the summer of 1862 one of their representatives arrived at Nassau with the stated intention of taking over the blockade-running business there, boasting that they had been responsible for all the Confederates' successes to date. One of Isaac, Campbell's steamers was the Melita. She sailed for Nassau in May 1862, with a cargo which included rifles, gunpowder, knapsacks, cavalry swords, shoes, bayonet scabbards and saddles, destined for transshipment to the Confederacy; also on board were Commander Raphael Semmes and Lieutenant John Kell, formerly of the CSS Sumter.

The firm also owned the cargo in the Springbok, a small sailing ship belonging to a man called Thomas May, which was under charter to Thomas Begbie. This included army blankets and clothing, army and navy footwear, buttons, samples of cavalry swords and rifle bayonets, and saltpeter. The ship left London for Nassau in December 1862, but the following February was captured some 150 to 200 miles east of there. Whether her cargo was intended for sale at Nassau or for transshipment to a Confederate port was a matter of opinion. The ship was impounded for the duration, but after the war the seizure of the vessel, but not the cargo, was ruled illegal, and she was returned to her owner.[38]

In addition to this misfortune, Thomas Begbie lost five of his own vessels when they were captured in 1862 and 1863. However, his steamer, the Harriet Pinckney, named after the wife of Caleb Huse, did make a successful run from London to Bermuda in 1862 with a cargo which included rifles, cannon and torpedoes; it was sold the following year to Samuel Isaac, of Isaac, Campbell.

Zachariah C. Pearson & Company of Hull and London, whose owner was a highly successful merchant, shipowner and prominent local citizen — he had twice been mayor of Hull — also found blockade-running could be a far from profitable undertaking. Between May and August 1862, no fewer than six of Pearson's steamers — three of which had been bought on credit — were captured by the Federals, and a seventh, the Modern Greece, ran aground off the North Carolina coast and was destroyed. He had already lost two vessels in the Baltic the previous year, and another ship, the Indian Empire, was destroyed by fire in the Thames when being moved from one dock to another. In August 1862 he stopped payment, and the following month was declared bankrupt, with debts and liabilities of more than £600,000.

Bankruptcy proceedings, which began in July 1863 and continued until April 1864, were reported in the Times, and included a list of people and firms with whom Pearson was involved.[39] One of them was the Hull shipbuilder Martin Samuelson, who was owed some £25,000. In February 1864, Samuelson, who is known to have built at least one blockade-runner, and was described during the hearings as having "a 'little interest' in the consignments," nevertheless wrote an indignant letter to the Times, denying his involvement in blockade-running or any other Confederate speculation.[40] Among Pearson's assets was the steamer Merrimac, which had been purchased by the Ordnance Bureau, but for which he had never received payment from the Confederate government, and which was subsequently sold by the mortgagees, Overend, Gurney.

Pile, Spence & Company of West Hartlepool were part owners, as well as builders, of the steamer Lloyd (later the Sea Queen), which left London in April 1862 with a cargo later said to have been worth £1 million, and was successfully run into Charleston. They also purchased the Peterhoff from Zachariah Pearson. In February 1863 this steamer became the focus of a diplomatic row when it was captured off St. Thomas in the West Indies, on suspicion of being a blockade-runner, while en route for Matamoras, in Mexico. Whether she was or not, she was also carrying mail, and her seizure caused a considerable furor; the situation was defused when the mail bags were returned, unopened, to the British consul in New York.

Given the money to be made out of trade with the Confederacy, it was almost inevitable that there should be rivalry and animosity between some of the firms involved. Alexander Collie complained that the Isaac brothers treated his clerks with disdain; at the same time, there was no love lost between him and Edgar Stringer. "As for Mr Stringer," he remarked to Lord Wharncliffe, writing to him after the war, "I heeded him as little as the buzz of a mosquito. He meant mischief, but had neither power nor influence to effect it."[41]

Firms who dealt with the Confederacy did so in the belief that, in the unlikely event of the South being defeated, the Federal government would take over any outstanding debts; they were to be sadly disappointed. The Fourteenth Amendment to the American Constitution, passed in June 1866, repudiated any debts or liabilities "contracted for the purpose of supporting the insurrection or rebellion against the United States."

Commission merchants like Isaac, Campbell, who had latterly been willing to accept payment in Confederate bonds, were largely ruined as a result, while shipbuilders like James Ash, who had borrowed heavily from the banking house of Overend, Gurney in order to expand, was forced to close down when the latter failed in 1866. Even the canny Alexander Collie, who had been a major operator of blockade-runners, had to sell his remaining steamers at a heavy loss.

Once the Confederacy was defeated, firms which had once been only too happy to supply it with whatever it required, and had made handsome profits in the process, hastened to deny all connections with it. Merchants like Charles W. & Wentworth Gray wanted readers of the Times to know that they "were never interested to the extent of one shilling either as owners of blockade-runners or as shippers of goods for the South."[42]

Though London was not the main port for blockade-running, which has been called "the lifeline of the Confederacy," the leading firms engaged in it had offices there, and many of the weapons and supplies the Confederates so desperately needed were either made or obtained there. And as a leading financial center, it provided the infrastructure for the launch of the Cotton Loan, which was vital for the continuation of purchasing operations in Britain.

9

Artistic Reflections, Literary Echoes

The name of America five years ago called up to the ordinary English mind nothing but a vague cluster of associations, compounded of Mrs Trollope, "Martin Chuzzlewit" and "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

—Leslie Stephen, The Times on the American War (1865)

Leslie Stephen's statement is somewhat exaggerated. The writings of popular authors like Frances Trollope (Domestic Manners of the Americans) and Charles Dickens (American Notes and Martin Chuzzlewit) had already helped make the British public more aware of America, but the Civil War focused additional attention on it, and, sheet music, magazine articles, books and particularly in London, plays, panoramas, exhibitions of paintings and photographs all reflect this.

In addition, plays like Tom Taylor's Our American Cousin and the many dramatized versions of Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin were already familiar to British audiences, and events across the Atlantic undoubtedly increased the appeal of ones with an American theme. It was not unusual for new plays to refer to current events, and several were written and produced in the early 1860s as a result of the Civil War. They were usually part of a double or triple bill, and one or two of them ran for four or five weeks, a fairly long time by the standards of the day.

One of the earliest examples was a one-act farce called A Southerner Just Arrived, by the actor-dramatist Horace Wigan, which was performed at the Olympic Theatre, Wych Street, from November 3 through December 6, 1862. Though the war is there in the background—"Great news, most encouraging intelligence ... the Federal General something or other ... I can't read his name ... has gloriously defeated the Confederate General ... something else ... I can't read his name either"—it is peripheral to the absurd plot, which concerns a planter from South Carolina (Jabez Julep, the "Southerner" of the title, played by Horace Wigan) who arrives at the home of a gullible Manchester abolitionist in pursuit of a runaway slave. An example of situation comedy, involving mistaken identities, it included a specially written song, beginning:

I was born in Carolina, that's a long way off you know,
And there I suffered all you've read in Mrs Beecher Stowe.

The Alabama: A Nautical Extravaganza, apparently a reworking of an earlier piece called Her Majesty's Sloop Spitfire, was produced at the Theater Royal, Drury Lane (March 7–19, 1864); then, coupled with Shakespeare's Henry IV, part I, it returned for a further five-day run (March 28–April 1). It was written by John Maddison Morton, a prolific playwright who was famous as the author of Box and Cox (once described as "the most popular play ever written"), and used the ship as a backdrop for a one-act romantic comedy. Its three scenes are set in the Confederate Arms, Havana, in a cabin, and on the quarterdeck of the CSS Alabama. Scene three concludes with a "spectacle"—an engagement with the "Fighting Philadelphia, a Federal war steamer"—a curious premonition of the Alabama's own encounter with the Kearsarge later that year. A well-known burlesque actress called Lydia Thompson played the female lead of Phoebe, "in which character," it was announced, "she will dance her celebrated sailor's hornpipe." While the audience was watching Mr. Morton's extravaganza, the real Alabama was still at sea; less than three months later, she would be lying on the seabed off Cherbourg.

Colin Henry Hazlewood's two-act drama, The Confederate's Daughter; or, the Tyrant of New Orleans, was the only one of these three plays to portray actual historical figures and events. Set in and around New Orleans in 1862, at the time of Major General Benjamin Butler's military governorship, it concerns the adventures of Frances Herbert, "the Confederate's daughter" (whose father has been executed by General Butler), Lieutenant Travers, C.S.A., her sweetheart, and Pompey, "a faithful black." It ends with Butler being relieved of his command at the end of that year, while the heroine's closing speech, on being told of plans to go to England—"And when you do, bear this in mind, that the flag of liberty which was first raised there still waves triumphant in Albion's Isle, ever ready to shelter within its folds an African's son or a Confederate's daughter"—no doubt brought rousing cheers from the audience at the Britannia Theater, Hoxton, where it ran from August 7 through September 9, 1865. Confederate journalist John R. Thompson went to see it during its third week and noted in his diary: "The villain, as General Butler, was almost as great a scoundrel as the original."[1]

Other plays which reflected increased public interest in life and events across the Atlantic included Down South; or, Life in the Cotton Fields, a farce by an unknown author, "in which the Alabama Minstrels will appear," which had a successful run at the Royal Victoria Theater, Waterloo Road (the Old Vic), from June 19 through July 15, 1865; and Cora; or, The Slaves of the South, a three-act drama by George Augustus Conquest, which was first performed at the Grecian Theater, City Road, on June 26, 1865.

On March 11, 1863, a new entertainment called Federals and Confederates opened at the Polygraphic Hall, King William Street, Strand, and ran until May 6. Presented every evening (except Saturdays) at 8:0, and Wednesdays and Saturdays at 3:0, it played to "crowded houses" and was described as a "highly instructive narrative of the present state of affairs in America, with pictorial and musical illustrations." It was advertised in both the London American and the Index. Its author was Henri Drayton, an American opera singer and minor dramatist, who before the war had sung in England and on the Continent. Some of the songs were by Henry Russell, one of the best-known singers and songwriters of his time, and included "Sunny Days Will Come Again," with lyrics by Edwin Ransford, though many were composed and written by Drayton himself, who also provided sketches to illustrate the show.[2]

Although the Times was impressed with the production, describing it as "exceedingly well put together," Federals and Confederates did not present an impartial view of the war, and the reviewer left his readers in no doubt about where its sympathies lay:

HENRI DRAYTON. ----- Polygraphic-hall, King William-street, Strand. --- HENRI DRAYTON has the honour to announce his PICTORIAL and MUSICAL ENTERTAINMENT entitled "Federals and Confederates," at the above Hall, THIS and EVERY EVENING (Saturday excepted), at 8: and Wednesday and Saturday, at 3. Tickets of Cramer and Co.'s, Regent-street; Chappell's, New Bond-street; and at the Hall. Admission 1s., 2s., and 3s.

> Mr Henri Drayton ... gives an "entertainment," in the strict sense of the word, ... narrating by means of song, anecdote, piano and picture, his recent experiences in America. Of his predilections he makes no secret, and the serious object of Federals and Confederates ... is to prove that the Confederates are all right and the Federals are all wrong ... "Dixie's Land" with the proper Secession words, honoured with an encore ... seems to indicate that the audience are not only pleased with the tune itself and the execution of the vocalist, but also with the sentiment embodied...[3]

Was Mr. Drayton merely giving the audience what he thought it wanted, or was his show, as the Times seems to suggest, actually a form of Confederate propaganda, presented as entertainment? There is no evidence to connect it with propagandists like Henry Hotze, but its possibilities would certainly not have escaped him.

Madame Tussaud's waxworks, located on Baker Street since 1835, was one of the sights of London. It had had "a full-length portrait model of Mr Lincoln" since November 1861, and in January 1862 the proprietors announced that they had recently added "the effigies of ... the notorious 'ambassadors,' Mason and Slidell." These were joined in August 1863 by "a model of [Major] General McClellan, in military uniform, late Commander-in-Chief of the Federal Army."[4] Assistant Paymaster Douglas Forrest records an amusing incident concerning a colleague, Lieutenant Charles King, Jr., who visited Madame Tussaud's in naval uniform. While intently examining a wax figure in the Chamber of Horrors, he was mistaken for one of them by a lady visitor, who looked in vain for his number; "King was a very hard-looking figure in his Confederate rig," he adds.[5] In June 1865 Tussaud's introduced "a full-length portrait model of John Wilkes Booth, the Assassin, taken from a likeness presented by himself to Mrs. Stratton, the wife of General Tom Thumb," and added "the late Presidents Lincoln and Davis" the following month. The figure of Lincoln was presumably an updated version from that of 1861.[6]

Panoramas had been a popular form of entertainment for many years, but by the early 1860s they had lost much of their appeal for London audiences, partly as a result of the growth of illustrated weekly magazines, with their topical engravings. Nevertheless, in March 1863, readers of the Illustrated London News were told that "M. Gompertz's New Panorama of the War in America, printed principally from his own sketches, will shortly be submitted to the public."[7]

Later that year another Civil War panorama was presented at the St. James's Hall, Piccadilly. "Civil War in America — Church's Historical Panorama" opened on November 9, and with "descriptive lecture and music" could be seen every evening at 8:0 and on Saturdays at 3:0. "This magnificent work of art," claimed its presenters, "portrays with life-like fidelity (from original sketches and photographs taken on the spot) the principal battles, sieges and naval engagements, illustrating historically and impartially the Civil War."[8]

CIVIL WAR in AMERICA. --- CHURCH's

HISTORICAL PANORAMA now OPEN every evening, at 8 o'clock, and Saturday morning at 3 o'clock, at St. James's-hall, with Descriptive Lecture and Music. This magnificent work of art pourtrays with life-like fidelity (from original sketches and photographs taken on the spot) the principal Battles, Sieges, and Naval Engagements, illustrating historically and impartially the civil war. Stalls, 3s. ; area, 2s. ; gallery, 1s. Tickets at Austin's ticket-office.

"Federals and Confederates," at the Polygraphic Hall, King William Street, Strand, and "Civil War in America — Church's Historical Panorama," at the St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, could both be seen in London in 1863. (Times, 11 March 1863 and 17 November 1863)

A detailed advertisement in the Times on the day it opened indicates a remarkably ambitious presentation, with thirty-seven scenes in three sections, which included the bombardment of Fort Sumter, the engagement between the Monitor and the Merrimack and the battle of Fredericksburg.[9] "In the battle-pieces, which are necessarily numerous," reported the Times, "a great deal of character and much skill in composition is displayed ... Far inferior to the battle-pieces are the landscapes, and again inferior to these are certain humorous pictures of life ... However ... as a work of art the 'Historical Panorama' ... will bear an interest of its own as a pictorial illustration of the sanguinary contest about which everybody talks and reads."[10] To sustain public interest, additional pictures, "with a new and highly interesting lecture," were announced in December. It appears to have closed in the middle of January 1864.

Photographers soon found that there was a ready market for Civil War portraits. In January 1862, McLean, Melhuish and Haes, in the Haymarket, were advertising "CIVIL WAR IN AMERICA — CARD PORTRAITS of all the CELEBRITIES, including President Lincoln, President Davis, Captain Wilkes [of the USS San Jacinto], Messrs. Mason, Slidell, &c."[11] The demand for these continued throughout the war, with Alfred W. Bennett of Bishopsgate offering "Cartes de Visite of American Celebrities, Federal and Confederate Statesmen and Generals" at one shilling each in August 1864.[12]

Some photographers seem to have specialized in Confederate celebrities, as the following announcement in December 1863 indicates:

> A series of very fine PHOTOGRAPHIC PORTRAITS, principally taken in camp within the last nine months, including Jefferson Davis, Generals Stonewall Jackson (photographed ten days previous to his death), R.E. Lee, Beauregard, Longstreet, Johnston, Bragg, A.P. Hill, Stuart, Ewell, Buckner, Price, Hood, Morgan, Kirby Smith, Fitzhugh Lee, etc are now published ... by MR WALKER, Photographer, 3 Pembridge Villas, Bayswater, of whom they may be obtained ... and from MESSRS MARION & SON, 23 Soho Square.[13]

A year later, photographer Henry Francis, in Great Russell Street, "opposite the British Museum," had for sale "A BEAUTIFUL PORTRAIT OF JEFF DAVIS, our FIRST PRESIDENT ... Also the twenty-three OFFICERS of the Confederate ship ALABAMA..."[14]

"Our First President" was also the subject of a large folio lithograph by Thomas Koppel, published in 1865 by Victor De La Rue, of Chandos Street, Covent Garden, presumably just before the final collapse of the Confederacy. Though described as being "From the Latest Photograph now in Possession of the Family," it was actually based on a pre-war portrait, and was probably intended for European rather than Confederate consumption, given the state of affairs in the South by then. Lithographs of Generals "Stonewall" Jackson and Joseph E. Johnston were issued by G. W. Bacon & Company, of Paternoster Row (who were also map publishers) and Day & Son, of Lincoln's Inn Fields, "lithographers to the Queen"; both were drawn from very out-of-date photographs. The war was already over when "A handsome steel engraving" of General Robert E. Lee, "from a portrait ... taken at Richmond, C.S.A., in October last," was announced as being "now ready" by Saunders, Otley of Brook Street, Mayfair in May 1865.[15]

Anyone wanting more than just a photograph or print could visit Thomas Revell's Fine Art Gallery in Leadenhall Street, where "STONEWALL JACKSON and other celebrated Confederate Generals. Authentic PORTRAITS, painted from life by B. F. Reinhardt [sic], Esq." were to be seen in June 1863.[16] Not just anyone could gain access: admission was by "address card" (visiting card) only. The generals represented included Robert E. Lee, Joseph E. Johnston, Pierre G. T. Beauregard, and for good measure, Jefferson Davis. Benjamin F. Reinhart was a Pennsylvania-born artist who exhibited at the Royal Academy, and as he spent the Civil War in London, his description "painted from life" should read, "painted from photographs."

Although more than seventy Confederate generals were killed in action or mortally wounded during the Civil War, none received more tributes than Thomas J. "Stonewall" Jackson, who was a victim of what we now call friendly fire. His accidental wounding by his own men at the battle of Chancellorsville in May 1863, and subsequent death a few days later from pneumonia, seemed to strike a particular chord with the British public. "Even on this side of the ocean," remarked the Times, "the gallant soldier's fate will everywhere be heard of with pity and sympathy," and it called him "one of the most consumate Generals that this century has produced." The paper went on to compare his death with that of Nelson at Trafalgar: "The national feeling of England recorded the victory of Trafalgar as dearly purchased by the death of Nelson. A similar feeling pervades the South for the loss of 'Stonewall' Jackson. The South will be exceptionally fortunate if it find another man with all the qualities and capacities General Jackson possessed."[17]

Americans living in London could not fail to notice the public mood. "Stonewall Jackson is dead of wounds. The British people are as sensibly affected by this last news as if the disaster were their own," an astonished Benjamin Moran recorded in his journal.[18] Henry Hotze expressed a similar view, in a letter to Secretary of State Judah Benjamin:

> The death of Jackson has elicited a feeling the depth and power, if not the very existence, of which had wholly escaped my observation before, a feeling altogether incommensurate to anything ever manifested on any previous event of the war. I am quite prepared to believe, what I am assured on all sides, that the death of no foreigner has ever so moved the popular heart ... The Press but inadequately expresses popular emotion which appears to be shared by all classes.[19]

On June 4, 1863, the Index announced: "It is proposed to raise a subscription in England for the erection in the Confederate States of A BRITISH MONUMENT to this gallant man." A committee of sixteen prominent Confederate sympathizers was formed to manage the "British Jackson Monumental Fund," with Alexander Beresford Hope as treasurer and William Gregory, M.P., as secretary and an account for it was opened at Coutts Bank in the Strand. Its prospectus spoke admiringly of Jackson's fame, which had won the respect of his enemies as well as the admiration of the Old World, but it was careful to point out that subscriptions to the statue would not, of course, imply any bias in the great struggle taking place across the Atlantic. The eminent, Irish-born sculptor John H. Foley, R.A., whose most famous work is the figure of the Prince Consort on the Albert Memorial in Hyde Park, and who also designed the Great Seal of the Confederacy, was commissioned to make the statue, which would be based on a recent photograph.

The staff of the Index contributed ten guineas and the donations received each week were published in its columns; by the end of August 1863, more than £600 had already been subscribed. According to the records of the "Stonewall Jackson Memorial Account" at Coutts Bank, 114 named individuals, two firms and a few anonymous donors contributed to it, mostly during the second half of 1863. The most generous donations came from James Spence, Alexander Collie and J. Henry Schroder, who each gave £50.

In July 1865, in reply to an enquiry from a subscriber, Alexander Beresford Hope was able to report in the Index that sufficient money had now been raised, and that "Mr Foley is at work, with the confident expectation of a very successful result" at his studio in Osnaburgh Street, near Regent's Park. In spite of this optimistic statement, there were to be many more delays, caused by the sculptor's desire for perfection, other commissions competing for his time, and increasing ill health, and Jackson's statue was not completed until a few months before the sculptor's own death in 1874. It was exhibited at the Royal Academy in London the following year, before being shipped to Richmond, where it was erected in the grounds of the Capitol in October 1875, "in the hundredth year of the Commonwealth" (of Virginia). The bronze statue, signed by Foley, shows Jackson standing, uniformed and hatless, holding his sword; an inscription on the plinth records that it was "presented by English gentlemen as a tribute of admiration."

In view of the continuing public interest, a photographer announced in April 1864 the publication, by private subscription, of a photograph of the fallen general:

> LIEUTENANT-GENERAL STONEWALL JACKSON
> THE ONLY AUTHENTIC AND FAITHFUL LIKENESS YET PUBLISHED
>
> MESSRS. W. WALKER & SONS, 64 MARGARET ST, CAVENDISH SQ ... have lately been furnished by the Hon. J.M. Mason, of the Confederate States, with the only original likeness of the late lamented General Thomas Jefferson [sic] Jackson, photographed from life a week before the General received his fatal wound ... This portrait remains emphatically as The Likeness of the illustrious General. It has been seen and highly approved by many Southern Gentlemen who knew the General personally.[20]

Half of the net profits from the sale of the photographs, it was stated, were to go to the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund, which had been set up to improve the lot of Confederate prisoners of war "in the Federal American States."

Another scheme to raise money for this was the reproduction of a bust of President Jefferson Davis, in a limited edition of 500 (quarter size), available in four versions — plaster; enameled plaster; à l'ivoire (wax and plaster); and marble — to order:

> The only Bust extant ... modelled by Volk, at Richmond ... has been kindly lent by the owner for reproduction for the benefit of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund ... The Bust may be seen at the studio of James Redfern, 29 Clipstone St., Fitzroy Sq. ... and at the Index office.[21]

Large numbers of songs were written and published in the South during the war and some of these were reprinted by London music publishers to satisfy popular demand. As Colonel Peyton later recalled: "Music dealers got out rapidly, Southern songs, set to music, and dedicated to Confederate exiles in Europe. Young ladies were taught to sing and play them, and everywhere was heard 'Dixie,' 'Bonnie Blue Flag,' 'Down among the Cotton,' 'My Maryland,' &c."[22]

Songs for the piano, as well as marches, quadrilles, polkas and quicksteps, all with Confederate themes, were published by firms like Boosey & Sons, Brewer & Company, Cramer, Beale & Wood and Joseph Williams, and advertised in weekly magazines like the Illustrated London News. Thomas Boosey & Sons, musical instrument makers, music sellers and publishers, who were established in 1816, and still exist as Boosey & Hawkes, brought out Victor Colline's "Maryland Quadrille" (1864) and George Forbe's "Maryland: A Confederate March for the Piano" (1864), as well as Twelve Songs of the American War, which contained six Confederate pieces, including "Old King Cotton" and "A Battle Hymn."

Cramer, Beale & Wood, music and musical instrument sellers and publishers, who had started in 1844 as Cramer, Beale & Chappell, and are now known as Cramer Music, published James Randall's "Maryland, My Maryland," which competed with Daniel Emmett's "Dixie" and Harry Macarthy's "Bonnie Blue Flag" as the Confederate national anthem. They also brought out "War Song of Dixie" (1862), written by Frederick Buckley, a member of the minstrel group known as Buckley's Serenaders, "with an illuminated frontispiece showing the Confederate flag and standard."

Joseph Williams, who had taken over his mother's music-printing business in 1844, published Henry Farmer's "Dixie's Land Polka" (1861) and Henri F. Hemy's "The Picket of the Potomac" (1864): "The beautiful and touching words of this song were found in the pocket of one of the Confederate volunteers who died in the camp on the Potomac from a rifle wound while on picket duty," claimed the publisher, who continued in business until at least 1954.[23] Another firm, Hopwood & Crew, advertised "Dixey's Land Gallop" (1861), by Charles Coote, Jr., and "The Boy of the Rappahannock" (1865), by Charles Blamphim, as well as those songs quoted by Colonel Peyton.

General Robert E. Lee rarely featured in songs, though his portrait appears on the cover of Carl Weiner's "Confederate War March," published by J. Jewell towards the end of 1864. "Stonewall" Jackson, on the other hand, was the inspiration for a number of pieces of music, not least after his death in 1863. Joseph Williams issued "The General Jackson Schottische" ("as played by the 600 performers at the Brass Band Contest, Crystal Palace") in 1862 and Foster & King brought out "The Stonewall Jackson Quadrille" in the same year. Charles Blamphim's "Death of Stonewall Jackson" was published by Samuel Brewer & Company in 1864; illustrated with the general's portrait, it is not surprising to learn that this was "sung by all the leading vocalists with rapturous applause."

As well as these reprinted pieces, at least two Confederate songs were published in London.[24] "A Confederate Raid" and "Our Queen Varine" were written by 'EM', an unidentified Southerner living in England, and brought out by Christopher Lonsdale, who had been in business on his own as a music seller and publisher since 1834, though the firm, previously known as Birchall, Lonsdale and Mills, dated back to c.1811.

"A Confederate Raid," dedicated to "General J. E. B. Stuart of the Confederate Cavalry," was the shorter of the two:

Then hurrah for Stuart, hurrah!
And his bold cavaliers of the West,
'Tis his twentieth raid, hurrah!
No rest for brave Stuart, no rest!

"Our Queen Varine" was dedicated to "Varina, wife of the President of the Confederate States of America":

Here's to the fair and brilliant one,
Who by his side is seen
Long may she be,
Long may we see
Varine our Queen!
Our Queen, Varine!

Copies of the two songs were deposited in what is now the British Library in March and July 1864. "A Confederate Raid" was perhaps written about the beginning of 1864, fairly late in Stuart's career as a cavalry leader, and would have been published two months before his death, following his wounding at Yellow Tavern in May 1864. It is difficult, however, to imagine a song like "Our Queen Varine" being published as late as July 1864; the adulatory and overly optimistic sentiments suggest a much earlier date — perhaps the spring or summer of 1861, when Confederate nationalism was in full flow — long before disillusionment with Davis and his leadership had set in. The colored cover, showing the earliest version of the first Confederate national flag, the "Stars and Bars," with seven stars (adopted in March 1861), and reused for the second song, tends to reinforce this idea.

Although maps and atlases published by American firms like J.T. Lloyd were available in England — they included Lloyd's Great Coloured Military Map of the Southern Confederacy ("engraved on steel for the use of the War Department") and Lloyd's American Railroad Map, showing the Whole Seat of War, both issued in 1861— London map publishers also responded to public interest in events across the Atlantic.

Most of the Civil War maps published appeared in the first two years of the conflict. Some showed the boundary of the seceded states, or the area and extent of the "free and slaveholding states," others the seat of war in America. They were produced for a public which was initially unfamiliar with the geography of the war, though by 1864 the Times could remark: "The country between the Rappahannock and the Potomac [i.e., between Fredericksburg and Washington] has become as familiar [to] the English public as the space between St Paul's and South Kensington."[25]

G.W. Bacon & Company of Paternoster Row, who described themselves as "American Map Publishers and Importers" and were the London agents for the American mapmaking firm of J.H. Colton, issued a New Army Map of the Seat of War in Virginia (1862), which showed the battlefields and fortifications near the Potomac. James Wyld, whose Great Globe had been such a prominent feature of Leicester Square throughout the 1850s, published a number of military maps of the war, including several editions of one of the Southern states, showing forts, harbors and military positions. H.G. Clarke, a bookseller and publisher in the Strand, issued Woolley's New Map of the Seat of War in the Confederate States of America, possibly in 1861. There seem to have been very few maps of individual battles, probably because the ones which appeared in magazines like the Illustrated London News made them largely unnecessary, though G.W. Bacon did issue one of the battle of Fredericksburg, as well as his Map shewing the entire Field of Operations under Grant, Sherman and Thomas (1865).[26]

Articles about the Civil War, many of them sympathetic to the South, began to appear in the weekly and monthly magazines published in London. They were usually unsigned, as was the practice of the time, and some of the accounts of the Confederacy were based on recent, first-hand experience, particularly ones written by serving army officers, who had gone there as unofficial observers or military tourists.

The Illustrated London News, which had begun publication in 1842, was the first and one of the most successful of the new illustrated weekly magazines, a pioneer in pictorial journalism. Its emphasis was on current affairs and in the spring of 1861, after the start of the Civil War, it sent a representative to America in the person of Frank Vizetelly, an experienced special correspondent who had already covered wars in Austria, Italy and Sicily. He began by reporting from the Northern side, but lack of cooperation from the Federal authorities caused him to go South in the summer of 1862.

He became a great admirer of the Army of Northern Virginia, with "its wonderful endurance ... its utter disregard for hardships," and made little attempt to hide his support for the Confederacy. Regardless of whether the Illustrated London News itself was hoping for a Southern victory, many of its readers probably were. With his taste for amateur theatricals and charades, this gregarious journalist was popular wherever he went. His sketches and reports sometimes failed to get through the blockade, and pirated ones occasionally appeared in Northern papers. Vizetelly returned to London three times during the war, on each occasion bringing with him collections of drawings made during the previous months. The only foreign artist–correspondent in the Confederacy, he accompanied President Davis and his party during part of their flight from Richmond, and his drawings of the "Last Days of the Confederate Government" (July 22, 1865) are a unique record of that event.

In December 1861 a favorable review of James Spence's book, The American Union, appeared in the widely-read weekly magazine, All the Year Round. Its founder and editor, Charles Dickens, was no admirer of the South, but his magazine did feature a couple of articles of Confederate interest: "The Diary of a Confederate Boy" (May 17, 1862) dealt with the early months of the war, about the time of First Manassas, and "A Waif from Dixie" (October 29, 1864) was based on the contents of Confederate newspapers from Mobile.

The humorous weekly Punch, which had been founded a year before the Illustrated London News, responded to the formation of the Confederate States of America by referring to them disparagingly as "confederates in the crime of upholding slavery" (March 9, 1861), but after the commencement of hostilities, it began to adopt a more ambivalent attitude, condemning both sides for what it saw as their stupidity:

> Yankee Doodles, oh, you noodles!
> Why prolong this idle strife? (September 28, 1861)

By the end of 1861, as a result of the blockade and the Trent affair, Punch was becoming increasingly anti–Northern and beginning to prophesy the defeat of the North. Nevertheless, it was still firmly opposed to slavery, which it regarded as doomed. When it was reported in 1862 that plantation bells were being donated to be melted down for cannon, it cautioned its readers:

> But pause on that last gift, can good come of cannon cast
> From the bells that waked the slaves to their heavy, hopeless toil? (April 26, 1862).

VERY PROBABLE.

Lord Punch. "THAT WAS JEFF DAVIS, PAM! DON'T YOU RECOGNISE HIM?"
Lord Pam. "HM! WELL, NOT EXACTLY—MAY HAVE TO DO SO SOME OF THESE DAYS."

As late as August 1864 it was still thought that Confederate recognition was a possibility, as this Punch cartoon by John Tenniel seems to suggest.

In spite of its guarded, pro–Southern stance, it advised the people of Southampton not to welcome the Southern Commissioners Mason and Slidell openly when they arrived there, lest it be seen as "a declaration on the part of the people of England for the Confederate side" (January 18, 1862), advice which appears to have been heeded. It also published a poem called "The Tuscarora" (February 8, 1862), occasioned by the unwelcome presence at Southampton of both the CSS Nashville and the USS Tuscarora.

Latterly, it seemed to allow wishful thinking to cloud its judgment, with cartoons such as "Very Probable" (August 27, 1864), suggesting that recognition of the Confederacy was still a possibility, and "The American Juggernaut" (September 3, 1864), showing Union troops being crushed by a huge Southern gun-carriage, at a time when Grant had Lee bottled up in Petersburg, Sherman had taken Atlanta and Sheridan was starting to drive Early out of the Shenandoah Valley. There were also cartoons on the contentious subject of black troops in the Confederate Army, "The Black Conscription" (September 26, 1863) and "The Black Draft" (November 19, 1864).

The verses accompanying its cartoon of Lee's surrender admitted that it had often "misread the chances of the fight" (April 29, 1865), and Punch's editor conceded privately that "we have been a bit mistaken" when, after ridiculing Lincoln for four years, the magazine was obliged to do a lightning volte-face, after news of his assassination reached London.

The Fortnightly Review began publication the year the war ended, and was unusual for its time in that its articles were signed. "The Last Six Days of Secessia," an account of Lee's retreat to Appomattox, which appeared in the issue of August 15, 1865, was written by Francis Lawley, who had covered the war for the Times. Noted for his pro–Confederate reports, he was in Richmond when it fell, and apparently followed Lee's retreating army, the only journalist to do so.

A well-respected literary monthly which had been established as long ago as 1817, Blackwood's Magazine published a number of articles by British visitors to the Confederacy. "A Month with the Rebels," by the Hon. Robert Bourke, an Irish barrister who was the brother of the Earl of Mayo, appeared in December 1861. Its mockery of Northern newspapers, in particular the New York Herald, "a paper which all Americans read, most abuse, and none believe," left readers in no doubt where its author's sympathies lay. Bourke was favorably impressed by what he saw during his travels in the autumn of 1861, and thought that "The perfect unanimity throughout the whole South in the belief that their cause is just, strikes the stranger as one of the most formidable symptons which the Union has to fear." Like many, he hoped that, once the Confederate States had been admitted into "the family of nations," European influences would bring about the emancipation of the slaves. Apparently at the request of propagandist Edwin De Leon, the same author also contributed a eulogistic piece about Jefferson Davis, "one of the few great men that this war has produced," to the September 1862 issue of the magazine.

Edward Seymour arrived in the Confederate capital at the end of June 1862, just as the Seven Days' Battles were about to start. He described them in "Ten Days in Richmond" (October 1862), and in particular the battle of Gaines' Mill, then went on to discuss the state of public opinion in the South. As far as he was concerned, "Separation is now not a question of right, or even of expediency, but a simple matter of fact. The people of the Confederate States are a separate nation." Seymour, who was Twelfth Duke of Somerset and First Lord of the Admiralty, was a privileged visitor and able to move around fairly freely.

Army officers like Lieutenant Colonel Garnet Wolseley, who had served in the Second

Burma War, the Crimean War, the Indian Mutiny and the China War, and was assistant quartermaster general in Canada, took a professional interest in events. In the North, Wolseley found that his English appearance and speech aroused suspicion and that "we are all considered as rebel sympathisers," a rather revealing comment. "A Month's Visit to the Confederate Headquarters" (January 1863) describes his visit in September and October 1862, during which time he saw the scenes of the recent Seven Days' Battles and was able to meet with both Lee and Jackson. He noted the confidence and loyalty they inspired in their men; some surprise was expressed that England had not already recognized the Confederacy, particularly "after M'Clellan's failure before Richmond."

Edward Hamley, who was professor of military history at the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, contributed an article called "Our Rancorous 'Cousins'" (November 1863). This denounced the attitude of the Federal government and press as one of "shameless impudence" while "glorying ad nauseam in the success of their own effort to throw off their allegiance to Great Britain [in the War of Independence] they have never ceased to denounce the secession of the Sovereign States of the South as 'a wicked and unnatural rebellion.'" Like many of his brother officers, Hamley was full of admiration for "the gallant deeds of the Southern armies and generals, the noble devotion of the Southern people."

A number of articles which were published in Blackwood's during or shortly after the war subsequently reappeared in book form. These included "The Battle of Gettysburg and the Campaign in Pennsylvania: extract from the Diary of an English Officer present with the Confederate Army" (September 1863), by Lieutenant Colonel Arthur Fremantle; "A Visit to the Cities and Camps of the Confederate States" (December 1864 — February 1865), by Captain Fitzgerald Ross; and "Memoirs of the Confederate War for Independence" (September 1865 — June 1866), by Lieutenant Colonel Heros Von Borcke.

The Cornhill Magazine, another literary monthly, was a runaway success when it began publication in 1860. For the first two years, its editor was the famous novelist William M. Thackeray, and it also published several articles on the Civil War, again chiefly from a Southern standpoint. "The Cruise of the Confederate Ship 'Sumter' (From the Private Journal of an Officer)," by a journalist called Frank Drake, appeared in the August 1862 issue. Comparison with Raphael Semmes' Memoirs of Service Afloat shows it to be remarkably accurate, even including details not contained in that work.

When "How We Broke the Blockade" was published in October 1862, its author, Edwin De Leon, was the Confederate propaganda agent in Paris. At the time of his blockade-running adventure, in February 1862, he was returning home after serving as U.S. consul general in Egypt. He and his wife sailed from Southampton to Havana, where they joined a "long, low, black, rakish-looking steamer" called the Victoria, for their uncomfortable, and at times alarming, journey back to the Confederacy.

"A Run through the Southern States" (April 1863), by Lieutenant Colonel Henry Fletcher, of the Scots Fusilier Guards, gave an account of his often difficult journeys, mostly by train, through Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, the Carolinas and Virginia, in the last months of 1862. Fletcher, who later wrote a three-volume History of the American War (1865–1866) and himself rose to the rank of major general, met Generals Price, Van Dorn, Beauregard and Admiral Buchanan along the way, and visited Vicksburg, Mobile, where he saw the CSS Florida, and Charleston. He concluded "that no danger will ever frighten, or bribes of power induce, the States of the Confederacy to join again the Northern Union."

Frank Vizetelly of the Illustrated London News was in Charleston in 1863, and witnessed the attack on Fort Sumter by Federal ironclads in April, the assault on Battery Wagner (Morris Island) by land and sea three months later and the bombardment of the city itself in August. These events were described in some detail in his article "Charleston under Fire" (July 1864).

In November 1864 the Monthly Packet, a periodical for young women, founded and for many years edited by the novelist Charlotte M. Yonge, began to publish a series of articles called "Home Life in a Confederate State." They were allegedly based on the journal of an Englishwoman who had gone to America at the beginning of 1861 to be a teacher at a plantation on the Georgia coast, and later had moved inland with her employers. The series stopped in December 1865, then resumed in August 1866 under a new title, "Extracts from the Journal of a Refugee in Georgia during the American War," when its author insisted that the earlier parts of her journal had not been intended for publication, but that her "zealous correspondent in England ... thought that a simple statement of facts would enlist the sympathies of the English people in [sic] behalf of the Southern Confederacy."[27] It continued intermittently until May 1867, when, still incomplete, it ceased altogether; no explanation for this was given. The journal covers the period March 1861—December 1864, and demonstrates a remarkable knowledge of conditions and events in wartime Georgia on the part of its anonymous author.

The Quarterly Review, another established and influential journal, had been founded by the famous publisher John Murray and that too published a number of articles about the war. "The Confederate Struggle and Recognition" (October 1862) has been attributed to Lord Robert Cecil, a member of the Southern lobby in Parliament, who wrote extensively for the magazine. He observed: "The Southerners have shown every characteristic that can mark an independent nation. They have made the costliest sacrifices that men can make to assure their freedom from a foreign rule, and they have fought for it with a gallantry that has not been surpassed in all the wars of liberation the world has seen."

An evaluation of "The Prospects of the Confederates," which appeared in the April 1864 issue, was by Robert Lawley, who summarized the difficulties facing the Confederates as "1. Insufficient supply of men, horses and food. 2. Jealousy between the armies of the Potomac [Northern Virginia] and Tennessee, and general dissatisfaction with President Davis and the Confederate Government." None was thought to be insurmountable. Some of the optimism may derive from his journalist brother, Francis Lawley, who is thought to have contributed to the article.

"The question naturally arises, what caused the failure of this great effort of the South to possess a government of its own?" asked James Spence, a leading British champion of Confederate independence, in "The Close of the American War" (July 1865). As well as "the great superiority of the North in numbers and resources ... their command of naval force ... soon felt in a country intersected by great rivers," and "that special weapon, the blockade"; there was also what he described as "excess of confidence ... lives of Southern soldiers were expended ... as if the supply were inexhaustible." (That was particularly true of generals like John Bell Hood.) The failure to recruit blacks into the Confederate army until it was too late was also thought to be a serious mistake, and "would have turned the scale in favour of the South," an opinion some military historians might question. He reiterated his belief that Confederate independence would have meant the end of slavery: it was "doubtless the real cause why the independence of the South was not recognized by the European powers." (Most historians would probably describe it as a contributory cause.)

These magazines all had a predominantly middle- and upper-class readership and by and large reflected the views of their readers; they were also relatively expensive. The Illustrated London News, for instance, cost sixpence a copy, while the Cornhill Magazine was a shilling, nearly a third of a day's wages then for many workingmen. The abolition of the stamp duty on newspapers and magazines in 1855, followed by that on raw paper in 1861, resulted in a crop of weekly magazines, usually costing little more than a penny and often illustrated with cheap woodcuts, which aimed to provide both instruction and recreation for respectable working-class readers. They included the London Journal, Cassell's Illustrated Family Paper, the London Reader, Once a Week and the Leisure Hour, which all published articles on the Civil War, usually cobbled together from other sources by journalists who had probably never set foot in America, but presented convincingly, nonetheless. It has been pointed out that, on the whole, working-class journals were hostile to the North, certainly before the Emancipation Proclamation, and to some extent, after it as well.[28] Some evidence for this can certainly be seen in their tendency to devote more space to articles about Southern topics.

"The South American Confederation" [sic], which gave a biographical sketch of Jefferson Davis, and a summary of his address to the Confederate Congress, appeared in the London Journal as early as March 30, 1861, and the magazine continued to take an interest in events across the Atlantic. There were illustrated pieces about the Merrimack and her encounter with the Monitor (April 19, 1862), and several more chronicling the exploits of the Sumter (March 1, 1862), and the Alabama (December 13, 1862 and February 28, 1863). Subjects like the latter lent themselves easily to journalistic hyperbole, with descriptions of "the brave Captain Semmes, his gallant ship the Alabama, and his daring crew of—as the Americans style us—Britishers." The same magazine also published a detailed account of the New York draft riots (August 22, 1863) and a discussion of General Grant's plan to capture Richmond (May 21, 1864).

Cassell's Illustrated Family Paper published articles about the Merrimack (January 11, 1862), the Arkansas (October 18, 1862), and the Alabama (July 30, 1864), whose "fate, though terrible, was glorious ... a suitable termination to her daring and brilliant career." There were also pieces about Charleston (February 15, 1862 and April 16, 1864), and an excellent map of "The Seat of War in America" (December 20, 1862), which would have done credit to the Illustrated London News. These articles were not necessarily uncritical; the author of "Richmond, on the James River" (October 3, 1863), for instance, made his feelings about slavery very clear.

An article about the late-lamented "Stonewall" Jackson (June 13, 1863), in the London Reader, a similar publication to the Journal, caught the mood of the moment; there were also pieces about Charleston (June 6, 1863 and September 26, 1863), and Robert E. Lee (August 27, 1864), which described him, somewhat prematurely, as "The Confederate Commander-in-Chief," rather than commander of the Army of Northern Virginia. It was published at a stage in the war when it really did seem as if "the one will never submit, and the other, it is now evident, is wholly unable to conquer," and there were calls that the "bugbear of non-intervention should be flung aside, and words of friendly counsel strongly urged on both sides."

Once a Week published two articles on the subject of "The American Generals" (November 15 and 22, 1862), which gave brief details of the lives of the main Confederate and Federal commanders, while the Leisure Hour featured "The American Blockaded Ports" (April 16, 1864), written, it was claimed, by a British settler in Texas, and dealing chiefly with Galveston, Wilmington and Charleston, and another piece on "American Generals" (June 25, 1864), which examined the careers of Jackson, Lee, McClellan and Grant.

Books by visitors to the South were also starting to appear. Samuel Phillips Day, the special correspondent of the Morning Herald from June through September 1861, was the author of Down South: or, An Englishman's Experience at the Seat of the American War, published by Hurst & Blackett in 1862. He spent most of his time in Richmond, and made no secret of his pro–Confederate sympathies, stating that "The Northern attempt to conquer the South is a labor equally as futile as that of Sisyphus [i.e., an endless, heart-breaking task] ... It is not only mere folly, but little short of sheer insanity, to think of over-running 750,000 square miles of territory, and subjugating the 9,500,000 people who now compose the eleven states of the Confederacy."[29]

Many of these books were published in 1863, when Confederate independence still seemed a possibility. The Rev. William Wyndham Malet's book, An Errand to the South in the Summer of 1862, was brought out by Richard Bentley & Son, a firm which had started in 1829 and was well-known for its multivolume novels, published for circulating libraries. Malet, a Hertfordshire clergyman, had traveled to South Carolina to visit his sister who was married to Captain Plowden C.J. Weston, a plantation owner serving with the Confederate Army. His readable account of a sometimes difficult trip, which lasted from May through November 1862, was based on a diary. While living in the South, he visited Richmond, where he met President and Mrs. Davis, and "Mr. Vizetelly, the accomplished sketcher for the Illustrated London News; he was lamenting over the loss of some sketches, from the bearer having to throw them with other papers into the Potomac, to avoid seizure by the enemy."[30] An Errand to the South is a rewarding account which would be worth reprinting.

Neither Samuel Day nor the Rev. William Malet found fault with slavery. That was not the case with William Howard Russell of the Times. As a representative of that opinion-forming newspaper, Russell was regarded as an important person on both sides of the Potomac, but succeeded in offending Northerners, with his outspoken account of the battle of Bull Run, and Southerners, with his denunciation of slavery. Unlike most English visitors to the Confederacy, Russell's name was already well-known there, since his reports on the Crimean War (1854–1856) had been reprinted in American newspapers. He spent three months in the South (April–June 1861) and was impressed by many of the civilian and military leaders he met. Ostensibly impartial, his sympathies, were really with the North, though like many he doubted that the Confederacy would ever be defeated. His experiences as special correspondent during the first year of the war were described in My Diary North and South, published by Bradbury & Evans.

Lieutenant Colonel Arthur James Lyon Fremantle's Three Months in the Southern States: April—June 1863 was published by William Blackwood & Sons after extracts from it had appeared in Blackwood's Magazine. The firm had first been established at Edinburgh in 1804 and had opened a London branch in 1840. Colonel Fremantle, an officer in the Coldstream Guards, traveled from Texas, through Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia and the Carolinas, to Virginia, joined Lee's Army during its invasion of Pennsylvania, and was present as an observer, along with Fitzgerald Ross, at the battle of Gettysburg. As well as Generals Lee, Ewell and Longstreet, he met Johnston and Beauregard, and was impressed by them and their troops. It has been called "the best commentary on the wartime South by an English visitor," and Constance Harrison, the wife of Jefferson Davis's secretary, Burton Harrison, recalled how "its charming spirit and interesting presentment of the situation was greatly welcomed" when copies of the book were brought through the blockade.[31] Two copies, inscribed to President Davis and Secretary of State Benjamin, were taken to Richmond by Commander Maury, who traveled there in February 1864.

Two Months in the Confederate States, including a Visit to New Orleans under the Domination of General Butler was also published by Richard Bentley. It was written by "An English Merchant," who has now been identified as William Carson Corsan, a member of the Sheffield firm of Corsan, Denton & Burdekin, hardware merchants and manufacturers. From October through December 1862, Corsan traveled, mostly by train, from New Orleans to Richmond, stopping off at various towns along the way, to investigate the financial status of his firm's customers and perhaps find some new business. The Sun thought that it provided "a most opportune peep into the Confederate States."[32]

George Alfred Lawrence, already a successful novelist, decided to go to America in 1863 and join the Confederate Army. Before he could do so, however, he was captured in Maryland and spent eight weeks in the Old Capitol Prison in Washington, where one of his fellow prisoners was Belle Boyd. Border and Bastille, an account of his misadventures published by Tinsley Brothers after his release and return to England later that year, was not a novel, though it has been described as fiction manqué.

English residents in the South also wrote of their experiences. The Rev T.D. Ozanne, an Episcopalian minister who had lived in Mississippi since 1841, decided to return to England in 1862. The South as it is; or, Twenty-one Years' Experience in the Southern States of America, was published the following year by Saunders, Otley & Company. The firm had been established in 1826 by Simon Saunders and Edward John Otley, and had been a successful publisher of nonfiction, drama, poetry and novels, though by the time of the Civil War neither of its founders was still alive and it was no longer in the front rank of London publishers. Ozanne's book is mostly a discourse on slavery, which he presents in a favorable light, the resources, government and social life of the South, and secession; only the last three chapters constitute a personal narrative, though these do include his spell as a wartime hospital chaplain, and a description of life in occupied New Orleans, while he was waiting for a steamer for New York. He too was convinced that the South could never be subdued.

After several appointments teaching the "ornamental branches" (i.e., polite accomplishments) in Virginia, Catherine Cooper Hopley, who had been in America since the late 1850s, became governess to the children of Governor John Milton of Florida. Life in the South: from the Commencement of the War, apparently written in the space of ten weeks after her return to England in the autumn of 1862, was brought out the following year by Chapman & Hall, who were also Dickens' publishers. She tried to give an "impartial account of the 'domestic institution'" (i.e., slavery), observing: "The most calamitous and unmerciful affliction that could befall both master and servant, would be the sudden emancipation of the slaves of the Southern States."[33] In Richmond she saw President Jefferson Davis, and Secretary of the Navy Stephen Mallory, who did not impress her, and also met journalist Samuel Day. She ended her well-observed account by inviting her readers "to regard with more leniency and justice the people of the Southern Confederacy."[34] Throughout her narrative she refers to herself as Sarah L. Jones, a pseudonym she also used in later publications.

Edward Fitzgerald Turton Ross, a "captain of hussars in the Imperial Austrian Army," spent eleven months in the South, from May 1863 to spring 1864, witnessed the battle of Gettysburg with Arthur Fremantle, and traveled in South Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee and Alabama. All but the last four chapters of his Visit to the Cities and Camps of the Confederate

TWO MONTHS

IN

THE CONFEDERATE STATES,

INCLUDING

A VISIT TO NEW ORLEANS

UNDER

THE DOMINATION OF GENERAL BUTLER.

BY

AN ENGLISH MERCHANT.

LONDON:
RICHARD BENTLEY, NEW BURLINGTON STREET,
Publisher in Ordinary to Her Majesty.
1863.

Two Months in the Confederate States, an account of life in the Civil War South by an English businessman, was published in London in 1863.

States had previously appeared in Blackwood's Magazine and the book itself was published by William Blackwood in May 1865. The timing, however, was unfortunate: there had been a large readership for earlier accounts of Confederate life, but with the defeat of the South, the subject had lost its appeal. "The present moment is hardly favourable to the success of a book which was written while the Confederate cause still seemed prosperous; and which ... throws no light on the circumstances which disappointed the hopes so long and so confidently entertained, and brought the final catastrophe to pass so much more suddenly and decisively than ordinary observers could have expected ... When the fate of the Southern people is finally decided ... books of this class will have another and more melancholy interest. But at this conjuncture we do not need them," said the Saturday Review discouragingly.[35] When Lieutenant Colonel Johann August Heinrich Heros Von Borcke, an aristocratic Prussian officer, who was "lately Chief of Staff to General J.E.B. Stuart," arrived in London in February 1865 on a mission for the Confederate government (the nature of which has not been ascertained), Fitzgerald Ross suggested to publisher William Blackwood that Von Borcke's diary might be turned into a book. Memoirs of the Confederate War for Independence was translated, and in fact ghostwritten, by the journalist John Thompson, and first appeared in Blackwood's Magazine before being published, with "Map of the Seat of War in Virginia," in 1866.[36] Von Borcke participated in many battles, from Seven Pines to the beginning of the Gettysburg campaign, when he was wounded; there are descriptions of Confederate camp life and he met various English observers, and correspondents like Frank Vizetelly and Francis Lawley.

The death of Stonewall Jackson in 1863 had created considerable public interest, and Chapman & Hall commissioned a short biography of him from Catherine Hopley. It came out later that year, and though it went through three editions, Stonewall Jackson, late General of the Confederate States Army: a Biographical Sketch and an Outline of his Virginian Campaigns, was not well received, one reviewer calling it "steeped in sentimentalism and short on scholarship."

Another subject of great public interest was the CSS Alabama, which, in the words of her captain, "attracted the attention of the book-makers — those cormorants ever on the look-out for a speculation." They were soon at work. A pamphlet entitled The Cruise of the Alabama, based on the journal of her boarding officer, George Townley Fullam, was published at Liverpool in 1863. This formed the basis of a long article in All the Year Round, and another edition was brought out by a London printer, Adolphe Schulze, under the title of Our Cruise on the Confederate States War Steamer Alabama.[37]

The Alabama and the Kearsarge. An Account of the Naval Engagement in the British Channel, on Sunday, June 19, 1864 was compiled by Frederick Milnes Edge, who had interviewed both Union and Confederate survivors in Cherbourg, as well as French eyewitnesses, and published by W. Ridgway. The Career of the Alabama, No. 290. From July 29, 1862 to June 19, 1864 was also cobbled together from reports in the Times, Standard and Daily News, and rushed out by Dorrell & Son, a firm of booksellers and stationers.

The illustrated weeklies published drawings of the sinking of the Alabama by the Kearsarge and a reconstruction of it, painted by a naval artist called Captain J. W. Anderson, was photographed and published by Oxford Street photographer Frederic Jones as a carte-de-visite, entitled "Action off Cherbourg, 19th June 1864."[38]

Before the battle, Captain Semmes had given his journals for safe keeping to a representative of the firm of Saunders, Otley, who had also published Ordnance Instructions for the Confederate States Navy. He was now persuaded to allow the publication of extracts from them, and The Cruise of the Alabama and the Sumter. From the Private Journals and Other Papers of Commander R. Semmes, C.S.N., and Other Officers, was out by the beginning of August. One of the first people to read it was Benjamin Moran: "Last night I bought and read the 'Cruise of the Alabama and Sumter, by Semmes' ... As a literary performance it is poor; but it contains certain facts that will be very useful some day against GB," he observed vindictively.[39]

Despite Moran's disparaging comments, it was a success, a second edition following within weeks, as well as a special "Confederate States edition" on thin paper, intended to be shipped through the blockade. It was reprinted in America (New York, 1864), and translated into French (Paris, 1864) and, somewhat surprisingly, into Dutch (Zwolle, 1865). An abridged edition called The Log of the Alabama and the Sumter was published in December 1864. In spite of all this, Semmes apparently made no money out of it, and later, in the preface to his Memoirs of Service Afloat (1869), made it clear he disapproved of it, calling it "a meagre and barren record." He claimed that its anonymous author, whoever he was, had neither the knowledge nor the experience to interpret his journals properly and do justice to the subject.

When Captain Semmes arrived in London in June 1864, Mrs. Rose Greenhow had been there for some months. Born in Maryland in 1817, Rose O'Neal Greenhow was a Washington political hostess with all the right connections. A widow with a reputation for intrigue, and known to some as "Rebel Rose," she was arrested and imprisoned for some months for operating a spy ring in the Federal capital. Deported to Richmond in 1862, in August of the following year Mrs. Greenhow was sent to Europe as an unofficial emissary for the Confederacy. With her youngest daughter and several other passengers from the Confederate States, she traveled, via Bermuda, in the steamer Harriet Pinckney and arrived at Falmouth, Cornwall, in September 1863.

She divided her time between London and Paris, writing and lecturing on behalf of the Southern cause, and also arranged for the publication of her book, My Imprisonment and the First Year of Abolition Rule at Washington. Published in November 1863 by Richard Bentley, who had already brought out two accounts of travel in the Confederate States, as well as the influential writings of James Spence, it was dedicated to "the brave soldiers who have fought and bled in this our glorious struggle for freedom." In spite of its rather uninspiring title, My Imprisonment enhanced its author's growing reputation, making her into a celebrity in both England and France, where she had a private audience with Emperor Napoleon III.

On her way to England, Rose Greenhow had encountered Georgiana Walker, the wife of Major Norman Walker, the Confederate agent in Bermuda. In December 1863 Mrs. Walker noted in her diary:

> I recd. a letter from Mrs. Greenhow. She has been wonderfully well received in England and her book is pronounced a "success." I do not wonder at that, for she is a very clever woman, and has the ability to show those Yankees up in their true character. She says a smart thing in her letter. She writes "I consider the cultivation of my good looks a duty which I owe to my country." She needs no cultivation of beauty, for Providence has blessed her with a high order of that. She is one of the most beautiful women I ever saw. She knows this and like a sensible woman, does not pretend to think the contrary.[40]

An imposing figure, theatrical in manner, and quick-witted, Rose Greenhow enjoyed the social and literary life of London, becoming a familiar figure at fashionable gatherings.

Both Mrs. Rose O. Greenhow and Mrs. Georgiana G. Walker lodged at this house in Sackville Street, Piccadilly, in 1864. (Author's photograph)

When she herself came to London, in July 1864, Mrs. Walker found herself living for a while in the same house in Sackville Street as Mrs. Greenhow, and observed:

> She has certainly had the entrée to the very highest society. The Lords & Ladies & Duchesses are her constant visitors, & her invitations to dinner parties & balls are innumerable. She is to dine with Lady Palmerston soon, & has gone thro the rounds of most of the others.[41]

One of her neighbors in Sackville Street was Commander Maury, and other Confederate associates included Henry Hotze and the Rev. Francis Tremlett. Lord Wharncliffe recalled a dinner conversation with her at Lady Chesterfield's house in Grosvenor Square, in a letter she was destined never to receive.[42]

In August 1864 Mrs. Greenhow joined the steamer Condor at Greenock, Scotland, to return to the Confederacy. One of Alexander Collie's blockade-runners, the Condor, was commanded by Captain William N.W. Hewett, an officer on leave from the Royal Navy, who used the alias Samuel P. Ridge. Off Fort Fisher, North Carolina, the vessel ran aground and Rose Greenhow was drowned while struggling to get ashore.

Although the event took place on October 1, it was not reported in the Times until November 5. One of those who knew of it before then was James Spence, who expressed his deep regrets in a letter to Lord Wharncliffe:

> I am sure you would feel as I did, deeply grieved at the tidings of Mrs Greenhow's death ... I believe she was drowned in getting on shore and the only one lost ... Poor thing — so bright and ... so cold now. None in this country ... will so much regret her sad fate. She had faults, and who has not, but she had great qualities far beyond the average ... I have known her to speak with an eloquence and power I have never heard the equal to in a woman.[43]

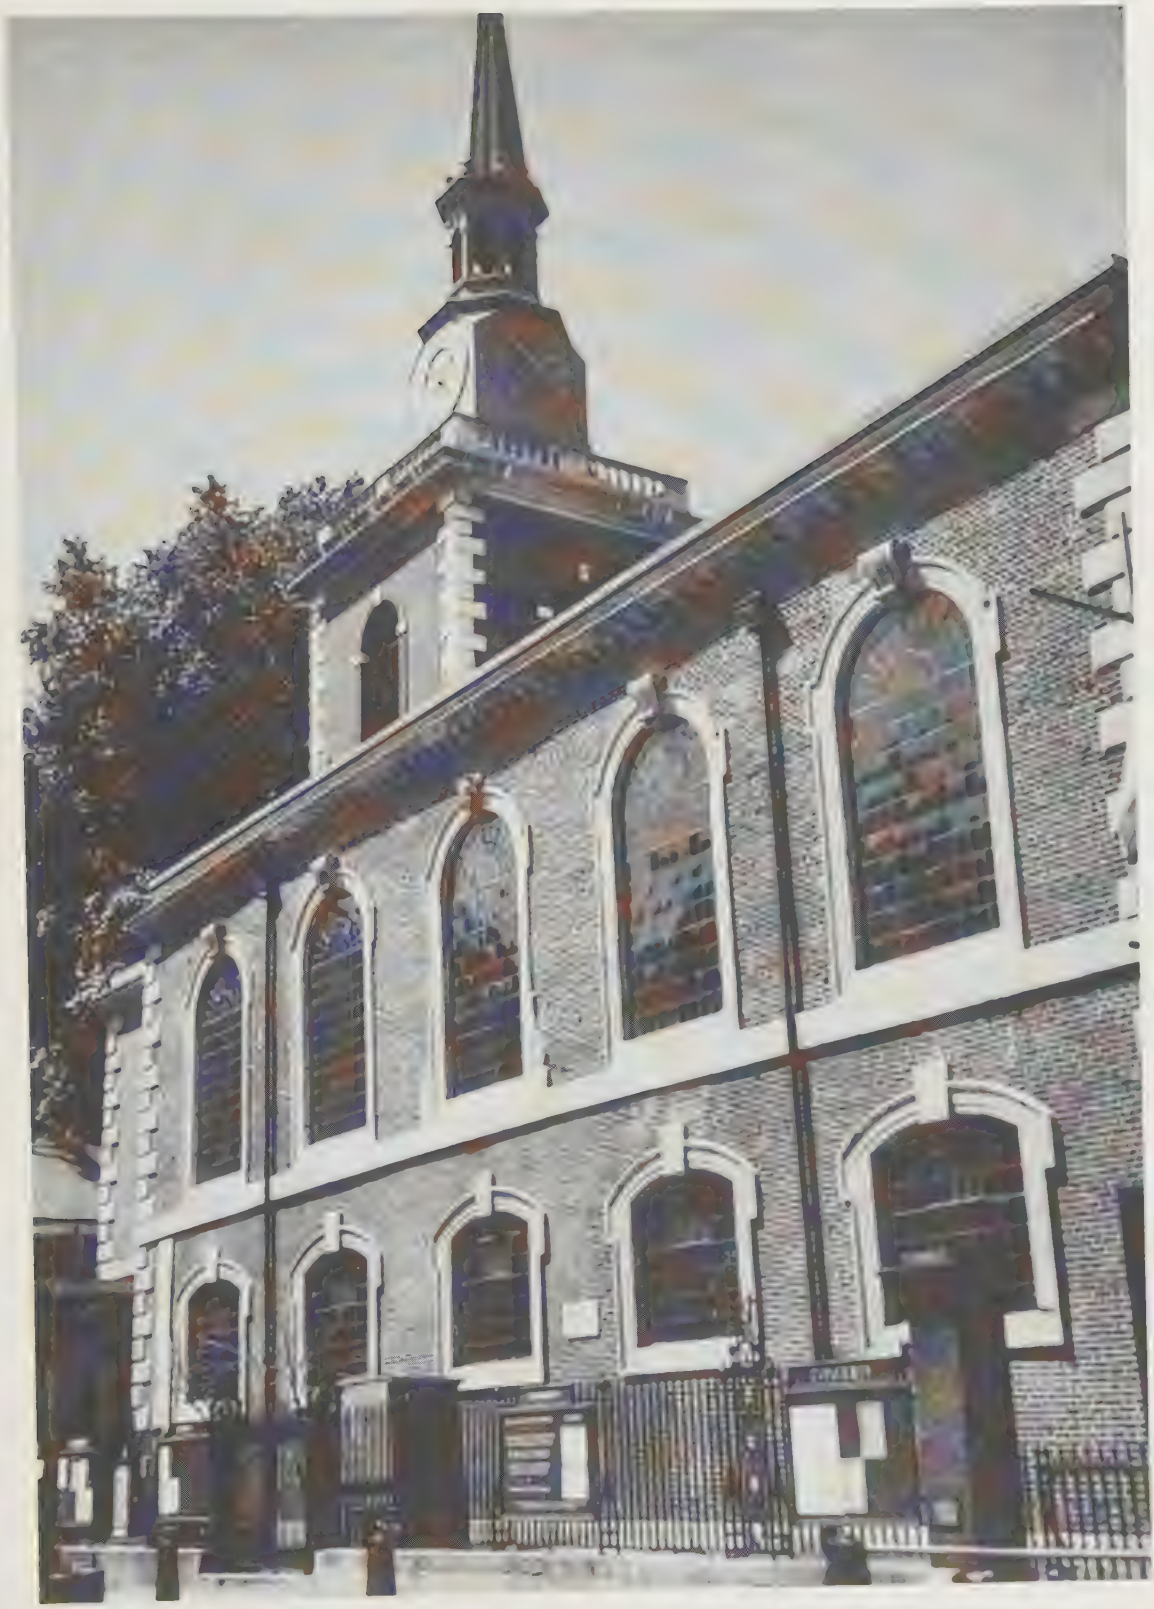
Alexander Collie's comment, written after the report of her death had appeared in the Times, was more matter-of-fact: "Mrs. Greenhow's fate is decided at last and we can lament her loss without laying blame on those who though near at hand were powerless to aid her."[44]

In the meantime, another well-known Confederate had appeared in London. Isabelle Boyd, better known as Belle Boyd, or, as French newspapers called her, "La Belle Rebelle," was a former spy and courier who had been imprisoned in the same Washington jail as Mrs. Greenhow. Sent to England in March 1864 with Confederate dispatches, the blockade-runner in which she was traveling was captured, and she was subsequently banished to Canada. When she finally reached London, she called on Henry Hotze to inform him that the dispatches she was carrying had been destroyed. Belle then surprised everyone by proceeding to marry a former Union naval officer, Samuel W. Hardinge, who had been involved in her capture.

The wedding took place on August 25, 1864 and the next day the Morning Post reported:

> A Confederate Wedding
>
> St James's Church, Piccadily was yesterday the scene of a romantic episode in the fratricidal war now raging on the American continent; as, at the altar of that sacred edifice, Miss Belle Boyd ... pledged her troth to Mr Sam Wylde Hardinge, formerly an officer in the Federal naval service.

The wedding guests included Major Caleb Huse, Henry Hotze, John L. O'Sullivan and James Williams. There was also Captain John Fearn, who after yet another abortive mission,



St. James's Church, Piccadilly, where Belle Boyd was married in November 1864. (Author's photograph) this time to Mexico, was now back in London as a Confederate agent. After the ceremony, everyone adjourned to the Brunswick Hotel in Jermyn Street for the wedding breakfast.

On November 7, to Benjamin Moran's astonishment, Sam Hardinge appeared at the U.S. legation in Upper Portland Place, in search of a loan. Two days later he was there again and Moran thought it extremely impudent of him, after "associating with rebels and marrying a spy," to be begging for money.[45] Hardinge returned to the United States later that month, but was arrested and imprisoned until the following February.

With her husband in a Federal prison, Belle now found herself increasingly short of money, and turned to George Augustus Sala, a prolific, freelance journalist, who in 1863–1864 had covered the Civil War for the Daily Telegraph. Visiting her in her Jermyn Street lodgings, he found her, "not quite friendless, in this great wilderness of London, but, what is worse, absolutely destitute of that indispensable and all-prevailing friend—money." Sala, who was pro-Southern, drew attention to her predicament in a letter to the Morning Herald, "that able and consistent defender of the Southern cause," headed "A Word to Confederate Sympathizers."[46] Some assistance was forthcoming from friends and admirers, but it was only a temporary respite, and Belle now embarked on a memoir describing her wartime adventures. Sala announced her forthcoming work in his "Echoes of the Week" column in the Illustrated London News:

> That famous Amazon of Secessia, Belle Boyd, now Mrs Hardinge—and whose marriage to the gallant but susceptible lieutenant whom she converted ... to Southern proclivities was one of the fashionable events of last season—is in London, and proposes, it is said, to publish her memoirs as a Secesh partisan and aide-de-camp to Stonewall Jackson. These memoirs cannot fail to be very interesting. Belle Boyd ... has suffered captivity, exile and poverty for the cause which she believes to be the true one.[47]

Belle Boyd in Camp and Prison. Written by Herself, with an introduction by "A Friend of the South" (Sala), was advertised in the Index on May 25, 1865 as "now ready" by Saunders, Otley.[48] In his introduction Sala claimed that the work was entirely her own, "with the exception of a few suggestions in the shape of footnotes."

Whatever the extent of Sala's contribution, the book was not well received. The Athenaeum thought Belle's story revealed her hardness and vanity, and disapproved of her exploits; it was, the reviewer concluded, "a very dull book."[49] The Spectator condemned the "unladylike qualities and saucy tone" of the narrative; "few books," wrote the reviewer, "are likely to disenchant Englishmen more thoroughly with the Confederate cause than the memoirs before us."[50] Even the Index remarked: "It is not according very high praise to say that it is among the best of its kind that the American war has thrown upon a glutted market," then tempered that by going on to describe it as "pleasantly, and upon the whole modestly, written, in a style ... free from any serious objection."[51]

One of the first novelists to write about the Civil War was William Stephens Hayward, who in 1862 wrote what was to be the first in a series of novels dealing with the exploits of Captain George, a pro-Confederate English adventurer. In Hunted to Death, or Life in two Hemispheres, the hero meets with various adventures in New York before marrying a Creole beauty in New Orleans. By the time of the second novel, The Black Angel: a Tale of the American Civil War (1863), he is serving with the Confederate Army in Virginia and South Carolina in the early weeks of the war, and in The Star of the South (1864) he is a cavalry commander at First Manassas. The Fiery Cross; a Tale of the Great American War, the next novel in the series, which deals with the battle of Shiloh and the capture of New Orleans, did not appear until 1866, while the final one, The Rebel Privateer; or the Last Cruise of the Black Angel, which includes Lincoln's assassination, was not published until 1874. The first two novels in the series were published by Ward & Lock, the last three by Charles H. Clarke.

George Augustus Sala, who reported the Civil War for the Daily Telegraph and assisted Belle Boyd with her memoirs. (Author's collection)

The Elopement: A Tale of the Confederate States of America (1863) was brought out by William Freeman, the first publisher of the Index. It was by "Miss L. Fairfax," a pseudonym which hid the identity of Celia Logan, an American journalist, novelist and dramatist, who came to Europe in 1858, married an artist called M.K. Kellog, and worked as a reader and editor for a London publishing house. The subtitle is rather misleading: most of the novel is set in pre-war America, much of it in the North, and only the last two chapters are concerned with the war itself. It is the story of the unfortunate Amanda, "a white negress" from Georgia, whose lover is killed at the first battle of Manassas, and who later, at New Orleans, throws herself into the Mississippi to save her virtue. "General Felun," the military governor there, is a thinly veiled portrait of Benjamin Butler.

Nothing seems to be known about Florence J. O'Connor, the author of The Heroine of the Confederacy; or Truth and Justice (Harrison, 1864), a literary curiosity, part novel, part historical narrative which incorporates official notices and correspondence. It is dedicated to Colonel Robert H. Barrow, C.S.A., "The Hero of Belmont" (an early, inconclusive engagement in Missouri), and illustrated with photographs of the author, Colonel Barrow and Lieutenant Beverley Kennon, C.S.N. The "heroine" is Natalie de Villerie, an orphan "who shone as a star of the first magnitude in every assembly," and background events include First Manassas, the Trent incident and the fall of New Orleans.

A number of other novels about the Civil War South, by authors like Ouida (Marie Louise de la Ramée), Benjamin Disraeli, R. D. Blackmore and Percy Greg (who had written for the Index), appeared in the 1870s and early 1880s. One American critic has commented on "the duration of this pro–Confederate tradition in English fiction," remarking, "it is surprising that so much sentiment and romance could be concentrated on a way of American life which before the war had attracted almost no attention from English novelists." Though "the wartime novels had ... only fictionalized the view of the war spread by The Times, the Saturday Review and most of the other influential journals of England," they were really continuing an anti–Yankee tradition which had started as far back as the 1830s.[52]

In the end, the cultural impact of the Civil War turned out to be fairly short-lived. It found its most enduring expression in the published accounts of life in the Confederate South written by observers like Arthur Fremantle, Fitzgerald Ross and William Russell, and its most visible one in John Foley's statue of Stonewall Jackson, erected at Richmond, Virginia, in 1875, with money collected in London from British sympathizers.

10

Support for the South?

A word or two of sympathy, that costs us not a penny,
We give the gallant Southerners, the few against the many,
We say their noble fortitude of final triumph presages,
And praise in Blackwood's Magazine JEFF DAVIS and his Messages.
—Punch, September 5, 1863

The humorous magazine Punch clearly thought that English support for the South did not run very deep. The extent of that support is still a matter of debate among historians, some of whom now think it was not just limited to the middle and upper classes, as was once supposed, but was more widely spread throughout the population.

There was a natural tendency by some Confederates, both during and after the war, to exaggerate the amount of support they thought they enjoyed. Caleb Huse believed that English sympathy for the South was universal and James Mason was also certain that the Confederacy enjoyed the entire support of those sections of society which had an opinion. In his memoirs, James Bulloch wrote: "Northern men often complained of the sympathy exhibited ... in England for the Confederate cause. I have reason to believe that at least five out of every seven in the middle and upper classes in England were favourable to the South...," though how he arrived at that estimate is impossible to say.[1]

Other Confederates saw things rather differently. In a letter written in January 1863, Matthew Maury remarked: "Many of our friends here have mistaken British admiration of Southern pluck and newspaper spite at Yankee insolence as Southern sympathy. No such thing. There is no love for the South here. In its American policy the British government fairly represents the British people."[2] A few months later Douglas Forrest noted in his diary: "There is a great deal of sympathy felt for us in England & there it ends. As a distinguished gentleman said the other day to me, 'England will aid us when her aid can avail us nothing & not before.'"[3]

On his return from England in January 1864, J.E. Ward of Georgia told Robert Kean, head of the Confederate Bureau of War, that he had met no Englishman who did not wish the Confederates success, but at the same time, none who wanted Great Britain to intervene.[4] After the war, John Peyton offered an equally skeptical view of support for the South, concluding, "They [the English] patted her on the back as the weaker of the two combatants ... not because they loved her, but because they disliked the Yankees," though he admitted, "Confederate flags, manufactured by wholesale, were at many houses hoisted at dinner, over dishes of smoking roast beef, and hung gracefully from the walls of parlours and saloons."[5]

Like the Confederates, Northerners also sometimes exaggerated the extent of public sympathy for the South. In June 1862, Benjamin Moran observed despairingly, "British officials openly aid rebel sympathizers to violate the blockade, and the Queen's proclamation [of neutrality] ... It is clear ... that the entire British people ... have openly and shamefully aided the rebels while hypocritically professing neutrality."[6] The following month, the sight of well-dressed Britons celebrating recent "rebel successes" (probably the Seven Days' Battles) at Blanchard's restaurant in Soho enraged him.

"The late cessation of our progress has had the effect of encouraging the hopes of the people here who sympathize with the rebellion. I think there can now be little doubt that they constitute much the greater part of the active classes of this kingdom," remarked U.S. minister Charles Francis Adams to Secretary of State William H. Seward in July 1862. In December of that year, writing his son in the Union Army, he expressed the opinion that "the great body of the aristocracy and the wealthy commercial class are anxious to see the United States go to pieces." In another letter, written in September 1863, he elaborated on this theme, observing that while the aristocracy were very much against the United States, they did "little or nothing to sustain the rebellion," whereas "the commercial and moneyed people go a step further and furnish more or less of material aid."[7]

"All the mercantile & upper classes are entirely against the North," remarked U.S. agent John Forbes, in a sweeping generalization in March 1863, but added, "the emancipation movement is coming to our rescue, and the people are with us and ... the vicious London Times shakes to hear them."[8] Some ten years after the war the New York Tribune observed, "The public feeling in London [then] was almost universally in favour of the South."[9]

As the war continued, the level of support for the South fluctuated according to its military fortunes. In a dispatch to Washington in July 1862, Consul Freeman Morse wrote: "Our check, if it be not a reverse, before Richmond [the Seven Days' Battles] has caused increased activity among the rebel agents here, and given them and their numerous friends here great confidence in the early establishment of 'Southern Independence.'"[10]

"When Lee was known to be on his march," Morse observed in August 1863, "it excited very general interest here and a strong desire in influential circles for his success. This desire was openly proclaimed in chop houses, club rooms, railway carriages and in most places of resort for what is called here the better class of society."[11] The Confederate defeat at Gettysburg, together with the loss of Vicksburg, caused consternation. "The news of the check sustained by our forces at Gettysburg, coupled with the reported fall of Vicksburg, was so unexpected as to spread very general dismay not only among the active sympathizers of our cause, but even among those who take merely a selfish interest in the great struggle," reported Henry Hotze to Judah Benjamin, while Henry Adams, writing his brother, described, no doubt gleefully, how the salons of London were in tears when the surrender of Vicksburg became known.[12]

"Selfish interest" undoubtedly played an important part in the support which either side enjoyed. Even James Spence, whose efforts on behalf of the Confederacy resulted in the neglect of his own business, was not immune from this. In a letter to Judah Benjamin, Henry Hotze remarked that Spence "contends that while his espousal of our cause arises from sincere conviction ... he never pretended that he sought a financial connection with the Government without expectation of profit to himself as well as to us ... and he complained that he is not only disappointed in his just expectation but a loser to a ruinous extent by reason of that connection."[13] He was subsequently compensated by the Confederate government for his losses.

Secession had been regarded by many English people as inevitable and irreversible; it was something the North should accept, and the war was therefore futile and unjustified. When it came, however, there was no lack of admiration for the South's military skills and gallantry, its bid for nationhood seen as a struggle for freedom, on a par with that previously witnessed in several European and South American countries. "The Confederates are doing their own work alone, nobly and successfully, and they have deserved and obtained the admiration and sympathy of the world," wrote banker John S. Gilliat to a correspondent in Richmond.[14]

Support for the South was not necessarily seen as an endorsement of slavery; indeed, once the South was independent and subject to European influences, many believed the "peculiar institution" would disappear. "It will surely depart as a result of Southern independence and the world's action upon it, as a taper will die out in the sunlight," predicted James Spence in one of his letters to the Times.[15]

Furthermore, as an advocate of free trade, the Confederacy was perceived as Britain's natural ally, as opposed to the Northern States, whose democratic system and growing economic power were viewed with dislike and apprehension. Few doubted that the South would achieve her independence, either on the battlefield or as the result of a negotiated settlement with a North grown weary of the struggle to force her back into the Union. Indeed, for much of the war, the possibility that the South might be defeated was not one which was regarded as worthy of serious consideration.

The thinking within some sections of the British government is illustrated by correspondence between Edmund Hammond, Permanent Under-Secretary at the Foreign Office, and Sir Austen Layard, M.P., Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. In mid–July 1862, after General McClellan's failure to capture Richmond during the Seven Days' Battles, the pro–Southern Hammond was of the opinion that the Confederacy had almost completely established its claim to recognition, but that the British should not interfere until "the Northern cause is more thoroughly degraded." Ten days later he was discussing the matter of funds for a mission to the Confederacy, which before long, it appeared, "we must be prepared to accredit." Yet he failed to grasp the importance of Lee's failure at Antietam and the significance of the prelimary Emancipation Proclamation, and by the end of October had to admit that the idea of recognizing the South had been abandoned because of "its inexpediency."[16]

The British Cabinet itself, uncertain of the outcome of Lee's invasion of Maryland in September 1862, had indeed paused in its deliberations over mediation in the war and recognition of the Confederacy, and then postponed the matter indefinitely. In the circumstances, Chancellor of the Exchequer William E. Gladstone's speech at Newcastle-on-Tyne on October 7, which gave the impression he was speaking for the government, was particularly unfortunate:

> We may have our own opinions about slavery; we may be for or against the South; but there is no doubt that Jefferson Davis and other leaders of the South have made an army; they are making, it appears, a navy; and they have made what is more than either — they have made a nation (loud cheers) ... We may anticipate with certainty the success of the Southern States so far as regards their separation from the North ["Hear, hear"].[17]

Prime Minister Lord Palmerston who pursued a policy of British neutrality throughout the Civil War. (Author's collection)

Although Lord Palmerston's Liberal government had adopted a policy of neutrality, there was considerable support for the Southern cause in Parliament. It was not a party political issue — individual members of Parliament in both Liberal and Conservative parties were sympathetic to the Confederacy. For instance, William Lindsay and John Roebuck, who were two of the principal spokesmen for the Southern lobby during the Civil War, were, respectively, a Liberal and a Conservative, while William Gregory was a Liberal-Conservative (i.e., a Conservative who usually voted with the Liberals).

Exaggerated claims were sometimes made about the extent of Confederate support in Parliament. Henry Hotze's statement that five-sixths of the House of Commons and all but two members of the House of Lords supported them was undoubtedly wishful thinking. Similarly, William Gregory, who should have known better, wrote in his autobiography: "The feelings of the upper-classes undoubtedly preponderated in favour of the South, so much so that when I said in a speech that the adherents of the North in the House of Commons might all be driven home in one omnibus, the remark was received with much cheering."[18]

Prominent pro–Southern members of the House of Commons included Lord Robert Cecil, William E. Duncombe, Sir James Fergusson, Thomas C. Haliburton, John L. Hopwood, Sir Edward Kerrison, John Laird, William S. Lindsay, George M.W. Peacocke, Frederick Peel, John A. Roebuck and James Whiteside. In the early part of the war, they were led by William H. Gregory, M.P. for County Galway, Ireland. Born in Dublin in 1816, William

Cambridge House, Piccadilly, Palmerston's London residence, was visited by a number of Confederates, including propagandist Edwin De Leon and Commissioner James Mason. (Author's photograph)

Henry Gregory had first been elected to Parliament in 1842 and, though he lost his seat in 1847, was reelected ten years later. His predilection for the Confederate cause seems to have been formed during a visit to America in 1859–1860.

In the House of Lords there was support for the South from men like the Marquess of Bath, Lord Campbell, Lord Eustace Cecil, the Earl of Donoughmore, the Marquess of Lothian and Lord Wharncliffe. Two of these were moved to express their feelings in print: Lord Campbell's speech to the House about Confederate recognition was published in 1863, while the Marquess of Lothian was the author of a pamphlet, The Confederate Secession, published the following year.

A number of members of Parliament visited the Confederacy during the war. Among them, in the autumn of 1861, was Crimean War veteran Sir James Fergusson, M.P. for Ayrshire, who was accompanied by the Hon. Robert Bourke (not yet an M.P.). While there, they watched a review of the Stonewall Brigade by Generals Joseph E. Johnston, Pierre G. T. Beauregard and Gustavus W. Smith. The future author Catherine Hopley, whom they encountered, was told that, contrary to what she might have heard, they were there in an unofficial capacity and that England would remain neutral. They were followed, in February 1863, by the Marquess of Hartington, M.P. for North Lancashire; in December 1864 by radical reformer George Thompson, the former M.P. for Tower Hamlets, whose particular parliamentary interests had included free trade and the extension of the ballot; and in January 1865 by Thomas L. Conolly, the Irish M.P. for Donegal, who arrived in the blockade-runner Owl, just in time to witness the collapse of the Confederacy, which he recorded in his diary.[19]

The main topics of parliamentary interest in the early months of the war were Confederate privateering and the treatment of British subjects living in the South. These were being "encouraged" to enlist as early as the summer of 1861 according to journalist William H. Russell, and the introduction of conscription in 1862 exacerbated the situation. Foreigners who did not have permanent residence in the Confederate States were exempt from military service, but this was a controversial ruling which was not always adhered to, and was further complicated by state laws often requiring militia service from all able-bodied white males in the appropriate age group. In July 1863 the House of Commons heard how Robert R. Belsham, an Englishman living in Alabama, had been dipped repeatedly in a tank of water because of his reluctance to join the Confederate Army.[20] British consuls in the Confederacy, who had remained in their posts after secession, attempted to safeguard the rights of British nationals, but this brought them into conflict with both state and Confederate authorities and probably contributed to the decision to expel them in October 1863.

Not until March 7, 1862 did the first major Civil War debate, on the effectiveness of the blockade, take place. It was introduced by William Gregory, who contended that it was a paper blockade, maintained by warships cruising up and down the coast, and not by ones lying off the main ports, and that many vessels had already successfully evaded it. Though the motion was supported by M.P.s like Sir James Fergusson, Lord Robert Cecil and William Lindsay, the government clearly had no intention of challenging the legality of the Federal blockade, which was tantamount to recognizing the South, and the motion was withdrawn without a division.

Henry Adams, son of the U.S. minister, who frequently attended the House of Commons, was present on this occasion, and heard Gregory make his speech: "It was listened to as you would listen to a funeral eulogy. His attacks on us ... and on our blockade were cheered with just enough energy to show the animus that existed in a large proportion of the members, but his motion ... was tossed aside without a division," he wrote his brother, who was serving with the Union Army.[21]

Lindsay, who had supported Gregory's motion, was to introduce one of his own some four months later and on July 18, 1862 the matter of mediation came before the House. If only to save the cotton industry, England should intervene to stop the war, Lindsay argued. There was much opposition to this, and again the motion was withdrawn without coming to a vote.

By the beginning of 1863, leadership of the Southern lobby in the House of Commons had passed to William S. Lindsay and John A. Roebuck, Gregory having concluded that he could do nothing further for the Confederate cause. William Schaw Lindsay, who had been a member of Parliament since 1854 and currently represented Sunderland, was a self-made man. Born at Ayr, Scotland, in 1816 and orphaned at an early age, he started life as a merchant seaman, then in 1840 went into business at Hartlepool. Moving to London in 1845, he rose to become the head of William S. Lindsay & Company, one of the largest shipowning firms in the world.

John Arthur Roebuck was M.P. for Sheffield. Born in Madras, India, in 1802 and educated in Canada, he returned to England in 1824 and trained as a barrister. He first entered Parliament in 1832 and became well-known for his outspoken, radical views, rather priding himself on the nickname of "Tear 'Em," given him by Punch on account of his bulldoglike ferocity in debates. By the 1860s he was described as "a small man, shabbily dressed, leaning on a stick, his face careworn, his voice feeble; but not a man to be lightly encountered — one who ... is still able to withstand his foes, and to lend good aid to his friends."[22]

In his autobiography, Henry Adams recalled them both: "Lindsay, about whom the whole web of rebel interests clung — rams, cruisers, munitions, and Confederate loan; social introductions and parliamentary tactics"; and Roebuck, "an eccentric of eccentrics ... notorious for poor judgment and worse temper ... rather a comical personage -- a favorite subject for Punch to laugh at — with a bitter tongue and a mind enfeebled ... by ... egotism."[23]

On June 30, 1863, Roebuck introduced the debate on his motion: "That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to enter into negotiations with the Great Powers of Europe, for the purpose of obtaining their co-operation in the recognition of the independence of the Confederate States of America."[24] There was a long debate which was adjourned, and not concluded until July 13, but the motion never came to a vote.

As if to encourage the Great Powers, Roebuck and Lindsay took it upon themselves to request an audience with the Emperor Napoleon III. Afterwards, there was some confusion about what was actually said in the course of it, and this attempt at would-be diplomacy was not well received.

Sir John Trelawny, M.P. for Tavistock, Devon, noted in his diary:

> Roebuck ... moved his resolution proposing to take diplomatic steps towards recognition of the Confederate States in America. I read his speech which was deemed to be a clever one & amusing, but I do not think that he will have a great many followers ... Roebuck rather startled the House by his account of his interview with the Emperor of the French. Certainly, R. takes extraordinary steps. [John] Bright described him as being not an ambassador extraordinary, but most extraordinary — & insinuated inaccuracy in the version given of what passed.[25]

Though he was not now in favor of European intervention, Gladstone still believed that Southern independence would ultimately be achieved, and said so:

> We do not believe that the restoration of the American Union by force is attainable. I believe that the public opinion of this country is unanimous upon that subject — well, almost unanimous ... I do not think there is any real or serious grounds for doubt as to the issue of this contest.[26]

The result was described with malicious glee by Henry Adams, when writing to his brother:

> We too have had our excitements this week, as it was the time of the regular annual motion for recognition by the English copperheads. There was a hot debate in Parliament, but the Southern spokesman succeeded in tripping himself up ... So far as our affair is concerned, Mr. Roebuck has done us more good than all our friends.[27]

This was to be the last major debate on the Civil War in the House of Commons, although over the following months there were questions about the Laird rams, the Confederate cruisers, the CSS Georgia, and, as late as July 1864, yet another about mediation from William Lindsay.

At a more popular level, Gladstone's speech of June 30, 1863 was echoed a day or two later in an editorial in the Illustrated Times:

> The conviction that the Confederate States must sooner or later be recognized by the rest of the nations of the world is every day becoming stronger, and is but faintly disputed even by the most zealous friends of the North ... who have now generally abandoned the hope that the Federals will ever be able to restore the Union by force of arms.[28]

On the day Gladstone made his speech, Lee's forces were nearing the little Pennsylvania town of Gettysburg, while the Illustrated Times editorial appeared on the day that Vicksburg surrendered.

As late as January 1865, Alexander Collie, a hard-headed businessman and far from being an idealistic dreamer, wrote to Lord Wharncliffe, a prominent Confederate supporter:

> Bad news have [sic] reached us as regards military matters from the South ... but my faith in its ultimate triumph is as strong as it ever was. We ought to be prepared to hear of Wilmington and Charleston being captured, and of Richmond being evacuated, for events reach in that direction; but, in spite of all, the South will wear the North out and gain its independence.[29]

Many British visitors to the South had been convinced of this: Samuel Day, a journalist, Fitzgerald Ross, a professional soldier, and William Corsan, a businessman, were all certain the Confederacy would never be defeated and would achieve her independence in due course.

The Confederate States of America was already being seen by many as a de facto nation, and when a new reference work, The Statesman's Yearbook, began publication in 1864, its publishers, Macmillan & Company, devoted sixteen pages to it, giving details of its constitution and government, revenue and expenditure, population, trade and commerce — not because the firm was pro-Confederate, but simply for reasons of completeness. It featured in the next edition as well, but within months of publication, the Confederacy was already part of history.

Reuter's News Agency had been started in London in 1851 by the German journalist Paul Julius Reuter. It had grown rapidly, and by 1861 was worldwide in its coverage of financial and commercial news. Its headquarters were in Fleet Street, but at the start of the Civil War it opened a second office near Finsbury Square to deal with American news. Towards the end of July 1861, it was visited by Dudley Mann, who was told it could use all the news from the Confederacy he was able to supply. There were allegations, then and later, that Reuter's was pro–Southern, something it strongly denied since its agents gathered news from both sides.

John A. Roebuck, one of the Confederacy's most vehement and outspoken supporters in the House of Commons. (Illustrated London News)

Benjamin Moran, however, was in no doubt he knew where Reuter's sympathies lay, noting in his journal in August 1861 that its telegrams always seemed to favor the South: "The German, Reuter ... has evidently been bought up by the rebels," he concluded. His comments in November were even more sweeping: "Reuter's telegrams of yesterday are all one-sided again. The slaveocracy have bought him over to their side, together with nearly the whole press of England."[30]

And the press, it is true, was not impartial. At the time of secession, leading newspapers had been fairly sympathetic to the North, but when it became clear that Lincoln's principal war aim was preserving the Union rather than freeing the slaves, press opinion shifted. This pro–Southern bias was reinforced by the Federal rout at First Manassas, when it began to look as if the Confederacy might indeed secure its independence. Nor was it greatly affected by the preliminary Emancipation Proclamation, which Punch derisively called "Abe Lincoln's Last Card," a public admission that the North's military tactics had failed.

"The English press is more Southern than the South itself," observed the German philosopher Karl Marx, then the London correspondent of the New York Herald, in November 1862. A year later, Major Edward Hamley came to much the same conclusion, remarking that "with a few not particularly respectable exceptions, the press here is favourable to the South." And writing just after the war, John Peyton also agreed that "the leading daily papers kept up a constant fire for the South."[31]

With many newspapers catering to a middle- and upper-class readership, there was a tendency on the part of editors to play down Northern successes and minimize Southern defeats. "So completely has the public become convinced of the correctness of the representations continually made in the London press of the desperate condition of our affairs, and of the triumphal progress of General Lee, that the expectation was almost universal to hear of his taking possession of Washington," wrote U.S. minister Charles Francis Adams to Secretary of State William H. Seward in July 1863.[32] When news of the surrender of Vicksburg was received that month, many newspaper editors at first refused to believe it.

At that time, the morning papers were usually regarded as more important and authoritative than the evening ones, and their editors were men of influence. Of the eight then published in London — the Daily News (Thomas Walker), the Daily Telegraph (Edward Lawson), the Morning Advertiser (James Grant), the Morning Herald (Thomas Hamber), the Morning Post (Algernon Borthwick), the Morning Star (Samuel Lucas), the Standard (Thomas Hamber) and the Times (John Delane) — only the Daily News and the Morning Star, which Punch referred to disparagingly as the "London New York Herald," supported the North, and even their proprietors, alleged Benjamin Moran, were "rebel in their tendencies."[33] They were mostly located in Fleet Street and its environs, though the Morning Post was further west, in Wellington Street, on the edge of Covent Garden, and the Times was in its famous home in Printing House Square, near Blackfriars Bridge.

The evening papers were similarly divided in their allegiance, with the Evening Herald, the Evening Standard, the Globe and the Sun favoring the South, and the Evening Star and the Express (the evening edition of the Daily News) backing the North. At the time of the Trent incident, the London American summarized the sympathies of what it regarded as the leading English newspapers as follows: Morning Star (Union); Morning Post (Secession); the Times (Secession); Daily News (Union); Daily Telegraph (Rabid Secession); Morning Advertiser (Secession); Standard (Rabid Secession); and Globe (Secession).[34]

Some Church of England clergymen were sympathetic to the Confederacy. They saw slavery as having a benign influence, bringing Christianity to its servile recipients, and the Rev. William Malet, whose account of his visit to the wartime South was published in 1863, was probably not untypical. It is not without significance that, when it began publication that same year, the Church Times also adopted a pro–Southern viewpoint.

The best-known pro–Confederate parson in London was the Rev. Francis W. Tremlett, the vicar of St. Peter's, Belsize Park. Francis William Tremlett was born in Newfoundland in 1821 and ordained there before coming to England in 1849. In 1861 he became vicar of what was then a new parish, and was sufficiently wealthy to pay for the building of a substantial vicarage, as well as most of the church itself. During the war, he became a close friend of Commander Matthew Maury, who later described him as "the best Confederate in England," and with whom he carried on an extensive correspondence. He also corresponded with other Confederate naval officers, including Captain Semmes, Commanders North, Sinclair and Pegram (the former captain of the Nashville) and Lieutenant Murdaugh.

A number of Confederates who visited London are known to have stayed at a house in nearby Buckland Crescent, which served as the vicarage until 1862, and others lodged in the vicarage itself, which became known as "the home of the Confederates" or "the rebels' roost." Captain Semmes, who had been introduced to the Rev. Tremlett by Commander Bulloch and Commander North, stayed with him twice, and described "the Confederate parson" in his Memoirs of Service Afloat (1869):

> a somewhat portly gentleman, with an unmistakable English face, and dressed in clerical garb — not over clerical either, for, but for his white cravat, and the cut of the collar of his coat, you would not have taken him for a clergyman at all ... The name of the Rev. Francis W. Tremlett, of the Parsonage, in Belsize Park, near Hampstead, London, dwells in my memory, and in that of every other Confederate who ever came in contact with him — and they are not few — like a household word.[35]

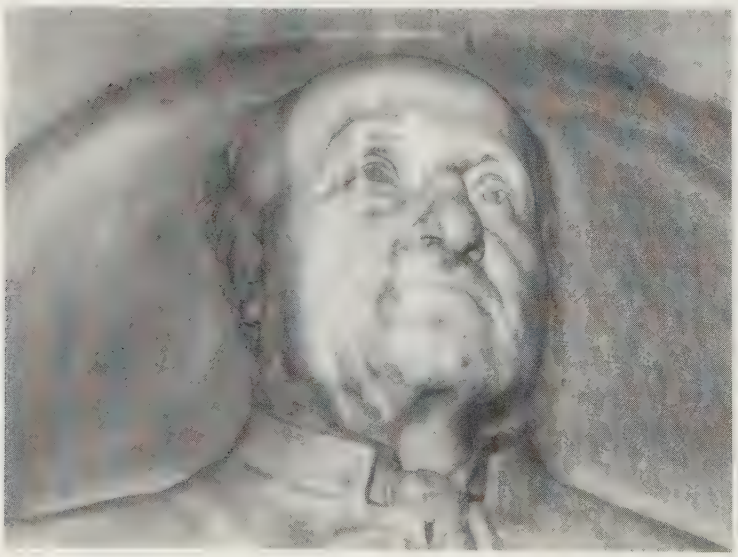
John Peyton dedicated his book, The American Crisis (1867), to "the Rev. F.W. Tremlett ... in admiration of ... his unbounded kindness, and hospitality to all Confederate exiles ..." and later praised him for "the liberal hospitality extended to all friends of the South then in St. Peter's Church, Belsize Park, whose vicar, the Rev. Francis W. Tremlett, was a staunch supporter of the Confederacy. His sermon on Christian Brotherhood, delivered here in November 1863, made special reference to the Civil War in America and sold many thousands of copies. (Author's photograph)

London," while another Confederate, Commander Pegram, writing to Tremlett's sister, Louisa, remarked that he could never repay all the acts of kindness and generosity he had received at the hands of her and her brother.[36]

Sympathy for the Southern cause, however, did not usually extend to Nonconformist ministers. In December 1861, at the time of the Trent incident, the Rev. Dr. John Waddington, the pastor of Union Street Congregational Chapel in Southwark, wrote to Sir Austen Layard at the Foreign Office deploring the idea of British support for the South and the possibility of war with the North. He wrote again in November 1862, expressing his hopes that the British government would not give any help to the slavery cause.[37]

There was also support for the Confederacy among some writers and intellectuals. Those favoring the South included historian and essayist Thomas Carlyle, poet and critic Matthew Arnold, historian Sir John Acton (who was also a Liberal M.P. and friend of Gladstone), novelist Edward Bulwer-Lytton and the poet laureate Alfred Tennyson. Confederate journalist and poet John R. Thompson became a friend of Carlyle, "the Sage of Chelsea," who though publicly neutral, nevertheless hoped for a Southern victory. He questioned Thompson about the Confederacy, its resources, its army, and its supplies of food and powder, and made many inquiries about General Lee, whom he greatly admired, during his visits to Carlyle's house in Cheyne Row, Chelsea.

The first pro–Southern organization in the metropolis was the London Confederate States Aid Association, established in August 1862. Its rules and aims were set out in a pamphlet, An Address to the British Public and all Sympathizers in Europe, a copy of which was obtained by the U.S. minister and sent to the secretary of state in Washington. "Formed for the purpose of giving countenance and support to the Confederate States of America in their struggle to establish and maintain their independence ... all moneys received by the association [were to be] appropriated for purchasing and forwarding to the Confederate States of America the materials ... the best calculated to enable them to carry on the war, and to bring their present protracted struggle to a successful issue."[38]



Memorial to the Rev. Tremlett by Kathleen Shaw in St. Peter's Church. (Author's photograph)

Reporting on this new association, Charles Francis Adams observed wryly, in a letter to Washington, that "an office has been opened in a house in the next street to that in which I am writing, at which place meetings for discussion are held every Wednesday evening." This was in Devonshire Street, just around the corner from the U.S. legation, which was now in Upper Portland Place. The association's meetings were not open to the public at large; a card, countersigned by the secretary, was necessary for admission. Nor was open discussion encouraged: "At one of the earlier [meetings] one person appeared who ventured to question some remark made by one of the speakers, for which act he was immediately expelled."[39] Nothing more was heard of it after 1862.

A house in Buckland Crescent, Belsize Park, belonging to the Rev. Francis W. Tremlett, where a number of Confederate naval officers stayed during the war. (Author's photograph)

The Society for Promoting the Cessation of Hostilities in America was founded in October 1863 by the Rev. Francis Tremlett, Mrs. Rose Greenhow and Commander Matthew Maury. The committee included Lord Robert Cecil, the Marquis of Lothian, Lord Wharncliffe, the Marquess of Bath, Alexander Beresford Hope and William Lindsay, and it held its meetings in Regent Street. The Society claimed to have 5,000 members, and was to prove the most active of the pro-Confederate organizations in London.

Its aims were set out in an article which appeared in the Index on February 11, 1864. "By wide association, by petition, by the publication of papers, by enlisting in its cause the great mass of the clergy and ministers of the gospel," it would "put all the moral pressure possible on the people and government of England, the peoples and governments in America, as by some means or other to restore the blessings of peace to that distracted country."

In May 1864 it sent a pamphlet to all members of Parliament, appealing for immediate action to end the war by mediation. Later that summer it embarked on its most ambitious enterprise, an Address from the people of Great Britain and Ireland to the people of the United States, which called on the latter to make peace with the Confederate States. Appended to the Address were 300,000 signatures, from "men of all ranks, classes, religions and politics" collected "within the short space of three weeks from its first appearance." In September Benjamin Moran noted in his journal the campaign for it, with large posters inviting people to sign the petition and men going from house to house to collect signatures. He thought the address was insulting to the loyal American people, and those who put their names to it, mostly "children and fools ... shop girls and servants."[40]

The petition, seventy-six lines in length, was published in the Times on October 12, 1864, together with a letter from Sir Henry De Hoghton, allegedly one of the principal subscribers to the Cotton Loan. By then it was on its way to America in the care of Joseph Parker of Manchester, to be given to the governor of New York, who, it was hoped, "would place [it] before the people of the United States of America ... with a view to secure the object of our appeal."[41] The initiative proved a failure, Secretary of State Seward refusing to accept anything not approved by the British government.

In December 1863 yet another pro-Southern organization had come into being, when a group of thirty influential gentlemen met at Arklow House in Connaught Place, the home of Alexander Beresford Hope. They were there in response to a circular signed by Beresford Hope, William Lindsay and the Hon. Robert Bourke, who had contributed articles about the Southern states and Jefferson Davis to Blackwood's Magazine. The object of the meeting was to form the Southern Independence Association of London. Among those present were some of the best-known names in London Confederate circles, including Lord Campbell, Lord Robert Cecil, John Gilliat, Lord Wharncliffe, the Earl of Donoughmore and William Gregory. All but two of those present agreed to join the association, whose aim was "to keep before the minds of the British public the policy and justice of recognizing the independence of the Confederate States at the earliest possible moment." Membership was to be one guinea a year, and at least eight members contributed additional funds, among them Alexander Collie.[42]

In its Address to the Public, issued in January 1864, the Association stated:

> Their wisdom in council, their endurance in the field, and the universal self-sacrifice ... have won general sympathy for the Confederates as a people worthy of, and who have earned, their independence. Our commercial classes are also beginning to perceive that our best interests will be promoted by creating a direct trade with a people so enterprising as the Confederates ... Therefore ... the Southern Independence Association of London has been formed ... as the rallying-point of all who believe that the dignity and interest of Great Britain will best be consulted by speedily and cheerfully recognizing a brave people...[43]

"The committee which is appended to the Address," noted pro–Northern academic Goldwin Smith in a pamphlet, "is highly aristocratic in its character. The list of the members of the Association, which has also been published, contains a large proportion of men of title and family, whose names head the list, and a good sprinkling of clergymen, curiously associated with the Member for Sheffield" [John Roebuck].[44]

In spite of its well-intentioned aims, the new association was not universally welcomed by the Confederates. The Address included the assumption that "recognition by Europe must necessarily lead to a revision of the system of servile labour ... in accordance with the spirit of the age, so as to combine the gradual extinction of slavery with the preservation of property..."[45] Dudley Mann wrote indignantly to Judah Benjamin about the offending paragraph, which had supposedly been inserted by James Spence, "the same gentleman who has the reputation of being, par excellence, the British champion of our cause."[46]

Henry Hotze's expectations of "much solid good" from the new associations were to be disappointed. "I am sorry that I can not give you a very glowing account of the two Southern Independence Associations which started out with such favorable auspices," he wrote to

Wharncliffe House, Curzon Street, Mayfair, the residence of Lord Wharncliffe, president of the Southern Independence Association of London. (Author's photograph)

Judah Benjamin in March 1864. "Both languished, partly for want of money and partly for want of moral courage."[47] The two associations did, however, join together in July 1864 to send a deputation to Lord Palmerston. It was headed by the Marquess of Clanricarde and the Bishop of Chichester, and urged the Prime Minister to mediate in the conflict. The response was predictable: a reaffirmation of British neutrality.

Lord Wharncliffe, president of the Southern Independence Association, was also chairman of a committee formed to administer the proceeds of the bazaar held at Liverpool in October 1864 to raise funds for Confederate prisoners-of-war. In November he wrote to Charles Francis Adams to obtain permission for "an accredited agent" to visit Federal prison camps and alleviate the sufferings of the inmates. His request, forwarded to Washington, brought a chilling response from Secretary of State Seward and a denial that any such sufferings existed. "The refusal of the Federal Government will not practically affect the distribution of the fund, for which, unhappily, we can find but too many recipients," Lord Wharncliffe assured the Times, in a long letter in December 1864, which it published along with the correspondence from Adams and Seward.[48]

Potential recipients of the fund were, indeed, not long in making themselves known. In January 1865 Lord Wharncliffe received a number of letters from men claiming to be former Confederate prisoners-of-war or wounded soldiers, some of whom may have been English. Joseph Taylor, late Co. F, 5th Louisiana, described the terrible conditions at Fort Delaware, where he had been held prisoner after being captured at Gettysburg; William S. Warwick, formerly a captain in General Morgan's cavalry, had been wounded three times; James D. Arco had also been wounded three times, though he omitted to give any details; and T. Hampson, "late Capt., 13th Louisiana Regt., and Provost Marshal, Adams' (Louisiana) Brigade," had escaped from Vicksburg in August 1864, before making his way to England. Most of the men were unemployed or in poor health and requested financial help. Some of the letters were referred to the Society for the Relief of Distress, suggesting Lord Wharncliffe had doubts about their authenticity.[49]

Goldwin Smith had observed that the Southern Independence Association was "not so strong in representatives of the interests of the labouring classes." Writing in 1862, just after Second Manassas, Henry Hotze observed: "The sympathies of the intelligent classes are now intensified into a feeling of sincere admiration ... If it cannot be said that this feeling is generally shared by the lower classes, it is at least certain that they also are swayed by that British instinct which hurrahs for the combatant who deals the hardest blows."[50]

The extent of support for the South among the "labouring classes" is still being debated by historians. Once thought to have been almost nonexistent, that view has now been revised somewhat. One modern historian has stated that the evidence suggests that many British workingmen — possibly a majority — were, like Gladstone, sympathetic to the idea of Confederate independence.[51] Another, however, has concluded that, though many working-class newspapers may have supported the South initially, their readers probably did not.[52]

The Bee-Hive, a weekly paper aimed at London workingmen, which began publication in October 1861, was an example of this. Intended as the official organ of the London Trades Council, which had been set up in 1860 as a result, the previous year, of a strike and continuing unrest in the London building trades, it adopted a pro–Confederate stance under its first editor, George Troup, arguing that secession would end slavery, and advocating the breaking of the Yankee blockade. Other prominent labor leaders, including George Potter, a carpenter, Thomas Vize and T.G. Facey of the Painters' union, T.J. Dunning of the Bookbinders', and J.B. Leno, a former shoemaker and prolific versifier, all supported Troup's pro–Southern views.

Things began to change, however, in January 1863, when Troup was replaced by Robert Hartwell, a former Chartist, who supported the North. This was in line with the shift in public opinion which seems to have occurred following Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, and was demonstrated in London by the mass meeting held at the end of that month in support of it at Exeter Hall, in the Strand. "That meeting," wrote the radical M.P. Richard Cobden, one of its organizers, perhaps a little prematurely, "has had a powerful effect on our newspapers and politicians. It has closed the mouths of those who have been advocating the side of the South."[53] By April 1863 the Bee-Hive was of the opinion that support for the Southern cause was now confined to "a very small section among the least thinking of the working millions."[54]

The huge trades union meeting which took place at St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, in March 1863 was "the most notable one in support of the North held throughout the whole course of the war."[55] It led to at least one union, the Bookbinders, disaffiliating itself from the London Trades Council the following year in protest at this pro–Northern agitation. "The trades of London," announced its secretary, T.J. Dunning, who was known as "the Father of London Trades Unionism," "have no confidence in Mr. Lincoln, either an an opponent to slavery or as a friend to the Negro. His Emancipation Proclamation ... they consider less intended to benefit the negro, than to destroy, if possible, the Confederates. Of course we say nothing as to their correctness, but such are the opinions of nine out of every ten workmen we have heard speak on the matter."[56]

Sympathy for the South certainly existed in considerable measure, both inside and outside Parliament. Whatever the actual extent of it, the British government was unlikely to grant the Confederacy diplomatic recognition until her independence was assured by military success. And that recognition would have meant, at the very least, the long-term enmity of the United States, not something that would have been seen as being in Britain's best interests.

Epilogue

Everybody was delighted or feigned delight with the news of Lee's surrender.
— Benjamin Moran, April 24, 1865

With the Civil War coming to an end, former Confederates began to arrive at the U.S. legation in Upper Portland Place, hoping to take the oath of allegiance and obtain passports, with a view to returning home. In May 1865, Benjamin Moran recorded the appearance there of M. Hildreth Bloodgood, "a rebel auditor of accounts," who two years previously had been sent to assist Colin McRae in his investigation of Major Huse's business transactions, and Commander William A. Webb, who had captained three Confederate warships, including "the rebel ram Atlanta," and was in England waiting to take command of another when the war ended.[1] Both were fortunate and were given passports; the amnesty issued by the U.S. government at the end of that month did not apply to Confederates who had worked abroad, and fearing persecution or even imprisonment, many who were in London when the war ended chose to remain there for the time being.

Later that year they were joined by others who had fled, either because they feared indictment for treason, or no longer wished to live in a defeated and devastated South. They included two former members of the Confederate government — Secretary of War Major General John C. Breckinridge and Secretary of State Judah P. Benjamin, who arrived in London separately in August 1865 — and an assortment of ex-senators, state governors and former generals.

For many, it was a stay of months rather than years and they moved on; Paris, with its large Confederate community, was a favorite destination. Writing to James Mason in May 1867, Judah Benjamin estimated that few former Confederates now remained in London, and most of those on the Continent seem to have departed by the middle of the following year.[2] Many had already gone back to America by the time of the universal amnesty of Christmas 1868, but some did not return until the 1870s.

A number of Confederates, of course, had gone back to the South while the war was still in progress. After serving as both a Confederate and state purchasing agent, Major Edward Anderson returned to Georgia in late 1861 and ended the war as a colonel. He was Savannah's first postwar mayor, became a director of both the Atlantic & Gulf and Central Railroads, and died in 1883; he was buried in Laurel Grove Cemetery, Savannah. Thomas King, who had been sent to Europe early in 1861 as a state commissioner for Georgia, returned the following year without having achieved very much; he did not outlive the war, but died in 1864 at Waresboro, Georgia. William Yancey, one of the first Confederate commissioners to be sent to Europe, went home in 1862, a deeply disillusioned man, and was only 49 when he died at his plantation near Montgomery, Alabama, the following year; he was buried there in Old Oakwood Cemetery. Lucius Lamar, one of the Confederacy's lesser-known diplomats, returned in 1863 and served as a judge-advocate in the Army of Northern Virginia in 1864–1865. After the war he became a member of the House of Representatives and a Senator, was Secretary of the Interior in Grover Cleveland's administration, 1885–1888, and was an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court when he died at Macon, Georgia, in 1893. John Fearn, who in turn had been secretary to Commissioners Yancey, Rost and Lamar, also had an impressive postwar career. He established an international law firm with offices in London and New York, held several diplomatic appointments, and was involved in planning the great Chicago Exposition of 1893; he died at Hot Springs, Virginia, in 1899.

Ordered back to the Confederacy in 1864 after the Georgia was decommissioned, Midshipman James Morgan tried his hand at many things after the war, including helping to train the Egyptian Army. His celebrated book, Recollections of a Rebel Reefer, appeared in 1917 and he lived to the age of 83, dying in Washington in 1928. Mrs. Rose Greenhow had also attempted to return to the Confederacy in 1864, but with tragic consequences; the blockade-runner Condor in which she was traveling ran aground off the North Carolina coast near Wilmington, and she was drowned while struggling to get ashore. Her grave is in Oakdale Cemetery, Wilmington.

After a period of recovery following the loss of the Alabama, Raphael Semmes and John Kell returned to the South. Semmes ended the war with the dual ranks of Rear Admiral, C.S.N., and Brigadier General, C.S.A. After being arrested on charges of treason and piracy in late 1865 and detained for three months, he was released and eventually able to return to Mobile to practice law; his Memoirs of Service Afloat was published in 1869. He died at Mobile in 1877 and was buried there in the Catholic graveyard. Kell, who had been promoted to commander, was on sick leave when the war ended. He became a farmer in his native state of Georgia and died there at Sunnyside in 1900, the year his Recollections of a Naval Life appeared.

A number of other Confederate naval officers were on their way back to the South when they learned that the war was over. Flag Officer Samuel Barron, the most senior of them, settled down to the life of a farmer in Essex County, Virginia, and died in 1888. Assistant Paymaster Douglas Forrest, who became an Episcopalian minister and served as rector of a number of churches in different parts of the United States, died while on a visit to Virginia in 1902. Commander James North chose to return to England and rejoin his family, but eventually went back to the United States and also became a farmer in Virginia, dying there in 1893.

Commander Matthew Maury went to Mexico after learning of the Confederate collapse, but after nine months in the impressive-sounding but largely meaningless role of Imperial Commissioner of Immigration, he returned to London in 1866 to be reunited with his family. There, he was guest of honor at a testimonial dinner attended by English naval officers, "scientific men of the highest distinction," and ex–Confederates like General Pierre G. T. Beauregard, and was presented with a purse of 3,000 guineas in appreciation of his services to the maritime world. He was commissioned to write a series of geography textbooks for a New York publisher, and in 1868 was awarded an honorary doctorate by Cambridge University. Later that year he returned to the United States, where he was appointed Professor of Meteorology at the Virginia Military Institute, Lexington. He died there in 1873 and was buried in Hollywood Cemetery, Richmond.

Albert Bledsoe, one of Henry Hotze's associates, returned to the South in 1865 and went to live in Baltimore, becoming a fierce promoter of the Lost Cause. In 1867 he founded the Southern Review, dedicated to "the despised, disfranchised, and down-trodden people of the South," and remained its editor until his death ten years later. After the Index ceased publication, John Thompson found work in London with the Standard newspaper, but returned to the United States in 1866, becoming literary editor of the New York Evening Post. He died in New York in 1873 at the early age of 49 and, like Matthew Maury, was buried in Hollywood Cemetery, Richmond.

Hiram Fuller, who had also worked on the Index, did not go back to America until 1874, but his attempt to reestablish himself there by means of a book called Grand Transformation Scenes in the United States, or Glimpses of Home after Thirteen Years Abroad (1875) was not successful and he returned to Europe. His last few years were spent in Paris, working as a journalist, and he died there in obscurity in 1880. After the Civil War, John O'Sullivan, another of Hotze's journalist colleagues, remained in Europe for some years, dividing his time between London, Paris and Lisbon, before returning to America in 1879. He spent the remainder of his life in New York, dying there in 1895 at the age of 82. After living abroad for a number of years, Confederate propagandist Edwin De Leon also went back to the United States in 1879 and died in New York in 1891. His Secret History of Confederate Diplomacy Abroad, originally written in 1867 as a series of articles for the New York Citizen, was finally published in book form in 2005.

James Mason remained in London until 1866, when he went to Canada to be reunited with his wife and family in Montreal. Two years later he was able to return to his native Virginia, dying near Alexandria in 1871. Sent to London in the closing weeks of the war, in a last desperate attempt by the Confederate government to secure diplomatic recognition in return for the abolition of slavery, Duncan Kenner returned to his ruined Louisiana sugar plantation to rebuild his life. He was so successful that when he died in New Orleans in 1887 his estate was more valuable than it had been before the war. Pierre Rost, who after his unsuccessful postings to Paris and Madrid, seems to have spent the rest of the war in self-imposed exile in provincial France, also returned to Louisiana and died in New Orleans in 1868.

The flamboyant Belle Boyd, who had taken to the English stage to support herself, returned to America in 1866.[3] For a while she continued with her work in the theater, but retired from it three years later. Then, in 1886, she embarked on a new career, giving recitations of her wartime experiences entitled "The Perils of a Spy," dressed in a Confederate uniform of her own design. She continued with these until her death in 1900, at Kilbourne, Wisconsin, while on tour.

Colonel John Peyton, who had served as a state agent for North Carolina, moved to Guernsey in 1866; his book, The American Crisis, appeared the following year. Apart from his travels on the Continent, he remained there until his return to America in 1876. He settled near Staunton, Virginia, devoting his remaining years to farming and literary pursuits until his death in 1896. Lieutenant Thomas Crossan, who had also been a purchasing agent for the Tar Heel state, died in 1865; his colleague, John White, resided in Liverpool for some time after the war, working in the cotton business, but later returned to his native North Carolina, dying there in 1894.

Left almost penniless at the end of the war, with a large family to support, Major Caleb

Huse lived at Auteuil, near Paris, before returning to the United States in 1868, where he started a military school, preparing pupils for entry to West Point. His pamphlet, The Supplies for the Confederate Army, was published in 1904, and he died the following year at Highland Falls, New York. Captain William Crenshaw also remained in Europe until 1868. An astute businessman, he became wealthy in the 1880s mining pyrites for the manufacture of sulphuric acid, and built the first furnace for that purpose in the United States at Richmond; he died there in 1897. James H. Burton, another purchasing agent for the Ordnance Bureau, lived in England for some time after the war before returning to Loudoun County, Virginia, where he farmed for some years; he died in Winchester in 1894.

Among the arrivals in 1865 from the former Confederacy, the most remarkable success story was that of Judah P. Benjamin. In January 1866, at the age of 55, he embarked on a new career, enrolling as a law student at Lincoln's Inn, then going on to become a highly successful lawyer and Queen's Counsel. His Treatise on the Law of Sale of Personal Property ("Benjamin on Sales"), first published in 1868, became a standard legal textbook which went through many editions and helped make his reputation. When he retired in 1883, a farewell dinner was given in his honor at the Inner Temple, a rare occurrence. He died in Paris the following year and was buried in Pere Lachaise Cemetery.

Judah Benjamin's postwar recovery was exceptional; for most ex–Confederates abroad, it was a matter of trying to rebuild their lives in a foreign land, with varying degrees of success. Major Norman Walker, the former agent in Bermuda, arrived in England in May 1865 with his wife, Georgiana, and their children and went to live at Leamington Spa, Warwickshire, where a number of other Southern families were residing.[4] The following year he established a cotton-importing business at Liverpool with his father-in-law, though it is not clear how successful this was. In any event, the Walkers returned to America in 1878, eventually settling in New York, where Georgiana died in 1904 and her husband in 1913; they were both buried on Staten Island.

At the other end of the scale was Louis T. Wigfall of Texas, a former Confederate brigadier and senator, and one of Jefferson Davis's bitterest opponents. He arrived in England about March 1866 and was joined by his family in October, to begin a miserable, poverty-stricken exile in London. One of those who never accepted defeat, he seems to have spent much of his time in a state of intoxication and it was no doubt a relief to all concerned when, in 1872, he was persuaded to return to America. He settled first in Baltimore, then moved to Galveston, Texas, where he died in 1874; he was buried there in the Episcopal Cemetery.

And there were those Confederates who never went back to America at all. After the Index ceased publication in 1865, Henry Hotze moved to Paris, where he continued working as a journalist, and three years later married Ruby Senac, the daughter of a former paymaster in the Confederate Navy. He returned to London for a while at the time of the Franco-Prussian War in 1870, and is known to have visited Constantinople (Istanbul) in 1872 for a newspaper assignment, but eventually he went back to his native Switzerland, dying at Zug in 1887 at the early age of 53. James Williams, one of his associates, who had also written for the Times and the Standard and remained in Europe after the war, died at Graz, Austria, in 1869.

Dudley Mann, one of the first Confederate commissioners, also settled in Paris after the war, and made a living as a journalist; he died there in 1889 at the age of 88. John Slidell, another of the commissioners, chose to remain in Paris, with occasional visits to England, until the fall of the Emperor Napoleon III in 1870; he died the following year on the Isle of Wight. Buried originally in Brighton Cemetery, he was subsequently reinterred at Villejuif (Seine), France.

Commander James Bulloch stayed on in Liverpool, where he had many friends and associates, and became a cotton broker. His book, The Secret Service of the Confederate States in Europe, was published in 1883 and he died at Liverpool in 1901, the year in which his nephew, Theodore Roosevelt, became the twenty-sixth president of the United States. His grave in Toxteth Park Cemetery is marked by a modern headstone erected by the United Daughters of the Confederacy in 1968.

When the Civil War ended, Confederate finances in Europe were exhausted, other than for a certain amount credited to the Navy Department. U.S. Consul Freeman Morse proposed that Fraser, Trenholm & Company, the Confederacy's bankers, should submit their books and accounts to official inspection, and also provide details of any remaining Confederate property still in their possession, such as cotton and steamers, which could then be sold. This arrangement, however, was vetoed by Secretary of State William H. Seward, and instead legal proceedings against Charles Prioleau, one of the principals of Fraser, Trenholm, were set in motion in July 1865, ending two years later with a failed attempt at an out-of-court settlement and bankruptcy.[5]

Colin McRae was sued unsuccessfully in the English courts by the Federal government for Confederate assets believed to be in his possession at the end of the war, and in June 1866 the government also began proceedings against him as the agent of the Confederate Cotton Loan. The case dragged on for three years, but McRae was able to prove that he had accounted to his own government for "the entire proceeds of the loan in payment of supplies and munitions of war to various commissary and quartermaster officers in this country" and it was finally dismissed in May 1869.[6] In both cases, one of the defending lawyers was Judah Benjamin; the irony of that situation cannot have been lost on those involved. McRae never returned to the United States, but emigrated to British Honduras (Belize) in 1867, and died there ten years later.

In an attempt to settle outstanding Confederate government debts, John Breckinridge and Judah Benjamin tried to recover funds thought to be in the possession of Jacob Thompson, the former commissioner in Canada. He had been in London for a while — William E. Gladstone had met him there in early April 1865 — but moved to Paris in July. Exactly how much money he had was a matter of conjecture, but former associates in Canada claimed it was as much as $300,000. Both Breckinridge and Benjamin went to Paris and interviewed Thompson separately, but with only limited success. To avoid a public scandal, they were forced to compromise: Thompson agreed to pay them £12,000, but insisted on retaining another £23,000, which he admitted having, as compensation for the destruction of his plantation in Mississippi.[7]

More information about missing Confederate funds also came to light in November 1865, when Consul Morse learned that "one or two persons here, who appear to have full knowledge of some of the financial operations of the late rebels, say that from £50,000 to £60,000 of Confederate government gold is now held in this city, by some person, house or bank, and that the holders refuse to deliver it to any ex-Confederate agent whatever ... [saying] that it belongs to the United States, if they can find it."[8] He requested authorization to negotiate with the persons in question, though whether the gold, if it ever existed, was eventually retrieved is not known.

Of the men who championed the Confederate cause in Parliament, William Lindsay was forced to give up both political life and the shipping business in 1864 when he lost the use of his legs. He retired to his home at Shepperton Manor, Middlesex, where he devoted his remaining years to writing his four-volume History of Merchant Shipping and Ancient Commerce (1874–1876); he died in 1877. John Roebuck continued to serve as an M.P. until 1868, and again from 1874 through 1879. Later a supporter of Benjamin Disraeli, he was made a privy councillor a year before his death in London in 1878; he was buried at Bushey, Hertfordshire. William Gregory remained in Parliament until 1871, then was appointed Governor of Ceylon (Sri Lanka). He held this post for five years and was knighted during the visit there of the Prince of Wales in 1875. His remaining years were spent chiefly in Ireland, though he died at his London home in 1892. Sir William Gregory: an Autobiography, edited by Lady Gregory, was published two years later.

Alexander Beresford Hope, treasurer of the British Jackson Monumental Fund, returned to Parliament in 1865 and remained an M.P., combining his parliamentary duties with his literary and artistic interests, until his death at Bedgebury Park, Kent, in 1887; he was buried nearby at Kilndown. Lord Wharncliffe, another prominent Confederate supporter, died at his London residence in 1899.

John Gilliat, head of J. K. Gilliat & Company, whom James Mason called "my bankers," had been appointed a director of the Bank of England in 1862 and was Governor in 1883–1884; between 1886 and 1900 he also served as an M.P. He died in London in 1912, at what the Times described as "the ripe age of 82," and was buried at Chorley Wood, Hertfordshire. Archibald Hamilton, the head of Sinclair, Hamilton & Company, and also a director of the London Armory Company, died at Southborough, Kent, in 1880. Edgar Stringer remained a partner in the firm of Stringer, Pembroke & Company until 1879, then continued in business on his own. After his retirement in 1882, he lived in a succession of large houses in west London, but died at Brighton in 1894. He left his widow well-provided for: Mrs. Julia Stringer was worth nearly £27,000 at her own death in 1906.

Thomas Hamber, the "Swiss Captain," continued to edit the Morning Herald until 1869, and the Standard until 1870, and went on to be the editor of three more newspapers over the next twenty years. He died at Mortlake, Surrey, in 1902. John Hopkins, who had been business manager, assistant editor, and eventually publisher of the Index, was a prolific journalist and after the war worked for the Standard for three years, as well as contributing to other newspapers and periodicals; he was also the author of several novels and plays. He died in London in 1888. John Witt, who was also an assistant editor on the Index, became a lawyer and a Queen's Counsel, dying in 1906. Percy Greg, another of the Index's contributors, wrote for many other periodicals, as well as publishing essays, novels and poems. His History of the United States to the Reconstruction of the Union (1887) left its readers in no doubt about his earlier pro–Southern views. He was only 53 when he died in London in 1889.

James Spence continued in business as an iron merchant and cotton broker at Liverpool, but in 1872 moved to London, "so as to be within reach of the literary circle of the metropolis." Later he seems to have returned to Liverpool, but by 1890 was living in South Wales, where he had a tinplate works. He finally retired to London, where he died in 1893.

The Rev. Francis Tremlett, who provided support and hospitality for many Confederates and former Confederates in London, during and after the war, died in 1913 at the remarkable age of 91, after serving for 52 years as vicar of St. Peter's, Belsize Park, and was buried in Hampstead Cemetery. There is a monument to his memory in St. Peter's Church.

John and William Dudgeon, who were among the principal London builders of blockade-runners, continued to operate their business until 1875, when their yards at Millwall and Cubitt Town were closed on the death of William and the mental illness of his brother John; the latter was admitted to an asylum in Edinburgh, where he died in 1881.

Zachariah Pearson was completely ruined by his blockade-running ventures and his disastrous involvement with the CSS Rapphannock. He never recovered his position as a leading shipowner and in later years found work as a ship's surveyor, though in 1882 he was described as "United States commercial agent, ship broker and coal exporter." He died in obscurity in Hull in 1891, though his name lives on in Pearson Park, which he had presented to the people of Hull in 1860; it contains an obelisk to his memory, bearing a relief portrait of him, and a statue of Queen Victoria which he commissioned. Thomas Begbie, though not actually bankrupted by the war, also lost a number of his blockade-runners, and does not seem to have prospered much afterwards as a merchant; he died in London in 1899 in relative poverty.

Though Samuel and Saul Isaac, of Isaac, Campbell & Company, were largely ruined by the war and their firm was forced into liquidation in 1871, both men had married wealthy second wives, so were able to start again and they made a remarkable recovery. Samuel acquired the rights to the unfinished Mersey Tunnel, between Liverpool and Birkenhead, and lived to see it opened in 1885; when he died in London the following year, he left more than £200,000. His younger brother, Saul, was M.P. for Nottingham, 1874–1880, and also had coal-mining interests in that area; he died in London in 1903. Both men were buried in Willesden Cemetery.

Alexander Collie survived his financial difficulties at the end of the war, only to go bankrupt in 1875. It was reported that his mansion in Kensington Palace Gardens, including the furniture and effects, was worth £28,755, while his pictures, watercolor drawings and paintings were valued at a further £14,500.[9] Charged with obtaining £200,000 from a bank by false pretenses, Alexander Collie broke bail and disappeared, leaving his partner, William Collie, to face the bankruptcy proceedings. They dragged on for nearly three years, by which time Alexander Collie had still not been traced.

The Rev. William Malet, the Hertfordshire clergyman whose visit to the Confederacy was described in An Errand to the South in the Summer of 1862, died in 1885, aged 81. The merchant William Corsan, who also visited the Confederacy that same year and wrote of his experiences in Two Months in the Confederate States, died at Sheffield in 1876 at the early age of 51. Lieutenant Colonel Arthur Fremantle, of the Coldstream Guards, author of Three Months in the Southern States, went on to have a distinguished military career, retiring with the rank of general. Subsequently knighted, he served as Governor of Malta from 1894 through 1899, and died on the Isle of Wight in 1901. All three of these books appeared in 1863, but Fitzgerald Ross, with whom Arthur Fremantle had watched the Battle of Gettysburg, did not publish his Visit to the Cities and Camps of the Confederate States until 1865. After its publication he vanished into genteel obscurity, dying at Kensington in 1895; he was buried at Little Bookham in Surrey.

* * *

The men sent to London by the Confederate government varied greatly in their abilities. Some were outstanding, others mediocre, almost verging on the incompetent. Representing a government not yet recognized, and one, furthermore, which endorsed slavery, they worked under difficult conditions, hampered by poor communications, financial problems and increasingly efficient Federal surveillance. In spite of their achievements — and in some cases they were considerable — international political considerations and military developments worked against them, and meant that they were unable to influence the outcome of what their English contemporaries called "the sanguinary contest about which everybody talks and reads."

Appendix A

London Firms with Confederate Links

Numbered postal districts were not introduced in London until 1917, but they are used in the appendices and Gazetteer for ease of reference.

Robert Adams, 76 King William Street (EC4): gun, rifle and pistol manufacturer.

Sir William G. Armstrong & Co., 59 Fenchurch Street (EC3); and Newcastle-upon-Tyne: engineers and armaments manufacturers.

James Ash & Co., Cubitt Town (E14): iron ship builders.

J.H. Ashbridge & Co., Adelaide Chambers, 52 Gracechurch Street (EC3); later 148 Leadenhall Street (EC3); and Liverpool: dealers in bonds and securities.

Baiss Bros. & Co., 102 Leadenhall Street (EC3): wholesale and export druggists.

Barker Bros. & Co., 4 Abchurch Lane (EC4): merchants.

John E. Barnett & Sons, 134 Minories (EC3); Brewhouse Street, Shadwell (E1): wholesale gunmakers.

William J. Barron & Co., 66–67 Aldermanbury (EC2): elastic web makers and wholesale shoe dealers.

Benjamin Beasley, 4 St. James's Street (SW1): gun, rifle and sword maker; also manufacturer of Whitworth rifles ("By appointment to HM War Department").

Thomas S. Begbie, 4 Mansion House Place (EC4); later 36 Walbrook (EC4): shipowner and merchant.

Bennett & Wake, 77 Cornhill (EC3): ship and insurance brokers.

Thomas Bensusan, 75 Old Broad Street (EC2): dealer in stocks and shares.

Thomas Bissell, 75 Tooley Street (SE1): gun, rifle and pistol manufacturer.

Blakely Ordnance Co., 35 Parliament Street (SW1); 28 Gravel Lane and 1 Bear Lane, Southwark (SE1)(works): cannon manufacturers.

Joseph Buckley, 156 Cheapside (EC2): dealer in securities.

R. Gordon Coleman & Co., 28 Clements Lane (EC4): shipowners.

Alexander Collie & Co., 22A Austin Friars (EC2); later 17 Leadenhall Street (EC3); and Liverpool: cotton merchants & commission merchants.

Coutts Bank, 57–59 Strand (WC2).

Crowder, Maynard, Son & Lawford, 57 Coleman Street (EC2): lawyers.

Curtis & Harvey, 74 Lombard Street (EC3); Hounslow Heath (works); and Tonbridge, Kent: gunpowder manufacturers and merchants.

Thomas De La Rue & Co., 109–113 Bunhill Row (EC1): printers & wholesale stationers.

Dent & Co., 61 Strand (WC2); 34–35 Royal Exchange (EC3): chronometer, watch and clock makers.

John T. Dobson, 34 Great St. Helens (EC3): merchant.

John & William Dudgeon, 10 London Street (EC3); Sun Iron Works, Millwall (E14); Cubitt Town (E14): engineers, boilermakers and iron shipbuilders.

Firmin & Sons, 153–155 Strand (WC2); 13 Conduit Street (W1); 12 White Horse Yard, Drury Lane (WC2) (factory): army and navy button manufacturers.

Foster, Porter & Co., 47 Wood Street (EC2); 25 Addle Street (EC2); 21 Aldermanbury (EC2): wholesale hosiers & glovers.

Freshfields & Newman, 5 New Bank Buildings, Princes Street (EC2): lawyers.

John K. Gilliat & Co., 4 Crosby Square (EC3): merchants and bankers.

Goody & Jones, 40 Pall Mall (SW1): military and naval outfitters.

Charles W. & Wentworth Gray, 31 Great St Helens (EC3): merchants.

Greenwood & Batley, 20 Cannon Street (EC4); and Leeds: machinists.

John Hall & Son, 23 Lombard Street (EC3): gunpowder manufacturers.

Sydney Hodgkinson & Co., 4 Laurence Pountney (EC4): general merchants.

Thomas & Charles Hood, Iron Wharf, Earl Street, Blackfriars (EC4): iron merchants and contractors for iron ordnance and munitions of war.

Lambert Hotchkiss, 16 Bishopsgate Street Within (EC2): shipbroker.

Hughes & Kimber, 5 Red Lion Passage, Fleet Street (EC4): importers of lithographic stones, manufacturers of lithographic and copperplate presses, and engravers' and lithographers' materials.

Isaac, Campbell & Co., 71 Jermyn Street (SW1): commission merchants and army contractors; promoters of the Atlantic Trading Company.

Jones, Loyd & Co., 43 Lothbury (EC2): bankers.

M. Kramer, 10 Old Jewry Chambers (EC2): dealer in securities.

William Ladd, 11–12 Beak Street (W1): electrical engineer.

Charles W. Lancaster, 151 New Bond Street (W1); 2 Little Bruton St. (W1) (factory): gunmaker; patentee of the British Lancaster short rifle.

John Lane, Hankey & Co., 25 Old Broad Street (EC2): merchants.

Laurence, Son & Pearce, Auction Mart, Bartholomew Lane (EC2): stockbrokers.

William S. Lindsay & Co., 8 Austin Friars (EC2); 54 Old Broad Street (EC2): shipowners and insurance brokers.

London Armory Co., Henry Street, Bermondsey (SE1); later 36 King William Street (EC4); Victoria Park Mills, Old Ford Road (E2): armaments manufacturers.

Charles Lungley & Co., 4 Brabant Court, Philpot Lane (EC3); Deptford Green Dockyard (SE8); Commercial Dry Dock, Rotherhithe (SE16): shipbuilders.

Henry F. Mackintosh, 11 Crane Court, Fleet Street (EC4): printer.

Morgan Brothers, 21 Bow Lane (EC4): merchants; dealers in bonds.

Frederick Napton, Glass House Yard (EC4): gun carriage maker.

Negretti & Zambra, 1 Hatton Garden (EC1); 59 Cornhill (EC3); 122 Regent Street (W1); 153 Fleet Street (EC4): meteorological, mathematical, surveying, electrical, nautical, chemical and photographic instrument makers.

Overend, Gurney & Co., 65 Lombard Street (EC3): bankers and money dealers.

Z. C. Pearson & Co., 34 Great St. Helens (EC3); later 32 Nicholas Lane (EC4); and Hull: shipowners and brokers.

Peek Brothers & Co., 20–21 Eastcheap (EC3); 31 Love Lane (EC2); 4 St. Mary-at-Hill (EC3): wholesale tea, coffee and spice dealers.

Pile, Spence & Co., 2 Cowper's Court, Cornhill (EC3); and West Hartlepool: shipowners, shipbuilders and ship repairers.

Quilter, Ball, Jay & Co., 3 Moorgate Street (EC2): accountants.

Rayden & Reid, 12 King William Street (EC4): shipbrokers.

Reuter's News Agency, 1 Royal Exchange Buildings (EC3); 2 King Street, Finsbury Square (EC2) (American office).

Richardson Bros. & Co., 17 St. Helens Place (EC3) (counting house); 11 East Road (N1): merchants; saltpeter refiners.

Robinson & Cottam (late Bramahs), 7 Parliament Street (SW1): Lower Belgrave Place (SW1): engineers, iron founders and railway plant contractors.

Robinson & Fleming, 21 Austin Friars (EC2): merchants.

Alexander Ross & Co., Grange Mills, Grange Road, Bermondsey (SE1): army contractors, tanners and leather merchants, accoutrement makers, artillery harness, cavalry equipment.

John Scott Russell & Co., 20 Great George Street (SW1); Blackwall (E14): civil engineers and shipbuilders.

Martin Samuelson & Co., 8 Adam Street (WC2); later 28 Cornhill (EC3); and Hull: engineers and iron shipbuilders.

J. Henry Schroder & Co., 145 Leadenhall Street (EC3): merchants and bankers; members of the European Trading Company.

Stephen W. Silver & Co., 3–6 Bishopsgate (EC2); 66–67 Cornhill (EC3); Silvertown (E16): patentees and manufacturers of telegraphic wire insulators; army and navy contractors; clothing and accoutrement makers.

Sinclair, Hamilton & Co., 11 St. Helen's Place (EC3); later 17 St. Helen's Place: commission merchants.

George A. Spottiswoode, 5 New Street Square (EC4): printer.

Samuel Straker & Sons, 80 Bishopsgate Street Within (EC2); 26 Leadenhall Street (EC3):

printers, lithographers, engravers, wholesale and export stationers.

Stringer, Pembroke & Co., 8 Austin Friars (EC2); 54 Old Broad Street (EC2): ship and insurance brokers; directors of the Mercantile Trading Company.

Charles Tennant, Sons & Co., 9 Mincing Lane (EC3): chemical manufacturers and agents; West India merchants.

Turner Bros., Hyde & Co., Falcon Factory, Whitecross Street (EC1/EC2); and Northampton: boot and shoe manufacturers.

James White, 12 Narrow Street, Limehouse (E14): sailmaker.

Joseph Whitworth & Co., 28 Pall Mall (SW1); and Manchester: engineers, machine tool, cannon and rifle manufacturers.

Wilkinson & Son, 27 Pall Mall (SW1): gun and sword manufacturers and army contractors.

William Wilson & Sons, 3 Aldermary Churchyard, Bow Lane (EC4): wholesale boot and shoemakers.

Joseph S. Wyon, 287 Regent Street (W1); 3 Langham Chambers, Langham Place (W1): medalist and engraver of seals.

Elizabeth Yeomans & Son, 7 St. Mildred's Court, Poultry (EC2); Tenter Street West, Goodmans Fields (E1): gunmakers to Her Majesty's Honorable Board of Ordnance; wholesale gun, pistol and rifle makers and sword cutlers; ships' armaments fitted up and supplied.

Appendix B

Pro-Confederate Publications and Their Publishers

Richard Bentley & Son, 8 New Burlington Street (W1): James Spence. The American Union (1861). (Also translated into French & German.); James Spence. On the Recognition of the Southern Confederation (1862); John L. O'Sullivan. Union, Disunion and Reunion (1862); An English Merchant [William C. Corsan]. Two Months in the Confederate States, including a Visit to New Orleans under the Domination of General Butler (1863). Reissued by Louisiana State University Press, 1996; Rose O. Greenhow. My Imprisonment and the First Year of Abolition Rule at Washington (1863); William W. Malet. An Errand to the South in the Summer of 1862 (1863); James Spence. Southern Independence (1863); James Williams. The Rise and Fall of the Model Republic (1863); The Southern Bazaar, Liverpool, October 1864 (1864).

William Blackwood & Sons, 37 Paternoster Row (EC4): Arthur J. L. Fremantle. Three Months in the Southern States (1863). Reissued by University of Nebraska Press, 1991; Marquis of Lothian. The Confederate Secession (1864). (Also translated into French.); Fitzgerald E.T. Ross. A Visit to the Cities and Camps of the Confederate States (1865). Reissued by University of Illinois Press, 1958; Heros Von Borcke. Memoirs of the Confederate War for Independence (1866).

Chapman & Hall, 193 Piccadilly (W1): A Blockaded British Subject [Catherine C. Hopley]. Life in the South: From the Commencement of the War (1863). Reissued by A.M. Kelly, 1971; [Catherine C. Hopley]. Stonewall Jackson, Late General of the Confederate States Army: A Biographical Sketch and an Outline of the Virginia Campaign (1863); Hiram Fuller. North and South (1863); Frederick A. Maxse. Pro Patria (1863).

William Freeman, 102 Fleet Street (EC4): The Index (1862).

Robert Hardwicke, 192 Piccadilly (W1): John W. Cowell. Southern Secession (1862); Hugo Reid. The American Question in a Nutshell (1862).

Hurst & Blackett, 13 Great Marlborough Street (W1): Samuel P. Day. Down South: Or, An Englishman's Experiences at the Seat of the American War (1862). Reissued by B. Franklin, 1971.

Longman, Green, Longman, Roberts & Green, 14 Ludgate Hill (EC4): James Williams. The South Vindicated (1862). (Also translated into German.)

Henry F. Mackintosh, Crane Court (EC4): The Index (1862–1864). A Northern Man [Hiram Fuller]. Curiosity Visits to Southern Plantations (1863). Charles Mitchell & Co., 12 & 13 Red Lion Court (EC4): P.C. Centz (Plain Common Sense) [Bernard J. Sage]. Davis and Lee: A Vindication of the Southern States, Citizens and Rights (1865).

James Ridgway, 169 Piccadilly (W1): Thomas C. Grattan. England, and the Disrupted States of America (1861); Alexander J.B. Beresford-Hope. The American Disruption (1862); Hiram Fuller. The Causes and Consequences of the Civil War in America (1862); Hiram Fuller. The Flag of Truce: Dedicated to the Emperor of the French (1862); Lord Campbell. Speech in the House of Lords, March 1863 (1863).

Saunders, Otley & Co., 66 Brook Street (W1): Lord Robert Montagu. A Mirror in America (1861); T.D. Ozanne. The South as It Is, or Twenty-One Years' Experience in the Southern States of America (1863); The Cruise of the Alabama and the Sumter, from the Private Journals and Other Papers of Commander R. Semmes, C.S.N., and Other Officers (1864); The Log of the Alabama and the Sumter (1864); Ordnance Instructions for the Confederate States Navy Relating to the Preparation of Vessels of War for Battle, to the Duties of Officers and Others When at Quarters, to Ordnance and Ordnance Stores, and to Gunnery, 3rd ed. (1864); Belle Boyd. Belle Boyd in Camp and Prison (1865). Reissued by Thomas Yoseloff, 1968; Louisiana State University Press, 1998; John L. Peyton. The American Crisis; or, Pages from the Note-book of a State Agent During the Civil War (1867).

Tinsley Brothers, 18 Catherine Street (WC2): George A. Lawrence. Border and Bastille (1863).

Appendix C

Confederate Music Published in London

Boosey & Sons, 28 Holles Street (W1) [now Boosey & Hawkes]: "A Battle Hymn" (ILN, Dec. 1864); "Bonnie Blue Flag" (Harry Macarthy) (ILN, Dec. 1864); "Dixey's Land" (arr. Frederick Buckley) (ILN, Jan. 1865); "Maryland" (George Forbes) (ILN, Dec. 1864); "Maryland Quadrille" (Victor Colline) (ILN, Dec. 1864); "Old King Cotton" (ILN, Jan. 1865)

Brewer & Co., 23 Bishopsgate Street (EC2): "The Death of Stonewall Jackson" (Charles Blamphin) (ILN, Aug. 1864)

Cramer, Beale & Wood, 201 Regent Street (W1) [now Cramer Music]; "War Song of Dixie" (Frederick Buckley); "The Confederates' National Air, Maryland" (James R. Randall)

Foster & King, 16 Hanover Street (W1): "Stonewall Jackson Quadrille" (Henri Talbot) (ILN, Nov. 1862)

Hopwood & Crew, 42 New Bond Street (W1): "The Bonnie Blue Flag" (Harry Macarthy) (ILN, Oct. 1864); "The Boy of the Rappahannock" (Charles Blamphin) (ILN, Jan. 1865); "Dixie" (Daniel D. Emmett) (ILN, Nov. 1864); "Dixey's Land Gallop" (Charles Coote, Jr.) (ILN, Nov. 1861); "Down Among the Cotton" (ILN, Nov. 1864); "It is My Country's Call" (ILN, Oct. 1864); "My Maryland" (ILN, Oct. 1864); "My Southern Home" (ILN, Jan. 1865)

J. Jewell, 104 Great Russell Street (WC1): "The Confederate War March" (Carl Weiner) (ILN, Oct. 1864)

Christopher Lonsdale, 26 Old Bond Street (W1): "A Confederate Raid" (E.M.); "Our Queen Varine" (E.M.)

Joseph Williams, 123 Cheapside (EC2): "Dixie's Land Polka" (Henry Farmer) (ILN, Nov. 1861); "General Jackson's Schottische" (Tidwell, arr. Henry Farmer) (ILN, Sept. 1862); "The Picket of the Potomac" (Henri F. Hemy) (ILN, Jan. 1864)

ILN = Illustrated London News

For details of songs, see Catalogue of Printed Music in the British Library to 1980. 62 vols. (London: K.G. Sauer, 1981–1987). Brief histories of some music publishing firms can be found in Charles Humphries & William C. Smith, Music Publishing in the British Isles from the Earliest Times to the Middle of the Nineteenth Century. (London: Cassell, 1954).

Appendix D

The Southern Lobby in Parliament

House of Commons: Lord Robert Cecil, Conservative M.P. for Stamford (Lincolnshire), 1853–1868; William E. Duncombe, Conservative M.P. for the North Riding of Yorkshire, 1859–1867; Sir James Fergusson, Bt., Conservative M.P. for Ayrshire (Scotland), 1859–1868; William H. Gregory, Liberal-Conservative M.P. for County Galway (Ireland), 1857–1872; Thomas C. Haliburton, Conservative M.P. for Launceston (Cornwall), 1859–1865; John T. Hopwood, Conservative M.P. for Clitheroe (Lancashire), 1857–1865; Sir Edward C. Kerrison, Bt., Conservative M.P. for Eye (Suffolk), 1852–1866; John Laird, Liberal-Conservative M.P. for Birkenhead, 1861–1874; founder of J. Laird, Sons & Co., shipbuilders; William S. Lindsay, Liberal M.P. for Sunderland, 1859–1865; shipowner; George M.W. Peacocke, Conservative M.P. for Maldon (Essex), 1859–1868; Frederick Peel, Liberal M.P. for Bury (Lancashire), 1859–1865; financial secretary to the Treasury; John A. Roebuck, Independent M.P. for Sheffield, 1849–1868; James Whiteside, Q.C., Conservative M.P. for Dublin University, 1859–1866

House of Lords: John A. Thynne, 4th Marquis of Bath; William F. Campbell, 2nd Baron Campbell, 2nd Baron Stratheden; Lord Eustace Cecil; Richard J. Hely-Hutchinson, 4th Earl of Donoughmore; William S. Kerr, 8th Marquis of Lothian; author of The Confederate Secession (1864); Edward M. Stuart-Wortley-Mackenzie, 3rd Baron Wharncliffe

Appendix E

The Southern Independence Association of London

Committee[1]: Edward Akroyd; Marquis of Bath; A. J.B. Beresford-Hope; Hon. Robert Bourke; Lord Campbell; Lord Eustace Cecil; Lord Robert Cecil, M.P.; Hon. C.W.W. Fitzwilliam, M.P.; W.H. Gregory, M.P.; Col. F.S. Greville, M.P.; T.C. Haliburton, M.P.; W.S. Lindsay, M.P.; Marquis of Lothian; G.M.W. Peacocke, M.P.; William Scholefield, M.P.; James Spence; William Vansittart, M.P.; Lord Wharncliffe.

Chairman: A.J.B. Beresford-Hope

Secretary: A. Kintrea

Treasurer: Lord Eustace Cecil

Temporary office: 24 St. James's St. (SW1)

Appendix F

The British Jackson Monumental Fund

Committee[1]: Lord Campbell; Lord Eustace Cecil; Earl of Donoughmore; Hon. W.E. Duncombe, M.P.; Sir James Fergusson, Bt., M.P.; Hon. C.W.W. Fitzwilliam, M.P.; J.S. Gilliat; Col. F.S. Greville, M.P.; Sir E.C. Kerrison, Bt., M.P.; Sir Coutts Lindsay, Bt.; W. S. Lindsay, M.P.; G.M.W. Peacocke, M.P.; G.E. Seymour; James Spence.
Hon. Treasurer: A.J.B. Beresford-Hope
Hon. Secretary: W. H. Gregory, M.P.

There is a slight discrepancy between the weekly lists published in the Index and the records of the Stonewall Jackson Memorial Account at Coutts Bank. The former show a total of £1,040 donated between June 1863 and August 1864; the latter lists £965 subscribed between June 1863 and May 1864, with a further £55 in July and August 1865, making a total of £1,020. Coutts' account also shows various expenses, amounting to some £44, probably for printing and advertising. The account appears to have become dormant in 1877.

Some subscribers to General Jackson's Statue

Edward Akroyd	£5	A. J. B. Beresford-Hope*	£20
D. Forbes Campbell	£5.5s	Lord Campbell*	£10
Lord Eustace Cecil*	£5	Alexander Collie	£50
Sir Henry De Houghton, Bt.	£22.10.6	W.H. De La Rue	£1.1s
Earl of Donoughmore*	£5	Sir Eardley Eardley, Bt.	£10.10s
Sir James Fergusson, Bt., M.P.*	£5	W.H. Gregory, M.P.*	£5
Col. F.S. Greville, M.P.*	£5	Sir E.C. Kerrison, Bt., M.P.*	£10
Marquis of Lothian	£5	H.F. Mackintosh	£1.1s
W.J. Rideout	£1.1s	J.H. Schroder	£50
G.E. Seymour*	£25	James Spence*	£50

*Member of the British Jackson Monumental Fund committee; not all members of it contributed to the fund.

Appendix G

A Note on British Currency

In the early 1860s, the basic unit of currency, as now, was the pound sterling. It then took the form of the gold sovereign, which was divided into 20 shillings or 240 pence. The actual coins in circulation were as follows:

Gold: Sovereign (20 shillings); Half-sovereign (10 shillings)

Silver: Florin (2 shillings); Shilling (12 pence); Sixpence; Threepenny piece

Bronze: Penny; Half-penny; Farthing (quarter-penny)

Bank of England notes for £5, £10, £20, £50, £100, £200, £300, £500 and £1,000 were also issued.

Guineas (21 shillings) and half-guineas (10 shillings and 6 pence), which were gold coins, had been withdrawn from circulation in the early nineteenth century, but the practice of charging in guineas was still common in the 1860s, and lingered on well into the twentieth century.

The exchange rate with the U.S. dollar throughout the Civil War was $4.85. Though there was no official exchange rate with the Confederate dollar, there was an attempt at an unofficial one, which at the time of the Erlanger Loan in 1863 was quoted as $13.33.

Chronology

1861

April	Dudley Mann, one of the three Confederate commissioners appointed for Europe, arrives in London and two weeks later is joined by William Yancey and Pierre Rost, who subsequently proceeds to Paris.
May	The commissioners have two unofficial meetings with Foreign Secretary Lord John Russell. Captain Caleb Huse arrives in London to buy weapons for the Confederate Army. Queen Victoria issues a Proclamation of Neutrality, granting both sides belligerent status. In Parliament, Lord John Russell points out that recognizing the Confederate States as belligerents does not imply diplomatic recognition. Charles Francis Adams, new U.S. minister to Great Britain, arrives to take up his post, as does consul Freeman Morse.
June	James Bulloch, purchasing agent for the Confederate Navy, arrives at Liverpool and subsequently calls on the commissioners in London. Lieutenant James North and Major Edward Anderson reach London, North to buy ships for the Confederate Navy, and Anderson to oversee Army purchasing operations. Private detective Ignatius Pollaky is hired to keep watch on the Confederates.
July	Major Benjamin Ficklin is sent to London to engage craftsmen and buy equipment for printing treasury notes.
August	Pierre Rost rejoins William Yancey and Dudley Mann in London, for another meeting with Lord John Russell, but their request to see him is refused.
September	After new commissioners James Mason and John Slidell are appointed for Europe, William Yancey resigns, but is asked to remain in London until his replacement arrives.
October	Henry Hotze visits London to check on arms shipments. James Spence's The American Union is published. The Bee-Hive, a workman's paper with a pro–Confederate bias, begins publication. Major Anderson leaves London for Liverpool, to return to the Confederacy.
November	William Yancey and Dudley Mann are guests of honor at a banquet given at Fishmongers' Hall. The CSS Nashville arrives at Southampton, carrying spare officers for Confederate ships being built in England and Colonel John Peyton, state agent for North Carolina, who proceeds to London. Reports of the seizure of Mason and Slidell from the British mail steamer Trent cause a public outcry, with newspaper placards proclaiming "outrage on the British Flag." Pierre Rost again returns to London in the hope of further dialogue with Lord Russell.

December — A royal proclamation, prohibiting the export of arms and munitions, is published.
Lord John Russell declines to enter into any further communication with the Confederate commissioners.

1862

January — New Confederate commissioner James Mason finally reaches London.
Henry Hotze, Confederate States commercial agent, also arrives. Effigies of Mason and Slidell go on display at Madame Tussaud's waxworks.
The Federals dispense with Ignatius Pollaky's services.

February — The Nashville finally leaves Southampton.
The order prohibiting the export of arms, ammunition and military equipment is revoked.
Pierre Rost moves to Madrid; William Yancey returns to the Confederate States.
James Mason has a meeting with Lord Russell.
Henry Hotze's first editorial is published in the Morning Post.
The first letter by "S" (James Spence) appears in the Times.

March — A debate takes place in Parliament about the effectiveness of the blockade.
Samuel Day's Down South is published.
The Oreto (CSS Florida) sails for Nassau.

April — Commander Raphael Semmes, of the CSS Sumter, arrives in London for a stay of a few weeks.
John Swisher is sent to London by the Texas State Military Board.

May — Henry Hotze begins publication of the Index in Fleet Street.
Colonel Peyton has an unofficial interview with Prime Minister Lord Palmerston.
A bark, the Agrippina (a "Scotch collier"), is chartered by Commander Bulloch as a tender for the Alabama and loaded in the London Docks.

June — Edwin De Leon arrives in London as head of Confederate propaganda in Europe.

July — He has a meeting with Lord Palmerston before proceeding to Paris.
British mediation in the Civil War is debated in Parliament.
The Enrica (CSS Alabama) leaves Liverpool, supposedly for a trial run.

August — The London Confederate States Aid Association is formed.
At a banquet, Lord Palmerston reiterates that Britain will maintain its policy of "a strict and rigid neutrality."

October — James Spence is appointed European financial agent for the Confederacy.
The Index moves to Bouverie Street.

November — A Southerner Just Arrived is produced at the Olympic Theater.
Commander Matthew Maury comes to England to buy ships and materials for the Confederate Navy.
Major Norman Walker is sent to London by the Ordnance Bureau.

December — The Quartermaster Bureau sends Major James Ferguson to London.

1863

January — North Carolina state agents John White and Thomas Crossan arrive in London.
The Bee-Hive gets a new editor and no longer supports the Confederacy.

February — James Mason makes a speech at the lord mayor's banquet at the Mansion House. Lieutenant William Maury arrives in London with $1.5 million in cotton certificates to purchase and equip a commerce raider, and stays with his cousin, Commander Matthew Maury.

March
The Seven Per Cent Cotton Loan is floated in London, Liverpool, Paris, Amsterdam and Frankfurt; "a great carnival" is held at Morley's Hotel to celebrate the event. The London American ceases publication.
Colonel Lucius Lamar, Confederate commissioner to Russia, arrives in London, and remains until mid–April, when he leaves for Paris.
Federals and Confederates opens at the Polygraphic Hall and runs until May. Texas state agent Nelson Clements arrives in London.

April
The Alexandra, being built for the Confederates at Liverpool, is seized.
Catherine Hopley's Life in the South is published.
Confederate naval officers assemble in London prior to joining the CSS Georgia.
The South as It Is, by the Rev. T.D. Ozanne, is published.

June
Colin McRae comes to London to manage the Confederate loan and investigate alleged irregularities in the purchasing operations.
Henry Hotze organizes a Confederate flag poster campaign as a prelude to the forthcoming parliamentary debate about diplomatic recognition.
Parliament debates the recognition of the Confederate States.
The trial takes place at the Court of Exchequer concerning the case of the Alexandra.
An exhibition of Confederate portraits by Benjamin F. Reinhart is held at Revell's Fine Art Gallery.
Colonel Lamar returns to London after his mission is aborted and works with Henry Hotze.

July
The British Jackson Monumental Fund is launched.
Assistant Paymaster Douglas Forrest arrives in London, prior to being assigned to the CSS Rappahannock.
The Rev. William Malet's Errand to the South is published.

September
Charles Francis Adams sends a note to Lord John Russell, pointing out that to allow the Laird rams to sail might mean war with the United States; meanwhile the seizure of the vessels is already under way.
Mrs. Rose Greenhow arrives in England as an unofficial Confederate emissary.
The London Confederate States Commercial League is formed.
James Mason informs Lord John Russell of his instructions to withdraw from London; he leaves for Paris, but returns from time to time.
Albert Bledsoe comes to London and writes for the Index.

October
Captain Samuel Barron arrives in London, en route for Paris, where he is to be Flag Officer Commanding Confederate States Naval Forces in Europe.
The Society for Promoting the Cessation of Hostilities in America is founded.
The Confederate States Exchange Rooms are proposed.

November
Church's Historical Panorama at the St. James's Hall features The Civil War in America.
Colonel Lamar returns to the Confederacy.
Mrs. Greenhow's My Imprisonment is published.
Charles Francis Adams makes representations to Lord John Russell about the CSS Rappahannock.

December
Colin McRae replaces James Spence as chief financial agent in Europe.
The Southern Independence Association of London is formed.
Colonel Arthur Fremantle's Three Months in the Southern States is published.

1864

January
Colonel Josiah Gorgas, head of the Ordnance Bureau, visits London.

March
The Alabama: A Nautical Extravaganza is performed at the Theater Royal, Drury Lane.

May
The Society for Promoting the Cessation of Hostilities addresses an appeal to M.P.s for immediate action.

June
Captain Semmes arrives in London, following the loss of the CSS Alabama in a battle off Cherbourg; he and Commander Maury are guests of the Rev. Francis W. Tremlett in Belsize Park.
The steamer Hawk, intended as a privateer in the Virginia Volunteer Navy, leaves London for Bermuda.
A Confederate bank in London is proposed by J. Henry Schroder and Emile Erlanger.

July
The Society for Promoting the Cessation of Hostilities and the Southern Independence Association of London make a joint appeal to Lord Palmerston for mediation in the war.
James Mason meets Lord Palmerston.
John Seymour is acquitted of violating the Foreign Enlistment Act in the Rappahannock affair.
John Thompson comes to London to work on the Index.
The Cruise of the Alabama and Sumter is published.

August
A Confederate wedding takes place at St. James's church, Piccadilly.
Major Walker comes to London again on Confederate business.
Mrs. Greenhow leaves London to return to the Confederate States.

September
John Witt is appointed assistant editor of the Index.

October
The Index moves to the Strand.
Captain Semmes returns to the Confederacy.
The Sea King, soon to become the CSS Shenandoah, sails from London.

November
Mrs. Greenhow is reported drowned.
Lord Wharncliffe asks permission for an "accredited agent" to be allowed to visit Confederate prisoners-of-war in Federal prison camps, but is unsuccessful.

1865

January
The Hawk, now returned to London, is sold at auction to pay its debts.

February
Lieutenant Colonel Heros Von Borcke arrives in London on a special mission for the Confederate government.
William Rumble, an Admiralty official, is found not guilty of a breach of the Foreign Enlistment Act in connection with the CSS Rappahannock.

March
Duncan Kenner comes to London on a secret mission from President Davis.
Officers take over from the CSS Florida arrive in London, on their way to join the ironclad CSS Stonewall.
Reports of the fall of Charleston create consternation among Confederate supporters.
James Mason and Duncan Kenner meet Lord Palmerston to discuss diplomatic recognition.
The last payment of interest on the Confederate loan is made.

April
Flag Officer Barron, Commanders North, Sinclair and Pegram, Assistant Paymaster Forrest and other naval officers leave for Havana.
A dinner is held in honor of Commander Maury prior to his return to the Confederacy.
News of Lee's surrender reaches London.
The reports of Lincoln's assassination cause intense excitement in the West End, leading John Thompson to remark that he "never witnessed such a sensation in London."

May
Belle Boyd in Camp and Prison is published.
Captain Ross's Visit to the Cities and Camps of the Confederate States also appears.

June
The Times publishes an official circular, declaring the Civil War to be at an end.

August
The Confederate's Daughter opens at the Britannia Theater, Hoxton.
The Index ceases publication.

November
The CSS Shenandoah surrenders at Liverpool.

Gazetteer

The following principal Confederate sites in London, mentioned in the text and described below, can still be seen: Arklow House, W2; 3 Belsize Square, NW3; 35 Buckland Crescent, NW3; 38 Clarendon Road, W11; 15 Half Moon Street, W1; 162 New Bond Street, W1; 40 Pall Mall, SW1; St. James's Church, W1; St. Peter's Church, NW3; 34 Sackville Street, W1; 17 Savile Row, W1; Wharncliffe House, W1.

Adelphi Theater see Strand

Albemarle Street (W1)

At the time of Commander Maury's stay in December 1862, the Albemarle Hotel, on the corner of Piccadilly, was owned by Louis Schill. The hotel, which was rebuilt in 1889, closed about 1905 and is now a suite of offices called Albemarle House.

The first Confederate commissioner to arrive in London, Dudley Mann had found lodgings at 40 Albemarle Street by May 1861; the premises then belonged to William Markwell, a wine and spirit merchant. Although subsequently commissioner to Belgium and the Vatican, Mann nevertheless appears to have been in London for much of the war, living at this address.

Arklow House see Connaught Place

Austin Friars (EC2)

The offices of W. S. Lindsay & Co., leading shipowners and insurance brokers, were at 8 Austin Friars; Commissioner Yancey went there in May 1861 and had "a long & interesting interview" with Mr. Lindsay. Edgar Stringer and Edward Pembroke, employees of Lindsay, set up the firm of Stringer, Pembroke & Co. c1864, and took over these premises, as well as others in Old Broad Street, when Lindsay retired.

Alexander Collie & Co., cotton merchants and major operators of blockade-runners, had a London office at 22A Austin Friars until 1864, when they moved to 17 Leadenhall Street. Agents like Major Huse and Captain Crenshaw seem to have used the premises as an accommodation address for correspondence.

Baker Street (W1)

Since 1835 Madame Tussaud's Waxworks on Baker Street had been a leading tourist attraction and was visited by a number of Confederates, including Lieutenant North in July 1861 and Assistant Paymaster Forrest in August 1863; Forrest was much impressed, finding them housed in "a magnificent building and admirably appointed." The collection moved to its Marylebone Road site in 1884.

Belsize Square (NW3)

Designed by J.R. St. Aubyn Mumford for the new suburb of Belsize Park and consecrated in 1859, St. Peter's Church, Belsize Square, was built largely at the expense of its first incumbent, the Rev. Francis Tremlett, who paid for the nave, aisles and transepts. A staunch Confederate, his sermon, Christian Brotherhood: Its Claims and Duties, with a Special Reference to the Fratricidal War in America, delivered here in November 1863, was printed and sent to churches throughout the country; it sold many thousands of copies. There is a memorial to him by Kathleen Shaw, on the wall by the vestry door, erected in 1915; his sister, Louisa, who corresponded with Captain Semmes and Commander Pegram, died in 1912 and is commemorated by a brass tablet in the side chapel.

Usually referred to in the nineteenth century as the Parsonage, St. Peter's Vicarage was built in 1862, also by the Rev. Tremlett; even by mid–Victorian standards it was massive. Confederates and their supporters were frequent guests here during the Civil War, and it became known as "the home of the Confederates" and "the Rebels' roost."

Ex-Confederates who came here after the war included Jefferson and Varina Davis, and ex-generals Pierre Beauregard, William Pendleton and Walter Stevens. The Rev. Tremlett remained here until his death in 1913 and it was demolished the same year to make way for a new vicarage.

In March 1866 Matthew Maury returned from Mexico and was reunited with his family at 30 Harley Street, where they rented rooms. From there they moved to 41 Clarendon Terrace, Belsize Road, in July, then to more comfortable accommodation at 3 Belsize Square in November. It cost $40 a week for food and lodgings "for all hands" (the Maurys and their four children) and was conveniently close to St. Peter's Vicarage, where the Rev. Francis Tremlett lived. The Maurys were to remain here until their return to the United States in July 1868. The house still exists.

Berners Street (W1)

Assistant Paymaster Forrest stayed at the Berners Hotel when he arrived in London at the end of July 1863, and probably again after his return from Liverpool the following month; it was then owned by Mrs. Louisa Ashton, the widow of its founder, Thomas Ashton. The hotel, which was rebuilt c1909, is still in existence.

Bouverie Street (EC4)

The Index left Fleet Street in October 1862 and moved to 13 Bouverie Street, next-door-but-two to the pro–Northern Daily News; it was published there until October 1864, when it transferred to the Strand. The paper occupied two small rooms in a building it shared with other publishers, engravers and a kitchen-range manufacturer.

Britannia Theater see Hoxton Street

Brunswick Hotel see Jermyn Street

Buckingham Palace Road (SW1)

When Assistant Paymaster Forrest stayed at the Grosvenor Hotel in November 1863, it had only been open two years. The Grosvenor was reconstructed in 1892–1899 and extended in 1907, but externally is not greatly changed. It is still a major London hotel.

Buckland Crescent (NW3)

Built in the late 1850s, 11 (now 35) Buckland Crescent, Belsize Park, served as a temporary vicarage for St. Peter's Church until the one in Belsize Square was completed in 1862. It remained the property of the incumbent, the Rev. Francis Tremlett, a staunch supporter of the South, and a number of Confederates are known to have stayed there in the early weeks of 1863, among them Commander Sinclair and Lieutenants Chapman and Evans.

Bunhill Row (EC1)

The premises of Thomas De La Rue & Co., stationers and printers, at 109–113 Bunhill Row, were visited by various Confederate agents, including Commander Bulloch, Commander Sinclair and Major Ficklin, who may also have lodged there and used them as an accommodation address for correspondence. They were destroyed in the London Blitz in 1940.

Burlington Hotel see Cork Street

Bury Street (SW1)

Mrs. E. Preston, of 31 Bury Street, St. James's, advertised "Furnished apartments and bedrooms to let" in the Index from September 1862 to January 1863, and Henry Hotze himself stayed there when he arrived in London. At least two other Confederates, Lieutenants Chapman and Carter, are also known to have lodged with Mrs. Preston.

Cambridge House see Piccadilly

Chesham Place (SW1)

There is a plaque on 37 Chesham Place to mark the residence here, from 1841 until 1870, of Lord John Russell, foreign secretary during the Civil War, and twice prime minister. Here he had interviews with commissioners William Yancey, Pierre Rost and Dudley Mann in May 1861, and with their successor, James Mason, in February 1862.

Cheyne Row (SW3)

Confederate journalist and poet John Thompson visited 5 (now 24) Cheyne Row, Chelsea, the home of Thomas Carlyle, on a number of occasions during his stay in London between 1864 and 1866. The house, which was Carlyle's home from 1834 until 1881, is marked with a plaque; it has been the property of the National Trust since 1936 and is open to the public.

Clarendon Road (W11)

Major Huse had moved from Jermyn Street to 38 Clarendon Road, Notting Hill, by July 1862; this may have been because of the arrival of his wife and children, though evidence for this is lacking. He was still at this address in 1863, but by February 1864 was living in the suburbs of Paris, in a house provided rent-free by the banker Emile Erlanger; 38 Clarendon Road seems little changed externally.

Clifford Street (W1)

Captain Ross, who wrote A Visit to the Cities and Camps of the Confederate States, was living at 3 Clifford Street when it was published in 1865; Lieutenant Colonel Von Borcke, author of Memoirs of the Confederate War for Independence, published the following year, also lodged there. The house was rebuilt in the late nineteenth century.

Connaught Place (W2)

Alexander Beresford Hope, a leading supporter of the South, lived at Arklow House, 1–2 Connaught Place. A number of Confederates came here during the war, including William Yancey, James Mason, Commander Bulloch, James Spence, Henry Hotze and Edwin De Leon. A plaque indicates that in 1883–1892 it was also the home of Lord Randolph Churchill, father of Sir Winston Churchill.

Cork Street (W1)

Flag Officer Barron, Commander Maury, Colin McRae, Hildreth Bloodgood and James Spence all stayed at the Burlington Hotel. The hotel was demolished in 1935, and a block of flats, later converted into offices, built on the site.

Covent Garden (WC2)

Assistant Paymaster Forrest was unimpressed with the Tavistock Hotel when he spent a night there in February 1864. It was rebuilt in 1868 and pulled down in 1928.

Crosby Square (EC3)

In September 1863, on the termination of his London mission, James Mason deposited "all the books and other things belonging to the commission" with J. K. Gilliat & Co., merchants and bankers, of 4 Crosby Square. At this time the head of the firm, which had various dealings with the Confederacy, was John Gilliat.

Curzon Street (W1)

The residence of Lord Wharncliffe, president of the Southern Independence Association of London, Wharncliffe House was the scene in February 1865 of a luncheon at which Confederate journalist John Thompson was present, and he commented in his diary on the sumptuous nature of the meal. The white-stuccoed mansion, which still exists, dates from about 1730, and was known for many years as Crewe House. In the twentieth century it was briefly home to two American ambassadors, including Frank Billings Kellog, of the Kellog-Briand Pact (1928), which attempted to outlaw war.

Devonshire Street (W1)

The home of Rev. Arthur Godson, curate of All Souls', Langham Place, 3 Devonshire Street, was where the London Confederate States Aid Association had an office and held its Wednesday evening meetings in the latter part of 1862.

A block of 1930s flats called Goodwood Court stands on the site of 54 Devonshire Street, where James Mason had taken rooms by the middle of May 1862; the house was then occupied by Frederick Hermann, a marquetery manufacturer. Mason was still there at the beginning of October, but a month later had moved to his next and final London address in Upper Seymour Street.

Drury Lane (WC2)

The Theater Royal, where John Morton's nautical extravaganza, The Alabama, was performed in March 1864, dates from 1812, though there have been many alterations since then. It is the oldest theater in London.

Euston Square (NW1)

On their first visit to London in May 1862, Commander Semmes and Lieutenant Kell took rooms in Euston Square. It was then still mostly in private occupation, though there was a boarding house on the north side and a private hotel on the east side. This latter building still exists, as does part of the south side of the original square, renamed Endsleigh Gardens in 1879.

Euston Street (NW1)

Lieutenant North stayed at the Euston Hotel in October 1861, on his way to and from Liverpool. The hotel was demolished in 1963 when Euston Station was rebuilt.

Evans' Music and Supper Rooms see King Street

Fenton's Hotel see St. James's Street

Fishmongers' Hall see King William Street

Fleet Street (EC4)

The Index was first published by William Freeman at 102 Fleet Street in May 1862, and continued to be published from this address until October 1862, when it moved to Bouverie Street.

Garrick Club see King Street

Grosvenor Hotel see Buckingham Palace Road

Half Moon Street (W1)

In May 1861 William Yancey came to lodge at 15 Half Moon Street, the home of Arthur Dare, a hosier and glover, who had a shop in nearby Piccadilly. The following month he was called on by James Bulloch, then by Major Anderson, Lieutenant North and Captain Huse. In August 1861 it was the scene of an altercation between Yancey and Anderson, concerning the former's recommendation of unknown Englishmen for appointments as officers in the Confederate Army and the latter's apparent failure to purchase 20,000 French muskets as a result of slowness. Yancey seems to have remained here until he returned to the Confederacy the following February. The house is now used as offices.

Hampstead Cemetery (NW6)

The Rev. Francis Tremlett, the vicar of St. Peter's, Belsize Park, who died in June 1913, aged 91, is buried here. His grave, which also houses his mother and sister, is marked by a simple cross bearing the patronym "Tremlett."

Hanover Square (W1)

In August 1863, Assistant Paymaster Forrest attended morning service at St. George's Church and was thrilled to discover that one of his eighteenth century ancestors had been married there. St. George's was designed by John James and built in 1721–1724.

Hatchett's Hotel see Piccadilly

Haxell's Hotel see Strand

Haymarket (SW1)

Major Anderson visited the Theater Royal twice, in August and September 1861. Externally, the building is largely unchanged since then, though there have been two major reconstructions of the interior, in 1879 and 1904.

High Holborn (WC1)

In September 1861 Major Anderson visited the Holborn Casino, a place for dancing rather than gambling. It was rebuilt in 1874, when it became the Holborn Restaurant, a celebrated establishment which survived until 1955. The site is now occupied by offices and a supermarket.

Lieutenant Whittle stayed at Wood's Hotel in October 1864 and here he met his contact, prior to embarking in the Sea King, the future CSS Shenandoah. The hotel later featured in Charles Dickens' last, unfinished novel, Edwin Drood (1870), and was demolished in 1895. A plaque on what was formerly the Prudential Assurance building, which stands on the site, records its approximate location.

Hoxton Street (N1)

John Thompson saw Colin Hazlewood's play, The Confederate's Daughter, at the Britannia Theater in August 1865. For many years the Britannia was famous for its melodramas; from 1923 until its destruction by bombing in 1940 it was used as a cinema.

Jermyn Street (SW1)

The Piccadilly Arcade, built in 1910, stands on the site of the Brunswick Hotel, where Belle Boyd stayed from August 1864 until at least January 1865; the owner then was Charles Hughes.

Captain Huse found rooms at 58 Jermyn Street, a lodging house kept by William Wyborn, and in July 1861 he was joined by Major Anderson, who noted in his diary the following month that he was sharing the accommodation with Huse, James Bulloch, and John Fearn (Commissioner Yancey's secretary). Anderson left at the beginning of October, when he returned to the Confederacy, but Huse was still there in March 1862.

Isaac, Campbell & Co., commission merchants and army contractors, established about 1852, were at 71 Jermyn Street, on the corner of Bury Street, by 1861. It was used later by Captain Huse as an accommodation address for correspondence. The firm remained there until after the war, when they moved to East India Avenue, Leadenhall Street. 71 Jermyn Street was rebuilt in 1902.

Belle Boyd was staying at 102 Jermyn Street, a private hotel kept by Mrs. Eliza Wood, in February 1865.

In July 1861 Major Anderson found "cheap lodgings" for Lieutenant North and his family at 108 Jermyn Street, an establishment kept by Henry Porter.

Colonel Peyton, state agent for North Carolina, took furnished rooms in Jermyn Street in November 1861.

Kensington Palace Gardens (W8)

Built in 1845–1846, 12 Kensington Palace Gardens was bought in 1864 by Alexander Collie. He had previously lived in Sussex Gardens, Bayswater, but in January 1865, in a letter to Lord Wharncliffe, he announced that he had now moved to his palatial new abode. Collie lived there until 1875, when he disappeared following his bankruptcy and prosecution for a banking fraud. The house still exists.

King Street (WC2)

James Mason made several visits to the Garrick Club; he dined there in February 1862 as a guest of William Gregory, M.P., and again in April with Alexander Baring, M.P. The club was then at 35 King Street, Covent Garden, and did not move to its present building in Garrick Street until 1864.

Evans' Music-and-Supper Rooms, which Assistant Paymaster Forrest visited in August 1863, were at 43 King Street, Covent Garden, and operated until c1882. They occupied an early eighteenth-century house which has survived, though much restored.

King William Street (EC4)

William Yancey and Dudley Mann were guests of honor at a dinner given by the Fishmongers' Company at Fishmongers' Hall, by London Bridge, in November 1861, at which Yancey made a speech. Fishmongers' Hall, designed by Henry Roberts and completed in 1834, was badly damaged in the London Blitz in 1940.

Knightsbridge (SW7)

Henry Hotze met William E. Gladstone, Chancellor of the Exchequer, at a dinner party at Stratheden House, the residence of Lord Campbell, in July 1862. James Mason had dined there the previous April, and met General Sir James Scarlett, a Crimean War hero, and the novelist Mrs. Caroline Norton. Rutland Court, a block of mansion flats built in 1901, stands on the site.

London Pavilion see Tichborne Street

Mansion House (EC4)

The official residence of the lord mayor of London, the Mansion House was built in 1739–1753 to the designs of George Dance, the Elder. Its splendid Egyptian Hall was the scene of a banquet in February 1863, when Confederate commissioner James Mason was a guest and made an impromptu speech.

Morley's Hotel see Trafalgar Square

New Bond Street (W1)

The Time and Life Building stands on the site of 157 New Bond Street, where in early August 1863, Assistant Paymaster Forrest and three other Confederate naval officers were lodging. The building was then occupied at street level by Henry Browne, a tailor, but the upper part was let as rooms. Later, at the beginning of March 1865, a dozen officers from the Florida arrived there, on their way to join the CSS Stonewall.

William Houghton, a stationer, occupied 162 New Bond Street when Commander Maury stayed there in May 1863. The five-story building, used as shop and office premises, still exists.

Olympic Theater see Wych Street

Osnaburgh Street (NW1)

For many years 10 Osnaburgh Street was the home and studio of sculptor John Foley, and the statue of General "Stonewall" Jackson was made there for the British Jackson Monumental Fund. Work on the statue was in progress by July 1865, though it was not completed until shortly before the sculptor's death in 1874. No. 10 subsequently became No. 30 and there is now a block of flats on the site.

Oxford Street (W1)

Assistant Paymaster Forrest paid a visit to the Princess's Theater in July 1863, but was unimpressed, both with the theater itself and the play (Romeo and Juliet). The Princess's Theater was destroyed by fire in 1880; though rebuilt, it closed in 1902 and was converted into shops. A modern shopping complex called Oxford Walk stands on the site.

Pall Mall (SW1)

Goody & Jones, military tailors, of 40 Pall Mall, advertised the availability of "Confederate Grey Cloth" in the Index. Their narrow-fronted, five-story building, with a stuccoed facade, still exists.

Piccadilly (W1)

The Piccadilly Hotel stands on the site of the St. James's Hall where Hiram Fuller gave a lecture about secession in December 1861. It was then a new building, opened only three years previously. Built as a concert hall, it became famous for its minstrel shows, as well as being used for lectures and readings. It was demolished in 1905.

The only West End church to be designed by Christopher Wren, St. James's church was the scene of Belle Boyd's wedding in August 1864; it was rebuilt following bomb damage in World War II.

Major Anderson and Lieutenant North stayed at Hatchett's Hotel when they first arrived in London in June 1861, and Anderson stayed there twice more the following month. It was rebuilt in 1886 but proved unsuccessful and was forced to close, though Hatchett's Restaurant perpetuated the name for many years.

94 Piccadilly, then called Cambridge House, was the home of Lord Palmerston from 1857 until his death in 1865. Confederates who came to see Palmerston included Colonel Peyton in May 1862, Edwin De Leon in July 1862, and James Mason, who had two meetings with him, in July 1864 and March 1865. The house, which still exists, was occupied by the Naval and Military Club from 1866 until 2000. Palmerston's residence here is commemorated by a plaque.

By mid–February 1862 James Mason had moved to 109 Piccadilly, a rooming house kept by Robert Francis. There until at least the beginning of May, Mason subsequently moved to an address in Devonshire Street.

Polygraphic Hall see William IV Street

Portland Place (W1)

The Royal Institute of British Architects' building occupies the site of 24 (now 66) Portland Place, which housed the U.S. legation at the outbreak of the Civil War. Confederate commissioner Dudley Mann called there in April 1861, on his arrival in London, to see outgoing minister George Dallas.

The U.S. legation was at 5 Upper Portland Place (now 98 Portland Place) from 1862 until 1866. When the Civil War ended, several Confederates living in London went there to obtain passports to return to America, including Hildreth Bloodgood, Colin McRae's assistant, and Commander Webb, formerly of the CSS Atlanta. A plaque records its diplomatic role as well as the fact that it was the home of Henry Adams, who became a distinguished historian.

Princess's Theater see Oxford Street

Regent Street (W1)

The Society for Promoting the Cessation of Hostilities in America had its headquarters at 215 Regent Street. Other occupants of these premises included Bosworth & Harrison, who published the Rev. Francis Tremlett's topical sermon, Christian Brotherhood, in 1863.

Russell Square (WC1)

After their return from Paris in November 1861, Lieutenant North and his family lodged at 37 Russell Square, on the corner of Montague Place, a private residence occupied by the Misses Ellis. They were certainly there by January 1862, and remained until at least June, after which they moved to Scotland. Stewart House, neo–Georgian offices built for the University of London in the 1980s, now stands on the site.

Sackville Street (W1)

When Commander Maury came to London in 1862, he found rooms at 10 Sackville Street, a house whose main occupant was William Frohlich, a military tailor. He was still there in September 1863, but by the following month had moved across the road to 43 Sackville Street, where his landlady was a Mrs. Hopkinson. 10 Sackville Street was rebuilt in 1961–1962, and a modern block called Pegasus House occupies the site of No. 43.

In July 1864, on her arrival in England, Georgiana Walker lodged for a few days at 34 Sackville Street, where she found that one of the other residents was Rose Greenhow, whom she had met in Bermuda. Mrs. Greenhow left in August, but Mrs. Walker again stayed there in September with her husband, Major Walker. The premises then were partly occupied by John Johnstone, an army clothier, and today are still in commercial use.

St. George's Church see Hanover Square

St. Helen's Place (EC3)

Sinclair, Hamilton & Co., commission merchants, had been at 11 St. Helen's Place since the 1850s. A storeroom, where Captain Huse proposed depositing future purchases of arms, and which Major Anderson refers to as "our warehouse," may have been there. The firm later moved to 17 St. Helen's Place, where it remained for many years after the Civil War.

St. James's Church see Piccadilly

St. James's Hall see Piccadilly

St. James's Street (SW1)

Because of the Trent incident, James Mason found himself a celebrity, "called on by a great number of gentlemen within the first few days" of his arrival at Fenton's Hotel at the end of January 1862. How long he was there is uncertain, but by mid–February he had moved to an address in Piccadilly. Fenton's Hotel closed and was demolished in 1886.

St. Mildred's Court (EC2)

The short-lived London Confederate States Commercial League was located at 7 St. Mildred's Court, Poultry, in 1863. The honorary secretary was James Yeomans, of the firm of Elizabeth Yeomans & Son, wholesale gun, pistol and rifle makers, and sword cutlers, whose address it was.

St. Peter's Church & Vicarage see Belsize Square

Savile Row (W1)

A four-story, stucco-fronted house, 17 Savile Row contained the offices of the Confederate States Commercial Agency between 1862 and 1865. Henry Hotze also resided there and was visited by men like Lord Campbell, a leading member of the Southern lobby in the House of Lords; John Thompson, who came to London to work on the Index, lodged there in August 1864 and possibly until he returned to America in 1866. At that time, Savile Row was mainly occupied by physicians and surgeons, and had not yet become world-famous as the home of London's finest tailors. No. 17 was the home of Dr. Richard King, and after he left in 1867 the house served as the offices of London University, and then as the Burlington Fine Arts Club, but is now used for business purposes. 17 Savile Row was a center of Confederate activity in London and is one of the most important sites to survive. A plaque records that it was also the home of architect George Basevi, 1829–1845.

Seymour Street (W1)

By the beginning of November 1862 James Mason had moved to 24 Upper Seymour Street (later 46 Seymour Street), a rooming house kept by the Misses Frances and Elizabeth Davies, and this became his chief base in London. He left for Paris at the end of September 1863, after receiving instructions to terminate his mission to London, but returned briefly about the middle of October to clear up some outstanding matters. In a letter to Judah Benjamin written about this time, he speaks of "having given up my house"; whether this means he rented all the available accommodation, or is simply a figure of speech, is not clear. Nonetheless, he made so many return visits to London, always staying at this address, that he must have made special arrangements to have rooms kept ready for him. In 1864 he was there from mid–February through the beginning of April, from early June through early August, in late September, probably in mid–October and in December. He was there again in January 1865, but had returned to Paris when Duncan Kenner arrived in late February, and came back to London with him at the beginning of March. When the war ended he was still there, and remained until the end of April 1866, when he left for Liverpool, en route for Montreal, where he was reunited with his family.

Stable Yard (SW1)

James Mason twice visited Stafford House, "perhaps the largest and most sumptuous in London," as a guest of the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland in May 1862. The first occasion was a glittering affair, when "a great crowd of the nobility" and members of the royal family, "it was said, were present"; the second was a dinner party which included such guests as Baron Rothschild. Perhaps Mason might have been less enraptured had he known that it had also been the scene of a luncheon given in honor of Harriet Beecher Stowe in 1853, when she was presented with a gold bracelet made in the form of a slave's shackle. Stafford House was built between 1825 and 1841 and renamed Lancaster House after it was presented to the nation in 1913; it is now used for government conferences and receptions.

Strand (WC2)

An account was opened at Coutts Bank, at 59 Strand, for the British Jackson Monumental Fund in June 1863. Founded in 1692, the bank came into the possession of the Coutts family in 1755, and under the direction of Thomas Coutts (d. 1822), it became a leading financial institution, numbering many distinguished people, including members of the royal family, among its clients. Now at 440 Strand, it was rebuilt in 1904 and again in 1978.

In October 1864 the Index moved from Bouverie Street to a large rented house at 291 Strand, and from then until it ceased publication in August 1865 was published from there.

A large establishment ("upwards of one hundred rooms"), Haxell's Hotel advertised in both the Index and the London American. Confederate journalist John Thompson stayed there when he first arrived in London in July 1864. The hotel, which was in two parts, separated by Exeter Hall, closed in the late 1920s; the Strand Palace Hotel, still popular with American visitors, stands on the site.

Major Anderson visited the Adelphi Theater in September 1861, shortly before his return to the Confederacy. The present Adelphi Theater dates from 1930.

Stratheden House see Knightsbridge

Tavistock Hotel see Covent Garden

Tichborne Street (W1)

Assistant Paymaster Forrest visited the London Pavilion Music Hall in August 1863. It was demolished in 1885 when Piccadilly Circus and Shaftesbury Avenue were constructed. A new London Pavilion, whose facade still exists, was built, but on a different site.

Trafalgar Square (WC2)

Captain Huse stayed at Morley's Hotel in May 1861, when he first arrived in London; a Mr. Davis, president of a New Orleans bank, met Major Anderson there in September 1861 to talk about financial matters; "a great carnival" was held there in March 1863 to celebrate the initial success of the Confederate Cotton Loan; and Assistant Paymaster Forrest stayed there twice, in February and April 1864. In 1921 Morley's Hotel became the first South Africa House; it was replaced by the present building in 1935.

Tussaud's Waxworks see Baker Street

Victoria Street (SW1)

William Yancey and Pierre Rost stayed at the Westminster Palace Hotel in May 1861, and Yancey returned there in August, when there was a dinner for Dudley Mann, John Fearn, Major Anderson and Richard Meade (a former U.S. minister to Brazil), "a very handsome affair, given in honour of the Confederates." Later, in March 1863, Midshipman Morgan spent several weeks there, prior to joining his ship, the CSS Georgia. Converted into offices after World War I and renamed Abbey House, it was demolished in the 1970s.

Wharncliffe House see Curzon Street

William IV Street (WC2)

Henri Drayton's show Federals and Confederates was staged at the Polygraphic Hall, in what was then King William Street, from March until May 1863. The Polygraphic Hall, which had opened in 1854, was converted into a theater in 1869; it was demolished in 1896 for an extension to Charing Cross Hospital.

Wood's Hotel see High Holborn

Wych Street (WC2)

Major Anderson visited the Olympic Theater in August 1861. It was rebuilt in 1890 but demolished in 1905 when the area was cleared for the building of the Aldwych.

Chapter Notes

Introduction

1. First reports of the Battle of Gettysburg (July 1–3, 1863) did not appear in the London Times till July 17, and the fall of Vicksburg (July 4, 1863) till the 20th. The occupation of Richmond (April 3, 1865) was first reported in the Times on April 15, with official dispatches in full two days later. Lee's surrender (April 9, 1865) was first known about in London on April 23, with reports appearing in the Standard on April 24 and the Times the following day.

2. There was at least one proposal for an Atlantic cable during the war. In 1862 a man called Henry Cook put forward a scheme for a cable linking the Confederate States with Europe and the details were forwarded to Richmond; Cook was told that the idea would be considered when peace was secured. Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies (ORN), ser. II, vol. 3, 545, 666.

3. Graham Storey, Reuter's Century, 1851–1951 (London: Max Parrish, 1951), 33–34; Donald Read, The Power of News: The History of Reuters, 1849–1989 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992), 35.

4. In The Secret Service of the Confederate States in Europe (New York: Thomas Yoseloff, 1959), first published in 1883, naval agent James Bulloch mentions the delays in communicating by letter and the danger of writing at length about important topics because of the danger of correspondence being captured.

1— London in the 1860s

1. John Timbs, Curiosities of London (London: Longmans, Green, 1868), 27.

2. Census of England & Wales, 1861, Vol. 3. General Report (1863), Table 133.

3. See Gavin Stamp, The Changing Metropolis: Earliest Photographs of London, 1839–1879 (Harmondsworth, Middlesex, UK: Viking, 1984), for illustrations of what 1860s London really looked like, including the chaos caused by the construction of the Metropolitan Railway, views of Battersea, Southwark and Waterloo Bridges, Morley's Hotel, Her Majesty's Theater and the International Exhibition in South Kensington.

4. Details of maps are in Ralph Hyde, Printed Maps of Victorian London, 1851–1900 (Folkstone, UK: Dawson, 1975).

5. Collins' Illustrated Atlas of London, with introduction by H. J. Dyos, was reissued by Leicester University Press in 1973.

6. Quoted in William Kent, London for Americans (London: Staples Press, 1950), 141.

7. Murray's Modern London 1860 (reprinted by Old House Books, 2003), xii.

8. Ibid.

9. Ibid., xiii.

10. Ibid., xiv-xv.

11. George F. Pardon, The Popular Guide to London and Its Suburbs (London: Routledge, Warne & Routledge, 1862), 25.

12. Index, January 5, 1865.

13. Timbs, 442.

14. Pardon, 47.

15. Murray's, xxxvii.

16. Pardon, 47.

17. Daniel Joseph Kirwan, Palace and Hovel; or, Phases of London Life (London: Abelard-Schuman, 1963), 15. First published 1870.

18. Pardon, 48.

19. Ibid., 37.

20. Francis Wey, A Frenchman Sees the English in the 'Fifties (1935), quoted in Alison Adburgham, Shopping in Style (London: Thames & Hudson, 1979), 112.

21. Pardon, 44.

22. Quoted in Ben Weinreb & Christopher Hibbert (eds.), The London Encyclopaedia (London: Macmillan, 1983), 513.

23. Douglas F. Forrest, Odyssey in Gray: A Diary of Confederate Service, 1863–1865, ed. William N. Still, Jr. (Richmond: Virginia State Library, 1979), 51.

24. George Augustus Sala, Twice Round the Clock, or the Hours of the Day and Night in London (Leicester: Leicester University Press, 1971), 157. First published 1859. A bezesteen is a bazaar or marketplace in the East.

25. Henry Mayhew, The Shops and Companies of London (London: Strand Printing & Publishing Co., 1865), 101.

26. Lady's Newspaper, December 21, 1850.

27. Murray's, xxi-xxii.

28. Quoted in M. Willson Disher, Winkles and Champagne: Comedies and Tragedies of the Music Hall (London: Batsford, 1938), 15.

29. Forrest, 46. "Welsh rarebit," or "rabbit," is toasted cheese.

30. Edward C. Anderson, Confederate Foreign

Agent, ed. W.S. Hoole (University, AL: Confederate Publishing, 1976), 67–68.

31. Murray's, xlviii.

32. Henry Mayhew, London's Underworld. Selections from Those That Will Not Work, vol. 4 of London Labour and the London Poor, ed. Peter Quennell (London: Spring Books, 1950), 38–39. First published 1862.

33. Murray's, 26.

34. Mayhew, op. cit. See also Kellow Chesney, The Victorian Underworld (Harmondsworth, Middlesex, UK: Pelican Books, 1972) for a detailed description of the criminal scene in the 1860s.

2 — A Diplomatic Presence

1. Charleston Mercury, June 4, 1861, quoted in Thomas A. Bailey, A Diplomatic History of the American People, 9th ed. (Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1974), 333. A surplus of cotton in Britain when the Civil War began postponed the expected cotton famine until 1862. It has been suggested that the failure of the British wheat crop early in the war, resulting in greatly increased imports from North America, may also have helped undermine the power of King Cotton; though European wheat could have been imported, it would have been more expensive than that from America. Clement Eaton, A History of the Southern Confederacy (New York: Free Press, 1965), 68–69.

2. Benjamin Moran, The Journal of Benjamin Moran, 1857–1865, eds. Sarah A. Wallace & Frances E. Gillespie, vol. 1 (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948), 799.

3. Frank L. Owsley, King Cotton Diplomacy, 2nd ed. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1959), 52.

4. Quoted in David P. Crook, The North, the South and the Powers, 1861–1865 (New York: Wiley, 1974), 27–28.

5. Brian N. Morton, Americans in London (London: Queen Anne Press, 1988), 208. "William L. Yancey's European Diary, March-June 1861," ed. W. Stanley Hoole, Alabama Review, 25 (April 1972):138. A report of both visits appeared in the New York Tribune and was reprinted in the National Anti-Slavery Standard, June 1, 1861. None of the histories of Barings makes any reference to the commissioners' visit.

6. London American, May 8, 1861. This was one of the very few references to their activities by the Federal newspaper.

7. "William L. Yancey's European Diary," 139. Each commissioner received a monthly allowance of $1,000, a generous amount, considering that the annual salary of commercial agent Henry Hotze when he first came to London in 1862 was only $1,500. The Confederate secret service fund accounts (American Historical Review, 35 [1930]:814–821) suggest that government officials in London were paid in U.S. currency because there was no British exchange rate with the Confederacy. How they actually received their money is uncertain, but it was probably via Fraser, Trenholm & Company, the Liverpool firm which acted as bankers to the Confederacy.

8. Yancey to Hunter, August 7, 1861, in James D. Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Confederacy, vol. 2 (Nashville, TN: U.S. Publishing, 1905), 57.

9. Russell had promised Adams in June that he would not see the "pseudo-commissioners" anymore. Richardson, vol. 2, 136.

10. Times, November 12, 1861.

11. Yancey, Rost and Mann to Hunter, December 2, 1861, in Richardson, vol. 2, 121.

12. Richardson, vol. 2, 132.

13. Punch, January 18, 1862. Stone-jug was slang for "prison"; "a free and an accepted mason" is a Masonic phrase.

14. Illustrated Times, February 8, 1862. Charles P. Cullop, Confederate Propaganda in Europe, 1861–1865 (Coral Gables, FL: University of Miami Press, 1969), 32.

15. Yancey to Reid, July 3, 1861, quoted in the Dictionary of American Biography article on Yancey. John Bigelow, "The Confederate Diplomatists," Century Magazine, 42 (1891):117. "Mr Yancey ... left yesterday," reported the U.S. consul in London on February 5, 1862.

16. Mary B. Chesnut, Mary Chesnut's Civil War, ed. C. Vann Woodward (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1981), 170–171, 520.

17. H. Adams to C. F. Adams, Jr., June 6, 1862, in Worthington C. Ford (ed.), A Cycle of Adams Letters, 1861–1865, vol. 1 (London: Constable, 1920), 154.

18. Henry Adams, The Education of Henry Adams (Boston: Mariner Books, 2000), 184–185.

19. Moran, vol. 2, 1212.

20. Mason to Hunter, January 30, 1862, ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 323.

21. Virginia Mason, Public Life and Diplomatic Correspondence of James Murray Mason (Roanoke, VA: Stone Printing & Manufacturing Co., 1903), 340–342.

22. Times, February 12, 1863.

23. Mason, 185.

24. H. Adams, 185.

25. Times, June 18, June 23, 1863. William L. Garrison, The Letters of William Lloyd Garrison, ed. Walter M. Merrill, vol. 5, 1861–1867 (Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1979), 88, 132–133, 161–162.

26. C. F. Adams to C. F. Adams, Jr., September 25, 1863, in Ford, vol. 2, 85.

27. Adams to Adams, Jr., February 17, 1865, ibid., 256–257.

28. Adams to Seward, March 9, 1865, in Papers Relating to the Foreign Relations of the United States, 1865, vol. 1, 199.

29. Times, January 16, 1865; Gladstone to Reynard, April 18, 1865, in C. Collyer, "Gladstone and the American Civil War," Proceedings of the Leeds Philosophical & Literary Society, 6 (1948–1952):593.

30. Index, January 19, 1865.

31. Kenner's mission also included attempting to negotiate a second foreign loan of £15 million, following the proposed establishment of a Confederate bank in Europe.

32. Moran, vol. 2, 1410.

33. Times, April 17, 1865.

34. Adams to Seward, April 20, 1865, in Foreign Relations 1865, vol. 1, 323.

35. Moran, vol. 2, 1414.

36. Mason to Benjamin, May 1, 1865, ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 1277.

37. Bulloch, vol. 2, 155.

3 — The Propaganda War

1. Mason to Benjamin, May 2, 1862, ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 401. There was a similar flood of pro-Northern books and pamphlets; they are listed in Donaldson Jordan & Edwin J. Pratt, Europe and the American Civil War (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1931).

2. The German translation, and possibly also the French one, was paid for by the Confederate secret service fund; Hotze himself also contributed towards the cost of the German edition. J. F. Jameson, "The London Expenditures of the Confederate Secret Service," American Historical Review, 35 (1930):814–815. ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 536.

3. Mason, 340; John W. Cowell, Southern Secession, quoted in James T. deKay, The Rebel Raiders (New York: Ballantine Books, 2002), 122. Cowell's pamphlet was also paid for by the Confederate secret service fund (Jameson, 815–816).

4. Richardson, vol. 2, 115.

5. Hotze to Hunter, February 23, 1862, ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 346–347.

6. Ibid. The "clubs" were the gentlemen's clubs of Pall Mall and St James's.

7. Ibid.

8. Sir Henry Brackenbury, Some Memories of My Spare Time (1909), 108, quoted in Basil L. Crapster, "Thomas Hamber, Tory Journalist," Victorian Periodicals Newsletter, 8 (1975): 116.

9. Crapster, 117.

10. Hotze to Benjamin, September 26, 1862, ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 535.

11. Hotze to Benjamin, April 25, 1862, ibid., 400–401. Both Brewer and Wetter were involved in the shipping business and later in blockade-running.

12. Index, May 1, 1862.

13. Hotze to Benjamin, May 15, 1862, ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 423.

14. H. Adams to C. F. Adams, Jr., June 6, 1862, in Ford, vol. 1, 154.

15. Ephraim D. Adams, Great Britain and the American Civil War, vol. 2 (London: Longmans, 1925), 231.

16. Index, February 18, 1864.

17. Hotze to Benjamin, September 26, 1862, ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 537.

18. Ibid., 535.

19. He died at Ealing, then a village in Middlesex, and was buried in the crypt of Kensington parish church. Gentleman's Magazine, August 1862. Who Was Who in America, Historical Volume 1607–1896 (Chicago: Marquis, 1963).

20. American Magazine Journalists, 1850–1900 (Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 79) (Detroit: Gale Research Inc., 1989), 61. Bledsoe traveled to England with Flag Officer Barron and Lieutenant Whittle in the steamship Florida.

21. The articles by "A White Republican" in Fraser's Magazine were as follows: "Universal Suffrage in the United States, and Its Consequences" (July 1862); "North and South: The Controversy in a Colloquy" (September 1862); "North and South: The Two Constitutions" (October 1862); "North and South; or, Who Is the Traitor?" (November 1862); "Negroes and Slavery in the United States" (February 1863).

22. S. H. Harris, "John L. O'Sullivan Serves the Confederacy," Civil War History, 10 (1964):275–290.

23. Hotze to Benjamin, October 24, 1862, ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 567; October 31, 1863, ibid., 944. John Slidell and Dudley Mann both complained about Spence, Slidell in connection with the Erlanger Loan and Mann regarding the Southern Independence Association of London's prospectus.

24. Some people apparently thought that "S" was John Slidell. There were at least forty-two letters, published on the following dates: 1862: February 5; March 18, 22; April 7, 28; May 5, 19, 29; June 4, 11, 16, 17; July 7, 17; August 1, 12, 29; October 3, 9, 11, 23; November 4, 27; December 30. 1863: January 16; June 19; July 2; August 13, 29; September 11, 26; October 9, 29; December 11. 1864: January 4; April 1; June 8; July 13; September 15; November 15; December 12. 1865: January 6.

There is no discernible pattern in their frequency and there may be others which have not yet been found.

25. Hotze to Benjamin, September 26, 1862, ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 537.

26. Jameson, 812.

27. Ibid.

28. Ibid., 814, 816. The exchange rate was then US$4.85 to £1 sterling.

29. Moran, vol. 2, 1114. The London American survived for 2 years and 10 months, the Index for 3 years and 3 months.

30. Hotze to Benjamin, August 4, 1862, ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 507. Why did Hotze travel all the way to Germany to consult an oculist when an eminent ophthalmic surgeon like William Bowman was just round the corner in Clifford Street?

31. William E. Gladstone, The Gladstone Diaries, vol. 6, 1861–1868, ed. H. C. G. Matthews (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1978), 138; Richard Shannon, Gladstone, vol. 1, 1809–1865 (London: Hamish Hamilton, 1982), 463.

32. Hotze to Benjamin, August 4, 1862, ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 506.

33. Jameson, 813.

34. Ibid., 816–817. The posters cost US$522, or approximately £108.

35. Autobiography of Moncure D. Conway (1904), vol. 1, 365, quoted in David A. Wilson, Carlyle to Threescore-and-ten, 1853–1865 (London: Kegan Paul, 1929), 556.

36. Antebellum Writers in New York and the South, in Dictionary of Literary Biography (DLB), vol. 3 (Detroit: Gale Research Inc., 1979), 330–332. See also American Magazine Journalists, 1741–1850 (DLB, vol. 73, 1988), 327–330, and Antebellum Writers in the South, Second Series (DLB, vol. 248, 2001), 364–369.

37. "From the Diary of John R. Thompson," Confederate Veteran (March 1929), 99.

38. Index, August 12, 1865. There is a complete file of the Index in the British Library Newspaper Library at Colindale, London NW9. The copies presumably came from the Index office as they bear the signatures of the publishers, Henry F. Mackintosh and John B. Hopkins.

4 — Supplies for the Confederate Army

1. Caleb Huse, Supplies for the Confederate Army (1904), quoted in Philip Van Doren Stern, Secret Missions of the Civil War (New York: Bonanza Books, 1990), 76.

2. Ibid., 77. In June 1863 Huse informed McRae he had been offered the opportunity to buy the London Armory Company; nothing came of this, though the following January it was recommended to Col. Gorgas that an unidentified armaments factory in England should be acquired (Thomas Boaz, Guns for Cotton [Shippensburg, PA: Burd Street Press, 1996], 72).

3. Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies (ORA), ser. IV, vol. 1, 344.

4. Dunbar Rowland, Jefferson Davis, Constitutionalist (Jackson, MS: Mississippi Department of Archives & History, 1923), vol. viii, 311.

5. Victor A. Hatley, "Monsters in Campbell Square," Northamptonshire Past and Present, vol. 4 (1966), 54. Isaac, Campbell & Co. had a boot and shoe factory in Northampton from 1857 until 1861, which was then taken over by Turner Bros., Hyde & Co., a London firm which advertised in the Index. Part of the cargo of the Justitia, a blockade-runner owned by Thomas Begbie, which left London in November 1862, was supplied by them.

6. Anderson, 31.

7. Peggy Robbins, "Caleb Huse, Confederate Agent," Civil War Times Illustrated (August 1978):35.

8. Anderson, 31.

9. Ibid., 43. James Bulloch was a naval purchasing agent, John Fearn was Commissioner Yancey's secretary and George Jones was a visitor from Savannah.

10. Ibid., 61. At the end of the war, Helm returned to London with General Breckinridge, whom he had encountered in Havana (A. J. Hanna, Flight into Oblivion [Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1999], 232).

11. Pardon, 177–178.

12. Ibid.

13. Anderson, 58. Archibald Hamilton's country residence was a house called Southbarrow, at Southborough, then a hamlet two miles from the village of Bromley, Kent.

14. Ibid., 62, 58.

15. Ibid., 67.

16. Ibid., 71. Henry Hotze was born in Zurich, in the German-speaking part of Switzerland.

17. Moran, vol. 2, 893.

18. Invoice dated January 1862, Pickett Papers, Library of Congress; The American Civil War: A Centennial Exhibition (Washington: Library of Congress, 1961), 26.

19. John W. Dubose, Life and Times of William Lowndes Yancey (Birmingham, AL: Roberts & Son, 1892), 661–664; Foreign Relations, 1862, 108.

20. William Diamond, "Imports of the Confederate Government from Europe," Journal of Southern History, 6 (1940):470–503.

21. ORA, ser. IV, vol. 3, 674.

22. Emma H. Ferguson, "Running the Blockade: A Confederate Reminiscence," Lippincott's Monthly Magazine (October 1893):493–502. Major Ficklin had previously been to England as a Treasury agent.

23. It was apparently the "magnificent new uniform" that Lee wore at Appomattox and which was also used by the French sculptor M. J. A. Mercie when modeling the equestrian statue of Lee which stands in Monument Avenue, Richmond, Virginia. Emma H. Ferguson, "Sketch of Major Ferguson," Confederate Veteran (March 1899):99–100.

24. John B. Jones, A Rebel War Clerk's Diary, ed. Earl S. Miers (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1993), 258.

25. He is sometimes referred to as General McRae: this was a pre-war rank in the Mississippi state militia and has nothing to do with the Civil War.

26. McRae to Seddon, February 19, 1864, ORA, ser. IV, vol. 3, 155. Before Bloodgood arrived, McRae was assisted in the initial examination by H. O. Brewer, a business associate from Mobile who was involved in blockade-running.

27. For the various ways in which the Confederates financed their overseas purchases, see Richard C. Todd, Confederate Finance (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1954), particularly chapter 6, "Financial Operations Abroad."

28. Quoted in Todd, 187.

29. Georgiana G. Walker, The Private Journal of Georgiana Gholson Walker, ed. Dwight F. Henderson (Tuscaloosa, AL: Confederate Publishing, 1963), 104. The vessel's arrival was reported to the U.S. consul, Freeman Morse.

30. Ibid., 109.

31. Angus J. Johnston, Virginia Railroads in the Civil War (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1961), 178–180; ORA, ser. IV, vol. 2, 409–410, 841–842.

32. Anderson, 4.

33. Ibid., 66.

34. John L. Peyton, The American Crisis, vol. 1 (London: Saunders, Otley, 1867), 334.

35. Times, November 26, 1861.

36. Peyton to Vance, January 15, 1863, in The Papers of Zebulon Baird Vance, ed. Joe A. Mobley, vol. 2, 1863 (Raleigh, NC: State Dept. of Archives & History, 1995). John Wilson was a bookseller and minor publisher.

37. The Papers of Zebulon Baird Vance, ed. Frontis W. Johnston, vol. 1, 843–862 (Raleigh, NC: State Dept. of Archives & History, 1963), lii-liii, 288, 360; Stephen R. Wise, Lifeline of the Confederacy (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1991), 105–106.

38. ORA, ser. IV, vol. 1, 545.

39. Louise B. Hill, Joseph E. Brown and the Confederacy (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1939), 119.

40. The invoice, dated May 15, 1863, is in ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 940.

5 — Vessels Suitable for Our Purposes

1. Raimondo Luraghi, A History of the Confederate Navy (London: Chatham Publishing, 1996), 20–21. It may also have been difficult at this time to fund the purchase of the cotton or transport it to England (Lester, 91).

2. Because he had commanded a mail steamer, he was often referred to as Captain Bulloch, which has led to confusion over his rank: he left the U.S. Navy as a lieutenant and was later commissioned as a commander in the C.S. Navy, but he never held the naval rank of captain. There is also a query concerning the spelling of his middle name. In the introduction to the 1959 edition of his memoirs, the Dictionary of American Biography and the Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War, it is spelt Dunwody; elsewhere, including on his tombstone in Toxteth Park Cemetery, Liverpool, it is Dunwoody.

3. Bulloch to Mallory, August 13, 1861, ORN, ser. II, vol. 2, 86.

4. Bulloch, vol. 1, 100.

5. It has been suggested that Bulloch's informant was a Foreign Office clerk called Victor Buckley (Luraghi, 225, 422).

6. Lester, 110–112.

7. Times, January 26, 1865. There were also plans for the Dudgeon Bros. to build six torpedo boats for the Confederate Navy, but they were still under construction when the war ended (Milton F. Perry, Infernal Machines [Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1965], 178).

8. Times, March 16, 1865.

9. Bulloch to Whittle, October 6, 1864, ORN, ser. II, vol. 2, 731–732.

10. A number of Confederates who came to England during the Civil War brought, or were joined by, their wives and children. In addition to Mrs. North, there was Mrs. Bledsoe, Mrs. Bulloch, Mrs. Clements, Mrs. Ferguson, Mrs. Hobson, probably Mrs. Huse, Mrs. Peyton and Mrs. Walker; Dudley Mann's son, Grayson, also came to London to act as his secretary, and Cdr. Maury was accompanied by 13-year-old Matthew, Jr.

11. James H. North Diary, July 29,1861, #862, Southern Historical Collection, Wilson Library, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

12. Anderson, 66.

13. North Diary, October 7–10, 1861. Bulloch came to England as a civilian; it was not until January 1862 that he became a commander in the Confederate Navy.

14. North to Mallory, March 29, 1862, ORN, ser. II, vol. 2, 176–177.

15. Quoted in Lester, 122.

16. Times, April 7, 1863, quoted in Douglas H. Maynard, "The Forbes-Aspinwall Mission," Mississippi Valley Historical Review, 45 (1958):74. Confederate commissioner James Mason had also been informed of their mission by a contact in New York.

17. Edgar Stringer seems to have specialized in introductions: apart from the two naval contracts with J. & G. Thomson, he also introduced Nelson Clements, a Texas state purchasing agent, to Sinclair, Hamilton & Co.

18. Sinclair to North, February 2, 1863, ORN, ser. II, vol. 2, 350.

19. Douglas H. Maynard, "The Confederacy's Super-Alabama," Civil War History, 5 (1959): 80–95. Some of the guns intended for it were later installed in the Shenandoah.

20. Raphael Semmes, Memoirs of Service Afloat, ed. John M. Taylor (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1996), 347–348. It is interesting to compare Semmes' rose-tinted view of Mason with that of Benjamin Moran and Henry Adams. Apart from newspaper reports, an article about the Sumter had appeared in the London Journal in March 1862, and there were several more pieces mentioning Semmes by name later that year.

21. Ibid., 785.

22. Part of this took the form of letters to the newspapers, e.g., Times, "A Voice from Secessia," December 23, 1862; "Prospects of the Confederates," August 20, 1863; and "The War in America," September 19, 1863, all of which were signed.

23. Bulloch, vol. 2, 261. After the war, Maury handed over the rights to his electric torpedoes to Nathaniel J. Holmes, "electrical engineer and contractor," who patented them in December 1865 (Perry, 191).

24. James M. Morgan, Midshipman in Gray: Selections from Recollections of a Rebel Reefer, ed. R. Thomas Campbell (Shippensburg, PA: Burd Street Press, 1997), 85. Maury remained a lieutenant in the U.S. Navy for many years and was not promoted to commander till 1858. In the Virginia State Navy and the C.S. Navy, he also held the rank of commander; sometime after his return to America in 1868, he was apparently given the honorary rank of commodore. His letter to the Times, December 23, 1862, was written from the Albemarle Hotel, where presumably he was staying for a few days.

25. Maury, Jr., to Mrs. Ann Herndon Maury, March 14, 1863, in Frances L. Williams, Matthew Fontaine Maury (New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1963), 405.

26. Morgan, 85.

27. Ibid., 88.

28. Ibid., 89. Lt. William L. Maury was promoted to commander about this time.

29. Maury to Carter, July 24, 1863, ORN, ser. II, vol. 2, 471.

30. Forrest, 39.

31. Ibid., 45. Paymaster Felix Senac subsequently served in Paris under Flag Officer Barron; his daughter, Ruby, married Henry Hotze after the war. Lt. Charles Graves served with Forrest on the Rappahannock, and Lt. Charles M. Morris was on his way to take command of the Florida.

32. According to Douglas Forrest's diary, Hobson appears to have died in the early part of 1865, though no record of his death in England has been found.

33. The Confederates were not the only ones trying to recruit in London: in November 1864 the Times carried reports of attempts to engage men, in both London and Lancashire, supposedly for a glassworks in New York, but in reality for the Union Army. Several hundred men were already on board an emigrant ship at Liverpool when this violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act was discovered; they were subsequently sent home. The Federals were also attempting to recruit in Ireland at this time.

34. Foreign Relations, 1864, pt. 1, 18–19.

35. Times, February 7, 1865.

36. Adams to Seward, April 28, 1864, in Foreign Relations, 1864, 1, 642.

37. ORN, ser. II, vol. 2, 671.

38. Morse to Adams, June 15, 1864, in Foreign Relations, 1864, 185–187.

39. Bulloch, vol. 2, 253.

40. Ibid., 253–254, 256–258.

41. A consular dispatch at the beginning of March

1865 reported rather belatedly that ten or more officers from the CSS Florida had arrived in London and were lodging in New Bond Street prior to joining the CSS Stonewall (London consular dispatches, March 4, 1865).

42. Wharncliffe Muniments, WhM 461. The honorary secretary of the testimonial fund was probably the Rev. Francis Tremlett. The circular was sent from 28 Charles Street, the offices of Du Pasquier & Tremlett, a firm of lawyers, one of whom, George Tremlett, was the Rev. Tremlett's cousin; it does not indicate where the dinner was to be held.

43. There are useful descriptions of the Florida, the Alabama, the Georgia, the Rappahannock and the Shenandoah in Lester, 212–221.

6— The Spying Game

1. Harriet C. Owsley, "Henry Shelton Sanford and Federal Surveillance Abroad, 1861–1865," Mississippi Valley Historical Review, 48 (1961–1962):212–213.

2. Ibid., 213.

3. Times, January 23, 1862. Pollaky, who was later assisted by his son and namesake, subsequently moved his office to Paddington Green, where it functioned until the 1880s. He appears in Gilbert & Sullivan's light opera Patience (1881) as "Paddington Pollaky."

4. "On Duty with Inspector Field," Household Words, June 14, 1851. He was also the original of Inspector Bucket in Dickens' Bleak House (1853).

5. Owsley, 217.

6. It had been in operation since at least August; Major Anderson noted in his diary on September 26 that he, as well as Bulloch and Huse, had been followed for the past month by detectives employed by the U.S. minister.

7. Moran, vol. 2, 946.

8. At the time of the Civil War, the United States had nine consulates in England. In addition to London and Liverpool, they were located at Falmouth, Plymouth, Southampton, Bristol, Leeds, Manchester and Newcastle. There were also three in Scotland, one in Wales and five in Ireland.

9. London consular dispatches, November 1, 1861.

10. Ibid., November 2, 1861.

11. Ibid., January 24, 1862.

12. Ibid., March 14, 1862.

13. Ibid., June 5, 1863.

14. Ibid., November 7, 1862.

15. Ibid., July 16, 1864. Bunting is mentioned several times in Douglas Forrest's diary. According to him, "that dog Bunting" was a former doctor who had been expelled from Canada for performing an abortion.

16. Ibid., July 6, 1864.

17. Forrest records a visit to them on April 12, 1864, when he met "Thomas Gordon," a name sometimes used by Thomas Bold, Cdr. Maury's cousin.

18. Morse to Adams, June 15, 1864, in Foreign Relations, 1864, pt. 2, 185.

19. Ibid., 186.

20. Ibid., 202.

21. Ibid., 187. The ship had, in fact, been intended for the Virginia Volunteer Navy, but the money to pay for it was not forthcoming.

22. London consular dispatches, July 18, 1862, July 25, 1862.

23. Ibid., September 23, 1864.

24. Ibid., July 19, 1861. Chester G. Hearn, Gray Raiders of the Sea (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1992), 154.

25. Owsley, 214.

26. Bulloch, vol. 1, 102.

27. Ibid., vol. 2, 38.

28. Ibid., vol. 1, 425.

29. Luraghi, 225, 422; Adams, vol. 2, 120. Buckley's name also appears in the list of supposed Confederate bondholders published in the New York Herald, December 9, 1865, with the comment: "This man is a clerk in that department of the Foreign Office through which passed all correspondence with or about the United States." Major Anderson also claimed to have a contact in the Foreign Office, a relative of a Mr. Bond, a member of the firm of Sinclair, Hamilton & Co.

30. Anderson, 63–64.

31. Ibid., 64.

32. Ibid., 64.

33. Ibid., 65.

34. Ibid., 68–69.

35. K. Bourne (ed.), British Documents on Foreign Affairs: Reports and Papers from the Foreign Office Confidential Print. Pt. 1, ser. C, vol. 6, The Civil War Years 1862–65, doc. 58, Huse to Major (?), April 1, 1862.

36. London consular dispatches, March 5, 1864. Edward (or Edwin) Archer's name does not appear in the list of commissioned and warrant officers in J. Thomas Scharf's History of the Confederate States Navy (1887), 819–820; like Daniel Talley, he was probably an officer in the Virginia Volunteer Navy.

7— The Cotton Loan

1. Quoted in Philip Van Doren Stern, The Confederate Navy: A Pictorial History (New York: Da Capo Press, 1992), 157. John Slidell formed a close relationship with Emile Erlanger, which became even closer when his daughter Marguerite married the latter in 1864.

2. In her carefully researched article on the Erlanger Loan, Judith Gentry concluded that "the Confederates could not have negotiated a better contract than that made with Erlanger & Company, and a comparison of the Erlanger contract with offers from other firms removes all doubt of it" (Judith F. Gentry, "A Confederate Success in Europe," Journal of Southern History, 36 [1970]:182).

3. At the time of the Loan, the (unofficial) Confederate exchange rate was $13.33 : £1 sterling, which would have made it worth $39,990,000. Using the U.S. exchange rate of $4.85 : £1 sterling, it was worth $14,550,000. The prospectus for the Loan is in the Times, March 20, 1863, the Economist, March 21, 1863, and is reprinted in The Times Reports the American Civil War (London: Times Books, 1975), 110–113.

4. Samuel B. Thompson, Confederate Purchasing Operations Abroad (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1935), 58.

5. Times, March 20, 1863.

6. Quoted in Richard Roberts, Schroders: Merchants and Bankers (Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1992), 66.

7. Economist, March 21, 1863.

8. Ibid.

9. Ibid.

10. Moran, vol. 2, 1137–1138.
11. Times, August 6, 1863.
12. There is a useful summary of Erlanger Loan quotations, taken from the Index and The Times, in Lester, app. II, 204–208.
13. Times, August 14, 1865.
14. Ibid., October 2, 1865.
15. Thomas J. Keiser, The English Press and the American Civil War (Reading University PhD thesis, 1971), 298.
16. A list of major Erlanger Loan bondholders, from John Bigelow, Lest We Forget: Gladstone, Morley and the Confederate Loan of 1863 (New York, De Vinne Press, 1905), is reprinted in Lester, app. III, 209.
17. Quoted in Times, October 7, 1865.
18. Ibid., October 9, 1865.
19. Morning Star, October 9, 1865.
20. New York Herald, December 9, 1865. Sixty-six of the names had previously appeared in the Index as subscribers to General Jackson's statue, but none of them included men such as Vice-Admiral Sir Provo Wallis, John M. Chamberlain, Thomas G. Taylor, William B. Morgan, Joseph Joseph, Spencer Herapath and Joseph Sebag, who are known to have attended meetings of bondholders in the autumn of 1865.
21. Times, December 21, 1865.
22. Ibid., November 3, 1865.
23. Morning Star, October 3, 1865; reprinted in Bigelow, 8.
24. Ibid., November 15, 1866.
25. Daniel Grinnan, "Disposition of Confederate Funds," Confederate Veteran (July 1929):328–329. For an account of the post-war history of the Cotton Loan, see John C. Schwab, The Confederate States of America, 1861–1865: A Financial and Industrial History of the South During the Civil War (New York, C. Scribner's Sons, 1901), 37–39.
26. Gentry, 171.
27. Schwab, 36.
28. Ibid., 43; Gentry, 188.

8 — Business with the Southern States

1. The engineer who installed the machinery was a Mr. McFarland, whom both Capt. Huse and Major Anderson encountered at the London Armory Company in 1861, working as a Federal purchasing agent. ORA, ser. IV, vol. 1, 345. George Measom, The Official Illustrated Guide to the South-Eastern Railway and Its Branches, 1858 (reprinted by E & W Books Ltd., 1970), 132–136; Robert E. Gardner, Small Arms Makers (New York: Crown, 1963), passim.
2. Howard L. Blackmore, A Dictionary of London Gunmakers, 1350–1850 (Oxford: Phaidon Christie's, 1986), 39. Jackson's pistol, still in its original case with all its accoutrements, is in the Museum of the Confederacy in Richmond, Virginia. Col. Gorgas's visit to London is mentioned in an advertisement in the Index (July 7, 1864), though it is not recorded in his diary. Robert Adams started up again in business in 1866 but died in 1870.
3. Blackmore, 130.
4. S.B. Saul, "The Machine Tool Industry in Britain to 1914," Business History, 10 (1968):26–27; Robert E. L. Krick, Staff Officers in Gray (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2003), 87; Frank E. Vandiver, Ploughshares into Swords (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1952), 174–176.
5. Times, December 7, 1861.
6. Adams to Seward, January 24, 1862, in Foreign Relations, 1862, 17.
7. Seward to Adams, June 2, 1862, ibid., 108.
8. Moran, vol. 2, 1090.
9. London consular dispatches, January 20, 1865.
10. Foreign Relations, 1865, vol. 1, 256–257, 348–350.
11. Moran, vol. 2, 1426. Taliaffero P. Shaffner was secretary of the North Atlantic Telegraph Company and also joint author of an Illustrated Record of the International Exhibition of 1862.
12. North to Hood, June 16, 1864, ORN, ser. II, vol. 2, 671–672. T. & C. Hood is an example of a firm which dealt with both sides: in December 1863, fifty 68-pounder guns they had supplied for the United States were proved at Woolwich Arsenal, then taken away by Naylor, Vickers & Co., who were acting as agents for the Federal government, and shipped to New York (Bulloch, vol. 1, 362).
13. London consular dispatches, November 25, 1864.
14. London American, August 13, 1862.
15. Index, October 1, 1863.
16. Ibid., October 22, 1863.
17. Ibid., September 3, 1863.
18. Sally C. Luscomb, The Collector's Encyclopedia of Buttons (New York: Crown Publishers, 1967), 46–48; Forrest, 163. A set of 24 gilded, brass Confederate Navy buttons, made by Firmin & Sons and still in their original box, is in the Museum of the Confederacy. The company, which is now based in Birmingham, still has some of the original button-stamping dies, though unfortunately not a complete set. Firmin also made swords, and one formerly owned by Flag Officer French Forrest (Douglas Forrest's father) is also in the Museum of the Confederacy.
19. Index, February 15, 1864; ibid., January 5, 1865. An estimated 550,000 pairs of shoes were imported, though English footwear was apparently thought to be no better than that issued by the Confederate government: "English-made shoes were ... lined with stiff paper, and after fording a few times, they came to pieces," one former soldier recalled (Philip Van Doren Stern, An End to Valor: The Last Days of the Civil War [Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1958], 239–240).
20. Mark E. Neely, Jr., et al., The Confederate Image (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987), 8; Lester, 162. In the event, the one-cent orange stamp was never issued.
21. De La Rue Journal 1862–1865, MS937, University of Reading Library. The rejected press was apparently transferred to Kent, Paine & Co. of Richmond, Virginia.
22. Lester, 161. The firm also printed paper currency ("greenbacks") for the Federal government.
23. Lorna Houseman, The House That Thomas Built (London: Chatto & Windus, 1968), 103; Stern, 306–307, 319.
24. Boaz, 9–10; Dictionary of American Biography, vol. 5, 121.

25. Mason to Benjamin, April 30, 1863, ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 754–755.

26. Index, August 25, 1864; ibid., November 3, 1864; ibid., November 19, 1863.

27. Times, June 14, 1864. It was not only Confederate notes that were being forged: Benjamin Moran noted in his diary (December 13, 1862): "There is a gang of English rogues at Sheffield busily engaged in counterfeiting our Treasury notes."

28. Overend, Gurney turned out to be the owners of freight on Zachariah Pearson's steamer Circassian, which was captured off Cuba in May 1862. Their name also appears several times in correspondence published in Frank E. Vandiver's Confederate Blockade Running through Bermuda, 1861–1865 (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1947).

29. Forrest, 40. James T. Soutter was the former president of the Bank of the Republic in New York and lived in Rome during the war; his daughter Sallie married Lieutenant Charles M. Fauntleroy, the last captain of the ill-fated CSS Rappahannock. Details of the proposed £15 million loan are in Thompson, 100–101.

30. Foreign Relations, 1864, pt. I, 582–583. The Atlantic Trading Company is not mentioned in Lifeline of the Confederacy, Stephen Wise's exhaustive study of blockade-running, and may never actually have commenced operations.

31. Charles Capper, The Port and Trade of London: Historical, Statistical, Local and General (London: Smith, Elder & Co., 1862), 182. The collapse of the banking house of Overend, Gurney in 1866 dealt shipbuilding in London a serious blow from which it never really recovered.

32. "Record of Performance and Experiences with Twin-screw Steamers built by J. & W. Dudgeon," in "Transactions of the Institute of Naval Architects , 1865, 209–213.

33. Times, September 4, 1863. The Nutfield was apparently named after the village in Surrey where Edgar Stringer was then living.

34. Scott Russell seems to have had Confederate links which went beyond just building blockade-runners. In April 1864 he approached Charles Francis Adams with what he claimed were Confederate terms for an armistice. Though Adams was naturally skeptical, the information was nevertheless conveyed, via his son, Capt. C. F. Adams, Jr., to Secretary of State W. H. Seward. The State Department went as far as approving an unofficial liaison officer, but he was unreliable and the effort collapsed the following month (The Letters of Henry Adams, vol. I, 1858–1868 [Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press, 1982], 434).

35. Mrs. Georgiana Walker, wife of Confederate agent Major Norman Walker, traveled as a passenger in the Index from Bermuda to London in June-July 1864, in what was to be its last trip as a blockade-runner, and described the experience in her journal; the trip took 22 days. Details of individual blockade-runners are in Wise.

36. Moran, vol. 2, 1109.

37. Survey of London, vol. 37, North Kensington (London: Greater London Council, 1973), 168; Builder (1865), 677.

38. Foreign Relations, 1873, vol. 3, "American-British Claims Committee," 117–123; W. R. Hooper, "Blockade Running," Harper's New Monthly Magazine (December 1870):105.

39. Times, July 28, 1863. See also October 30, 1863, January 16, 1864, February 6 and 20, 1864, March 7 and 12, 1864, April 25, 1864.

40. Ibid., February 10, 1864. Samuelson was the builder of the Eugenie, which was also purchased for the Confederate Ordnance Bureau. Later in 1864, his own firm collapsed and he was forced to sell out to a joint-stock company, which itself went into liquidation in 1866.

41. Collie to Wharncliffe, June 27, 1868, in Wharncliffe Muniments, WhM 461.

42. Times, November 29, 1865.

9 — Artistic Reflections, Literary Echoes

1. "From the Diary of John R. Thompson," Confederate Veteran (March 1929):100. Most of these plays have never been published, but there are manuscript copies in the Lord Chamberlain's Plays Collection in the Department of Manuscripts at the British Library in London. See also Allardyce Nicoll, History of English Drama, vol. 5, Late Nineteenth Century Drama, 1850–1900, 2nd ed. (Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1959).

2. Times, May 2, 1863; Index, April 9, 1863.

3. Times, March 25, 1863.

4. Ibid., November 23, 1861, August 10, 1863; London American, January 22, 1862. McClellan himself visited London in February 1865 and stayed at the Westminster Palace Hotel.

5. Forrest, 53–54. Lieut. King subsequently served on the CSS Georgia.

6. Times, June 20, 1865; ibid., July 10, 1865. "General Tom Thumb" (Charles S. Stratton) was a famous American midget who came to England several times. Most of the other Civil War personalities were removed in or before 1869; Madame Tussaud's has no record of a figure of John Wilkes Booth, so it is not known how long he was there.

7. Illustrated London News, March 7, 1863.

8. Times, November 7, 1863. This was presumably painted by or in association with New York artist Frederic Church, who is known to have contributed to at least one other panorama.

9. Ibid., November 9, 1863.

10. Ibid., November 10, 1863.

11. Ibid., January 10, 1862.

12. Index, August 25, 1864.

13. Ibid., December 10, 1863.

14. Ibid., December 8, 1864.

15. Neely, 20–21, 119, 195; Index, May 25, 1865.

16. Ibid., June 25, 1863.

17. Times, May 26, 1863, May 29, 1863. This phenomenon is examined by Charles P. Cullop in "English Reaction to Stonewall Jackson's Death," West Virginia History, 29 (1967):1–5; see also John D. Bennett, "General Jackson's Statue," Crossfire, December 2004, 25–26.

18. Moran, vol. 2, 1167.

19. Hotze to Benjamin, June 6, 1863, ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 784.

20. Index, April 26, 1864. This may also have been the photograph used by Foley for his statue.

21. Ibid., December 24, 1863. "Volk" was probably the Bavarian-born sculptor Frederick Volck. The original bust is now in the Confederate White House at Richmond. A plaster statuette of Robert E. Lee, based on photographs, was also made by the Richmond sculptor Edward V. Valentine, while studying in Berlin in 1864, and sent to England to be sold for the Southern cause, possibly at the Liverpool Bazaar in October of that year (Ex inf. Valentine Richmond History Center.)

22. Peyton, vol. 2, 39–40.

23. Illustrated London News, January 9, 1864.

24. E. Lawrence Abel, Singing the New Nation (Mechanicsburg, PA: Stackpole Books, 2000), 104–105, 112–113, 316, 318.

25. Times, August 20, 1864, quoted in Michael Hammerson, "The American Civil War Comes to Belsize Park," in Belsize 2000: A Living Suburb (London: Belsize Conservation Area Advisory Committee, 2000), 60.

26. They are listed in the British Museum Catalogue of Printed Maps, Charts and Plans, vol. 14 (London: British Museum, 1967), 634–638.

27. The full title was the Monthly Packet of Evening Readings for Younger Members of the English Church. The articles are not mentioned in Mary Elizabeth Massey's Refugee Life in the Confederacy (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1964), perhaps because she was unaware of them or maybe doubted their authenticity.

28. Royden Harrison, "British Labour and the Confederacy," International Review of Social History, 2 (1957):79, 104.

29. Samuel P. Day, Down South, vol. 2 (London: Hurst & Blackett, 1862), 196.

30. William W. Malet, An Errand to the South in the Summer of 1862 (London: Richard Bentley, 1863), 187. There is a parallel account of Malet's visit, written by Elizabeth Collins, who was his sister's maid (Memories of the Southern States [Taunton, Somerset, UK: J. Barnicott, 1865]).

31. Allan Nevins et al. (eds.), Civil War Books: A Critical Bibliography, vol. 1 (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1967), 91; Constance C. Harrison, Recollections Grave and Gay (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1911), 133.

32. William C. Corsan, Two Months in the Confederate States, ed. B. H. Trask (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1996), xii; Index, June 25, 1863.

33. Catherine C. Hopley, Life in the South, vol. 1 (London: Chapman & Hall, 1863), vi-vii.

34. Ibid., vol. 2, 404.

35. Saturday Review, May 6, 1865.

36. Fitzgerald Ross, Cities and Camps of the Confederate States, ed. Richard B. Harwell (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1997), xviii-xix.

37. All the Year Round, March 19, 1864. The two pamphlets only contained selections from George T. Fullam's journal; the full text, edited by Charles G. Summersell, was not published till 1973.

38. Robin and Carol Wichard, Victorian Cartes-de-Visite (Princes Risborough, Bucks, UK: Shire Publications, 1999), 62. In 1864 action photographs were not yet possible, though in his account of the battle, Frederick Edge claimed to have seen the negative of one made by a Cherbourg photographer called Rondin (Notes & Queries, April 23, 1910).

39. Moran, vol. 2, 1308.

40. Walker, 53.

41. Ibid., 104. In her journal Mrs. Walker makes no mention of Belle Boyd, who was also in London at this time and actually living nearby; well-bred Southern ladies are unlikely to have approved of her flamboyant behavior and predilection for male company.

42. Wharncliffe to Greenhow, September 5, 1864, in Wharncliffe Muniments, WhM 461.

43. Spence to Wharncliffe, October 31, 1864, in Wharncliffe Muniments, WhM 460. Mrs. Greenhow's body was found the next day on the beach near Fort Fisher by Thomas Taylor, who was engaged in blockade-running for the Anglo-Confederate Trading Co. of Liverpool.

44. Collie to Wharncliffe, November 9, 1864, ibid.

45. Moran, vol. 2, 1346–1347.

46. These quotations are all taken from Sala's Introduction, which is dated May 17, 1865.

47. Illustrated London News, February 25, 1865.

48. Sala declined to put his name to the English edition, for reasons which are not apparent, though it appeared on the American one, published in New York later that year.

49. Quoted in Belle Boyd in Camp and Prison, ed. Curtis C. Davis (New York: Thomas Yoseloff, 1968), 48.

50. Ibid., 48–49.

51. Ibid., 50. Despite these lackluster reviews, she seems to have done quite well as a result of her literary venture. In April 1868, in a letter to a friend, she speaks of expecting "some 7. or 8. thousand dollars coming to me from the sale of my Book." Quoted in Sharon Kennedy-Nolle's introduction to Belle Boyd in Camp and Prison (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1998), 4.

52. Charles E. Shain, "The English Novelists and the American Civil War," American Quarterly, 14, no. 3 (1962):420–421 (Copyright the American Studies Association).

10— Support for the South?

1. Bulloch, vol. 1, 294.

2. Maury to Franklin Minor, January 21, 1863; Williams, 404.

3. Forrest, 43–44.

4. Robert G. H. Kean, Inside the Confederate Government: The Diary of Robert Garlick Hill Kean; ed. Edward Younger (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1993), 129. J. E. Ward was a former U.S. minister to China.

5. Peyton, vol. 2, 101; 39–40.

6. Moran, vol. 2, 1022.

7. Adams to Seward, July 11, 1862; Foreign Relations, 1862, 133. Adams to Adams, Jr., December 25, 1862, Ford, vol. 1, 220–221; Adams to Adams, Jr., September 25, 1863, ibid., vol. 2, 85.

8. Forbes was in England on a secret mission for the Federal government (Douglas H. Maynard, "The Forbes-Aspinwall Mission," Mississippi Valley Historical Review, 45 (1958):73.

9. New York Tribune, October 15, 1875, quoted in Philip Ziegler, The Sixth Great Power: Barings 1762–1929 (London: Collins, 1988), 214.

10. London consular dispatches, July 18, 1862.

11. Ibid., August 7, 1863.

12. Hotze to Benjamin, July 23, 1863, ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 849; Ford, vol. 2, 58–63.

13. Hotze to Benjamin, October 31, 1863; Thompson, 74. Spence claimed $45,000—just over £9,000—as compensation for his losses.

14. Gilliat to Barret, April 24, 1863, quoted in Lester, 41.

15. Times, January 16, 1863.

16. John W. Raimo, A Guide to Manuscripts Relating to America in Great Britain and Ireland, Rev. ed. (London: Mansell Publishing, 1979), 58.

17. Times, October 9, 1862.

18. Sir William Gregory, Autobiography, ed. Lady Gregory (London: John Murray, 1894), 215–216.

19. Ella Lonn, Foreigners in the Confederacy (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2002), 357–358. Robert Bourke described his visit in Blackwood's Magazine, December 1861, 755–767. Thomas Conolly's diary was published as An Irishman in Dixie, ed. Nelson D. Lankford (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988).

20. House of Commons Parliamentary Debates, July 10, 1863.

21. H. Adams to C. F. Adams, Jr., March 15, 1862; Ford, vol. 1, 120–121.

22. Cassell's Illustrated Family Paper, March 28, 1863.

23. H. Adams, 186.

24. House of Commons Parliamentary Debates, June 30, 1863.

25. Sir John Trelawny, Parliamentary Diaries, 1858–1865, ed. T. A. Jenkins, Camden, 4th ser., vol. 40 (London: Royal Historical Society, 1990), 260. Lindsay confirmed Roebuck's version of their meeting with the Emperor in a letter to the Times, July 4, 1863.

26. House of Commons Parliamentary Debates, June 30, 1863. In his diary, Gladstone recorded the books he was reading and during the Civil War they included: James Spence, The American Union (November 23, 1861); Alexander Beresford-Hope, A Popular View of the American Civil War (December 13, 1861); John Cowell, Southern Secession (January 25, 1862); James Spence, On the Recognition of the Southern Confederacy (August 12, 1862); and Arthur Fremantle, Three Months in the Southern States (January 2, 1864).

27. H. Adams to C. F. Adams, Jr., July 3, 1863; Ford, vol. 2, 43.

28. Illustrated Times, July 4, 1863.

29. Collie to Wharncliffe, January 23. 1865, in Wharncliffe Muniments, WhM 461.

30. Moran, vol. 2, 904. An article in the Spectator (October 5, 1861), for example, claimed that American news from Reuters was biased towards the Confederates.

31. Die Presse, November 14, 1862, quoted in John Laskey, "Marx and Engels on the Civil War," Crossfire (December 2003), 24. Edward B. Hamley, "Our Rancorous 'Cousins'," Blackwood's Magazine, November 1863, 637; Peyton, vol. 2, 39–40.

32. Adams to Seward, July 23, 1863, in Foreign Relations, 1863, vol. 1, 319.

33. Perhaps demonstrated by the fact that George E. Seymour, one of the proprietors of the pro-Northern Daily News, was included in the list of Confederate bondholders. Henry Adams was a contributor to both the Morning Star and the Daily News.

34. London American, December 4, 1861.

35. Semmes, 348–349.

36. Hammerson, 60.

37. Raimo, 59.

38. Foreign Relations, 1863, vol. 1, 19–24, which reprints the complete text of the association's pamphlet.

39. Ibid., 18.

40. Moran, vol. 2, 1329.

41. Times, October 12, 1864.

42. Collie, who undoubtedly made a great deal of money out of the Civil War, seems to have been prone to munificent gestures: through Governor Vance, he donated $20,000 for the relief of the North Carolina poor (Papers of Zebulon Baird Vance, vol. 1, liii).

43. Southern Independence Association of London, Address to the Public, in Goldwin Smith, Letter to a Whig Member of the Southern Independence Association (London: Macmillan, 1864), 34–35.

44. Ibid., 35–36.

45. Ibid., 35.

46. John Bigelow, "The Confederate Diplomatists," Century Magazine , May 1891, 123.

47. Hotze to Benjamin, March 12, 1864, ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 1061.

48. Times, December 23, 1864; ibid., December 26, 1864.

49. Taylor to Wharncliffe, January 5, 1865; Warwick to Wharncliffe, January 6, 1865; Arco to Wharncliffe, January 12, 1865; Hampson to Wharncliffe, January 17, 1865, in Wharncliffe Muniments, WhM 461. Another disabled Confederate soldier who visited London was William H. Brawley, a South Carolinian who had lost his left arm at the battle of Fair Oaks in 1862. He arrived in London in June 1864 and in his diary he recorded meeting Commissioner Mason and seeing the sights; his diary was edited by Francis R. Brawley and published in 1970.

50. Hotze to Benjamin, September 26, 1862, ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 534.

51. Joseph M. Hernon, Jr., "British Sympathies in the American Civil War," Journal of Southern History, 33 (1967):362.

52. Donald Bellows, "A Study of British Conservative Reaction to the American Civil War," Journal of Southern History, 51 (1985):505–526.

53. Quoted in deKay, 131.

54. Bee-Hive, April 11, 1863, quoted in Royden Harrison, "British Labour and the Confederacy: A Note on the Southern Sympathies of Some British Working Class Journals and Leaders During the American Civil War," International Review of Social History, 2 (1957):99.

55. E. D. Adams, 133.

56. Harrison, 101.

Epilogue

1. William Webb returned to his native state of Virginia, where he died in 1881. (William A. Young, Jr., "Treasures from the Attic: The Colonel's Bootjack & the Commander's Watch Chain," Crossfire, August 1997, 13–15.)

2. Daniel E. Sutherland, "Exiles, Emigrants and Sojourners: The Post-Civil War Confederate Exodus in Perspective," Civil War History, 31 (1985): 252. Paris acted as a magnet for Americans both during and after the Civil War, and particularly for artists; men like Thomas Eakins and Winslow Homer flocked there, as Americans in Paris 1860–1900, a recent exhibition at London's National Gallery demonstrated.

3. George Augustus Sala was an admirer of the American actress Kate Bateman, who was then playing in London, and knew her father, the theatrical impresario, Col. Hezekiah L. Bateman. Sala may have introduced him to Belle Boyd, and got her an introduction to the stage (Sigaud, 186).

4. For an account of the Confederate community at Leamington, see John D. Bennett, "A Popular Place with Rebels," Crossfire, April 2005, 23–24.

5. "United States of America v. Prioleau," Times, July 7, 1866, December 21, 1866, and June 18, 1867; Wise, 223.

6. "United States of America v. McRae," The Law Reports, Equity Cases, vol. 4, 1867, 327–340; Chancery Appeal Cases, vol. 3, 1867, 79–92; Equity Cases, vol. 8, 1869, 69–77; Daniel Grinnan, "Disposition of Confederate Funds," Confederate Veteran (July 1929):328.

7. William C. Davis, "The Conduct of Mr Thompson," Civil War Times Illustrated, May 1970, 5–7, 43–47. It seems likely that Thompson had considerably more than this; he went back to America in 1869, and when he died in 1885 was estimated to have been worth at least $500,000.

8. Morse to Seward, November 30, 1865, in Foreign Relations, 1866, vol. 1.

9. Times, November 24, 1875.

Appendix E — Southern Independence Association of London

1. Index, January 14, 1864, which also prints the Association's constitution.

Appendix F — The British Jackson Monumental Fund

1. Index, July 2, 1863; this differs somewhat from the list in ORN, ser. II, vol. 3, 828.

Bibliography

Primary Sources: Unpublished

De La Rue Collection, #MS937, University of Reading.

De La Rue Private Day Book 1862, National Postal Museum, London.

Jackson Memorial Account, Coutts & Co., London.

London Consular Dispatches, 1861–1865, #M528, John Rylands University Library, Manchester (microfilm).

James Heyward North Diary, #862, Southern Historical Collection, Wilson Library, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill (microfilm).

Wharncliffe Muniments, #WhM 460 & 461, Sheffield City Libraries.

Primary Sources: Published

Adams, Henry. The Education of Henry Adams, an Autobiography. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1961. Originally published in 1918.

Anderson, Edward C. Confederate Foreign Agent: The European Diary of Major Edward C. Anderson, ed. W. Stanley Hoole. University, AL: Confederate Publishing, 1976.

Barron, Samuel. "Diary from 1863 to 1865." ORN, ser. II, vol. 2, 813–821.

Bigelow, John. "The Confederate Diplomatists." Century Magazine (May 1891), 113–126.

_____. Lest We Forget: Gladstone, Morley and the Confederate Loan of 1863. New York: De Vinne Press, 1905.

Boyd, Belle. Belle Boyd in Camp and Prison, ed. Curtis C. Davis. South Brunswick, NJ: Thomas Yoseloff, 1968. Originally published in 1865.

Bulloch, James D. The Secret Service of the Confederate States in Europe; or, How the Confederate Cruisers Were Equipped, ed. Philip van Doren Stern. 2 vols. New York: Thomas Yoseloff, 1959. Originally published in 1883.

"Caleb Huse." Confederate Veteran (May 1905), iii.

Ferguson, Emma H. "Sketch of Major Ferguson." Confederate Veteran (March 1899), 99–100.

Ford, Worthington C., ed. A Cycle of Adams Letters, 1861–1865. 2 vols. London: Constable, 1920.

Forrest, Douglas F. Odyssey in Gray: A Diary of Confederate Service, 1863–1865, ed. William N. Still, Jr. Richmond: Virginia State Library, 1979.

Grinnan, Daniel. "Disposition of Confederate Funds." Confederate Veteran (July 1929), 328–329.

"Major Huse of the Secret Service." Confederate Veteran (February 1905), 65–66.

Mason, Virginia. The Public Life and Diplomatic Correspondence of James Murray Mason, With Some Personal History by His Daughter. Roanoke, VA: Stone Printing & Manufacturing Co., 1903.

Moran, Benjamin. The Journal of Benjamin Moran, 1857–1865, ed. Sarah A. Wallace & Frances E. Gillespie. 2 vols. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948.

Morgan, James M. Midshipman in Gray: Selections from Recollections of a Rebel Reefer, ed. R. Thomas Campbell. Shippensburg, PA: Burd Street Press, 1997. Originally published in 1917.

Murray's Modern London 1860. Moretonhampstead, Devon: Old House Books, 2003.

Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies in the War of the Rebellion (ORA), 4th ser. Vols. 1–3. Washington, DC: 1900.

Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies in the War of the Rebellion (ORN), 2nd Ser. Vols. 2–3. Washington, DC: 1921–1922.

Papers Relating to the Foreign Relations of the United States. Washington, DC: 1861–1865.
Pardon, George F. The Popular Guide to London and Its Suburbs. London: Routledge, Warne & Routledge, 1862.
Peyton, John L. The American Crisis; or, Pages from the Notebook of a State Agent During the Civil War. 2 vols. London: Saunders, Otley, 1867.
Richardson, James D. Messages and Papers of the Confederacy, Including the Diplomatic Correspondence, 1861–1865. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: U.S. Publishing, 1905.
Semmes, Raphael. Memoirs of Service Afloat During the War Between the States, ed. John M. Taylor. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1996. Originally published in 1869.
Thompson, John R. "From the Diary of John R. Thompson." Confederate Veteran (March 1929), 98–100.
Trelawny, Sir John. Parliamentary Diaries, 1858–1865, ed. T.A. Jenkins, Camden, Fourth Series, vol. 40. London: Royal Historical Society, 1990.
Walker, Georgiana G. The Private Journal of Georgiana Gholson Walker, 1862–1865; with Selections from the Post-War Years, 1866–1876, ed. Dwight F. Henderson. Tuscaloosa, AL: Confederate Publishing, 1963.
"William L. Yancey's European Diary, March-June 1861," ed. W. Stanley Hoole. Alabama Review, 25 (1972), 134–142.

Secondary Sources

Adams, Ephraim D. Great Britain and the American Civil War. 2 vols. London: Longmans, 1925.
"An American in London." Times Literary Supplement, June 30, 1950.
Barton, Peter. "The First Blockade-Runner and Another Alabama." Mariner's Mirror, 81 (1995), 45–64.
Beers, Henry P. The Confederacy: A Guide to the Archives of the Government of the Confederate States of America. Washington, DC: National Archives and Records Administration, 1998. Originally published in 1968.
Bennett, John D. "Benjamin Moran's Journal." Crossfire, The Magazine of the American Civil War Round Table (UK), August 1998, 8–9.
_____. "A Confederate Link with Chelsea." Crossfire, March 1999, 24.
_____. "General Jackson's Statue." Crossfire, December 2004, 25–26.
_____. "A Popular Place with Rebels." Crossfire, April 2005, 23–24.
Boaz, Thomas. Guns for Cotton: England Arms the Confederacy. Shippensburg, PA: Burd Street Press, 1996.
Brogan, Hugh, ed. The Times Reports the American Civil War: Extracts from the Times, 1860–1865. London: Times Books, 1975.
Callahan, James M. The Diplomatic History of the Southern Confederacy. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins Press, 1901.
Caskie, Jaquelin A. The Life and Letters of Matthew Fontaine Maury. Richmond, VA: Richmond Press, 1928.
Cochran, Robert T., Jr. "Witness to a War." National Geographic, April 1961, 453–491.
Collyer, C. "Gladstone and the American Civil War." Proceedings of the Leeds Philosophical and Literary Society, 6 (1948–1952), 583–594.
Coulter, E. Merton. Travels in the Confederate States: A Bibliography. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1994. Originally published in 1948.
Crapster, Basil L. "Thomas Hamber, 1828–1902: Tory Journalist." Victorian Periodicals Newsletter, 8 (1975), 115–124.
Cullop, Charles P. "Edwin De Leon, Jefferson Davis's Propagandist." Civil War History, 8 (1962), 386–400.
_____. "English Reaction to Stonewall Jackson's Death." West Virginia History, 29 (1967), 1–5.
_____. Confederate Propaganda in Europe, 1861–1865. Coral Gables, FL: University of Miami Press, 1969.
Davis, William C. "The Conduct of Mr. Thompson." Civil War Times Illustrated (May 1970), 5–7, 43–47.
_____. "Confederate Exiles." American History Illustrated, June 1970, 31–43.
deKay, James Tertius. The Rebel Raiders: The Astonishing History of the Confederacy's Secret Navy. New York: Ballantine Books, 2002.
Delaney, Norman C. "'When Can You Start?': The Strange Occupation of James Bulloch." In Raiders and Blockaders: The American Civil War Afloat. Washington, DC: Brassey's, 1998, 1–12.
Diamond, William. "Imports of the Confederate Government from Europe." Journal of Southern History, 6 (1940), 470–503.
Dubose, John W. The Life and Times of William Lowndes Yancey. Birmingham, AL: Roberts & Son, 1892.
Dufour, Charles L. Nine Men in Gray . Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1963.
Gentry, Judith F. "A Confederate Success in Europe: The Erlanger Loan." Journal of Southern History, 36 (1970), 157–188.

Goff, Richard D. Confederate Supply. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1969.
Griffiths, Dennis. Plant Here the Standard. London: Macmillan, 1996.
Hammerson, Michael. "The American Civil War Comes to Belsize Park." In Belsize 2000: a Living Suburb. London: Belsize Conservation Area Advisory Committee, 2000, 58–66.
Harris, S.H. "John L. O'Sullivan Serves the Confederacy," Civil War History, 10 (1964), 275–290.
Harrison, Royden. "British Labour and the Confederacy: A Note on the Southern Sympathies of Some British Working-Class Journals and Leaders During the American Civil War." International Review of Social History, 2 (1957), 78–105.
Hearn, Chester G. Gray Raiders of the Sea. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1992.
Hendrick, Burton J. Statesmen of the Lost Cause. New York: Literary Guild of America, 1939.
Henry, William W. "Kenner's Mission to Europe." William and Mary Quarterly, ser. I, vol. 25 (1916), 9–12.
Hernon, Joseph M., Jr. "British Sympathies in the American Civil War: A Reconsideration." Journal of Southern History, 33 (1967), 356–367.
Houseman, Lorna. The House That Thomas Built: The Story of De La Rue. London: Chatto & Windus, 1968.
Jameson, J.F. "London Expenditures of the Confederate Secret Service." American Historical Review, 35 (1930), 811-824.
Jenkins, Brian. "Frank Lawley and the Confederacy." Civil War History, 23 (1977), 144–160.
_____. "William Gregory: Champion of the Confederacy." History Today, (May 1978), 322–330.
Jordon, Donaldson, & Edwin J. Pratt. Europe and the American Civil War. Boston, MA: Houghton Mifflin, 1931.
Keiser, Thomas J. The English Press and the American Civil War. Unpublished doctoral dissertation, Reading University, 1971.
Lester, Richard I. Confederate Finance and Purchasing in Great Britain. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1975.
_____. "An Aspect of Confederate Finance During the American Civil War: The Erlanger Loan and the Plan of 1864." Business History, 16 (1974), 130–144.
_____. "The Procurement of Confederate Blockade Runners and Other Vessels in Great Britain During the American Civil War." Mariner's Mirror, 61 (1975), 255–270.
Logan, Kevin J. "The Bee-Hive Newspaper and British Working-Class Attitudes Towards the American Civil War." Civil War History, 22 (1976), 337–348.
London Times. The History of the Times: The Tradition Established, 1841–1884. London: Times, 1939.
Lonn, Ella. Foreigners in the Confederacy. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2002. Originally published in 1940.
"The Lost Shipment." De La Rue Journal (July 1951), 18–20.
Luraghi, Raimondo. A History of the Confederate Navy. London: Chatham Publishing, 1996.
Markham, John. "The Rise and Fall of Hull's Ambitious Mayor." Select (October/November 1988), 88–90.
Maurer, Oscar. "Punch on Slavery and Civil War in America." Victorian Studies, 1 (1957), 5–28.
Maynard, Douglas H. "The Forbes-Aspinwall Mission." Mississippi Valley Historical Review, 45 (1958), 67–89.
_____. "The Confederacy's Super-Alabama." Civil War History, 5 (1959), 80–95.
Merli, Frank J. Great Britain and the Confederate Navy, 1861–1865. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2004. Originally published in 1970.
Morton, Brian N. Americans in London. London: Queen Anne Press, 1988.
Neely, Mark E., Jr., Harold Holzer, & Gabor S. Boritt. The Confederate Image: Prints of the Lost Cause. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.
Nevins, Allan, James I. Robertson, & Bell I. Wiley, eds. Civil War Books: A Critical Bibliography. 2 vols. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1967–1969.
Oates, Stephen B. "Henry Hotze: Confederate Agent Abroad." Historian, 27 (1965), 131–154.
Owsley, Frank L. King Cotton Diplomacy: Foreign Relations of the Confederate States of America, 2nd ed. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1959.
Owsley, Harriet C. "Henry Shelton Sanford and Federal Surveillance Abroad, 1861–1865." Mississippi Valley Historical Review, 48 (1961–1962), 211–228.
Priestley, Charles. "Confederates in Paris: Slidell, Benjamin and the Shameless Jezebel of Secession." Crossfire (September 2001), 14–16.
_____. "Batavian Grace: A.J.B. Beresford Hope: An Example of English Upper Class Support for the Confederacy in the American Civil War." Crossfire (August 2002), 18–22.
_____. "Cleaning Tremlett's Grave." Crossfire (December 2003), 18.
_____. "Did Semmes Sleep Here? 71 Euston Square, London." Crossfire (April 2004), 24–25.
_____. "France's Opportunity: An Englishman's Plea for French Intervention." Crossfire (April 2005), 13–16.

Robbins, Peggy. "Caleb Huse, Confederate Agent." Civil War Times Illustrated (August 1978), 30–40.
Robinson, William M., Jr. The Confederate Privateers. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1994. Originally published in 1928.
Schwab, John C. "The Confederate Foreign Loan: An Episode in the Financial History of the Civil War." Yale Review, 1 (1892), 175–186.
_____. The Confederate States of America, 1861–1865: A Financial and Industrial History of the South During the Civil War. New York: Scribner's & Sons, 1901.
Shain, Charles E. "English Novelists and the American Civil War." American Quarterly, 14 (1962), 399–421.
Sigaud, Louis A. Belle Boyd: Confederate Spy. Richmond, VA: Dietz, 1944.
Smith, Van Mitchell. British Business Relations with the Confederacy, 1861–1865. Unpublished doctoral dissertation, University of Texas, 1949.
Spencer, Warren F. The Confederate Navy in Europe. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1997. Originally published in 1983.
Stern, Philip Van Doren. Secret Missions of the Civil War. New York: Bonanza Books, 1990. Originally published in 1959.
Sutherland, Daniel E. "Exiles, Emigrants and Sojourners: The Post-Civil War Confederate Exodus in Perspective." Civil War History, 31 (1985), 237–256.
Thompson, Samuel B. Confederate Purchasing Operations Abroad. Gloucester, MA: Peter Smith, 1973. Originally published in 1935.
Todd, Richard C. Confederate Finance. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1954.
Vanauken, Sheldon. The Glittering Illusion: English Sympathy for the Southern Confederacy. Worthing, Sussex, UK: Churchman, 1988.
Vandiver, Frank E. Confederate Blockade Running Through Bermuda, 1861–1865: Letter and Cargo Manifests. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1947.
_____. Ploughshares into Swords: Josiah Gorgas and Confederate Ordnance. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 1994. Originally published in 1952.
Weller, Jac. "The Confederate Use of British Cannon." Civil War History, 3 (1957), 135–152.
_____. "Imported Confederate Shoulder Weapons." Civil War History, 5 (1959), 157–181.
Williams, Frances L. Matthew Fontaine Maury: Scientist of the Sea. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1963.
Wise, Stephen R. Lifeline of the Confederacy: Blockade-Running During the Civil War. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1991. Originally published in 1988.
Young, William A., Jr. "Treasures from the Attic: The Colonel's Bootjack & the Commander's Watch Chain." Crossfire (August 1997), 13–15.

Index

Abel, Prof. Frederick 97–98
Abel fuses 97–98
"Action off Cherbourg" 127
Acton, Sir John, MP 146
Adams, Charles Francis 28, 33, 36–38, 63–64, 75–76, 79–85, 97, 103, 136, 143, 146, 150
Adams, Henry 33–34, 36, 43, 136, 140–142
Adams, John 6
Adams, John Quincy 28
Adams, Robert 95–96
Address to the British Public (London Confederate States Aid Association) 146
Address to the Public (Southern Independence Association of London) 148–149
Adelphi Theater, Strand 18, 56
Advance (blockade-runner) 61
Agrippina (bark) 63
Ajax, CSS 64
Alabama, CSS 63, 67–69, 77, 82, 84, 110, 113, 123, 127, 153
Alabama: A Nautical Extravaganza 18, 111
Alabama and the Kearsarge 127
Alabama claims 93
Alar (steamer) 72
Albemarle Street, Piccadilly 12, 28
Albert, Prince Consort 23
Albert Memorial, Hyde Park 24, 115
Albion Trading Co. 103
Aldridge, Ira 6
Alexandra (steamer) 82, 86
Alexandra, Princess of Wales 24
Alexandria, Virginia 154
Alhambra Palace, Leicester Square 19
All Saints' Church, Margaret Street 40
All the Year Round 39, 118, 127
"American Affairs" 47
"American Blockaded Ports" 123–124
American Crisis 144, 154
American Disruption 39–40
"American Generals" 123–124
American Notes 110
American Union 39, 48, 101, 118
Amnesty, United States 152
Anderson, Major Edward C., CSA 52, 54–56, 60–61, 63, 66–68, 84–85, 96, 152
Anderson, Capt. J.W. 127
Anderson, John 23
Annie Childs (blockade-runner) 67
Antietam, battle of 137
Arabia (steamer) 70
Archer, Asst. Engr. E., Confederate States Volunteer Navy 85
Arco, James D. 150
Argyll Rooms, Great Windmill Street 19
Arkansas, CSS 123
Arklow House, Connaught Place 148
Armstrong & Co., Newcastle-on-Tyne 96
Armstrong guns 97
Army & Navy Club, Pall Mall 69
Army Stores and Clothing Depot, Northamptonshire 52
Arnold, Matthew 146
Ash, James 103, 106
Ashbridge & Co., Liverpool 103
Ashburton, Lord 60
Aspinwall, William H. 68, 80
Atalanta (blockade-runner) 103, 105–106
Athenaeum 39, 46, 132
Atlanta, CSS 152
Atlantic Trading Co. 103
Audubon, John J. 6
Austin Friars 107

Bacon & Co. 114, 117
Bahama (steamer) 63, 85
Baltimore 154
Bank, Confederate 103
Bank of England 74, 157
Banvard, John 20
Baring Bros. 27
Barnett & Sons 83, 95
Barney, Cdr. Joseph N., CSN 77
Barron, Flag Officer Samuel, CSN 69, 76–77, 153
Barrow, Col. Robert H., CSA 134
Bates, Joshua 27
Bath, Marquess of 34, 91, 140, 148
Bath House, Piccadilly 60
Battersea Park 20
Battery Wagner, South Carolina 122
"Battle of Gettysburg" 121
Beasley, Benjamin 95
Beauregard, Gen. Pierre G.T., CSA 101, 140, 153
Bedgebury Park, Kent 157
Bee-Hive 150–151
Begbie, Thomas S. 75, 82–83, 103, 107, 158
Belgravia 7, 9
Belle Boyd in Camp and Prison 132
Belsham, Robert R. 140
Benjamin, Judah P. 38–39, 41, 43, 47, 49, 60, 87, 94, 102, 114, 136, 149–150, 152, 155–156
Bennett, Alfred W. 113
Bennett & Wake 82
Bensusan, Thomas 102
Bentley & Son 124–125, 128
Beresford Hope, Alexander J. 39–40, 92, 114–115, 148, 157
Bermuda (blockade-runner) 56, 101
Berners Hotel, Berners Street 73–74
Bethnal Green, factory explosion at 24
Bible Society of the Confederate States 102
Bibles 101–102
Bigelow, John 41, 93
Birmingham 54
Birmingham Small Arms Co. 96
Bishopsgate station 15
Bissell, Thomas 95
Black Angel 132
Blackmore, R.D. 134
Blackwall 106
Blackwood & Sons 124, 127
Blackwood's Magazine 120, 124, 127, 135, 148
Blakely, Capt. Alexander T. 85, 97
Blakely guns 97
Blakely Ordnance Co. 97
Blamphin, Charles 116
Blanchard's restaurant, Soho 12, 136
Bledsoe, Albert T. 45, 154
Blockade, Union 3, 25, 31–32, 34, 49, 121, 136, 140
Blockade-running 56–57, 59, 61, 67, 79–80, 101, 103–109
Blondin, Charles 19
Bloodgood, M. Hildreth 58, 152

Bloomsbury 7
Bold, Thomas 70, 73
"Bonnie Blue Flag" 50, 116
Bookbinders' Union 150–151
Boosey & Sons 116
Booth, Edwin 18
Booth, John W. 18, 112
Boots and shoes 99
Border and Bastille 125
Bostwick, A.W. 48
Boucicault, Dion 56
Bourke, Hon. Robert 120, 140, 148
Bouverie Street 45, 99
Bowles, James 10
Bowman, William 59
"Boy of the Rappahannock" 116
Boyd, Belle 125, 130–132, 154
Bradbury & Evans 124
Braidwood, James 23
Breach, James 9, 12
Breckinridge, Maj. Gen. John C., CSA 152, 156
Brewer, H.O. 43, 103
Brewer & Co. 116
Briggs, Thomas 24
Bright, John, MP 141
Brighton 157
Britannia Theater, Hoxton 18, 111
British & Foreign Bible Society 102
British Honduras (Belize) 156
British Jackson Monumental Fund 114–115
British Swiss Legion 41
Britton, Mr. 54
Brixton Prison 23
"Brown, Capt." 75
Brown, Governor Joseph E. 25, 60–61
Brunswick Hotel, Jermyn Street 132
Buckland Crescent, Belsize Park 68, 144, 147
Buckley, Frederick 116
Buckley, Joseph 102
Buckley, Victor 84
Buckstone, John B. 18
Bull Run, first battle of 30, 124
Bulloch, Cdr. James D., CSN 36, 38, 52, 54–56, 62–70, 76–77, 82–85, 135, 144
Bulwer-Lytton, Edward 146
Bunch, Robert 26
Bunting, J.G. 82
Burford's Panorama, Leicester Square 20
Burlington Arcade, Piccadilly 16
Burlington Hotel, Cork Street 9, 58, 76
Burton, James H. 96–97, 155
Bury Street, St. James's 12, 41, 72
Butler, Maj. Gen. Benjamin, USA 111, 134
Buttons 99

Calais 73–75, 82
Calhoun, John C. 99
Cambridge House, Piccadilly 37, 139
Camilla (yacht) 66
Campbell, Alexander 52
Campbell, Dugald F. 93
Campbell, Lord 34, 49, 92, 140, 148
Campbell, Robert B. 45
Campbell, Lt. William P.A., CSN 73
Canton (Pampero) 68
Capper, Charles 104
Career of the Alabama 127
Carlyle, Thomas 146
Carter, Lt. William F., CSN 64, 72–73
Carteret, Felix 87
Cassell's Illustrated Family Paper 123
Catlin, George 6
Causes and Consequences of the Civil War 46
Cecil, Lord Eustace 140
Cecil, Lord Robert, MP 40, 122, 139–140, 148
Central Criminal Court, Old Bailey 74
Chameleon (blockade-runner) 106
Chancellorsville, Battle of 114
Chapman, Lt. Robert T., CSN 68, 72, 102
Chapman & Hall 125, 127
Charing Cross station 16
Charleston Mercury 25
Charleston, South Carolina 37, 90, 121–123, 142
"Charleston Under Fire" 122
Charlotte (blockade-runner) 103
Chase, Thomas H. 80–81
Chattanooga, battle of 90
Cherbourg 111, 127
Chesham Place, Belgravia 35
Chesnut, Mrs. Mary B. 32–33
Chesterfield, Lady 130
Cheyne Row, Chelsea 146
Chichester, Bishop of 150
Chickamauga, CSS 105
Chorley Wood, Hertfordshire 157
Christian Brotherhood 145
Church of England clergy 144
Church Times 144
Church's Historical Panorama, St. James's Hall 112–113
City of London 7, 88
City of Richmond (blockade-runner) 77
"Civil War in America" 112–113
Clanricarde, Marquess of 150
Clarendon Road, Notting Hill 53
Clark, Governor Henry T. 60
Clarke, Charles H. 134
Clarke, H.G. 117
Clements, Nelson 61
Clerkenwell House of Detention 23
"Close of the American War" 122
Cobden, Richard, MP 34, 151
Cold Bath Fields Prison, Clerkenwell 22–23
Coleman & Co. 73–75
Coles, Capt. Cowper, RN 63, 66
Colleen Bawn 56
Colletis (steamer) 67
Collie, Alexander 61, 105–108, 115, 130, 142, 148, 158
Collie, William 158
Collie & Co. 57, 91, 107
Collier, Sir Robert 93
Colline, Victor 116
Collins, Henry G. 7
Collins' Illustrated Atlas of London 7
Colt, Samuel 6
Commons, House of 139–142
Condor (blockade-runner) 107, 130, 153
"Confederate Raid" 116
Confederate's Daughter 18, 111
Confederate Secession 140
Confederate States Commercial Agency 41–42
Confederate States Exchange Rooms 99
"Confederate Struggle and Recognition" 122
"Confederate War March" 116
Conolly, Thomas, MP 140
Conscription, Confederate 140
Consulate, United States 80, 82
Consuls, British 140
Conway, Rev. Moncure D. 36
Cooper, James F. 6
Cooper, Mr. 64
Coote, Charles 116
Cora: or, The Slaves of the South 111
Corbett, Capt. Peter 65
Cornhill Magazine 49, 121, 123
Corsan, William C. 125, 142, 158
Corsan, Denton & Burdekin, Sheffield 125
Cotton embargo 25
Cotton famine 24
Cotton Loan, Confederate 37, 58, 68, 87–94, 103, 156
Court of Exchequer, Westminster 82
Court of Queen's Bench, Westminster 75
Coutts Bank, Strand 115
Covent Garden Theater 17
Cowell, John W. 34, 39
Cowell, William 10
Cramer, Beale & Wood 116
Crane Court, Fleet Street 45
Cremorne Gardens, Chelsea 74
Crenshaw, Capt. William G., CSA 57–58, 61, 74, 77, 155
Crossan, Lt. Thomas M., CSN 61, 154
Crowder, Maynard, Son & Lawford 88
Cruise of the Alabama 127
Cruise of the Alabama and the Sumter 128
"Cruise of the Confederate Ship 'Sumter'" 121
Crystal Palace, Hyde Park 6
Crystal Palace, Sydenham 20, 55
Cubitt Town 57, 64, 105–106, 158
Curtis & Harvey 54
Cushman, Charlotte 18

Daily News 45, 92, 127, 144
Daily Telegraph 16, 45, 132, 144
Dallas, George M. 26, 28
Davidson, Lt. Hunter, CSN 77
Davis, President Jefferson 25–27, 34, 37, 41, 46, 77, 99, 101–102, 112–113, 115, 118, 120, 123–125, 135, 137, 148, 155
Davis, Joseph E. 27

Davis, Mrs. Varina H. 117, 124
Day, Samuel P. 124–125, 142
Day & Son 114
Dayton, William L. 36
Deane, Adams & Deane 95–96
"Death of Stonewall Jackson" 116
Deerfoot 23
De Hoghton, Sir Henry 148
Delane, John T. 91
De La Rue, Victor 114
De La Rue & Co. 99, 101
De Leon, Edwin 49, 54, 120–121, 139, 154
Denbigh (blockade-runner) 103
Denny & Co., Dumbarton 64
Deptford 106
Devonshire Street 146
"Diary of a Confederate Boy" 118
Dickens, Charles 7, 39, 78, 110, 118
Diplomatic recognition, Confederate 3, 27, 30, 32, 34, 38, 46, 49–50, 70, 119, 140
Disraeli, Benjamin 134
"Dixie" 32, 74, 116
"Dixie's Land Gallop" 116
"Dixie's Land Polka" 116
Domestic Manners of the Americans 110
Donoughmore, Earl of 140, 148
Dorrell & Son 127
Dover 75
"Down Among the Cotton" 116
Down South; or, An Englishman's Experiences at the Seat of the American War 124
Down South; or, Life in the Cotton Fields 111
Drake, Frank 121
Drayton, Henri 111–112
Dudgeon, John & William 57, 64, 105, 158
Dudley, Thomas H. 63, 68, 80
Duncombe, William E., MP 139
Dunning, T.J. 150–151
Dyke, Mid. James H., CSN 77

Eardley, Sir Eardley 57
Eardley, Lady Florence 57
Early Closing Assocation 16
East India Co. 62
Eastern Counties Railway 15–16
"Echoes of the Week" 132
Economist 87–88
Economist (blockade-runner) 56, 80
Edge, Frederick M. 127
Edith (blockade-runner) 105
Edward, Prince of Wales 24
Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly 20
Elopement: A Tale of the Confederate States 134
Emancipation, Confederate 37–38, 45
Emancipation Proclamation, Lincoln's 3, 137, 143, 151
Emerson, Ralph W. 6
Emmett, Daniel D. 116
Engineer Bureau, Confederate 60
England and the Disrupted States of America 47
Enrica (CSS Alabama) 63
Erlanger, Emile 87–88, 90, 94, 103
Errand to the South in the Summer of 1862 124, 158
European Trading Co. 103
Eustis, George 32
Euston Hotel 10
Euston Square 69
Euston station 15, 85
Evans, Lt. William E., CSN 68, 72
Evans' Supper Rooms, Covent Garden 19, 74
Evening Herald 144
Evening Standard 144
Evening Star 144
Exeter Hall, Strand 23–24, 151
Express 144
"Extracts from the Journal of a Refugee in Georgia" 122

Facey, T.G. 150
"Fairfax, Miss L." 134
Falcon (blockade-runner) 107
Falmouth, Cornwall 54, 128
Farmer, Henry 116
Fauntleroy, Lt. Charles M. 73
Fawcett, Preston & Co., Liverpool 63
Fearn, Capt. John W., CSA 28, 33, 36, 54, 130, 132, 153
Federals and Confederates 111
Fenchurch Street station 15
Fenton's Hotel, St James's Street 9, 33
Ferguson, Mrs. Emma 57
Ferguson, Major James B., CSA 57
Fergusson, Sir James, MP 34, 139–140
Ferté, Jean F.J. de la 99
Ficklin, Major Benjamin F., CSA 57, 99, 101
Field, Inspector Charles F. 78
Fiery Cross 132
Fingal (blockade-runner) 56, 67, 79, 85
Finsbury Square 143
Firmin & Sons 99
Fishmongers' Hall, King William Street 30–31
Fitzroy, Rear Adm. Robert, RN 70
Fitzroy Square 81
Flamingo (blockade-runner) 107
Fleet Street 9, 45, 48, 142, 144
Fletcher, Lt. Col Henry 121
Flora (blockade-runner) 105
Florida, CSS 63, 67, 69, 77
Florida (steamer) 76
Foley, John H. 102, 115, 134
Forbes, George 116
Forbes, John M. 68, 80, 136
Foreign Enlistment Act 4, 63, 65, 74–75
Foreign Office 137, 146
Forrest, Asst. Paymaster Douglas F., CSN 15, 73–74, 77, 99, 112, 135, 153
Forrest, Edwin 6
Fort Fisher, North Carolina 37, 97–98, 130
Fort Sumter, South Carolina 37, 113, 122
Fortnightly Review 120
Foster & King 116
Fourteenth Amendment 108
La France (steamer) 64
Francis, Henry 113
Franco-Confederate treaty, abortive 36
Franklin, Benjamin 5
Franklin, battle of 36
Fraser, Trenholm & Co., Liverpool 3, 56–58, 62, 65, 82, 85, 88, 94, 97–98, 102, 107, 156
Fraser's Magazine 46
Fredericksburg, battle of 113, 117–118
Freeman, William 45, 134
Fremantle, Lt. Col. Arthur J.L. 121, 124, 134, 158
Freshfields & Newman 88
Fullam, George T. 127
Fuller, Hiram 45–46, 154

Galveston, Texas 155
Garibaldi, Gen. Giuseppe 24
Garroting Act 21
Geddes, C.W. 82
"General Jackson Schottische" 116
Gentry, Judith F. 94
Georgia, CSS 70, 72–73, 77, 142
Gettysburg, battle of 90, 124, 136, 142
Gilliat, Algernon 64
Gilliat, John S. 34, 137, 148, 157
Gilliat & Co. 87–88, 102, 107
Giraffe (blockade-runner) 101
Gladiator (blockade-runner) 56, 80
Gladstone, William E., MP 15, 37, 49, 91, 137, 142, 150, 156
Glaisher, James 5
Glasgow 68–69, 75–76, 82
Globe 144
Gold, Confederate 156
Gompertz, M. 112
Goody & Jones 99–100
Gorgas, Col. Josiah, CSA 51–52, 54, 56, 96–97
Gospel Oak train crash 23
Grand Transformation Scenes in the United States 154
Grant, Lt. Gen. Ulysses S. 97
Grattan, Thomas C. 47
Graves, Lt. Charles I., CSN 74
Gray, Charles W. & Wentworth 109
Gray, W.F. 82
Graz, Austria 155
Great Exhibition of 1851 6
Great Northern Hotel, King's Cross 10
Great Northern Railway 16, 81
Great Russell Street, Bloomsbury 60
Great Seal of the Confederacy 102, 115
Great Western Hotel, Paddington 10
Great Western Railway 16
Grecian Theater, City Road 111
Greek War of Independence 88
Green, Charles 54–55
Green Park 20
Greenhithe, Kent 55, 77
Greenhow, Mrs. Rose O. 59, 81, 128–130, 148, 153

Greenmore, John 19
Greenock, Scotland 67, 79
Greenwich 106
Greenwich Park 20
Greenwood & Batley 96–97
Greg, Percy 47, 134, 157
Gregory, William H., MP 27, 34, 92, 115, 139–141, 148, 157
"Grigson, Mr." 72
Grosvenor Hotel, Victoria 10, 74
Grosvenor Square, Mayfair 130
Gunboats, Confederate 64
Gun's American Agency, Strand 43

Half Moon Street, Piccadilly 12, 24, 28–30, 52, 60
Haliburton, Thomas C., MP 139
Hamber, Thomas 41, 47, 157
Hamburg 85
Hamilton, Archibald 52, 56, 157
Hamley, Major Edward 121, 143
Hammond, Edmund 137
Hampson, T. 150
Hampton Roads peace conference 37
Hardinge, Lt. Samuel W., USN 130, 132
Harriet Pinckney (steamer) 81, 107, 128
Harrison, Mrs. Constance 124
Hartington, Marquess of 140
Hartwell, Robert 151
Haseltine, George 48
Hatchett's Hotel, Piccadilly 10, 52, 66
Havas News Agency, Paris 49
Hawk (steamer) 75–76, 82–83
Hawkins, Edward 21
Haxell, Edward N. 10
Haxell's Hotel, Strand 10, 50
Haymarket 19, 56
Hayward, William S. 132, 134
Hazlewood, Colin H. 18, 111
Helen (blockade-runner) 103
Helm, Major Charles J., CSA 54
Hemy, Henri F. 116
Her Majesty's Theater, Haymarket 17–18
Hercules, CSS 64
Heroine of the Confederacy 134
Hewitt, Capt. William N.W., RN 130
Highgate Cemetery 24
Highland Falls, New York 155
History of the United States to Reconstruction 157
Hobson, Lt. Charles L., CSA 74
Hoge, Rev. Moses D. 101
Holborn Casino, High Holborn 19, 56
Holcombe, Lt. Isaac C., CSN 77
Holland, Sir Henry 34, 70
Holloway Prison 23
Holyhead, Wales 67, 85
"Home Life in a Confederate State" 122
Hood, Gen. John B., CSA 122
Hood, Thomas & Charles 98
Hopkins, John B. 44–46, 99, 157
Hopley, Catherine C. 125, 127, 140
Hopwood, John L., MP 139
Horsemonger Lane Gaol, Southwark 22–23
Hot Springs, Virginia 153
Hotze, Henry 33, 39–41, 43, 45–50, 56, 58, 88, 103, 112, 114, 130, 136, 139, 149–150, 154–155
Houghton, Lord 91
Household Words 78
"How We Broke the Blockade" 121
Hoyer & Ludwig 99
Hull 108, 158
Hunt, Thornton 47
Hunted to Death 132
Hunter, Robert M.T. 30, 34, 40
Hurst & Blackett 124
Huse, Major Caleb, CSA 51–54, 56–61, 63, 66, 74, 84–85, 96–97, 101, 107, 130, 135, 152, 154–155
Hyde Park 9, 20, 115

Illustrated London News 105–106, 112, 116–118, 121, 123–124, 132
Illustrated Times 33, 142
Index 12, 37, 43–50, 98–99, 103, 111, 114–115, 132, 134, 148, 154
Index (blockade-runner) 59, 106
Indian Empire (steamer) 108
International Exhibition of 1862 23–24
Irvine, Mrs. 57
Irving, Washington 18
Isaac, Campbell & Co. 52, 54, 56–58, 61, 69, 74, 78, 91, 93, 99, 103, 107–108
Isaac, Samuel 52, 55–56, 107–108, 158
Isaac, Saul 52, 108, 158
Isle of Wight 156, 158
Islington 7, 9
It's Never Too Late to Mend 18
Ivanhoe (blockade-runner) 103

Jackson, Lt. Gen. Thomas J., CSA 96, 114–116, 121, 123, 127, 132, 134
James, Thomas & George 10
Jansen, Capt. Marin H. 70
Japan (CSS Georgia) 70
Jefferson, Joseph 18
Jermyn Street 10, 54, 60, 66, 84–85
Jewell, J. 116
Johnston, Gen. Joseph E., CSA 114, 140
Johnston, T. & J. 103
Jones, Frederic 127
Jones, George 54
Jones, John B. 58
"Jones, Sarah L." 125
Jones, Loyd & Co. 88
Junior United Service Club, Charles II Street 69
Juno (blockade-runner) 103

Kean, Robert 135
Kearsarge, USS 63, 69, 111, 127
Kell, Lt. John M., CSN 69, 107, 153
Kenner, Duncan F. 37–38, 154
Kennon, Lt. Beverley, CSN 134
Kensington 158
Kensington Gardens 20
Kensington Palace Gardens 107, 158
Kerr, James 54, 96
Kerrison, Sir Edward, MP 34, 139
Kew Gardens 20
Kilbourne, Wisconsin 154
King, Lt. Charles, Jr., CSN 112
King, Thomas B. 25, 152
King's Cross station 16
Kirwan, Daniel J. 12
Knight, John A. 48
Knox, Lt., CSN 76
Koppel, Thomas 113
Kramer, M. 102

Ladd, William 98
Ladies' London Emancipation Society 50
Lady Sterling (blockade-runner) 103, 106
Lady's Newspaper 17
Laird, John, MP 91, 139
Laird & Sons, Birkenhead 63
Laird rams 3, 63–64, 77, 82, 86, 142
Lamar, Lucius Q.C. 36, 153
Lancaster, Charles W. 95–96
Lane, Sam & Sara 18
Langham Hotel, Portland Place 12
"Last Days of the Confederate Government" 118
"Last Six Days of Secessia" 120
Laurel (steamer) 66
Laurence, Son & Pearce 88
Lawley, Francis 120, 122, 127
Lawley, Robert 122
Lawrence, George A. 125
Layard, Sir Austen 137, 146
Leadenhall Street 107
Leamington Spa 37, 59–60, 155
Lee, General Robert E., CSA 38, 57, 90, 96, 114, 116, 120–121, 123, 136–137, 142–143
Legation, United States 28–30, 81, 132, 146
Leisure Hour 123
Leno, J.B. 151
Lest We Forget 93
Letters on Slavery 46
Lewis, John 16
Libby Prison, Richmond 12
Life in the South 125
Lincoln, President Abraham 90, 112, 120, 134, 151
Lindsay, William S., MP 28, 92, 139, 140–142, 148, 156
Lindsay & Co. 68, 81, 87–88, 103, 141
Little Bookham, Surrey 158
Little St. James's Street 70, 72
Liverpool 3, 4, 51–52, 54, 56–57, 60, 62–64, 66, 72, 76, 83, 85, 92, 102, 107, 154–157
Liverpool, Confederate bazaar at 37, 150
Lloyd (steamer) 108
Lloyd, J.T. 117
Lloyd's American Railroad Map 117
Lloyd's Map of the Southern Confederacy 117
Log of the Alabama and the Sumter 128

Logan, Celia 134
Lombard Street 104
London: American presence in 6; apartments 12; bridges 12–13; casinos 19; clubs 17; concert rooms 20; criminals 22; department stores 16; drainage system 6, 24; events in 23–24; extent of 5, 8; fogs 7; from a balloon 5; garroting outbreak 21; guidebooks 9, 12, 22; horse buses 13; horse cabs 13–14; hotels 9–12; maps & atlases 6–7; music halls 18–19; newspapers 45, 143–144; nightlife 19–20; parks 20; population of 5; prisons 22–24; railway terminals 15; residential districts 7, 9; restaurants 12; rooming houses 12; shipbuilding 104–105; shopping arcades 17; shops 16; slums 9; steamboats 15; street crime 21; street entertainers 21; street names 6; street vendors 11, 21; streetcars 13; theaters 17–18; trades 9; traffic congestion 21; underground railway 6
London American 48, 98, 111, 144
London & Birmingham Railway 15
London & Blackwall Railway 15
London & Greenwich Railway 15
London & North Western Railway 15, 81
London & South Western Railway 16
London Armory Co. 51, 52, 54–55, 83, 95–96
London Bridge station 15, 56, 74–75
London, Brighton & South Coast Railway 15–16
London, Chatham & Dover Railway 16, 64, 105
London Confederate States Aid Association 146
London Confederate States Commercial League 98
London Emancipation Society 50
London Journal 3, 123
London Labour and the London Poor 21
"London New York Herald" 144
London Pavilion, Tichborne Street 18, 74
London Reader 123
London, Tilbury & Southend Railway 15–16
London Trades Council 150
Longstreet, Lt. Gen. James, CSA 57
Lonsdale, Christopher 116
Lord Mayor's banquet 34
Lords, House of 140
Lost Cause 154
Lothian, Marquess of 140, 148
Louisa Ann Fanny, CSS 64–65, 77, 86
Lowther Arcade, Strand 17
Lungley, Charles 106
"Lying List" 92–93
Lynx (blockade-runner) 57

Macarthy, Harry 116
Mackintosh, Henry F. 45
Macmillan & Co. 142
Macon, Georgia 153
Maffitt, Lt. John N., CSN 63
Magoffin, John 82
Mail steamers 4
Malet, Rev. William W. 124, 144, 158
Mallory, Stephen R. 62–63, 67–68, 77, 125
Manassas, first battle of 30, 124, 132, 134, 143
Manassas, second battle of 150
Manchester Guardian 47
"Manhattan Letters" 41
Mann, A. Dudley 25–28, 30–33, 35, 40, 52, 60, 66, 91, 143, 149, 155
Mann, W. Grayson 28
Mansion House 34
Map Showing Operations under Grant, Sherman and Thomas 118
Maps, Civil War 117
Marion & Son 113
Marmion (blockade-runner) 103
Martin Chuzzlewit 110
Marx, Karl 24, 143
Mary Augusta, CSS 64, 77
"Maryland: A Confederate March" 116
"Maryland, My Maryland" 116
"Maryland Quadrille" 116
Marylebone 7
Mason, James M. 30–34, 36–39, 43, 46, 54, 57, 59, 68–70, 74, 76, 87–88, 90, 97, 102, 112, 120, 135, 139, 152, 154
Matthews, Charles 55
Maury, Cdr. Matthew F., CSN 69, 71–72, 74–75, 77, 98, 125, 130, 135, 144, 148, 153
Maury, Matthew, Jr. 70, 77
Maury, Lt. William L., CSN 70, 72
May, Thomas 107
Mayfair 7, 9
Mayhew, Henry 17, 19, 21–22, 55
McClellan, Maj. Gen. George B., USA 90, 112, 137
McCormick, Cyrus 6
McFarland, C. 54
McFarland, James E. 32, 59
McGill, Lt. John, Confederate States Volunteer Navy 85
McLean, Melhuish & Haes 113
McRae, Colin J. 58–59, 88, 103, 107, 152, 156
Meade, Richard 56
Mediation, British 3, 141–142
Melita (steamer) 69, 107
Memminger, Christopher 59, 94, 103
Memoirs of Service Afloat 128, 144, 153
"Memoirs of the Confederate War" 121, 127
Mercantile Trading Co. 103, 105, 107
Mercedita, USS 101
Merrimac (blockade-runner) 108
Merrimack, USS (CSS Virginia) 113, 123
Mersey Tunnel 158
Metropolis Road Commissioners 15
Metropolitan Police 22
Metropolitan Railway 15, 24, 74
Metropolitan Tabernacle, Elephant & Castle 23
Midland Railway 16
Millbank Penitentiary 23
Miller & Sons, Liverpool 63
Milton, Governor John 125
Minna (blockade-runner) 81
Mitchell's Newspaper Press Directory 44–45
Mobile, Alabama 153
Modern Greece (blockade-runner) 108
Monitor, USS 113, 123
Montgomery, Alabama 153
"Month with the Rebels" 120
Monthly Packet 122
"Month's Visit to Confederate Headquarters" 121
Montreal 154
Moore, Governor Thomas O. 61
Moran, Benjamin 26, 30, 34, 38, 46, 48, 56, 75, 80, 82, 90, 97–98, 106, 114, 128, 132, 136, 143–144, 148, 152
Morgan, Mid. James M., CSN 70, 72, 153
Morley, John 91
Morley's Hotel, Trafalgar Square 10, 51, 74, 90
Morning Advertiser 144
Morning Chronicle 78
Morning Herald 41, 50, 124, 132, 144, 157
Morning Post 41, 45, 91, 130, 144
Morning Star 32, 45, 91–93, 144
Morris, Lt. Charles M., CSN 74
Morse, Freeman H. 66, 68, 76, 78–79, 80, 82–83, 85, 95, 97–98, 136, 156
Mortlake, Surrey 157
Morton, John M. 111
Motley, John L. 7
El Mounassir 64
Muller, Franz 24
Murdaugh, Lt. William H., CSN 144
Murray, John 122
Murray's Modern London 5
My Diary North and South 124
My Imprisonment 128
My Lord and My Lady 55

Napoleon III, Emperor 36, 38, 128, 141
Nashville, CSS 60, 76, 98, 101, 120
Nashville, battle of 37
Navy Department, Confederate 57, 62, 66–68, 84
Negretti & Zambra 98
Neutrality, Proclamation of 4, 28, 95, 136
New Army Map of Virginia 117
New Bond Street 71, 74
New Orleans 111, 134, 154
New Plan 59, 107
New York 154–155

"Voice from the South" 60
Volck, Frederick 115
Volunteer Navy, Confederate States 75
Von Borcke, Lt. Col J.A.H. Heros, CSA 121

Wachusett, USS 63
Waddell, Lt. Cdg. James I., CSN 66
Waddington, Rev. Dr. John 146
"Waif from Dixie" 118
Walker, Mrs. Georgiana G. 59–60, 128–130, 155
Walker, Leroy P. 40, 60
Walker, Major Norman S., CSA 59–60, 64, 128, 155
Walker & Sons 115
Wandering Minstrel 55
War Department, Confederate 57–58, 98
"War Song of Dixie" 116
Ward, J.E. 135
Ward & Lock 134
Waresboro, Georgia 153
Warrior, HMS 55, 66
Warwick, William S., 150
Washington, DC 153
Waterloo station 16
Webb, Cdr. William A., CSN 152
Webster, Benjamin 18
Weed, Thurlow 41
Weiner, Carl 116
Weller, Edward 6
Wellington Street 144
West Hartlepool 56, 108
West India Docks 107
Westminster Palace Hotel, Victoria Street 10, 12, 28, 70
Weston, Major J.A., CSA 101
Weston, Capt. Plowden C.J., CSA 124
Wetter, A.P. 43
Wharncliffe, Lord 91, 108, 130, 140, 142, 148–150, 157
Wharncliffe House, Curzon Street 149
White, John 61, 154
"White Republican" 46
Whiteley, William 16
Whiteside, James, MP 139
Whittle, Lt. William C., Jr., CSN 65–66, 76
Whitworth & Co. 68, 96
Whitworth guns 97
Wigan, Horace 18, 110
Wigfall, Louis T. 155
Wigg, George 103
Wilkinson, Lt. John, CSN 105
Williams, James 45–46, 130, 155
Williams, Joseph 116
Wilmington, North Carolina 37, 57, 64, 76, 142, 153
Wilson, John 60
Wilson & Sons 99
Wimbledon Common 55, 102
Winchester, Virginia 155
Witt, John G. 50, 157
Wolseley, Lt. Col. Garnet 120–121
Wood, Sir W. Page 90
Wood's Hotel, High Holborn 10, 65
Woolley's New Map of the Confederate States 117
Woolwich Arsenal 54–55, 96–98
Wright, Richard 65
Wrottesley, Lord 70
Wyatt, Matthew D. 107
Wyld, James 20, 117
Wynn, William 74
Wyon, Joseph S. 102

Yancey, William L. 25–28, 30–31, 33, 35, 40, 43, 52, 55–56, 60, 66, 153
Yeomans, James 98
Yonge, Charlotte M. 122
Yonge, Clarence R. 82

Zug, Switzerland 155

DATE DUE

Franklin County Library System
101 Ragged [illegible]
Chambersburg, PA 17202

LILIAN S. BESORE MEMORIAL LIBRARY
305 E. BALTIMORE ST.
GREENCASTLE, PA. 17225

GAYLORD M2

BESORE LIBRARY
3 7225 00060694 7

Although the British government declared its neutrality during the American Civil War, London nevertheless became an important center of Confederate overseas operations. This work examines the extensive Confederate activities in London during the war, including diplomacy, propaganda, purchasing for the Army and Navy, spying, the Cotton Loan, and various business associations; reflections of the Civil War in British art and literature; and the extent of British support for the South. Appendices cover London firms with Confederate links, pro–Confederate publications, Confederate music published in London, the Southern lobby in Parliament, the Southern Independence Association, and the British Jackson Monumental Fund. The work also includes a chronology of events and a gazetteer of Confederate sites in London.

Former reference librarian JOHN D. BENNETT lives in Leicester, England.

McFARLAND

ISBN 978-0-7864-3056-7

On the cover: foreground, the offices of Overend, Gurney & Company, who lent money to London shipbuilders for the construction of blockade runners and were themselves involved; background ©2007 Shutterstock

P7-DQL-038

Full text of "Abraham Lincoln and the Jews"

See other formats

ABRAHAM LINCOLN AND THE JEWS

By ISAAC MARKENS

author of
"The Hebrews in America"

NEW YORK

PRINTED FOR THE AUTHOR

COPYRIGHT, 1909

BY ISAAC MARKENS

ABRAHAM LINCOLN AND THE JEWS

BY: ISAAC MARKENS

author of
"The Hebrews in America"

NEW YORK

PRINTED FOR THE AUTHOR

COPYRIGHT, 1909

BY ISAAC MARKENS

Digitized by the Internet Archive

in 2010 with funding from

State of Indiana through the Indiana State Library http://www.archive.org/details/abrahamlincolnje2962mark

LINCOLN AND THE JEWS.

Since the name of Abraham Lincoln has been linked with no stirring event in connection with American Judaism it follows that the subject " Lincoln and the Jews/' may possibly be lacking in the essentials demanding treatment at the hands of the critical historian. Nevertheless, as a student of the great war President the writer has been impressed by the vast amount of interesting material bearing upon his relations to the Jews, which it occurs to him is worthy of compilation and preservation. A contribution of this character seems specially fitting at the present time in view of the centenary of the one whose gaunt figure towers above all others in the galaxy of American heroes — " the first of our countrymen to reach the lonely heights of immortal fame."

The Jews of the United States formed but a small portion of the population in Lincoln's time. The President of the Board of Delegates of American Israelites, their representative organization, estimated their number in the loyal States near the close of 1861 at not less than 200,000, which figures are now regarded as excessive. The Rev, Isaac Leeser as late as 1865 could not figure the entire Jewish population of the United States as exceeding 200,000, although he admitted that double that number had been estimated by others.

Political sentiment was then divided and found expression largely through the Occident^ a monthly, published by Eev. Isaac Leeser in Philadelphia ; the Jewish Messenger, a weekly, conducted by Rev. Samuel M. Isaacs in New York, and the Israelite, a weekly, edited by Rev. Isaac M. Wise in Cincinnati. Rabbis and laymen of learning and eloquence were conspicuous in the political arena, both by voice and pen and to some of these we shall refer. Arrayed with the party represented by Lincoln was Rabbi David Einhorn, who published in Baltimore a German monthly called Sinai, devoted to the anti-slavery movement. Rabbi Isaacs unreservedly favored the preservation of the Union and the policy of Lincoln. In Philadelphia Rabbi Sabato Morals proved such a potential factor in rousing patriotic sentiment that he was elected an honorary member of the Union League Club of that city. Rabbi Liebman Adler of Chicago, besides patriotic appeals to his countrymen, sent his only son to serve in the ranks of an Illinois regiment. Dr. Abraham B. Arnold of Baltimore, arrayed himself with the Republican party on the election of Lincoln and was made a member of the State Executive Committee of Maryland. A former Assistant United States District Attorney of New York, Philip J. Joachimsen, who had secured the first conviction for slave trading, was a warm admirer of Lincoln and raised a regiment of troops which rendered good service.

The pro-slavery faction, by no means insignificant in numbers, had few leaders, their most earnest advocate being Rabbi Morris J. Raphall, of New York, author of Post-Bihlical History of the Jews. In a pamphlet entitled Bible View of Slavery, published shortly after Lincoln's election, he sought to show that the " Divine Institution " had Scriptural sanction, a proposition by no means original. Rev. Leander Ker of Missouri having taken the same ground as early as 1853 in a book. Slavery Sanctioned hy the Bible. Mr. Leeser, while sustaining Raphall, deplored his utterances as untimely, and Michael Heilprin in an article in the New York Tribune completely demonstrated the fallacy of Raphall's contention.

Writing from Philadelphia to the Israelite on January 13, 1861, Rabbi Wise said it was "not so much the election of Lincoln in itself that threatened the destruction of the Union as the speeches of Lincoln and his colleagues on the irrepressible conflict doctrine." This was coupled with a tribute to President Buchanan, the then occupant of the White House, who from Rabbi Wise's standpoint " has shown himself to be a full statesman and only now are the North appreciating his conservative administration." While deprecating the threatened dissolution of the Union Eabbi Wise indulged in frequent humorous flings at Lincoln after his election, comparing him to " a country squire who would look queer in the White House with his primitive manner." He also protested against his entertainment while passing through Cincinnati on his way to Washington. Later on his admiration for Lincoln was unbounded. In the course of an address following the President's death and published in the Cincinnati Commercial of April 20, 1865, he thus attempted to prove that he was one of the chosen people : " Abraham Lincoln believed himself to be bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh. He supposed himself to be of Hebrew parentage, he said so in my presence, and indeed he possessed the common features of the Hebrew race both in countenance and features." As a matter of fact Lincoln's knowledge of his ancestry was vague — so much so that his statement to Dr. Wise must be accepted as nothing more than a bit of pleasantry. Hon. Robert T. Lincoln states in reply to an inquiry of the writer, that he had "never before heard that his father supposed he had any Jewish ancestry."

Lincoln's policy was severely attacked in the California State Convention of the Breckinridge party held at Sacramento on June 11, 1861, by Solomon Heydenfeldt, a brilliant jurist of that State and a native of South Carolina. An example of his attitude appears in the published proceedings of that convention, wherein he refers in the course of the debates to "the Democrats of the Eastern States struggling against the tyranny of the administration, their voices being drowned by the music of Lincoln's drums."

President Lincoln's administration was marked by a few noteworthy incidents affecting the Jews as a body, the most important being the appointment of a Jewish chaplain in 1861-62, and the proposed expulsion of the Jews " as a class " from within the lines of General Grant's army in 1862-63. Here it may be proper to note that the President on two occasions was sharply reproved by the Jews for the objectionable phraseology of his State papers.

In his first inaugural orders he declared :

Intelligence, patriotism, Christianity, and a firm reliance on Him who has never yet forsaken this favored land are still competent to adjust in the best way our present difficulty.

In his " General Order Eespecting the Observation of the Sabbath Day in the Army and Navy/' issued November 15, 1862, he announced :

The importance for man and beast of the prescribed weekly rest, the sacred rights of Christian soldiers and sailors, a becoming deference to the best sentiments of a Christian people, and a due regard for the Divine will demand that Sunday labor in the Army and Navy be reduced to the measure of strict necessity.

This order provoked more or less public discussion and elicited a lengthy address to the President from one B. Behrend, of Narrowsburg, N. Y., the father of a Jewish soldier in the service, on the ground that " thousands in the army who celebrate another day as Sunday should be allowed to celebrate that day which they think is the right day according to their own consciences." The Occident shared in these views and urged that Jewish soldiers should be free from unnecessary work on their Sabbath. While the alleged sectarian character of these compositions subjected the President to considerable criticism, his utterances were soon lost sight of in the more stirring events of the day.

In the United States Senate May 22, 1860, Judah P. Benjamin spoke in scathing terms of Stephen A. Douglas and lauded Lincoln, the question under consideration being certain measures introduced by Jefferson Davis on the subject of State Eights and Slavery. Benjamin's address on this occasion occupies several pages of the Congressional Globe, 1859-60, Part III. The Senator from Louisiana therein charged Douglas with inconsistency and evasion in his debates with Lincoln, referred to his Jonesboro address as " nonsense " and says Douglas copied from Lincoln's dispute with him. Lincoln had just been nominated for the Presidency. The nomination of Douglas was still in the balance. How far he had lost caste with the Southern leaders is evidenced by this excoriation by Benjamin :

I have been obliged to pluck down my idol from his place on high, and to refuse him any more support or confidence as a member of the Democratic party. His adversary stood upon principle and was beaten, and lo! he is a candidate of a mighty party for the Presidency of the United States. One stood on principle — was defeated. To-day where stands he? The other faltered — received the prize, but to-day where stands he? He is a fallen star; we have separated from him.

Eeferring further to the joint debates and more especially to Lincoln's declarations at Freeport in reply to interrogations of Douglas, regarding his position in the slavery question, he further complimented Lincoln in these words :

In that contest, the candidates for the Senate of the United States in the State of Illinois went before the people. They agreed to discuss the issue; they put questions to each other for answer, and I must say here, for I must be just to all, that I have been surprised in the examination that I have made again within the last few days of this discussion between Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Douglas, to find that Mr. Lincoln is a far more conservative man, unless he has since changed his opinions, than I had supposed him to be. There was no dodging on his part. It is impossible not to admire the perfect candor and frankness with which his answers are given — no equivocation, no evasion.

The Appointment of a Jewish Army Chaplain.

The Jewish Chaplain question was a matter of some significance and grew out of the refusal of Secretary of War Simon Cameron in the fall of 1861 to grant the application of Eev. Dr. Arnold Fischel for appointment as Chaplain of the Cameron Dragoons, a New York regiment largely composed of Jews, Fischel being informed by Cameron that favorable consideration of his application was impossible on account of an Act passed by Congress a few months previous and duly approved by the President, which provided that " chaplains must be regular ordained ministers of some Christian denomination."

This barrier to the appointment of a Chaplain gave rise to a widespread agitation in which many prominent men took part, including Lewis K. Dembitz, of Louisville, who had voted for Lincoln in the Eepublican National Convention of 1860; Alfred T. Jones, of Philadelphia; Joseph Abrahams, of Cincinnati ; Jacob Kantrowitz, of Columbus, Ind. ; Felix Deutsch, of Franklin, Ind.; E. Fleischmann, of Iowa City; Martin Bijur, of Louisville; S. Eosenthal, of Albany, N. Y., and Eev. B. H. Gotthelf, of Louisville. They demanded that the Act of Congress be made to conform with their plain constitutional rights, " those rights " they urged " for which the bones of many of our brethren in faith are now mouldering on the banks of the Potomac." The New York Journal of Commerce and Baltimore Clipper sided with the Jews.

At this juncture the Board of Delegates of American Israelites took up the matter and through Senator Ira Harris and Eepresentative Frederick Conkling, both of New York, petitioned Congress, protesting that the existing Act was " prejudicial discrimination against a patriotic class of citizens on account of their religious belief " and demanding its repeal. At the same time they addressed the President urging the appointment of a Jewish Chaplain to each of the military departments. This the President was unable to do, declaring his intention, however, to recommend Congress to modify the law as it stood. Dr. Fischel spent some time in Washington endeavoring to secure the repeal of the objectionable law.

On December 11, 1861, he reported to the Board of Delegates the result of his efforts thus far. This is printed in the article, " A Jewish Army Chaplain,^' by Myer S. Isaacs, Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 12, 1904.

On the following day Dr. Fischel again called at the White House in accordance with the President's invitation but failed to see him. On December 14, 1861, the President wrote to Dr. Fischel:

Executive Mansion, December 14, 1861.
Rev. Dr. A. Fischel.

My dear Sib: I find that there are several particulars In which the present law in regard to Chaplains is supposed to be deficient, all of which I now design presenting to the appropriate Committee of Congress. I shall try to have a new law broad enough to cover what is desired by you in behalf of the Israelites.

Yours truly,

A. Lincoln.

The proceedings which followed in Congress were without noteworthy incident. Mr. Trumbull of Illinois at the request of Eabbi Isidor Kalisch, of Indianapolis, presented a numerously signed petition in the Senate and J. Friedenreich, of Baltimore, secured 7000 signatures, mostly of Christians to another. Numerous members of the Legislature of Maryland also memorialized Congress urging a change in the existing law. Isaac Leeser of Philadelphia also addressed a letter to the President. Final action by Congress was deferred until March 13, 1862, when the Act was amended so as to authorize the employment of Brigade Chaplains, " one or more of which shall be of the Catholic, Protestant or Jewish religion." Meanwhile Dr. Fischel conducted services for the Jewish Hospital in Virginia until April, 1862. Subsequently the President appointed as Hospital Chaplains Eev. Jacob Frankel, of Philadelphia; Eev. B. H. Gotthelf, of Louisville, and Dr. Ferdinand Sarner of the 54th New York Infantry. Dr. Sabato Morals, of Philadelphia, had previously declined an appointment as Chaplain.

Dr. Kalisch, in the third year of the war, aspired to a chaplaincy, his sponsor being Adolph Dessar, a prominent citizen of Indianapolis, and a close friend of John P. Usher, Secretary of the Interior in Lincoln's cabinet. Mr. Usher's efforts were unavailing as appears from the following letter:

Depabtment of the Interior,

Washington, October 16, 1863.
Ad. Dessar, Esq.

Dear Sir: I made inquiry of the President to-day respecting the appointment of Post Chaplain, and was advised by him that the public service did not at present require the appointment of any more; but that if occasion should happen requiring the appointment of additional chaplains he should be happy to consider, with the many other applications, the claims of your friend. Rev. Mr. Isidore Kalisch.

Very truly yours,

J. P. Usher.

General Grant's Order No. Eleven.

The edict of General Grant, known as Order No. 11, excluding the Jews, as a class, from within the lines of his army, naturally aroused a storm of indignation. Grant's first manifesto appeared at Lagrange, Tenn., on November 9, 1862, in the form of instructions to Gen. Hurlbut to refuse all permits to come south of Jackson, Tenn., adding " the Israelites especially should be kept out." He next issued orders to Gen. Webster, referring to the Jews as " an intolerable nuisance." He also reported to the War Department that " the Jews roam through the country contrary to the government regulations." Finally on December 17 he issued a general order expelling all Jews as a class " from his Department within 21 hours."

Cincinnati and Paducah became the storm centres of the Jewish uprisings mainly by reason of their proximity to Grant's field of operations, and the agitation eventually extended to the halls of Congress. Eabbi Wise, in the Israelite, demanded the recall of the order on the ground that " the President had an oath registered in Heaven to enforce the laws/' and he urged that justice should be demanded from the chief magistrate of the country. Capt. Ferdinand Levy, of Company H, Battalion New York Volunteers, wrote to The Jewish Messenger urging that the President compel General Grant to apologize or dismiss him from the service.

While the Jews of Cincinnati, under the lead of Eabbi I. M. Wise were devising means to reach the President, their coreligionists at Paducah were equally active. After several conferences they transmitted the following appeal to the President, the signers being among the leading merchants of the town.

Paducah, Ky., Dec. 29, 1862.
Hon. Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States.

General Order No. 11 issued by General Grant at Oxford, Miss., December the 17th, commands all post commanders to expel all Jews without distinction within twenty-four hours from his entire Department. The undersigned good and loyal citizens of the United States and residents of this town, for many years engaged in legitimate business as merchants, feel greatly insulted and outraged by this inhuman order; the carrying out of which would be the grossest violation of the Constitution and our rights as good citizens under it, and would place us, besides a large number of other Jewish families of this town, as outlaws before the world. We respectfully ask your immediate attention to this enormous outrage on all law and humanity and pray for your effectual and immediate interposition. We would especially refer you to the post commander and post adjutant as to our loyalty, and to all respectable citizens of this community as to our standing as citizens and merchants. We respectfully ask for immediate instructions to be sent to the Commander of this Post.

D. Wolff & Beos.

C. J. Kaskel.

J. W. Kaskel.

It was determined to send a representative of the Jewish community to Washington to communicate with the President in person, and for that purpose Ceasar J. Kaskel, one of the signers of the appeal, a vice-president of the Paducah Union League Club and one of the most respected merchants of the town, was selected.

Ceasar Kaskel was a native of Prussia. When Grant's General Order No. 11 was issued he was in his thirtieth year, J. W. Kaskel, another signer of the appeal, was his brother. A record of the Paducah proceedings was preserved by the latter, now living at Bensonhurst, Brooklyn, N. Y., from which we learn that Ceasar Kaskel at once left Paducah by steamer for Cairo. While en route he prepared a full account of the affair which on reaching Cairo was furnished to the agent of the Associated Press, this being the first newspaper report given to the country.

Kaskel, says the Israelite, took with him letters from Rabbi Max Lilienthal, and Daniel Wolf, a prominent Cincinnati merchant, to influential parties in Washington and arrived at the National Capital on the evening of January 3, 1863. Accompanied by Representative Gurley of Ohio the two at once sought an audience with the President, reaching the White House at about dusk. Announcing their presence, with an apology for calling at such an hour, the President sent word that he was " always glad to see his friends," and shortly made his appearance. On learning the object of their visit he remarked :

And so the children of Israel were driven from the happy land of Canaan?

Kaskel replied :

Yes, and that is why we have come unto Father Abraham's bosom, asking protection.

Lincoln responded:
And this protection they shall have at once.

Then seating himself at a table the President penned an order to General Halleck requesting his visitors to deliver it at once.

" You may leave for home at once if you wish/' said General Halleck to Kaskel on reading Lincoln's instructions, " and before you reach there Grant's order will have been revoked."

Kaskel that same night started back to Paducah, and arriv- ing there was surprised to learn that the order of revocation had not yet been promulgated.

"By whose orders do you return?" demanded the Post Commander, on learning of Kaskel's presence in town.

"By order of the President of the United States," replied Kaskel.

Halleck's instructions to Grant, it appears, had been delayed in transmission and the latter's revocation was not issued until January 7, 1863. Two weeks later, January 21, Halleck wrote to Grant:

The President has no objection to your expelling traitors and Jew peddlers which I suppose was the object of your order, but as it in terms proscribed an entire religious class, some of whom are fighting in our ranks, the President deems it necessary to revoke it.

Dr. Wise is authority for the statement that Halleck would not believe in the existence of Grant's order until Kaskel showed him the official copy.

Before the result of Kaskel's mission became known Rabbis Wise and Lilienthal, accompanied by Edgar M. Johnson, a lawyer of Cincinnati, Martin Bijur, a lawyer of Louisville, and Abraham Goldsmith, a merchant of Paducah, had gone to Washington. Learning of Kaskel's success on the way they determined nevertheless to complete the journey in order to express their thanks to the President for his prompt action. Eabbi Wise, in the Israelite, gave an interesting account of their interview.

We went to the White House in our traveling habiliments and spoke about half an hour to the President of the United States in an open and frank manner and were dismissed in the same simple style. Having expressed our thanks for his promptness and despatch in revoking Grant's order the President gave utterance to his surprise that such an order should have been issued. " I don't like to see a class or nationality condemned on account of a few sinners," he said. The President fully convinced us that he knows of no distinction between Jews and Gentiles and that he feels no prejudice against any nationality and especially against the Israelites. We had little chance to say anything, the President being so splendidly eloquent on this occasion. He spoke like a simple, plain citizen and tried in various forms to convince us of the sincerity of his words on this matter.

Pending a settlement of the matter, Representative George H. Pendleton, of Ohio, who the following year figured as the running mate of George B. McClellan, Lincoln's rival for the Presidency, introduced a resolution in the House of Eepre-sentatives condemning Grant's action " as well as that of the President as commander-in-chief of the Amy and Navy," which was laid on the table. Unmindful of the success of Kaskel's mission, Mr. Powell, of Kentucky, offered a resolution in the Senate on January 5, 1863, condemning Grant's order as "illegal, tyrannical, cruel and unjust;" but inasmuch as the order had been revoked, objection was raised to its con-sideration, and Senators Hale, of New Hampshire and Sum-ner, of Massachusetts urged that the resolution be tabled.

Mr. Powell, according to the Congressional Globe, then ad-dressed the Senate. He had in his possession, he said, docu-ments that would go to establish the fact beyond the possi-bility of a doubt that some thirty Jewish gentlemen, residents of Paducah, were driven from their homes and their business by virtue of this order of General Grant. They had only the short notice of four and twenty hours. The Jewish women and children of the city were expelled under that order. Not a Jew, man, woman or child was left, except two women who were prostrate on beds of sickness. He added :

If we tamely submit to allow the military power thus to encroach on the rights of the citizens who shall be setting a bad and most pernicious example to those in command of our Army.

He urged the passage of the resolution. It would be of the greatest importance particularly at that time when the constitutional rights of the citizens were being trodden under foot by the executive and military power.

General Grant might just as well expel the Baptists or the Methodists or the Episcopalians or the Catholics as a class, as to expel the Jews. All are alike protected in the enjoyment of their religion by the Constitution of our country. They are inoffensive citizens and it was set forth in papers that he had before him that two of the Jews that were expelled had served three months in the Army of the United States in defence of the Union cause.

It may be that some Jews in General Grant's department had been guilty of illegal traffic; if so, expel those who violate the law and punish them.

Mr. Clark, of New Hampshire, moved that the resolution be indefinitely postponed, believing that it would be unwise to condemn General Grant unheard. Mr. Anthony, of Kansas, suggested that a better disposition would be to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. Wilson, of Massachusetts, followed. He declared that no man in the Senate approved Grant's order, that as soon as it was called to the attention of the President of the United States it was promptly revoked, and there the matter ended. He agreed with Mr. Clark, that Grant should not be condemned unheard. He considered the order unwise, unjust and utterly indefensible; but the rights of these people having been promptly vindicated he hoped the matter would be dropped. Senator Hale then moved to lay Mr. PowelFs resolution on the table and this was done by a vote of 30 to 7, thus disposing of further Congressional action.

Two Cincinnati newspapers, the Enquirer and the Volksfreund, were outspoken in condemnation of Grant. The Philadelphia Ledger opened its columns to persons who severely censured Grant, while the Inquirer of the same city declined to publish articles derogatory of the Federal Commander. John W. Forney, Secretary of the United States Senate, and editor of the Washington Chronicle, defended General Grant, saying :

If there was no good reason, there was at least some excuse for the promulgation of the order.

The Occident commended the President's action:
Fortunately he would not be the instrument of such a cruel order and the majority in Congress deserve the condemnation due them for disregard of their obligations as conservators of the rights of the people, which ought to be safe under the guarantees of the Constitution.

The Board of Delegates of American Israelites adopted resolutions thanking Halleck for revoking Grant's order " in the name of the Hebrews of this country." Dr. Wise vehemently protested against this, describing the resolution as " a species of insanity," as " Halleck only carried out the order of the President who deserves thanks for his promptness in the affair."

Did Grant issue his obnoxious edict of his own volition, or at the behest of higher authority? The Cincinnati Commercial, after the affair was over, published a communication intimating that Grant had acted on orders from Washington.
The Israelite was of the opinion that such an order could have come only from Stanton or Chase, since the President and Halleck absolutely maintained that they knew nothing of it until seventeen days after it was issued.

General Grant, in his Personal Memoirs, makes no reference to Order No. 11. An explanation of his silence may be found in the following letter dated Governor's Island, N. Y., December 8, 1907, and addressed to the writer.

In reply to your letter of Nov. 23d I write to say that when my father was writing his memoirs I asked if he would refer to the order No. 11 — about which you enquire in your letter, and he replied that that was a matter long past and best not referred to; therefore, I shall, following his example, have nothing to say about that order.

Yours very sincerely,

Feedeeick D. Grant.

Nicolay and Hay dismiss the subject in these few words :
Lincoln had a profound respect for every form of sincere religious belief. He steadily refused to show favor to any particular denomination of Christians, and when General Grant issued an unjust and injurious order against the Jews expelling them from his Department, the President ordered it to be revoked the moment it was brought to his notice.

As further bearing upon Ceasar Kaskel's activity in this matter it may be stated that the Washington press despatches gave him full credit for the repeal of the order. He died in Wiesbaden, Germany, March 30, 1892.

Lincoln's Jewish Friends.

The name of Abraham Jonas, a leading lawyer, politician, and public speaker of Illinois, is indissolubly associated with that of Abraham Lincoln, the two having enjoyed very intimate relations, dating, it is believed, from about the birth of the Whig party in 1834 and continuing up to the death of Jonas in 1864.

Of the antecedents of Abraham Jonas, we learn that he was one of twenty-two children of Annie Ezekiel and Benjamin Jonas, of Exeter, England, where he was born in 1801. He arrived in Cincinnati, in 1819, two years after his brother Joseph, the first Jew to settle in that city, and engaged in the auction business with his brother-in-law, Morris Moses. He was twice married, his first wife being Lucia Orah, daughter of Eev. Gershom Mendes Seixas, of New York, who died in 1825. In 1829 he married Louisa Block, of Virginia. He "7 was one of the incorporators of the first synagogue in Cincinnati, in 1829, and his name appears in a conveyance recorded in 1821, as one of the purchasers of a small plot of ground for a Jewish cemetery from Nicholas Longworth, great-grandfather of the present Ohio Congressman of that name, the son-in-law of President Theodore Eoosevelt.

Jonas moved to Williamstown, Grant County, Ky., before his marriage to Miss Block, and served in the State legislature of Kentucky in 1828, 1829, 1830, and 1833. He was elected Grand Master of Masons of Kentucky in August, 1833, and his portrait as such adorns the walls of the Grand Lodge room in Louisville. He settled in Illinois in 1838 and was elected to the legislature in 1842. He became the first Grand Master of Masons of that State in 1839. A tablet in his honor was placed in the hall of the Grand Lodge of Illinois on the announcement of his death in 1864 and the Grand Lodge at their semi-centennial in 1889 had a bronze medal struck which bears his name.
2

Jonas, with Lincoln, was chosen by the Illinois State Convention held at Bloomington on May 29, 1856, a Presidential elector on the Fremont ticket. He was engaged in mercantile pursuits up to the year 1843. Meanwhile he had studied law and was admitted in that year to the bar in Quincy where he continued to practice with success up to his death in 1864, being associated with Henry Asbury. William A. Eichardson, of Quincy, avers that Lincoln, when in that city did much of his work in the office of Jonas & Asbury. The Quincy Whig, of October 7, 1858, prints a notice signed by Jonas, as chairman of the Eepublican committee of arrangements, addressed to the friends of Abraham Lincoln requesting their presence at the debate of Lincoln and Douglas, on October 13, in that city. (See Collections Illinois State Historical Society, Vol. III.) The Hon. William H. Collins, of Quincy, a prominent member of the State Historical Society of Illinois, is authority for the statement that Jonas was " an influential leader in the Eepublican party and likewise a personal friend of Lincoln.^' The Grand Secretary of the Masonic Grand Lodge of Kentucky also testified to his prominence " in all the positions he occupied."

With the exception of Nicolay and Hay none of the numerous biographers of Lincoln makes mention of Jonas either in connection with Lincoln or his prominence in Illinois politics. These writers give us an interesting letter addressed by Lin-coin to Jonas after the former's nomination for President in 1860 when the opponents of the Republican nominee were assiduous in reviving accusations of his affiliation with the Know-Nothing party, notwithstanding his repeated statements to the contrary. In this emergency Lincoln turned to his friend Jonas, to whom he addressed the following letter which fully evidences the confidential relations of the two and explains the former's attitude on the Know-Nothing question:

Connaential j^j^ 21. 1860.

Hon. A. Jonas,

My dear Sib: Yours of the 2nd is received. I suppose as good or e\en better men than I may have been in American or Know-Nothing lodges; but in point of fact I never was in one in Quincy or elsewhere. I was never in Quincy but one day and two nights while Know-Nothing lodges were in existence and you were with me that day and both those nights. I have never been there before in my life and never afterwards, till the joint debate with Douglas in 1858. It was in 1854 when I spoke in some hall there, and after the speaking, you with others took me to an oyster saloon, passed an hour there, and you walked with me to, and parted with me at the Quincy House quite late at night. I left by stage for Naples before daylight in the morning, having come in by the same route after dark the evening previous to the speaking, when I found you waiting at the Quincy House to meet me. A few days after I was there, Richardson, as I understand, started this same story about my having been in a Know-Nothing lodge. When I heard of the charge, as I did soon after, I taxed my recollection for some incident which could have suggested it; and I remember that on parting with you the last night I went to the office of the hotel to take my stage passage for the morning and was told that no stage office for that line was kept there and that I must see the driver before retiring, to insure his calling for me in the morning; and a servant was sent with me to find the driver, who after taking me a square or two, stopped me and stepped perhaps a dozen steps farther, and in my hearing called to some one, who answered him, apparently from the upper part of a building, and promised to call with the stage for me at the Quincy House. I returned and went to bed, and before day the stage called and took me. This is all. That I never was in a

Know-Nothing lodge in Quincy I should expect could be easily proved by respectable men who were always in the lodges and never saw me there. An affidavit of one or two such should put the matter at rest. And now a word of caution. Our adversaries think they can gain a point if they force me to openly deny the charge, by which some degree of offence would be given to the " Americans." For this reason it must not publicly appear that I am paying any attention to the charge.

Yours truly,

A. Lincoln.

Prom 1849 to 1852 Jonas served as postmaster at Quincy by appointment of Presidents Taylor and Fillmore. One of Lincoln's earliest appointments was that of his friend Jonas to his former office, his commission being dated April 29, 1861. He discharged the duties of postmaster until the spring of 1864 when he was incapacitated by serious illness. Martin Joseph, then, as now, a resident of Quincy, informs the writer that he visited Jonas frequently during his illness, being personally acquainted with him, and "when the doctors had no hope for his recovery, of which he was aware, his only wish was to see his son Charles H., at that time a prisoner of war, a member of the Twelfth Arkansas Regiment of the Confederate Army. The friends telegraphed to Lincoln to grant him the privilege to go to his dying father and the President being a great friend of Mr. Jonas granted the release and sent word the son was on the way."

This statement of Mr. Joseph varies but slightly from that of Charles H. Jonas, still living in his 77th year. In a letter to the writer dated July 14, 1908, he says :

When during my father's last illness and hope of his recovery had been abandoned, my mother and sister asked Mr. Lincoln to permit me to see him before his death. I was at that time a prisoner of war on Johnson's Island, Lake Erie. President Lincoln granted the request without hesitation, and issued an order to the Commandant at the prison to liberate me on parole to visit my dying father. This was done at once and I reached Quincy on the day of my father's death, but in time to be recognized and welcomed by him.

From the records of the War Department we are enabled to reproduce the President's order above referred to, the same being also quoted by Leslie J. Perry in an article " Appeals to Lincoln's Clemency/' in the Century Magazine, December, 1895:

Allow Charles H. Jonas now a prisoner of war at Johnson's island a parole of three weeks to visit his dying father, Abraham Jonas, at Quincy, Ills.

June 2nd 1864. A. Lincoln.

In connection with this incident it should be said that three other sons of Jonas served in the Confederate army — Benjamin F., in later years United States Senator from Louisiana; Julian, and Samuel Alroy, the latter being known as the author of the poem " Written on the Back of a Confederate Note." A fifth son, Edward, served with distinction as Major of an Illinois regiment, Lincoln's postmaster at Quincy suffered in no wise by the Southern sympathies of his four sons; in fact we have it from Benjamin F. Jonas that " Mr. Lincoln always asked after us when he saw any one from New Orleans during the war."

Further evidence of Lincoln's high opinion of Jonas exists in the shape of an order of the President in the matter of one Thomas Thoroughman of St. Joseph, Mo., arrested for disloyalty in May, 1862, and sent to Quincy, 111. Appeal being made to Lincoln he directed the Secretary of War " to dispose of the case at the discretion of Abraham Jonas and Henry Asbury, both of Quincy, both of whom I know to be loyal and sensible men." Their report resulted in Thoroughman's parole. This case is also quoted by Leslie J. Perry in the Century Magazine, December, 1895. Asbury in 1869 published in the Quincy Whig a series of sketches of the bench and bar of Adams County including that of Jonas, to which he refers in his volume Reminiscences of Quincy, published in 1882.

On the death of Jonas the President appointed his widow

Louisa Block Jonas to fill his unexpired term as postmaster, the office being meanwhile managed by her daughter Anna Jonas who became the wife of Adolph Meyer, for twenty years Congressman from Louisiana.

Of Jonas' personality we learn from his niece Mrs. Annie J. Moses, of New York. She writes :

He was tall, of medium weight, rather inclined to leanness than flesh, with black eyes and hair and complexion between dark and fair. His features were very strong, with a serious, intelligent face, which broke into a very pleasant expression when amused. He was a very intellectual man and full of humor and wit; and benevolence was well marked in his countenance.

Of the few Jewish residents of Springfield for several years preceding Lincoln's election to the Presidency, Julius Hammerslough, of the firm of Hammerslough Brothers, enjoyed very friendly relations with Mr, and Mrs. Lincoln. He heard Lincoln's memorable address in Springfield on June 17, 1858, beginning with the words, " If we could first know where we are and whither we are tending, we could better judge what to do and how to do it." Mr. Hammerslough witnessed Lincoln's first inauguration and frequently called to see him at the White House, the President invariably inquiring of Mr. Hammerslough : " How are the boys ? " — referring to the brothers in Springfield. One one occasion he escorted Mrs. Ninian Edwards, a sister of Mrs. Lincoln, from Springfield to Washington. He accompanied Lincoln's remains from Chicago to Springfield as one of a committee of citizens of Lincoln's old home chosen for that purpose, and he also provided the plumes for the funeral car used in Springfield. Hammerslough took a very active part in the project for the erection of the Lincoln monument in Springfield, being appointed by the national monument committee special agent to bring the subject to the notice of the Jews. In a stirring appeal for funds dated Springfield, May 30, 1865, he wrote:

23

It is above all, fitting in this land where the Hebrews have won so proud a name and are so greatly respected and honored that they should thus show their love and veneration for the fallen chief of the nation, whose wisdom, honesty and purity of purpose were so highly appreciated by foreign nations and who was so beloved at home.

Shortly before his death Mr, Hammerslough called the writer's attention to an old and familiar Lincoln story the authenticity of which has long been questioned. Eeturning to Springfield after several weeks' absence with saddle bags on his arms, Lincoln noticed on nearing his home that an additional story had been added since he left — the work of Mrs. Lincoln and intended as a surprise. Feigning inability to recognize the house he inquired of a passer-by, " Say, Mister, can you tell me where the widow Lincoln lives ? " The party thus addressed was Abner Wilkinson, a well-known merchant tailor of Springfield, from whose lips Hammerslough heard the story some years afterwards. This statement of Wilkinson to Hammerslough is interesting, in that it settles the character of at least one of the many Lincoln stories heretofore in the apocryphal class.

In the late 'sixties Mr. Hammerslough moved to New York where he became the founder and first President of the Clothiers Association of New York. On his death, June 18, 1908, the directors of that association formally gave expression to the debt of gratitude due him for the uplifting of the clothing industry. The daily newspapers also noted his intimate acquaintance with Lincoln.

There resided in Jacksonville, HI., from 1853 to 1861 Henry Eice a merchant born in Germany in 1834 and now a resident of New York. Eice knew Lincoln well. Eeferring to his acquaintance he told the writer of a visit to Springfield when he met Lincoln bound for the railroad station in quest of Mrs. Lincoln who had been away on a shopping trip " to get some duds" as he put it. Eice told Lincoln it was his intention, if he would permit it, to furnish his inauguration suit. He thanked Eice, saying he had already accepted a similar offer from the Springfield firm of Wood and Hinkle. Eice had been acting for several months after the breaking out of the war as military store-keeper at Cairo, 111,, and sought a similar appointment embracing the entire district, being backed by John A. Logan and Governor Eichard Yates of Illinois. Accompanied by these gentlemen Eice called upon Lincoln at the White House. He found the President at supper and at his invitation the three joined in the repast. Lincoln favored Eice's appointment and endorsed his applica- tion to Simon Cameron, Secretary of War. It turned out however, that Cameron had already filled the office. Lincoln, when informed of this, suggested a method by which Eice might yet secure the appointment but the latter allowed the matter to drop.

24

A characteristic instance of Lincoln's probity is narrated by Mr. Eice, who was a party to the proceeding. Several Cin- cinnati firms, on learning of the failure of a Decatur, 111., debtor for a large sum, wrote to Eice at Jacksonville request- ing that he recommend a reputable lawyer to protect their interests. Eice suggested Abraham Lincoln of Springfield. Thereupon a committee representing the creditors met Eice at Springfield and the party called upon Lincoln. Much to their chagrin they were told he did not feel satisfied he could properly attend to the matter. He advised them, however, to consult his fellow-townsman and most bitter political op- ponent, John A. McClemand, also a lawyer of note, who was later a Major-General in the Union Army. Indisposed to accept a retainer McClemand suggested that the party again see Lincoln, assuring them of his thorough qualification for the work in hand. This flattering endorsement induced Lin- coln to yield, the result being a speedy and mutually satis- factory adjustment of the matter at issue.

It was during the Presidential campaign of 1860 that Abraham Kohn, City Clerk of Chicago, first met Lincoln, the acquaintance being formed in the store of Kohn, at that time a merchant, Kohn was a Bavarian, then in his 42d year, a man of excellent education, well versed in Hebrew literature and known and respected as a public-spirited citizen. He had been for several years President of the Hebrew Congregation Anshe Maariv (Men of the West). In politics Kohn was described by the Democratic press as " one of the blackest Eepublicans and Abolitionists." Kohn's popularity and in- fluence had probably been brought to Lincoln's attention, and the latter, consummate politician as he was, recognized in Kohn, presumably, an ally whose acquaintance would prove a valuable asset in the pending election. Lincoln was intro- duced by Congressman Isaac N. Arnold who accompanied him and it was this meeting that inspired Kohn with a feeling of admiration for his visitor and a conviction that he was the destined Moses of the slaves and the saviour of his country. Thus says his daughter, Mrs. D. K. Adler, in a letter to the writer. Lincoln in the course of the conversation spoke of the Bible as their book and Kohn, being a devout Jew as well as an ardent patriot, conceived an intense admiration for Lincoln. This found expression in his sending to the President-elect before his departure for Washington a silk flag, the work of his own hands, painted in colors, its folds bearing Hebrew characters exquisitely lettered in black with the third to ninth verses of the first chapter of Joshua, the last verse being :

Have I not commanded thee? Be strong and of good courage; be not afraid neither be thou dismayed; for the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest.

This flag is referred to by Admiral George H. Preble in his History of the Flag of the United States, published in 1894. The incident being brought to the attention of the late President McKinley, when Governor of Ohio, he thus alluded to it in the course of a speech delivered at Ottawa, Kansas, on June 20, 1895:

What more beautiful conception than that which Abraham Kohn of Chicago in February, 1861, to send to Mr. Lincoln, on the eve of his starting to Washington, to assume the office of President, a flag of our country, bearing upon its silken folds the words from the first chapter of Joshua. Could anything have given Mr. Lincoln more cheer or been better calculated to sustain his courage or to strengthen his faith in the mighty work before him? Thus commanded, thus assured, Mr. Lincoln journeyed to the Capital, where he took the oath of office and registered in Heaven an oath to save the Union. And the Lord our God was with him, until every obligation of oath and duty was sacredly kept and honored. Not any man v?as able to stand before him. Liberty was the more firmly enthroned, the Union was saved, and the flag which he carried floated in triumph and glory from every flagstaff of the Republic.

Mr. Lincoln at once wrote to Mr. Kohn thanking him for his gift. His letter was sent through a mutual friend, John Young Scammon, a prominent citizen of Chicago, who delayed its delivery until six months after Lincoln's departure from Springfield, when he wrote to Mr. Kohn as follows :

Chicago, August 28, 1861.

Abraham Kohn, Esq.

My dear Sib: The enclosed acknowledgment of the receipt of your beautiful painting of the American flag by the President got among my letters or it would have been sent to you before. Regretting the delay, I am.

Truly your friend,

J. Young Scammon.

Mr. Lincoln's letter to Kohn being lost cannot be reproduced. The whereabouts of the flag cannot be traced, although Mrs. Adler states that while in Washington during the administration of President McKinley she made a thorough search for the relic in all the places where it might be preserved but without success. Kohn never met Lincoln after his visit to his store in Chicago. He was one of the citizens appointed by the Mayor to go some distance into Indiana to meet the train bearing Lincoln's body to that city. He died in Chicago in 1871.

Henry Greenebaum, for many years a banker of Chicago, was an intimate friend of Lincoln and numbered also among his friends Generals U, S. Grant, John A. Logan, James A. Garfield, and Stephen A. Douglas. Born in Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany, in 1833, he reached Chicago in 1849 and in 1855 was elected an Alderman on the Democratic ticket in recognition of his political activity and influence with the voters of that party. John Wentworth, " Long John," being Mayor of Chicago at the time, he invited the Aldermen to a dinner at the Tremont House, Lincoln, a personal friend of Wentworth, being a guest. Of this and subsequent visits Mr. Greenebaum gave the vn-iter the following account :

On the occasion of the dinner at the Tremont House I met Lincoln for the first time and was greatly impressed by his congeniality, by his wealth of humor, and by his remarkable mental endowment. I formed the brightest appreciation of his personality, and whenever he came to Chicago subsequent to that time, I called on him at the Tremont House to pay my respects. On one of these occasions, during his contest with Stephen A. Douglas, for the United States Senatorship, I accompanied Lincoln on a walk during which he asked me for my support. My reply was that I could not do so, that I was a strong political friend of Douglas. Lincoln said he knew this and that he was not in real earnest in asking my support.

Greenebaum was called to Springfield in the month of February, 1861, to attend a hearing before a committee of the State legislature. The night before Lincoln left Springfield, Greenebaum and a large party of legislators and others went to Lincoln's home to bid him good-bye and the President-elect asked all present to come to the depot in the morning to see him off. To quote Mr. Greenebaum:

A large crowd gathered and the dear man made a very solemn and impressive speech — indeed he moved us to tears. With wonderful modesty he expressed his fear of being unable to meet the grave responsibility that awaited him at the White House.

His faith in God gave him courage, he said, and he asked us to pray for him. Taken all in all I consider him the greatest man I ever met. He was a man of very broad views, had no prejudices whatever against any nationalities or classes and many of the most prominent Jews of Illinois supported him for the Presidency.

By reason of his residence and prominence in the city of Washington Adolphus S. Solomons had frequent intercouse with Lincoln. He was a member of the book and publishing firm of Philip and Solomons which for many years was given the government contracts for printing. Mr. Solomons has taken an active part in the inauguration ceremonies of every President from Lincoln to Eoosevelt, is still living in the National Capital in his eighty-second year, and is full of reminiscences of Lincoln. At the Lincoln birthday celebration given under the auspices of the Hebrew Educational Society of Brooklyn in 1903 he said :

To me, whose good fortune it was to know Mr. Lincoln when he first came to Washington, and to know him was to love him, it would come with natural impulse to glow over the make up of his remarkable career. All of his inclinations were on the sunny side of life and the beauty spots seen through his hopeful eyes covered many freckles upon the human face divine and made him think well of all his fellow men.

On the same occasion Mr. Solomons related the following reminiscences :

One day while I was in the White House waiting to see the President I found myself in line with fifty others and had to wait my turn. Right in front of me was a tall, stupid-appearing fellow, and I wondered what in the world his mission was. The man said to the President, " I see that you are rather busy today, and I will come in some other time to tell you what a contraband told me"; whereupon the President interrupted him by a slap on the shoulder and with a steady look at his muddy clothing and boots, and looking at his shaggy red hair exclaimed:

" Excepting myself you are the homeliest man I ever set eyes on. But that makes no difference: sit right down and tell me all you know." As he said this Lincoln winked at me over the stranger's shoulder, and added, " And it certainly cannot take you long." Evidently the man did not see the joke, for he told a short story and was soon out of the room.

On another occasion, when I was present, a Mr. Addison, a Federal officer from Baltimore, called upon Lincoln to tender his resignation, whereupon Lincoln said: " All right, Addison, I accept your resignation but nothing can compensate me for the loss of you, for when you retire I will be the ugliest man left in the employ of the Government " — again emphasizing that he thought himself no beauty.

The day that Lincoln issued one of his early war proclamations I chanced to be at the White House with a distinguished New York Rabbi, Dr. Morris J. Raphall, who came to Washington to ask for the promotion of his son Alfred, from a second to a first lieutenancy in the army. The White House was closed for the day when we got there, but upon sending up my card we gained admittance and after Lincoln had heard the Rabbi's request he blurted out, " As God's minister is it not your first duty to be at home today to pray with your people for the success of our arms, as is being done in every loyal church throughout the North, East and West? " The Rabbi, evidently ashamed at his faux pas, blushing made answer: "My assistant is doing that duty." " Ah," said Lincoln, " that is different." The President then drew forth a small card and wrote the following upon it:

" The Secretary of war will promote Second Lieutenant Raphall to a First Lieutenantcy.

A. Lincoln."

• Handing the card to the Rabbi he said, with a smile all his own: " Now doctor, you can go home and do your own praying."

Eeferring to this interview, in an address on Lincoln at his synagogue B'nai Jeshurun, Few York, April 19, 1865, Dr. Eaphall said that he had seen the President but once, he had asked him but one favor, but that time he granted it freely, he had granted it lovingly " because he knew the speaker was a Jew — because he knew him to be a true servant of the Lord."

The last photograph of President Lincoln, taken shortly before his assassination, was made in the gallery attached to the Philip and Solomons' establishment in Washington. After Mr. Solomons retired from the business the plates and negatives of the firm passed to Alexander Gardner who was in charge of the portraiture branch and subsequently a partner in the concern. In the American Hebrew of February 12, 1909, Mr. Solomons gives the following account of Mr, Lincoln's sitting for this picture :

As many statements have been made relating to the " last photo-graph " Mr. Lincoln sat for, I feel assured that the following dis-poses of the fact:

During the early 60's our bookselling and publishing firm of Philip & Solomons, located at 911 Pennsylvania avenue in this city, had a large photograph branch in the upper part of the build-ing, under the charge of Alexander Gardner who was well known for his celebrated " Photographic Sketch Book of the War " in two oblong folio volumes, in which Mr. Lincoln was a frequent and conspicuous figure in camp and battle fields.

One day while in his office I casually remarked that I would like very much for him to give us another sitting as those we had been favored with were unsatisfactory to us, and would he permit us to try again, to which he willingly assented.

Not long afterwards he sent word that he could " come on some Sunday," and a date was arranged, which was the second Sunday previous to the Friday night when the assassin, Wilkes Booth, in cold blood shot to death one of the most beloved men God ever created.

At the time named by appointment, he came and at my first glance I saw, with regret, that he wore a troubled expression, which, however, was not unusual at that eventful period of our country's fitful condition, and throwing aside on a chair the gray woolen shawl he was accustomed to wear, Mr. Gardner, after sev-eral squints at his general make-up, placed him in an artistic position and began his work.

After several " snaps," during which the President while making jocular remarks, had completely upset the operator's calculations, I followed Mr. Gardner into his " dark room " and learned to my sorrow that he had not succeeded in getting even a fair expression of his mobile countenance, and therefore was much discouraged, which, however, was but a repetition of former occasions.

I courageously named the result of my investigation to Mr. Lincoln, whereupon he, noticing, perhaps, my disappointment.

said to me, " tell Mr. Gardner to come out in the open " — referring to the " dark room," — " and you, Solomons tell me one of your funny stories and we will see if I can't do better."

I complied as best I could, and the result was the likeness as reproduced.

TMs portrait is identical with the one published by the Sprague & Hathaway Co., of West Somerville, Mass., which they informed the writer was made by them from an old-fashioned wet plate owned by Watson Porter, photographer to the Army of the Potomac, by whom it was sold to Henry M. Williams, a lawyer and capitalist at Fort Wayne, Indiana, whose father was a personal friend of Lincoln. By what means Porter came into the possession of this negative is not known.

Joseph Seligman, formerly of the New York banking firm of J. and W. Seligman & Co., had close relations with President Lincoln, by whom he was called to Washington for consultation with himself and Secretary Chase, on matters of finance. Many of the issues of government bonds were placed by the Seligmans in Frankfort and Amsterdam. This action, at a time when the nation's credit was low and its fate uncertain, elicited frequent expressions of commendation from the President. The appointment of General Grant to the supreme command of the army was in a large measure due to Joseph Seligman's influence with Lincoln, as he had known Grant before the war and recognized his fitness for the duties. Mr. Seligman entertained a strong affection for the President, which was fully reciprocated. He was in Frankfort at the time of Lincoln's assassination and his grief in learning the news was poignant. Eeferring to that event in later years he often declared to his children that not only had a noble man fallen by the hand of an assassin but also that the South had lost its best friend. Mr. Seligman was with others, instrumental in aiding Mrs. Lincoln after the death of her husband, whereby her wants were much alleviated. To his son, Mr. Isaac 'N. Seligman, of New York, we are indebted for the foregoing details.

Presidential Electors and Delegates.

Two electoral votes were cast for Lincoln by Jews, one in the election of 1860, another in that of 1864. Two Jews served as delegates in the Eepublican National Convention of 1860 and one in that of 1864.

Sigismund Kaufmann, a member of the bar and a native of Darmstadt, Germany, was a Eepublican Presidential elector for the State of New York in 1860. He had taken part in the German revolution of 1848-49, was a man of brilliant parts and was at this period in his thirty-fifth year. Kaufmann was the representative of the German Eepublican element in the United States. He wrote for the Staats-Zeitung, founded the New York Turn Verein, and the Legal Aid Society, was President of the German Society of the City of New York, a commissioner of immigration, and a director of the Hebrew Orphan Asylum. At the age of twenty-seven he addressed anti-slavery meetings in the city of New York, speaking one evening in English, German, and French. With his fellow-members of the Electoral College he went to the Astor House to see Mr. Lincoln on his arrival in New York in February, 1861. On being presented Lincoln remarked, " I know enough German to know that Kauf mann means merchant." Then he added, as if to emphasize his linguistic accomplishments, " And Schneider means tailor — am I not a good German scholar? " (See New York Tribune, February 21, 1861.)

The President shortly after his inauguration offered Kaufmann the post of Minister to Italy. He declined it on the ground that he could be more useful to his party at home. Kaufmann was an important factor in the distribution of Federal patronage in the State of New York and wielded much influence with the Lincoln administration. He secured for Franz Sigel an appointment as Colonel of a Missouri regiment on the outbreak of the Civil War in response to an urgent appeal from Sigel then at St. Louis asking "What shall I do ? " to which Kauf mann replied, " Organize a regiment. I will attend to the rest." Mr. Kaufmann in 1870 was an unsuccessful candidate for Lieutenant-Governor of the State of New York, Stewart L. Woodford being the nominee for Governor.

The emancipation proclamation Kaufmann regarded as the transcendant act of Lincoln's administration. In the course of an address to the German Eepublicans in 1879 in opposition to a third term for President Grant he declared :

The proclamation of Abraham Lincoln freeing the slaves was the greatest victory for the Federal cause of the War. It shed no drop of blood, it cost no treasure. Where graves are the monuments of Grant's victories, millions of free men are the trophies Lincoln won.

Kaufmann died in Berlin in 1889, aged 65 years.

In the Presidential campaign of 18G4, Abram J. Dittenhoefer was a Presidential elector for the State of New York on the Republican ticket. He was born in South Carolina in 1836 and is a lawyer by profession.

Mr. Dittenhoefer heard Lincoln's Cooper Institute speech in 1859 and was then introduced to him. He did not become intimate with him, however, until after the Presidential election of 1864. Thereafter he called upon the President a number of times at the White House. The President seemed pleased to see his visitor and spent quite a time in conversation, generally about New York politics. Of these interviews Mr. Dittenhoefer, in a communication to the writer, said :

While an air of melancholy seemed always to suffuse his features, I always regarded President Lincoln as the most genial of men. I often found him sitting in the business oflBce of the White House having on a black, threadbare, alpaca coat, out at the elbows and in slippers. I could always notice when he was about to indulge in a jest, which he frequently did in the midst of the most serious conversation; a sort of half suppressed smile would appear on that strong face for a brief interval before the jest was given, as if he was anticipating the pleasure it would give in the hearing of it. I remember distinctly presenting to him the ballot I had cast as one of the Presidential electors for him in the New York college of electors. Looking at it a few minutes, he said, " It represents the power and dignity of the American people and the grandeur of American institutions."
3

In thanking me for giving it to him he said he would leave it to his children as a memento. I saw him in Washington a few days before his death. He seemed then to be in the best of spirits and spoke of the great work that was before him in completing the restoration of harmony and peace between the North and the South.

The friends of Dittenhoefer early during the war, knowing that he was a South Carolinian, filed an application for his appointment as United States Judge of that State. Nothing, he says, was heard of the matter for a year or two, when a Mrs. Carson, a daughter of the only Union man in South Carolina, who had been driven from the State for his loyalty, wrote to him that she had been directed by Lincoln to examine the applications on file and make her recommendation to him. This she did and seeing Dittenhoefer's name among the applicants recommended his appointment, which the President promised to make. Shortly thereafter Dittenhoefer received a letter from one of Lincoln's private secretaries saying that the President was going to nominate him for that judgeship, but his business having meanwhile increased and being unwilling to take up his residence in the South he at once replied that he could not accept the nomination.

Mr. Dittenhoefer was in later life appointed a justice of the City Court of New York. He was a delegate to several Eepublican National Conventions and acted for twelve years as chairman of the Eepublican Central Committee of New York City where he now resides. For further details about him and Lincoln see New York Herald, November 22, 1908.

In the Eepublican State Convention held at St. Louis on February 12, 1860, Moritz Pinner, one of its members, was elected a delegate to the National Eepublican Convention to be held in Chicago the following May. Pinner was a young German of thirty-two engaged in the publication of a German newspaper devoted to the anti-slavery cause. The St. Louis Republican of February 13, 1860, gives a detailed account of the proceedings of this State Convention in which Pinner seems to have been very prominent, being especially active in his efforts to defeat the endorsement of Edward Bates of Missouri for the Presidency. The friends of Bates, constituting a majority in the Missouri Convention, having introduced a resolution instructing the national delegates to vote as a unit for the Presidential nominee, Pinner announced his resignation as a delegate to Chicago, the convention immediately adjourning without taking action thereon, thus leaving him free to attend the National Convention where he further devoted his attention to the prevention of Bates' endorsement by the Illinois delegation. This being accomplished he took no further part in the deliberations of the convention and kept aloof from the Missouri delegation, whose leaders Frank P. Blair and B. Gratz Brown he had antagonized in their efforts to secure the nomination of Bates. The consequence was that he failed to record his vote on either of the three ballots which resulted in the choice of Lincoln.

Pinner's name does not appear on the official roll of Missouri delegates to the convention. This omission he explains to the writer as " spite work " of Gratz Brown for his anti-Bates activity. Pinner favored the nomination of William H. Seward, but now in the light of history is extremely thankful that Lincoln was nominated and elected. While he made no effort to secure Lincoln's nomination he worked earnestly for his election and believes that " by preventing the nomination of Bates he paved the way for Lincoln and made his nomination possible and his election probable."

Pinner informs the writer that he became acquainted with Lincoln in Chicago during the Presidential campaign of 1856 and saw him quite often during the Lincoln-Douglas debates in 1858. After Lincoln's nomination he met him in Springfield and was there introduced to Mrs. Lincoln with whom he had a pleasant chat. He frequently saw the President after his election and was by him oifered the mission to Honduras which he declined, preferring to enter the army. Appointed by General Philip Kearney Brigade Quartermaster on his staff, Secretary Stanton resented Kearney's action, claiming the sole right of such appointments. An appeal to Lincoln followed. The latter's intervention. Pinner says, secured a prompt adjustment of the controversy but not before its consideration by a full cabinet meeting called for that purpose. Pinner's commission followed at once. This document, signed by Lincoln and Stanton, he has shown to the writer. Since the war Pinner has been engaged in real estate enterprises and the study of economic questions. He is now living in Elizabeth, N. J.

In the same convention with Pinner was Lewis N. Dembitz, a delegate from the city of Louisville, Ky., who was born in Prussia in 1833. He was educated abroad and read law at Cincinnati and Madison, Ind. From 1884 to 1888 he was assistant city attorney for Louisville and drafted the first American law establishing the Australian ballot for the Louisville election in 1888. He was a prolific writer, some of his works being: Kentucky Jurisprudence, Law Language for Short-Hand Writers, Land Titles in the United States and Jewish Services in Synagogue and Home. He also contributed many articles to Jewish periodicals. Dembitz was very proud of having served as a delegate in the convention of 1860 and of voting for Lincoln, whom he much admired but never met, a fact which he always regretted.

Maier Hirseh, a merchant of Salem, Oregon, was one of the six delegates from Oregon to the Republican National Convention of 1864. He came from Hohebach, Wiirttemberg, in 1852, and had lived in Oregon for twelve years, his home being in Salem. He was a brother of Solomon Hirseh, United States Minister to Turkey from 1889 to 1892, and of Edward Hirseh, at one time State Treasurer and later on a State Senator of Oregon. While prominent and influential in the councils of the Republican party in Oregon and frequently asked to stand for the legislature, Hirsch steadily refused the candidacy for any office save that of delegate to the convention of 1864 in which he appeared as an inconspicuous figure taking no part in the proceedings beyond voting with his delegation for Lincoln whom he much admired. He thereafter disappeared from public view, settling in New York City in 1874, where he died two years later at the age of forty-seven.

Demonstrations Following the Assassination.

In I he manifestation of the public grief following the death of President Lincoln, which event " arrested the daily concerns of the whole civilized world " the Jews everywhere were prominent. Occurring as it did on the Jewish Sabbath, the first pulpit utterances were heard in the synagogues, the general character of the services therein being thus described by the New York Times of April 21, 18G5 :

The American flag was half-masted and the hanner itself often enshrouded with folds of crape; long festoons of black and white overhanging the entrance doors. The galleries were draped in black and the huge tapers almost concealed beneath the sombre cloths of mourning. In all the synagogues, as on Saturday last, the prayers for the dead and dying were repeated by the ministers and sorrow-stricken people and the buildings were crowded with assemblages whose earnest attention and fervent responses to the supplications of the officiating clergymen gave evidence of the deep grief that bowed down the hearts of the congregation.

The Times states that the services on April 17, 18G5, at the Synagogue Shaary Zedek, Rev. Mr, Menks officiating, lasted from 8.30 a. m. to 1 p. m.

In the Synagogue Shearith Israel of New York, the rabbi recited an Hazcarah (prayer for the dead) for Lincoln. This, according to the Jewish Messenger, was the first time that prayer had been said in a Jewish house of worship for any other than those professing the Jewish religion. The innovation provoked very strong remonstrance in some Jewish quarters. Rev. Mr. Leeser, however, took a liberal view. Addressing the Hebrew Congregation in Washington he declared that :

Prayers for the deceased President were in accordance with the spirit of the faith which the Jews inherited as children of Israel who recognized in all men those created like them in the image of God, and all entitled to his mercy, grace and pardon, though they have not yet learned to worship and adore Him as they do who have been specially selected as the bearers of His law.

The number of Jews taking part in the funeral procession in the city of Washington was about 125, mainly members of the " Hebrew Congregation " under the marshalship of B. Kaufman.

Of the 50,000 who marched in procession in the city of New York, 7000, according to the Jewish Messenger, were Jews, chiefly members of the orders of B'nai B'rith, B'nai Mosheh and Free Sons of Israel, including some 2000 who paraded with the Masonic, military and other organizations. The Free Sons of Israel carried a banner with the inscription :

The Father of his Country is Dead

The Nation Mourns him

LINCOLN

He is not dead but he still lives in the hearts of the Nation.

The Henry Clay Debating Association of forty members, Samuel Adler, president, was assigned a place in the procession, as were the employes of Heineman and Silberman's factory. Following the funeral procession in the city of New York a memorial meeting was held in Union Square under the direction of 100 leading citizens, Martin H. Levin, a merchant of prominence, being the only Jew among them. George Bancroft was the orator and to Rabbi Samuel M. Isaacs was assigned the reading of the Scripture. Referring to this meeting Bishop Simpson said in his oration at the burial in Springfield:

The Archbishop of the Roman Catholic Church in New York and a Protestant minister walked side by side in the procession, and a Jewish rabbi performed a part of the funeral service.

Most of the synagogues and Jewish organizations of the city were represented at this gathering, delegations being present from the Board of Delegates of American Israelites, the Purim Association, the Jerusalem Society, the Mutual Benefit and Burial Society, Young Men's Hebrew Benevolent Fuel Association, Hebrew Benevolent Society and Orphan Asylum, and Congregations B'nai Jeshurun, Shaarai Tefila, Anshe Chesed, Eodef Sholom, B'nai Israel, Ahawath Chesed, Beth Israel, Bikur Cholim Kadisha, Atereth Israel and Mishkan Israel.

The Jews of Boston joined in a funeral procession which ended at the Temple Ohabei Shalom, where an address was delivered by Eev. David Myers. In the Tribute of Nations covering 1200 contributions from every portion of the civilized world and published by order of Congress in 1867 the resolutions of this congregation appear in full, being, strange to say, the only tribute from American Jewish sources in the entire volume. They read as follows :

Boston, April 16, 1865.

At a vestry meeting held this day by the Hebrew Congregation Ohabei Shalom, worshipping in Warren street synagogue, a committee was appointed to draw up resolutions in regard to the late lamentable national calamity, and the following preamble and resolutions were drawn up and passed unanimously:

Whereas it has pleased an all-merciful Father to remove from our midst his Excellency Abraham Lincoln, President of these United States of America, by death, at a moment when the whole nation rejoiced in the promised peace of our distracted country; and

Whereas this death has been caused by the foul hand of an assassin, who came unawares upon his illustrious victim while enjoying relaxation from his arduous duties, In the company of the partner of his bosom; and

"Whereas feeling that this calamity concerns every individual, not alone in this country, but throughout the civilized world, affecting as it does the capability of mankind to govern themselves, and dealing a fearful blow against republican institutions: Therefore,

Resolved, That we, the congregation " Ohabei Shalom," of the city of Boston, deeply deplore this sad event, and we humbly bow to our Heavenly Father, praying this last, his " greatest sacrifice " of all will suffice " the monster moloch," and that the Lord our God will be pleased to sanctify the death of our Chief Magistrate to the end that no more victims shall be required to end this unholy war.

Resolved, that with grief and horror we noticed the attempted double assassination of the Secretary of State of the United States, Mr. Seward, and his family, one ripe in years, wisdom and honor; that this attempted assassination is scarcely less to be deplored than that of the Chief Magistrate, whose death the nation now mourns, and that no words can convey the deep sorrow which we feel within us that the first officer of the country should thus be cut off from among us at the moment when his wisdom and prudence were about to lead us out of the chaos of war to the paradise of peace.

Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with the bereaved family of the late most worthy Chief Magistrate, and that no words of ours can convey the deep shock, the thrill of horror, the unspeakable agony with which the sad tidings were received by our community. But we hope that He who tempers the winds to the shorn lamb — He who was from the " beginning " " the protector " of the " widow and orphan," will also vouchsafe to be the protector of the family of the lamented dead (dead in the flesh, but living in the hearts of his countrymen). May he temper their grief, and let them remember, and let us hope, that the good deeds done by him whilst on earth will intercede for him before the throne of Almighty God, and that the throne of martyrdom be sanctified unto him.

Resolved, That the synagogue shall be draped in mourning for thirty days and that a prayer for the dead shall be chanted every Sabbath day and Mondays and Thursdays during that time.

Resolved, That on the day of the funeral of the lamented dead, a funeral sermon shall be preached in the synagogue, and that we, the members of this congregation, unanimously resolve to close our places of business on that day for the purpose of keeping it as a day of mourning.

Resolved, That a copy of the above resolutions be forwarded to the widow of the lamented President, as also to the family of the Secretary of State; that they be sealed with the seal of the congregation and signed by the president and vice-president and secretary.

Resolved, That the above resolutions be entered on the minutes of the congregation and published in the Post, Journal, and Herald, newspapers of this city.

Done the 19th day of Nisan, of the year of the creation 5260 — April 16, 1865.

S. Mtebs, President.

[Seal.] S. Steinburg, Vice-President.

N. Ehrlich, Secretary.

The Boston Traveller oi April 20, 1865, notes that " Solemn and appropriate services were held at both the Jewish Synagogues," the second house of worship being undoubtedly that of the Reform Congregation Adath Israel of which Eev. Joseph Schoninger was rabbi. There were at this time two other synagogues in Boston, Mishkan Israel, Rev. Alexis Alexander rabbi, and the Dutch Jews' synagogue, the rabbi of which is unknown.

The United Hebrew Congregation of St. Louis, A. S. Isaacs, president, ordered their place of worship draped in mourning and that the members wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days. Tlie congregation was addressed by Dr. Henry Vidaver. At the Synagogue B'nai Israel in the same city Rev. Mr. Kittner spoke. The Hebrew Young Men's Literary Association of St. Louis adopted resolutions drawn up by a committee composed of S. H. Lazarus, J. R. Jacobs, and A. S. Aloe which were published in the Missouri Republican of April 19, 1865. The Congregation Emanu-El of San Francisco was addressed on the day of the President's death by Rev. Dr. Elkan Cohn, who was handed a despatch announcing the assassination just as he was going into his pulpit to deliver the weekly sermon. Eev. B. H. Gotthelf addressed the Congregation Adath Israel of Louisville. Congregation Miekve Israel of Philadelphia adopted resolutions in which Lincoln was described as

One of the best and purest presidents, who like the law-giver Moses brought a nation to the verge of the haven of peace, and like him was not allowed to participate in its consummation.

In the Brevard Street Synagogue, Detroit, Michigan, Eev. Dr. Isidore Kalisch delivered an eloquent address dwelling especially on Lincoln's proclamation of emancipation and likening him to Moses. He also referred to the President's tolerant views, citing as an instance his action in reference to the appointment of Jewish Chaplains for the army.

According to the Chicago Evening Journal of May 2, 1865, the Jews were represented in the funeral procession in that city by the Hebrew Benevolent Association and Congregation Bikur Cholim. The establishment of Stein, Kramer and Company draped their store elaborately and a portrait of Lincoln, heavily draped, occupied a place in the window. Foreman Brothers displayed a motto reading :

" FiBST IN THE Race that led to Glory's Goal."

Say Nicolay and Hay :

The President's body rested in the Court House In Chicago for two days under a canopy of sombre richness inscribed with that noble Hebrew lament: " The Beauty of Israel is Slain upon the High Places."

Two congregations in Albany, N. Y., were conspicuous in the demonstrations. Eev. Max Schlesinger spoke at the Temple Anshe Emeth, and the Congregation Beth El held a special meeting at which elaborate resolutions were adopted. These were published in full in the Evening Journal of that city of April 20 and the Argus of April 21, 1865. This congregation voted to hold services three times on the day of the funeral, first at 6 a. m. for morning prayers, at 10 a. m. for a sermon by the Eev. J. Gotthold, rabbi of the congregation, and at 6 p. m. for evening prayers.

The resolutions of the Washington Literary and Dramatic Association, adopted on April 18, 1865, were published in full in the Washington National Intelligencer of April 24. They were drawn up by a committee composed of S. Wolf, Julius Lowenthal, F. P. Stanton, A. Hart, and J. Stralitz, and read :

By the death of Abraham Lincoln the nation has sustained an Irreparable loss, freedom her brightest and purest champion, humanity her greatest benefactor, who, more than any other whose name history transmits, deserves the poet's tribute of being " A man take him for all in all we ne'er shall look upon his like again." He has immortalized the country over which he so worthily presided by ever remaining true to freedom and the constitution affected by his inspiration; his heroism, statesmanship and kindness of heart during the trying ordeal of this accursed rebellion will be the marvel, and command the admiration of future ages as they have aroused the fervent homage of the present; the Emancipator stands side by side in our affection and esteem with the Father of his country.

While we mourn this great loss we utter our respectful protest against any leniency towards the responsible leaders of this accursed deed; this is yet and ever shall be a government of the people, more slow to anger but sure to avenge; we extend to Andrew Johnson, the President of the United States, our assurances of esteem and confidence and readiness to sustain him in all acts that will redound to the glory and perpetuity of our beloved country.

Eesolutions were drawn by a committee of the Hebrew Benevolent Society of New York, composed of P. Frankenheimer, Philip Spier, M. Mayer, I. S. Solomons, and I. Phillips.

District Grand Lodge No. 2 of the order of B'nai B'rith representing the States of Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, Missouri, Michigan, Tennessee, Illinois, and Wisconsin called the assassination " a futile attempt to overthrow the grand principles of freedom and to place in its stead anarchy with its attendant misery." The Executive Committee of the Board of Delegates of American Israelites resolved that

The Israelites of the United States are deeply sensible of the loss humanity has sustained in the painful death of the lamented President; that the loss strikes us with peculiar solemnity and significance at this momentous period of the National history when we behold so nigh the end of that unhallowed combination against the government to the hastening of which the good, the honest Abraham Lincoln, contributed so largely, and with all the zeal, the sincerity and the prudence of his kind heart, his clear practical judgment, his steadfast unfaltering fidelity to the Union.

J. H. Montefiore, President of London Board of Deputies, wrote a letter of condolence to the Hon. Charles Francis Adams, the American Minister in London, requesting him to convey it to Mrs. Lincoln and the United States Government. In the House of Commons, Benjamin Disraeli spoke of the President's death in seconding the address to the Crown.

Jewish citizens in several of the seceded States also joined in paying homage to the deceased President. In Richmond, Va., Rev. M. J. lilichelbacher of the Synagogue Beth Ahaba devoted a sermon to the assassination which he characterized as a most horrible crime and expressed his satisfaction that it had not happened in Richmond. At Memphis the military commander of the Federal forces, having assumed control of the demonstrations, two Jewish congregations united with other denominations in a joint service held in the city park, these being Congregations Israel, Rabbi Tuska, and Beth El, Rabbi Joel Alexander. In the funeral procession in that city appeared Eupiirates Lodge, No. 35, Order B'nai B'rith, with its entire membership of 1G7, Samuel Schloss acting as marshal. Rev. Dr. Bernard Illoway addressed the Congrega-tion Shaarey Chesed of New Orleans. The Congregation Termini Derech of New Orleans draped their synagogue in mourning and was addressed by Colonel Philip J. Joachimsen of New York. Citizens of all classes held a memorial meeting in Charleston, S. C, at which Governor Aiken presided. Samuel Hart, Sr., and Benjamin M. Seixas were members of a Committee of Fifty to draft resolutions. Unmoved by this toucliing manifestation of a fallen foe the New York Tribune correspondent at Charleston, S. C, in a venomous letter to his paper assailed the majority of the Committee of Fifty as sympathizers with the Confederate cause, Hart and Seixas being with others specifically designated as "still violent secessionists at heart."

The official minutes of the Lincoln Monument Association of Springfield record among tiie very fii'st contributors to the fund the " Hebrew Citizens of Alton, HI.," followed shortly thereafter by the Hebrew Congregation of St. Joseph, Mo., and the Hebrew Congregation of Philadelphia.

Dr. C, H. Liebermann, a practicing physician of Washing-ton, was one of the nine medical men at the death-bed of Lincoln, and his portrait is among the forty-seven persons in Alonzo Chappel's painting, The Last Hours of Lincoln, executed in 1867. From the prospectus of a steel-plate engraving of this painting we learn :

Lincoln's family physician, Dr. Stone and Surgeon-General Barnes accompanied by assistant Surgeon-General Crane were in early attendance, and later he was visited by Doctors Hall and Liebermann, and other eminent physicians, all of whom agreed that the wound was unto death.

Numerous contemporary newspapers referred to Dr. Liebermann's presence on this occasion and his name is mentioned in various books treating of the assassination. Neighbors of Liebermann in Washington are of the impression that he was a Jew, although unaffiliated with Jewish organizations. He was born in Eiga, Russia, September 15, 1813, and died in Washington, March 27, 1886.

The flight, pursuit and remorse of Lincoln's assassin have been vividly portrayed by Emma Lazarus in a poem of five stanzas entitled " April 27th, 1865." She chose for her title the date of Booth's capture and death, inadvertently given a day in advance of the actual date. These verses first appeared in 1867 in Poems and Translations Written between the Ages of Fourteen and Seventeen. Owing to their ambiguous title their existence has escaped the notice of most students of Lincoln.

Inspired by the death of Lincoln, Judah Eoswald of Baltimore wrote a poem in Hebrew called " Lincoln's Amnesty," the same being published in the Jewish Messenger of June 24, 1865.

In its issue of May 25, 1865, this journal published an appreciation of Lincoln in Hebrew by Isaac Goldstein. In translation this reads:

ACROSTIC

On Abraham Lincoln, Assassinated Nisan 18th, 5625.

My heart overflows with a good speech. I address my work unto a king. Psalms, XLY. 2.

I.
Happy art thou, Lincoln, Who is like unto thee!

Among kings and princes thou art exalted.
Much thou did'st with an humble spirit.
Thou art like a unique person in the land.
Who among princes is like Lincoln?
Who shall be praised like him?

II.
Thou hast also a name among heroes!
Thy right hand has achieved prowess against them.
Thou hast girded on the sword of the slain.
Thou hast drawn the bow by night and by day.
One Father has created us, thou hast said;
Therefore thou hast proclaimed Freedom in thy land.
The black people thou hast redeemed into Freedom:
Forever they will praise and bless thy name.

Who among princes is like Lincoln, and who can be praised like him?

Isaac Goldstein, the Levite.

Eulogies of Lincoln were pronounced by the rabbis of many synagogues, and some of these were printed in the Israelite, the Jewish Messenger, the Occident, and daily newspapers. Of these eulogies none has been preserved in perma-nent form with the exception of the following :

Liebman Adler, Address (in Funf Reden), Chicago, 1866.

David Einhorn, Trauer Rede, Philadelphia, April 19, 1865.

Henry Hochheimer, Predigt, April 19, 1865; Feat- und Fasttag, Baltimore, June 1, 1865.

Sabato Morais, An Address, Philadelphia, April 19, 1865; A Discourse, June 1, 1865.

Benjamin Szold, Vaterland und Freiheit, Baltimore, June 1, 1865.

Philip J. Joachimsen, An Address, New Orleans, April 29, 1865.

Jonas Bondi, Trauer-Predigt, New York, April 19, 1865.

Lincoln's Clemency.

No phase of Lincoln's administration surpasses in interest the chapters dealing with the appeals to executive clemency. The importunities of pardon seekers and his habitual yielding to their entreaties in the face of earnest protests gave rise to much harsh criticism, but this rarely swerved him from his predetermined course of action.

An exceptional instance of Lincoln's denial of a pardon was narrated by the late Eabbi Benjamin Szold, of Baltimore, in the case of a Jewish deserter in General Meade's army. Stopping at Washington on his way to Eappahannock station Eabbi Szold sought an audience with the President with a view of obtaining a pardon for the condemned man. Lincoln being engaged at a cabinet meeting at the time, Dr. Szold sent in his Bible with the passage from Deutoronomy xx, 8, marked, at the same time making his plea for the soldier. Presently the President emerged with the Bible in hand, laughing heartily, " the tears rolling down his cheeks," according to an account of the visit published in the Baltimore Herald May 24, 1896. Several other soldiers in General Meade's army, — Catholics and Protestants, — were awaiting execution at this time for a similar offence and the President inquired of the Eabbi whether he was interceding for the Jew only or for all the deserters. Lincoln refused to interfere but gave Dr. Szold a letter to General Meade asking that every courtesy be shown the bearer. Meade firmly refused to waive the death penalty on the ground that it would be a bad example for the army and a serious precedent for the future, lilore fortunate in his effort to save the life of a Jewish deserter was Simon Wolf, of Washington, who paid a midnight visit to the President for that purpose. In a recent address in Baltimore he said :

The scene when I called upon Mr. Lincoln is indelibly impressed on my memory and gave evidence of the luminous spirit, humanity and charity which characterized the great President. Deserters at that period were numerous, soldiers were needed and stern measures were demanded to preserve discipline in the decimated ranks of the Army of the Potomac. Secretary Stanton and the Commanding Generals were continually complaining of the President's leniency. The execution in this instance was fixed for the following day. I was accompanied by " Tom " Corwin, the distinguished Ohio statesman. Mr. Lincoln listened patiently to the pleadings of both but stood firm. At last I pleaded with him on lines which 1 knew he could not resist. The President turned in his chair and rang a bell. The Secretary answered the call and he ordered a stay of execution. The young soldier subsequently led the forlorn hope at the battle of Cold Harbor, and fell in his tracks with the flag of his country wrapped around him. A monument to his memory has since been erected. When I subsequently told the President of the tragic end of the boy he had so nobly pardoned, he was affected to tears. And this is the man whom a partisan press denounced as a " baboon " and an " ignoramus."

In the archives of the War Department is recorded the remarkable experience of David Levy, who was granted a pardon by Lincoln under peculiar circumstances. Levy in December, 1902, applied to the Pension Bureau for a pension, which was refused on the ground that his name appears on the books of the War Department as a deserter. The records show that Levy first enlisted on April 19, 1861, in the 16th Pennsylvania cavalry, serving until July 23, 1861, when he was mustered out. He again enlisted August 19, 1861, and deserted February 22, 1863. This desertion was fatal to his claim for pension under the Act of Congress, and he was so informed. He immediately wrote to the Bureau that he was pardoned for that desertion by President Lincoln and as evi- dence of the fact he forwarded to the Pension Office a small card, such as Lincoln habitually used in the course of his official business, whereon was written in his well-known handwriting :

If David Levy shall enlist and serve faithfully for one year or until otherwise honorably discharged I will pardon him for the past.

Jan. 12, 1865. A. Lincoln.

Upon receipt of this Eugene F. Ware, the Commissioner of Pensions, ordered that the pardon be recognized. This card Levy subsequently presented to Mr. Ware, who is now its owner.

In the Century Magazine, December, 1895, may be found numerous orders of Lincoln in reference to the appeals of pardon-seekers, including that of Abraham Samuels, arrested in Virginia in the fall of 1864 while trying to pass through the Union lines to obtain medical supplies for the Confederate army. Samuel's defense was that he "was simply trying to escape from the South." The matter was referred to Lincoln who endorsed the papers as follows:

It is confessed in this case that Samuels when arrested had on his person a paper prima facie showing that he was going North to obtain medical supplies for the rebels. Will the oflBcer in conmmand at Fort Monroe please give him an opportunity of trying to prove that this was not his real object and report the evidence, with his opinion on it, to me?

A. Lincoln.

After taking considerable testimony the President on December 10, 1864, issued this order :
Let the prisoner Samuels be discharged.

A. Lincoln.

Diligent research fails to reveal the identity of Samuels.
4

Of exceptional interest was the arrest and imprisonment in Washington, 1864, of Goodman L. Mordecai, of South Carolina. He was the son of Benjamin Mordecai, one of the most prominent citizens of Charleston, and was then in his 26th year. He had received an honorable discharge from the Confederate Army, and had been an occasional contributor to the Southern press. Intending to visit Nassau in the interest of a prominent blockade company, he left Eichmond bound for Washington, fortified with passports from Judah P. Benjamin, and the city authorities. Eeaching Washington, he was arrested, and, refusing to take the oath of allegiance, was imprisoned for several months. He then sent for Samuel A. Lewis, an uncle of his fiancee, Miss Ada Jackson. Lewis was editor of the Hebrew Leader, and Vice-President of Mt. Sinai Hospital, New York. He also appealed to Dr. I. Zacharie, whose close relations with Lincoln will be referred to later on, who took immediate steps for his release. He called on the President and successfully accomplished this result. In return for this act of kindness young Mordecai accompanied his benefactor to the White House to thank Lincoln for his consideration. Describing this interview, Mr. Mordecai told the writer :

Zacharie unconsciously informed Lincoln that I had fought against the Government and that my father was the first contributor to the Southern Cause having been a subscriber in the sum of $10,000 soon after the secession of South Carolina. The President then grasped my hand and answered: " I am happy to know that I am able to serve an enemy." My release followed, on condition that I would not return to the South during the war. Proceeding to New York I found myself under the constant surveillance of the Federal detectives. I then called upon General Dix to whom I showed the President's order for my release which he examined with care and at once dismissed me, remarking: " I bow to higher authority! "

On Lincoln's birthday, 1901, Mr. Mordecai contributed to the New YorJc Tribune a detailed account of his arrest and release, which was printed the following day. In the article he ventured the statement that " one of the greatest, grandest characters in history was Abraham Lincoln."

Lincoln's course in this case occasioned a scandalous editorial in the anti-administration organ — the New York World, of September 24, 1864, its caption being "Mr. Lincoln's Unionism and Bunionism." Dr. Zacharie is held up as a man who had been courted and flattered by high oflBcials because of his intimacy with the President. He, it alleges, " has often left his business apartment to spend an evening in the parlor with this favored bunionist." Zacharie is said to have " enjoyed Mr. Lincoln's confidence perhaps more than any other private individual." The World broadly intimates that Mordecai's release was obtained for a consideration and suggests that " there must be a reason for this remarkable intimacy between an obscure toe-nail trimmer and the Chief Executive of a great nation."

Noteworthy Incidents.

Several noteworthy incidents marked Lincoln's visit to New York when en route to Washington on February 19, 1861. Passing down Broadway in his barouche he may have noticed the establishment of Isador Bernhard and Son decorated with a banner with the device : " Welcome Abraham Lincoln ; we beg for Compromise," The same night at the Astor House he greeted J. Solis Eitterband of the New York bar, President of the Young Men's Eepublican Club of the City of New York, who had made many speeches in the campaign, marched with the " Wide Awakes " and worked enthusiastically for the election of Lincoln and Hamlin. On the following day Lincoln was officially received at the New York City Hall where he was welcomed by Mayor Fernando Wood. An impromptu reception followed in the course of which the Mayor announced the presence of " Mr. Cohen " of Charleston, probably J. Barret Cohen, remarking as he did so that the gentleman was " outside the jurisdiction," bearing in mind the fact that South Carolina had, sixty-two days before, passed an ordinance of secession. Whether Mr. Cohen's visit was prompted by admiration or curiosity does not appear in the Tribune account of the presentation, published the following day (February 20, 1861). At any rate, Mr. Lincoln extended a cordial greeting to the gentleman from South Carolina, observing as he did so that " the matter of jurisdiction makes no difference at all."

Lincoln's various calls for troops met with prompt response from the Jews, the names of GOOOof that faith being recorded by Simon Wolf in The American Jew as Patriot, Soldier and Citizen, as having served in the cause of the Union. The actual number serving was probably double that figure. Numerous appointments and promotions in the military service attest Lincoln's appreciation of the services rendered by the Jews.

He appointed Major Leopold Blumenberg, of Maryland, Provost-Marshal of the third Maryland District, and President Johnson subsequently promoted him Brevet-Brigadier-General. Edward S. Solomon, a lieutenant in an Illinois regiment, was ultimately brevetted Brigadier-General and commended for " the highest order of coolness and determination under very trying circumstances " in the battle of Gettysburg. After enlisting as a private in an Indiana regiment Frederick Knefler rose to be Brevet-Major-General, the highest rank attained by any Jew in the Federal Army. In the first battle of Bull Eun, in 1861, Colonel Max Einstein commanding a Pennsylvania regiment covered the retreat of the Union Army, and was subsequently appointed by President Lincoln United States Consul at ISTuremburg, Bavaria. President Lincoln appointed Adolph A. Mayer of the Fourth New Mexico Volunteers Inspector-General of Volunteers. Among the recipients of Medals of Honor, authorized by Congress and approved by President Lincoln, were a large number of Jewish soldiers, both commissioned and non-commissioned ojBBcers, and privates. Colonel Marcus M. Spiegel of the 67th Ohio Infantry had been recommended for promotion to the grade of Brigadier-General but died of wounds received at Vicksburg before the appointment could be made.

Conspicuous in manifestations of loyalty was Uriah P. Levy, of the United States Navy, the owner of Monticello, the former home of Thomas Jefferson. Calling on Lincoln at the opening of the war, he placed his entire fortune at his disposal. The offer being declined, he subscribed liberally to tlie war loan. Levy died March 22, 1862, devising a large portion of his estate in Virginia and the city of New York to the people of the United States, for the maintenance, at Monticello, of an agricultural school for the children of deceased warrant-officers of the United States Navy. Mr. Fessenden of Maine, in a speech in the United States Senate shortly after Levy's death, estimated the value of the property so devised at $300,000. The constitutionality of this bequest gave rise to considerable discussion in the Senate. Litigation resulted in a reversion of the property to Levy's heirs (see Levy V. Levy, 33 N. Y. Reports, 97).

A touching story is told of Lincoln's visit to the bedside of a dying soldier of twenty-five, Lieutenant-Colonel Leopold C. Newman of the 31st New York Infantry. Newman's leg had been shattered by grapeshot in a battle near Fredericksburg, Va., early in 1863. He was carried to the National Hotel, in Washington, where, it has been asserted, Lincoln called to see him bearing with him a commission as Brigadier-General, Newman died shortly afterwards.

Mr. Simon Wolf, in his The American Jew as Patriot, Soldier and Citizen tells this incident, his authority being, so he informs the writer, a soldier of Newman's command who was present at Newman's death. Colonel Frank Jones, Newman's superior officer, at present attached to the War Department, states in reply to this that he has no knowledge of Lincoln's visit or of Newman's promotion, nor do the records of the Department show any such promotion. That Newman's advancement was at least contemplated seems quite probable, inasmuch as there appears in the Israelite of July 3, 1863, the statement :

Had Newman recovered he would have received his Commission as Brigadier General which had been already written out for him.

The Occident said in its issue of September, 1864:

One Colonel Newman of New York obtained the honorary title of Brigadier General after he was mortally wounded; and in reviewing the record of Jewish soldiers shortly after the close of the war took occasion to say:

We do not believe that more than one officer, a Lieutenant Colonel when wounded was promoted to a Brigadier General, just before his death.

Unfortunately the identity of the officer is not disclosed.

Early appreciation of Lincoln's place in history is evidenced by an incident at a festival given by the Jewish women of Pittsburg, Pa., for the benefit of the Sanitary Commission on December 9, 1863. Inspired by the recent victories at Gettysburg and Vicksburg, which were doubtless regarded as harbingers of early peace, Jacob Affelder offered the following toast, which was published in the Israelite a few days later:

Abraham Lincoln, the noble Pilot, called by the voice of the people to the position of danger and responsibility, when traitors' hands had directed the ship of State toward the breakers of National Destruction. Nobly has he buffeted the waves of Disunion, until now with the assistance of Providence and our gallant Army and Navy he has brought us within sight of our longed for peace. His name will be synonymous with Patience, Honesty and Justice.

President Lincoln was evidently in good humor when visited by Mr. Simon Wolf with an invitation to attend the celebration of the 300th anniversary of Shakespeare's birth in 1864 by the Young Men's Literary Association of Washington. Captain Isaac N. Gotthold of the 42d New York Infantry accompanied him. Mr. Lincoln, says Mr. Wolf, was drinking a cup of coffee when the two called. On learning the object of their visit he said :

" Well, boys, what are you going to play? "

Wlien he was told "Hamlet," he said:

" Why could I not be the grave digger of the evening; for am I not a fellow of infinite jest? "

" Unfortunately," says Mr. Wolf, " the President could not come, but he sent a check for $25."

For the purpose of introducing abroad certain publications from his pen bearing upon the mineral resources of the United States, Julius Silversmith, of California, an eminent metallurgist, sought the endorsement of President Lincoln. He presented letters of introduction from Governor James W. N"ye, of Nevada, and United States Senator John Conness, of Oregon, both of whom assured Mr. Lincoln that Mr. Silversmith's mission was an important one, likely to induce a large immigration. They further stated that his encouragement would be highly appreciated by the loyal people of the western side of the continent. Mr. Lincoln, while not to be swerved from his usual policy of caution in dealing with strangers, endorsed Governor Nye's letter as follows :

Not personally knowing Mr. Silversmith I cheerfully endorse what Governor Nye says of him.

A. Lincoln,

April 30, 1864.

On the letter of Senator Conness he wrote:

I do not personally know Mr. Silversmith but Senator Conness who writes the above is habitually careful not to say what he does not know.

April 30, 1864.

A. Lincoln.

The original letters above quoted are in the possession of the Hon. Simon W. Eosendale, of Albany, N. Y.

Silversmith lived in San Francisco for some years before the Civil War. In the directory of that city for 1858 his occupation is given as " assistant teacher at the Emanu-El Institute." During 1860-61-62 he was the editor and proprietor of the Mining and Scientific Press. In 1866 he wrote a Practical Hand-Booh for Miners, Metallurgists and Assayers, which is recognized as a standard work in the profession. Silversmith died in Chicago in 1894.

To Edward Eosewater belongs the distinction of having with his own hands transmitted to the world from the telegraph oflSce of the War Department in Washington Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation of January 1, 1863, He met the President twice that day and in the evening attended a ball at the White House. Eosewater came from Bohemia in 1854 at the age of thirteen. He was successively peddler, clerk and bookkeeper. At the age of eighteen he became a telegraph operator. In the Chicago Tribune, September 11, 1893, he tells, in an authorized interview, of a visit of the President to the War Department on December 13, 1863, Eosewater being the only telegraph operator on duty. General Burnside was at this time preparing to attack the strongly intrenched army of Lee at Fredericksburg, Va. Lincoln, evidently recalling Burnside's confessed incompetency to command the Army of the Potomac, as expressed to himself and others, and filled with forebodings of disaster, went to the telegraph office in his slippers at 8 a. m., and remained there all day. Eosewater did all the telegraphing for him, some by dictation and some from notes. The President's fears proved well-founded, Burnside's force of 100,000 men being overwhelmingly defeated with a loss of over 10,000 killed and wounded.

Eosewater was attached to the United States Military Telegraph Corps 1861-1863 and transmitted General Pope's despatches from various battlefields. He subsequently became manager of the Pacific Telegraph with headquarters in Omaha, Feb. Later he founded the Omaha Bee, which he conducted from 1871 to the time of his death in 1906.

The late Myer S. Isaacs, at one time judge of the Marine

Court of ISTew York City, attended a reception at the White House in February, 1865. He was accompanied by A. S. Solomons and his daughter Zillah, This interesting account of what he saw Mr. Isaacs wrote for the Jewish Messenger o-ver the signature " M/'

The President kindly assisted in the welcome and entertainment of the lady guests. We were presented and cordially greeted, Mr. Lincoln being particularly engaging in his remarks to the little daughter of the gentleman accompanying me, saying that he liked to see the children, and inquiring their names and whether he had seen them before. He is by no means so awkward as his pictures represent him; unusually tall, a head and shoulders above those around he had, of course, to stoop when speaking to most of his visitors, but his countenance strongly expressive of good nature as well as of resolution, an index of his heart, and nobody leaves the Executive Mansion without being fascinated by the kindly amiable bearing of the President. I was particularly struck with this, and in the demeanor of the numerous visitors of humble appearance, private soldiers, widows and other relatives of unfortunate or distressed members of the Union armies, whom I saw congregated in the ante-room on a subsequent day and who waited with patience and confidence their turn for an interview, many remaining there for hours, as the President's time is pretty constantly occupied, and all satisfied that their petition, however unimportant to others than themselves, would receive the gentle attention of the Chief Magistrate; and even a refusal would be couched in such kindly and winning language that their love and confidence in his goodness of heart would be diminished not at all.

With the passing years, Mr. Isaacs conceived a passionate admiration for Lincoln, seizing every occasion to extol his virtues and public record. As evidence of his earnestness and enthusiasm when discussing the war President it is interesting to note his indignation when the New York Times, shortly before his death, proposed the abolition of the Lincoln-Birthday holiday in that State on the ground that it was " a monument to legislative folly." This proposition elicited a scathing reply to the offending newspaper (February 20, 1903), reading as follows:

His unparalleled career from the modest Kentucky home to the White House, his devotion to country in the period of dire distress and danger, his tragic taking off, his immortal deeds, his trust in the common people, the lofty place he occupied among the leaders of men in modern times, entitle him to the distinc-tion due only to Washington and Lincoln — setting apart his natal day, for the study and appreciation of his character and achieve-ments, the inspiration that elevates the Nation, the lesson of a life dwelt upon wherever humanity feels sympathy for the op-pressed and downtrodden and honors unselfishness and devotion.

One of the vast army of civilians attracted to Washington in the early days of the Civil War was a young Englishman, Dr. Isachar Zacharie, who had attained considerable celebrity as a skillful chiropodist. By some means he was introduced to Lincoln and very friendly relations resulted, their intimacy going so far, it is alleged, that Zacharie was entrusted with confidential missions to Savannah and- New Orleans, being subsequently sent to Eichmond in the role of peacemaker, a statement which should be accepted cum grano sails.

In a letter to his wife, dated Fortress Monroe, September 23, 1863, Zacharie notes his intention of leaving the following day "for Dixie," under flag of truce; for what purpose does not appear. He expresses concern about his reception by the people of the South, hopes they will listen to him, and inti-mates that he may be long absent. Samuel Zacharie, a son, accepts this letter as evidence of his father's visit to Eichmond on behalf of President Lincoln, insists that he had interviews with Jefferson Davis and Judah P. Benjamin, but offers noth-ing in corroboration of his actual presence in Eichmond or interviews with the Confederate leaders.

Of Dr. Zacharie's close relations with Lincoln there is little doubt. Whether these went beyond the bounds of professional intercourse cannot be determined, the only evidence of their acquaintance being a document in the handwriting of Lincoln now in the possession of the Zacharie family which reads as follows :

Dr. Zacharie has operated on my feet with, great success and considerable' addition to my comfort.

A. Lincoln.
Sept. 2, 1862.

Dr. Zacharie's strong foothold in political and social circles in the National Capital was the subject of a column editorial in the New York Herald, October 3, 1862, under the caption " The Head and Feet of the Nation." Zacharie is described as

A wit, gourmet and eccentric, with a splendid Roman nose, fashionable whiskers and eloquent tongue, a dazzling diamond breast-pin, great skill in his profession and an ingratiating address, a perfect knowledge of his business, and a plentiful supply of social and moral courage.

Secretary Stanton, it adds, was unable to resist such a combination of eloquence when Zacharie called to see him with a proposition to treat the feet of the soldiers and he even proposed the raising of a corps of chiropodists to accompany the various armies. " Prior to that," says the Herald, " he had trimmed the feet of President Lincoln and all his Cabinet." After the war Dr. Zacharie resumed the practice of his profession in the city of New York, and subsequently in London. In England he founded a branch of Free Masonry, known as the Order of the Secret Monitor, in which he wielded much influence. He died in London in 1897, at the age of seventy-two, his death being extensively noticed by the American press, special prominence being given to his relations to Lincoln.

One of Lincoln's ardent admirers was a South Carolinian, Septima M. CoUis, the daughter of David C. Levy, later a Philadelphia banker. She contracted a romantic marriage with Charles H. T. Collis, captain of an Independent Company known as the Zouaves d'Afrique, of Philadelphia, and accompanied him to the front, her experience being recorded in a little volume A Woman's War Record. Being presented to President Lincoln, while the Army of the Potomac was on the Eappahannock, she was struck by his curious attire. She wrote:

He wore a dress suit, his swallow tail coat being a terrible misfit, and it puzzled me very much to tell whether his shirt collar was made to stand up or turn down — it was doing a little of both.

Another Jewess who recorded her impressions of Lincoln was Eose Eytinge, the actress. Accompanied by Wallack and Davenport she went to the White House in response to an invitation from the President, who had witnessed their performance. In her Memoirs she makes the following record of this visit:

When I was presented to the President he took my hand, and holding it while he looked down upon me from his great height said: " So this is the little lady that all us folks in Washington like so much! " Then with a portentous shake of his head but with a twinkle in his eye, he continued, " Don't you ever come around here asking me to do some of those impossible things you women always ask for, for I would have to do it and then I would get into trouble."

At a social function Miss Eytinge relates she met Secretary Seward by whom she was not favorably impressed because " he was stately, cold and dignified, whereas she found Lincoln simple, warm-hearted and free spoken."

President Lincoln's entry into Eichmond in 1865 was witnessed by Sir Moses Ezekiel the eminent sculptor, a native resident of that city, who had served in the Confederate Army. The then budding artist recognizing the President's presence in Eichmond as an historic event, made at this time a close study of Lincoln. This enabled him some thirty-five years later to execute for Nathaniel Myers of New York a striking bust of the great Emancipator.

Note. — ^Additional data on the subject-matter of this monograph, not now accessible, are reserved for a future publication.

LINCOLN and the JEWS

A HISTORY

"Nothing brings history to life more vividly than handwritten letters, maps, and photographs. This book is a spectacular collection of primary documents that cast new light on Lincoln . . . it is a treasure."

—DORIS KEARNS GOODWIN

JONATHAN D. SARNA and BENJAMIN SHAPELL

ABRAHAM LINCOLN
WITH MALICE TOWARD NONE WITH CHARITY FOR ALL

LINCOLN AND THE JEWS

A HISTORY

JONATHAN D. SARNA AND BENJAMIN SHAPELL

Begin Reading

Table of Contents

About the Authors

Copyright Page

Thank you for buying this
Thomas Dunne Books ebook.

To receive special offers, bonus content,
and info on new releases and other great reads,
sign up for our newsletters.

Sign Up

Or visit us online at us.macmillan.com/newslettersignup

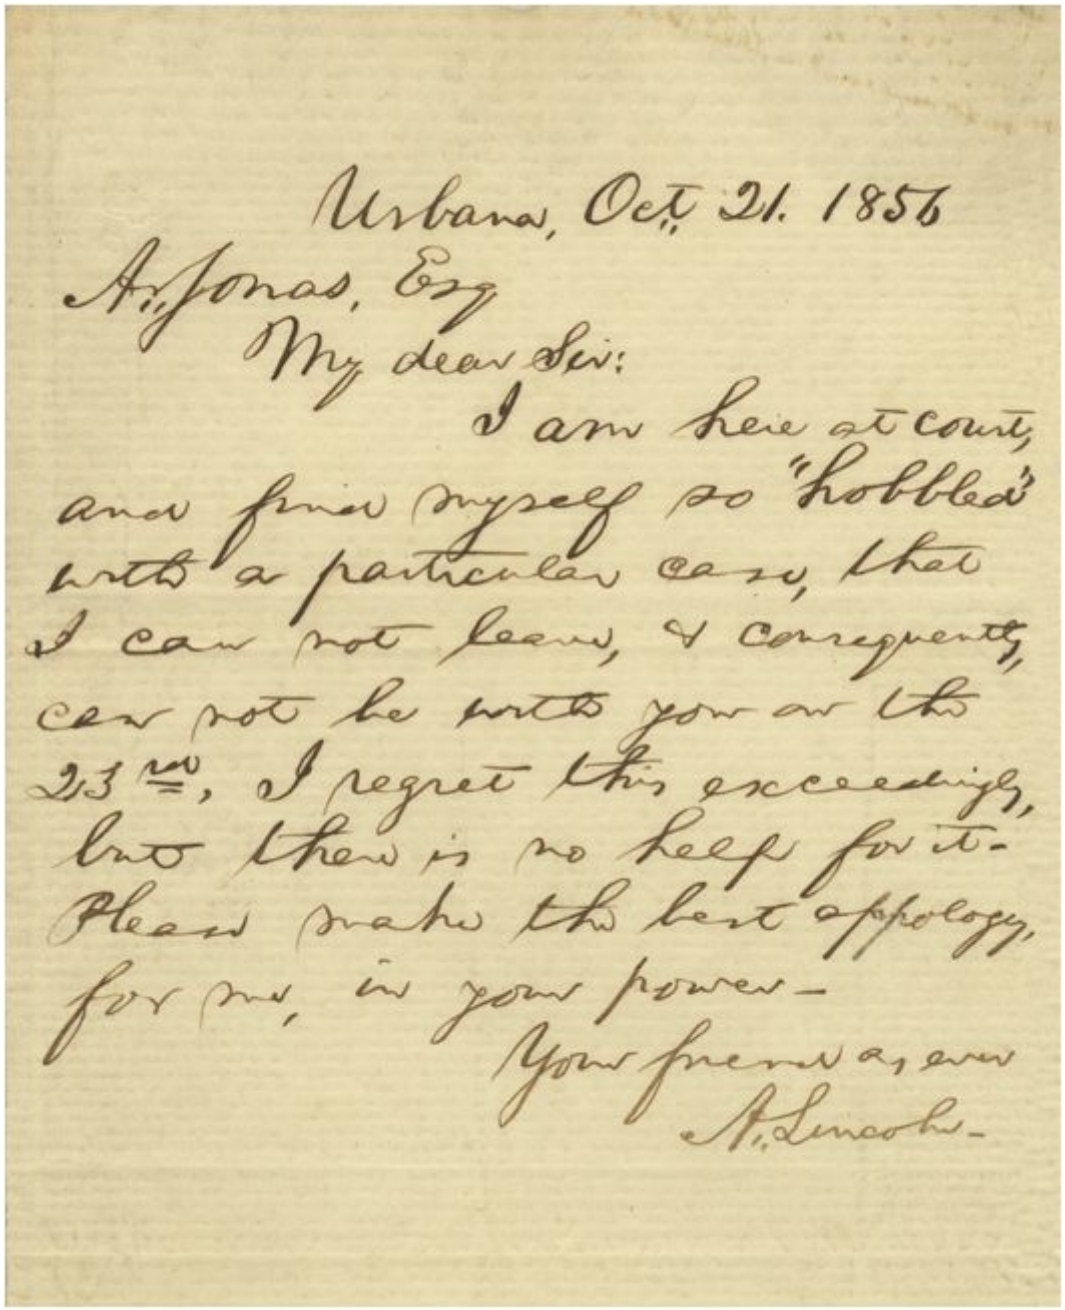
For email updates on the author, click here.

The author and publisher have provided this e-book to you for your personal use only. You may not make this e-book publicly available in any way. Copyright infringement is against the law. If you believe the copy of this e-book you are reading infringes on the author's copyright, please notify the publisher at: us.macmillanusa.com/piracy.

To my wonderful parents, David and Fela Shapell, who made this book possible.

Benjamin Shapell



Urbana, Oct. 21. 1856

A. Jonas, Esq

My dear Sir:

I am here at court, and find myself so "hobbled" with a particular case, that I can not leave, & consequently, can not be with you on the 23rd, I regret this exceedingly, but there is no help for it. Please make the best apology, for me, in your power—

Your friend as ever

A. Lincoln—

ABRAHAM LINCOLN TO ABRAHAM JONAS, OCTOBER 21, 1856

(see here).

FOREWORD

In the field of manuscript collecting, documents are traditionally prized for statements of grand historical fact. While I deeply appreciate those historic letters, I have always, however, been fascinated by the "other" letters of U.S. presidents; letters with an interesting turn of phrase; letters that express humanity, compassion, modesty, fragility, and irony. Letters one seldom comes across or reads about, such as presidents referring to the White House as a prison, or excoriating other presidents, or lamenting their failure to get reelected, or one, Benjamin Harrison, anxiously looking forward to "my discharge" and getting "out of this House." And then, too, there are ironically prophetic letters, such as President-elect James Garfield, writing, "Assassination can no more be guarded against than death by lightning." He would die at the hands of an assassin after only six months in office.

But in the thirty-five years I have been collecting, it is Lincoln, more than anyone else, who has most intently absorbed my interest. He was a self-made man, unschooled but not uneducated, who, with determination, persistence, and firmness of purpose, demonstrated that anyone could rise to, meet, and overcome the challenges of life. Despite the war's heavy toll on him and the country for four long years, the presidency to Lincoln was, as historian Stefen Lorant once wrote, a "glorious burden." Lincoln loved the presidency, finding humor where he could amid military and personal setbacks.

In reading through Lincoln's vast canon of collected writings, I find myself using the same word—fascinating—over and over again. His letters and writings are interwoven with jewels, full of wisdom, poetic flair, and marvelous turns of phrase. And while some of these letters are more recognizable than others—the first and second inaugurals, the Gettysburg Address, or his letter to Grace Bedell about growing a beard, it is still those "other" letters—the ones most Americans do not know about—that truly impress me. "'And this too shall pass away'—Never fear," Lincoln writes to comfort his campaign manager after losing his 1858 Senate race against Stephen A. Douglas. Or, on the eve of his assured election to the presidency, humbly expressing, "I am not a man of great knowledge or learning." Later, Lincoln, sticking to his principles, uses a coarse but effective phrase: "Broken eggs can not be mended. I have issued the Emancipation Proclamation and can not retract it."

Many of Lincoln's finest words were reserved for the generals who consistently disappointed him: to Major General George Meade, for allowing Robert E. Lee's defeated army to escape from Gettysburg ("I do not believe you appreciate the magnitude of the misfortune involved in Lee's escape. He was within your easy grasp, and to have closed upon him would, in collection with our other late successes, have ended the war"); about General of the Army of the Potomac George McClellan's slowness to engage the enemy ("If General McClellan does not want to use the army, I would like to borrow it for a time"). But in "other" letters to lesser-known generals, an even more complex relationship emerges between the commander in chief and his highest-serving men. Lincoln, regretting the pain he has caused a general by dismissing him, writes: "I bear you no ill will; and I regret that I could not have the example without wounding you personally." Or, in a poetic outburst to General Robert Milroy: "I would be glad to see Gen. Milroy were it not that I know he wishes to ask for what I have not to give."

Robert Louis Stevenson said: "To be wholly devoted to some intellectual exercise is to have succeeded in life." Collecting for me is the passion that constantly infuses my thoughts. It is the tireless, daily adventure of constructing something piece by piece, of drawing strength from history; it is the focus on building something unique and complementary and anchored to themes. I have been privileged to have acquired over the years—and include in this volume—some truly remarkable examples from Lincoln's pen, many formerly held in some of the greatest private collections ever assembled, including those of Oliver Barrett, Phillip Sang, and Malcolm Forbes, as well as new and great discoveries that have emerged from hidden estates or obscure auctions far beyond the beaten path, where their importance was often overlooked.

It is, in fact, those "overlooked" letters that have formed the genesis of a particular thread in my collection of "other" Lincoln documents: the barely known relationship between Lincoln and the Jews. One day, thirty years ago, I discovered something amazing: Lincoln knew Jews. Despite the minuscule number of Jews who lived in the "Western frontier," as Illinois was then considered, Lincoln still managed to run into Jews and they into him.

I first discovered the Lincoln-and-Jews relationship in an auction catalog when I acquired the "hobbled" letter (chapter 2), where Lincoln revealingly expresses his frustration, and no doubt embarrassment—at having to defend a wayward nephew accused of thievery. The recipient of the letter was one Abraham Jonas, who, I would come to learn, was a lifelong Jewish friend who supported, campaigned for, and helped engineer Lincoln's successful run for the presidency. It is the only known letter from Lincoln to Jonas in private hands, and a great favorite of mine.

As I came across letter after letter in which Lincoln expresses humility, biblical imagery, compassion, and respect for a people and a religion, I was transformed as a collector. Lincoln never wrote, "You are one of my most valued friends" to anyone, except to his friend and confidant Abe Jonas. And when the latter lay dying in 1864, it was Lincoln who immediately took pen to paper and ordered Jonas's son, Charles, a Confederate officer and prisoner of war, paroled for three weeks "to visit his dying father."

I am fortunate to include many examples of Lincoln and the Jews in my collection, most of which are included in this book. In my research over the years, I have found dozens more, housed in major public institutions, and all revealing the inescapable truth of the depth and breadth of this relationship and Lincoln's interest in the causes important to Jews. It was not during the war that Lincoln met and interacted with Jews for the first time but rather as a young man in Illinois, thirty years before. And over the course of his tragically foreshortened life, as this book shows, he represented Jews, befriended Jews, admired Jews, commissioned Jews, defended Jews, pardoned Jews, consulted with Jews, and extended rights to Jews. His relationships with Jews were not exploitative but warm and genuine, and went further and deeper than those of any previous American president.

We meet Issachar Zacharie, Lincoln's foot doctor, for whom Lincoln wrote three testimonials attesting to Zacharie's skill; amazingly, two of the handwritten cards were written during Lincoln's most historic week as president—the week he issued the preliminary Emancipation Proclamation—and one on the actual day itself, September 22, 1862. Lincoln almost always found time for Zacharie, who, the New York World wrote, “enjoyed Mr. Lincoln’s confidence more than any other private individual” and even sent him on peace missions to the South during the war.

It was Lincoln who, for the first time, appointed Jewish military chaplains to serve the thousands of Jewish soldiers fighting for the Union, attended Jewish-themed plays, some multiple times, and, in the midst of his greatest trial, the secession of the Southern states, found parallels in the Old Testament with a line from Daniel, referring to the “troub’lous times” as Civil War loomed and the lions that were also surrounding him.

When Jews faced their own troublous times during the war, Lincoln acted with characteristic tolerance and inclusion. With anti-Semitism swirling through the military and the War Department, Lincoln did not flinch, whether in reversing an edict by his most successful general—Grant’s General Orders No. 11—or deflecting offensive and odious comments from other generals, including the immensely successful William Tecumseh Sherman. Through all this, Lincoln was the Jews’ most stalwart protector. In that respect, interestingly enough, he very much resembled Harry Truman, as both presidents desperately tried to find an end to a terrible war while at the same time trying to give the Jews, as Lincoln famously said, a “leg up” when it came to returning to their Promised Land. Perhaps it is not a coincidence, then, that both men had close Jewish friendships starting at a young age.

With more than 16,000 Abraham Lincoln books published and with hundreds more appearing every year, the question is constantly asked by historians: Is there anything new to say about Lincoln? This book is my obvious answer, being only the third or fourth work of its kind in over a hundred years. The subject of Lincoln and the Jews is still unknown to most. In 1961, a major exhibition in New York on Jews during the Civil War, including Lincoln’s relationships with Jews, opened to mark the occasion of the hundredth anniversary of the beginning of the war. Now, on the occasion of the hundred and fiftieth anniversary marking the end of the war and Lincoln’s assassination, this book reveals fresh discoveries and revelations of Lincoln’s profound and unusual relationship with Jews to a new generation of readers. So I take the liberty of borrowing a single line from a letter Lincoln wrote in response to a compliment on his second inaugural speech which best expresses my inspiration for this project: “it is a truth which I thought needed to be told.”

In order to illustrate the full depth of the story of Lincoln and the Jews—when Lincoln first learned about Jews, respected them as individuals and considered them, as a group, entitled to full equality—we have chosen to introduce, by visual evidence, high-quality images of the documents, letters, photographs, lithographs, ephemera, and artifacts that catch the eye, enhance the story, and capture history, something never before accomplished for this subject.

On the last day of his life, Lincoln, according to his wife Mary's later recollections, turned his thoughts to Jerusalem, telling her, ironically, of his wish to see Jerusalem before he died. As a young man, Lincoln had seen the moral failings and indignations of slavery but now wondered, with right seemingly on the side of the North, why the bloody Civil War had lasted four long years. "Both read the same Bible, both pray to the same God," he intoned in his second inaugural, and yet, both the North and South had tolerated the institution and its cruelties for years before the war. In the end, Lincoln had no answers for the suffering and God's hidden purposes, yielding to a half verse from Psalms (part of the Jewish Shabbat liturgy), "The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether," which immediately precedes his more famous conclusion "With malice toward none, with charity for all." Perhaps Lincoln thought the answers could be found in Jerusalem, where God dwells, as do his "righteous judgments." Sadly, he would never find out.

Benjamin Shapell

INTRODUCTION

In central Jerusalem, close by streets named for the medieval Jewish luminary Moses Maimonides and the modern Hebrew writer Peretz Smolenskin, and abutting the American consulate, lies a crooked street named for Abraham Lincoln. When questioned about what he did for the Jewish people to merit a street named for him in Jerusalem, even those Jerusalemites familiar with Lincoln's biography shake their heads and shrug.

Lincoln and the Jews provides the first full-scale answer to that question, based on newly discovered documents and years of painstaking research. It shows that Lincoln consorted with a wide range of Jewish friends and acquaintances, some of whom, like Abraham Jonas and Issachar Zacharie, he came to know well. It is impossible to point to any previous American president about whom like claims might have been pressed.

The fact that Abraham Lincoln was intimately acquainted with Jews mattered. Robert Putnam, a political scientist at Harvard, observes that "having a religiously diverse social network leads to a more positive assessment of specific religious groups, particularly those with low thermometer scores." "When birds of different feathers flock together," he concludes, "they come to trust one another."[1] Precisely because Lincoln, for fully half his life, had Jewish friends and acquaintances, he repeatedly intervened on Jews' behalf—most famously in 1862, when he overturned Ulysses S. Grant's order expelling "Jews as a class" from his war zone. "I do not like to hear a class or nationality condemned on account of a few sinners," Lincoln explained.[2] Experience had taught him to trust Jews, even when those around him displayed ugly prejudices against them.

Lincoln's life coincided with the emergence of Jews on the national scene. When he was born, in 1809, scarcely 3,000 Jews lived in the entire United States, most of them concentrated in half a dozen East Coast port cities. Growing up in Kentucky and Indiana, he probably encountered no living Jews; the only Jews he knew at that time were in the Bible. By the time of his assassination in 1865, by contrast, large-scale immigration, principally from central Europe, had brought the Jewish population of the United States up to more than 150,000. Jews, by then, had spread from coast to coast, and Lincoln encountered them frequently; many other Americans did, too.[3]

Lincoln's interactions with Jews thus form part of a much larger history. It is, in microcosm, the story of how America as a whole began to come to terms with its growing Jewish population and how Americans and Jews were both changed by that encounter. Lincoln, we shall see, was personally broadened by his encounters with Jews and also worked to broaden America so that Jews might gain greater acceptance as equals nationwide. Thanks to his personal intervention, for example, the military chaplaincy was widened to embrace non-Christians. He himself appointed the first Jewish chaplains to the armed forces, and he placed many other Jews into positions of authority as well. Remarkably, he justified one such appointment with the statement, "We have not yet appointed a Hebrew,"[4] a sign that he had made the inclusion of Jews a priority.

Lincoln also subtly changed his personal rhetoric in response to Jewish sensitivities. Early on, and as late as 1862, he reflexively described America in Christian terms and characterized Americans as a "Christian people."[5] Later in his presidency, however, he increasingly took note of the presence of non-Christians in the United States. His Gettysburg Address and deeply religious second inaugural bespoke a conscious effort to redefine America through phrases like "this nation under God" that embraced Jews and other non-Christians as insiders.

Lincoln's willingness to embrace Jewish Americans as insiders paralleled his far better known efforts to abolish slavery and grant legal equality to black Americans. In the mid-nineteenth-century, persecution of Jews and persecution of blacks were frequently linked in the popular mind. A Canadian religious enthusiast named Henry Wentworth Monk, for example, specifically urged Lincoln to "follow the emancipation of the Negro by a still more urgent step—the emancipation of the Jew."[6] Sir Moses Montefiore of England similarly linked Lincoln's efforts to liberate slaves to his own efforts to liberate Jews from oppression. Two plays in Washington that the Lincolns are known to have attended, Gamea and Leah, likewise employed the theme of anti-Jewish persecution in ways that contemporaries considered highly relevant to the situation of blacks. To Lincoln, the connection between eradicating the persecution of blacks and ending the persecution of Jews must have seemed obvious. Underlying both, to his mind, was a common philosophy: a passionate belief that "all men are created equal."

Lincoln's interactions with Jews, we shall see, developed and changed over the course of his lifetime. That is why this book, unlike any previous study of Lincoln and the Jews, proceeds chronologically. Chapter 1 examines Lincoln's upbringing, his church's uncompromising opposition to missionizing Jews, and some of what he learned about Jews from the Bible, schoolbooks, and current events. Chapters 2 and 3 trace his earliest Jewish friends and acquaintances in Illinois, particularly his close and important relationship with Abraham Jonas, and recount the role Jews played in advancing Lincoln to the White House. Chapters 4 to 7 detail Lincoln's interactions with Jews during his presidency, beginning with a controversy over his first inaugural address and continuing with episodes such as his leadership in the battle to open the chaplaincy up to non-Christians, the countermanding of Ulysses S. Grant's General Orders No. 11, and other lesser-known episodes that reveal much about his character. For the first time, this book recounts in full the mysterious story of Lincoln's chiropodist, Issachar Zacharie, and the grisly story of Beverly Ford, where General George Meade ordered a Jew, two Catholics, and two Protestants shot for desertion while a rabbi, priest, and minister looked on. Chapter 7 concludes with the memorable Passover of 1865, which began joyfully amid news of General Lee's surrender at Appomattox Court House and ended tragically following Lincoln's assassination by John Wilkes Booth. Finally, the epilogue traces Jewish involvement in Lincoln's funeral and in the subsequent memorialization of Lincoln continuing down to contemporary times.

As part of her memorialization, Mary Lincoln recounted in 1866 that her husband had hoped to visit Palestine after his second term as president came to an end. The introduction of steamships, which made long-distance travel safer and more pleasurable, inspired many Americans of that time to make the trip. Herman Melville and Mark Twain published celebrated books based on their travels to the Holy Land, and Civil War figures like Ulysses S. Grant and William Seward toured there as well. Lincoln, had he lived, could easily have joined them.[7]

Perhaps the naming of a Jerusalem street in Lincoln's memory aimed to compensate for this thwarted presidential desire to visit Palestine. If so, that would have been highly appropriate. But Lincoln Street also memorializes the fact that so many American Jews considered Abraham Lincoln to be their friend. As this book demonstrates, he promoted the inclusion of Jews into the fabric of American life and helped to transform Jews from outsiders in America to insiders.

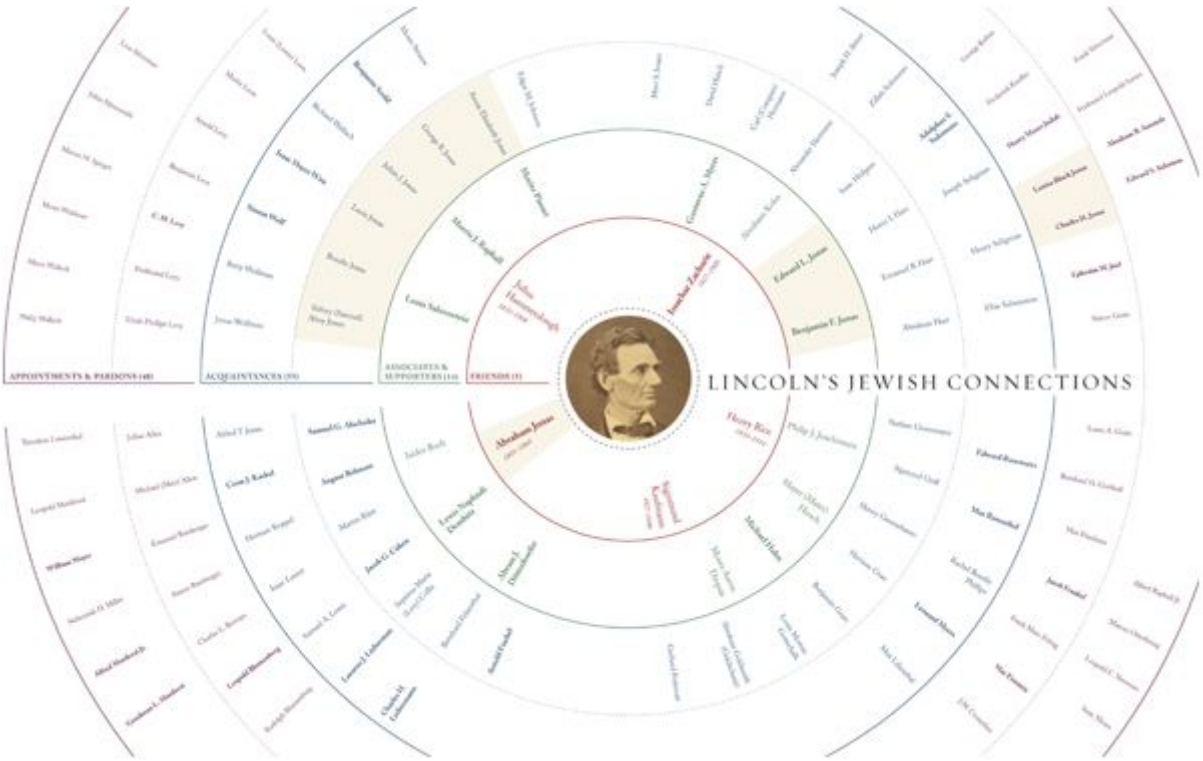
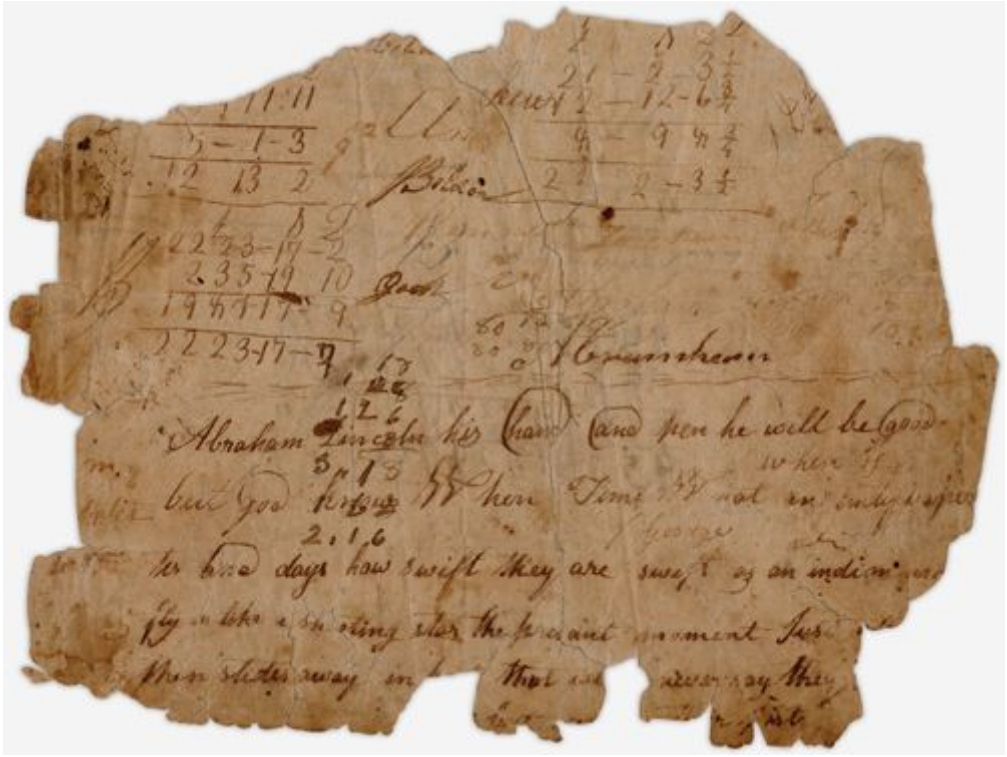
Jonathan D. Sarna



LINCOLN'S JEWISH CONNECTIONS



A RARE PAGE OF LINCOLN'S CHILDHOOD "SUM BOOK," LATE 1825

His education, Lincoln said, was deficient: it lasted, formally, but a year. At sixteen years old, Lincoln created a personal notebook, known then as a sum book. Here, amid arithmetical calculations, he also writes a piece of doggerel, daydreaming about his future: "Abraham Lincoln his hand and pen he will be good but God knows When."

Shapell Legacy Partnership

CHAPTER ONE

THE PROMISED LAND … WHOSE STONES ARE IRON AND OUT OF WHOSE HILLS THOU MAYEST DIG BRASS

1809–1830

In all likelihood, Abraham Lincoln never met a Jew while he was growing up. No Jews lived in Hardin County, Kentucky, where he was born in 1809. Nor is there any record of a Jew living in the wilds of Spencer County, Indiana, where the Lincolns moved in late 1816. The entire Jewish population of the United States at that time did not exceed 3,000, with the vast majority of those Jews living in a small number of East Coast port cities.[1]

A few intrepid Jews, to be sure, had cast their eyes to the west. By 1812, Simon and Hyman Gratz owned Mammoth Cave in Kentucky, just fifty miles from where Lincoln was born. In 1819 Benjamin Gratz settled in Lexington, Kentucky. Samuel Judah, the first Jewish graduate of Rutgers and a respected attorney, moved to Vincennes, Indiana, at about that same time and became active politically. Within a few years, Cincinnati, Ohio, would become the fastest-growing Jewish community in the United States. But no Jewish community or formal Jewish organization existed anywhere in Kentucky or Indiana while the Lincolns lived there, and the family's poverty and isolation probably discouraged any wayfaring Jewish peddlers from stopping at their door. It is most likely, therefore, that Abraham Lincoln only heard stories about Jews during his first two decades of life.[2]

The first Jews that Abraham Lincoln undoubtedly heard about were found in the Bible. He took pride in his own biblical name, Abraham, recalling the biblical progenitor of the Jewish people as well as his paternal grandfather, Abraham, who had been brutally murdered by Indian raiders.[3] His uncle, Mordecai, likewise bore an illustrious name from the Bible. Lincoln, as a youth, also became familiar with the biblical figures of Moses and Job, whose life stories in some ways paralleled his own. Indeed, "Father Abraham," as his countrymen would come to call him, may well have been America's most biblically literate president. Throughout his life, he regularly quoted from the Bible in letters, talks to juries, political speeches, and even in day-to-day conversation. He lauded the Bible as "the best gift God has given to man."[4] Like his Puritan ancestors (and unlike Catholics of his time), he considered the Hebrew Bible an equal partner with the New Testament. He quoted, and referenced, the Old Testament about a third more times than he did the New; and in referencing the Deity some 420-plus times, used the phrase "Savior" but six. Likewise, according to the The Collected Works of Abraham Lincoln, he mentioned Christ directly only once—"when Christ suffered on the cross—when Moses led Israel through the Red-Sea—nay, even, when Adam first came from the hand of his Maker—then as now, Niagara was roaring here…" He never referred directly to Jesus.[5]

Lincoln's parents, Thomas and Nancy, like many Old School Calvinists, considered the Bible inerrant and infallible, the source of Divine Truth. "We believe the Old & New Testaments are the words of God," the constitution of his parents' Pigeon Creek Baptist Church declared. The Bible, their church taught, contained everything "necessary for man's salvation" and supplied all that was required for "faith and practice."[6] In Lincoln's home, as in so many others of his day, life was lived by the "Bible alone."[7]

The Bible was also part of Lincoln's more extended patrimony. His earliest American ancestor, Samuel Lincoln, born in 1622 in the village of Hingham, seventeen miles from Norwich, in East England, sided with the Puritan vicars of his village against the Church of England, and like so many others of his time, crossed the ocean in search of greater independence, congregational autonomy, and economic opportunity. Hingham, Massachusetts, where he built his new home (its name serving as a bridge between his old home and his new one), was a Puritan community deeply influenced by the teachings of John Calvin. Its citizens, like those of Boston, felt especially elected by God. They viewed themselves as part of God's new Israel, characterized by devotion to Scripture ("about as close to literal Biblicism," the Puritan scholar Perry Miller once wrote, "as one can come"[8]), rugged individualism, and a religious commitment to hard work and manual labor. They were fascinated by Jews, and many in the town bore names from the Hebrew Bible. This was especially true of the Lincolns in Hingham, whose names included Abner Lincoln, Abraham Lincoln, Amos Lincoln, Benjamin Lincoln, Enoch Lincoln, Isaac Lincoln, Jeremiah Lincoln, Josiah Lincoln, Levi Lincoln, Mordecai Lincoln, Perez Lincoln, Samuel Lincoln, and Solomon Lincoln.[9]

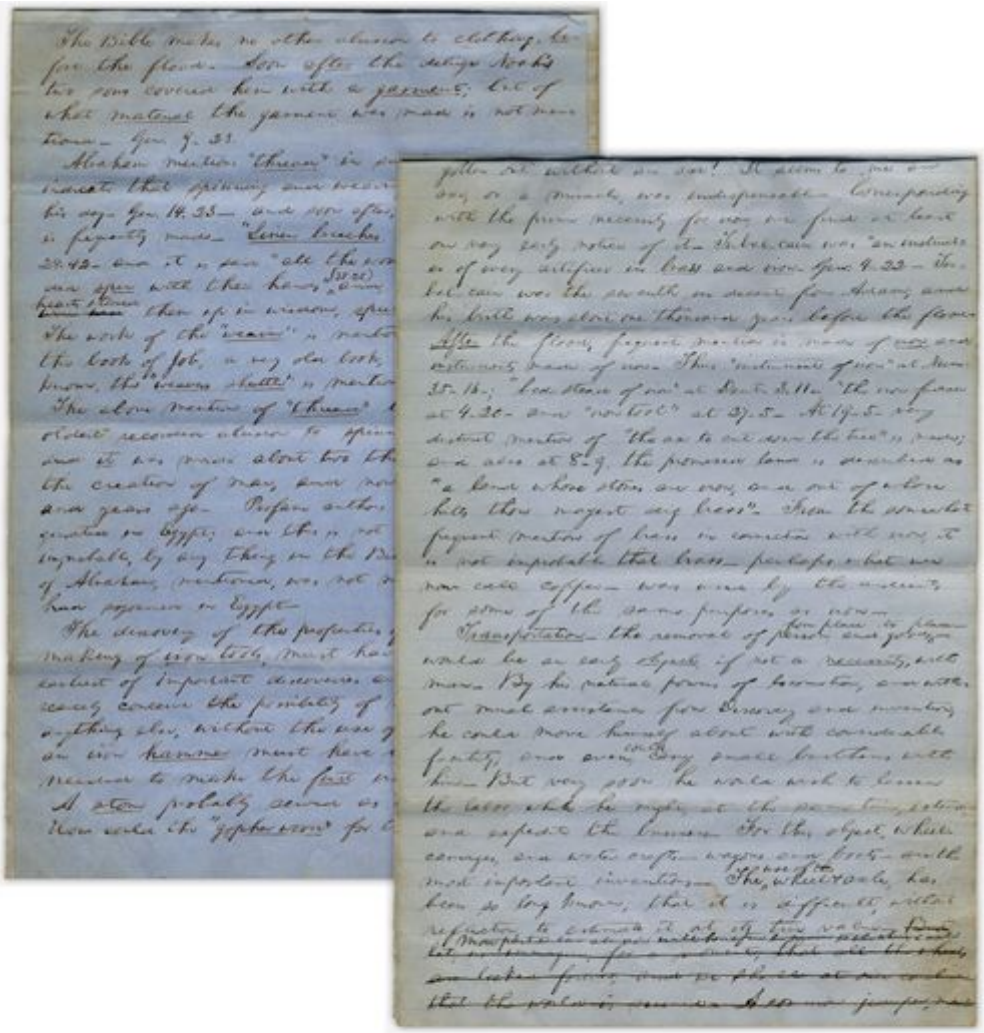
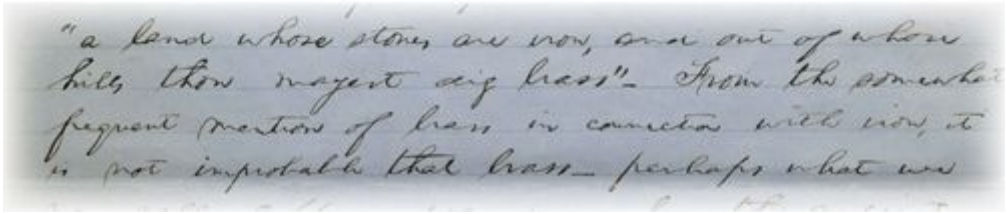
Growing up in Kentucky and Indiana, Abraham Lincoln knew next to nothing about his Hingham ancestors, but his world, like theirs, was suffused with the Bible. In fact, he learned the English of the King James Bible long before he could read its words for himself. He recalled listening to his mother as she recited Psalms while she worked. He heard the words of Scripture preached in church and was drilled, as all good children were, in the Ten Commandments.[10]

Actual copies of the Bible were expensive and scarce in the frontier regions of Kentucky and Indiana when Lincoln was a boy. Whether his parents owned one at that time is uncertain. In any case, his father and many of the Lincolns' neighbors were functionally illiterate. So an oral culture prevailed. Churches encouraged the repetition of Scripture word for word following the preacher. Storytelling, in which Thomas and later Abraham Lincoln excelled, consumed a good deal of leisure time. Schools—known as "blab schools"—required students to repeat their lessons aloud, relying heavily upon memory and rote learning. The goal of preachers and teachers was to train the memory, to instill it with lessons for life; Abraham Lincoln's own life was shaped by those lessons.





"a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass"- From the somewhat frequent mention of brass in connection with iron, it is not improbable that brass- perhaps what was

FIRST LECTURE ON DISCOVERIES AND INVENTIONS

The three most important advances in human development, Lincoln said in a nine-page lecture first delivered early in 1858—and repeated, with small revisions, four times over the next year—were writing, printing, and the discovery of America. What most impresses is that while delivered at the invitation of Christian groups, the lecture evidences that the basis of Lincoln's thinking on the world's most important discoveries and inventions was overwhelmingly rooted in the Old Testament; the New Testament is mentioned a scant twice. With commanding ease, Lincoln refers to Old Testament characters and events—including Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Jerusalem—nearly fifty times and spans four out of what he called "the five books of Moses." On describing God's hidden gifts in "the promised land," Lincoln invokes a passage from Deuteronomy: "a land whose stones are iron and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass."

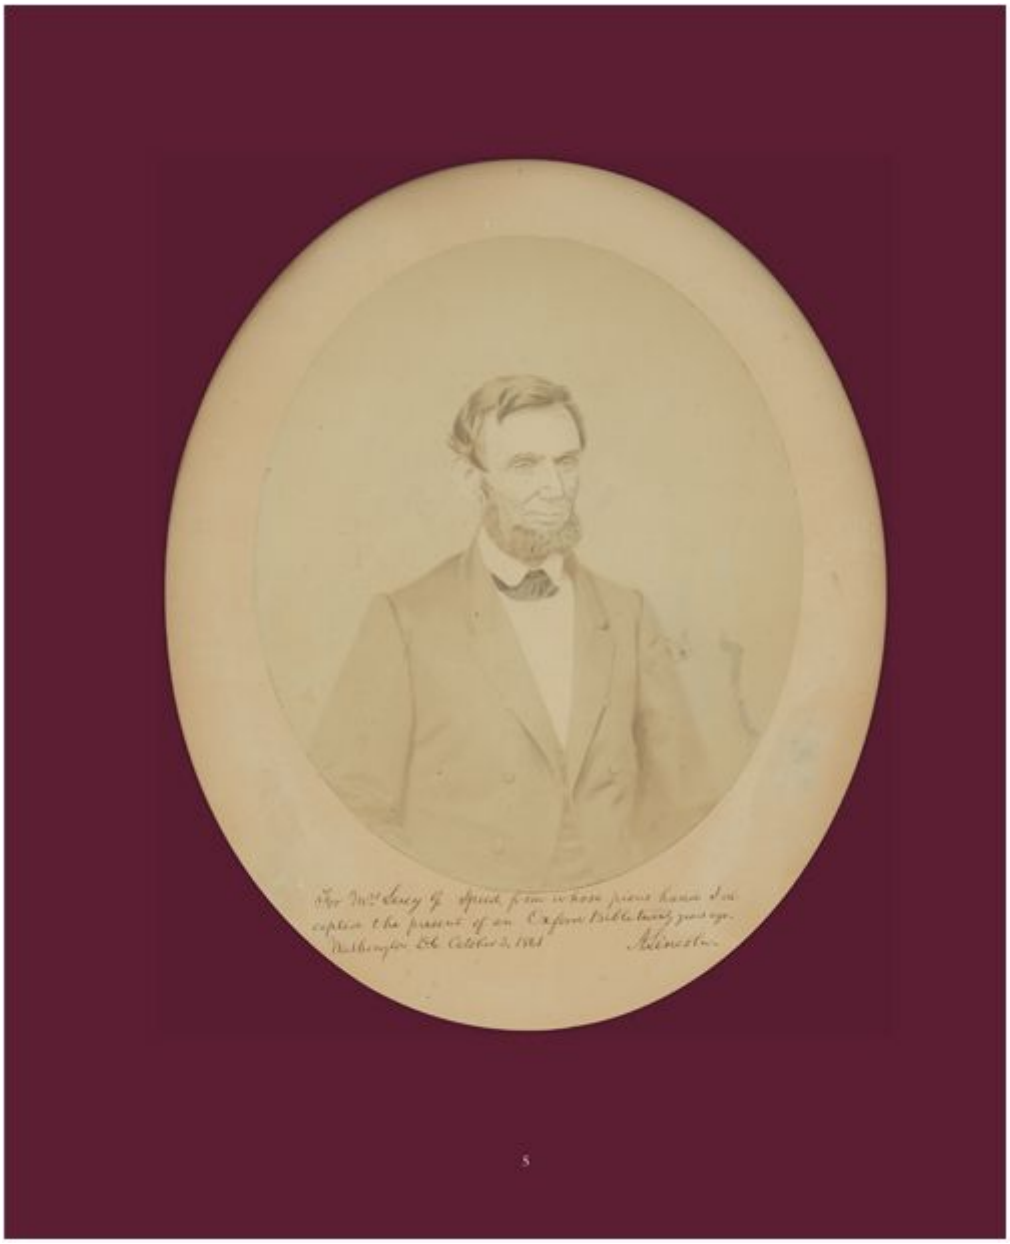
Meisei University, Tokyo

Lincoln was also deeply influenced by the schoolbooks that he read and studied as a youngster. Precisely because they were few in number and he read them aloud to himself, those books became deeply imprinted upon his memory. One of them, which he is said to have described as "the best schoolbook ever put into the hands of an American youth,"[11] was Lindley Murray's The English Reader (1799). Written by a Pennsylvania Quaker who settled in England, it included well-chosen selections of prose and poetry, many by Scottish Enlightenment writers, and was designed to train students in reading as well as in "some of the most important principles of piety and virtue." A selection that summarized the biblical Book of Esther, for example, described Haman ("a very wicked minister") as "an Amalekite, who inherited all the ancient enmity of his race to the Jewish nation." It contrasted him with "Mordecai the Jew" who, "with virtuous indignation," refused to pay Haman homage. Haman's passions, the text explained, were "so violent and black … that he resolved to exterminate the whole nation to which Mordecai belonged." Fortunately, the "conspicuous justice of God" resulted in Haman's "fall and punishment."[12]

The positive estimation of the Jews found in this selection, especially as contrasted with the fate meted out to Haman, reflected the tone of the volume as a whole. Even as it trumpeted Christianity and the New Testament, The English Reader also promoted the virtues of religion in general, as well as values like gratitude, integrity, and gentleness to which all could aspire. It praised the beauties of the Psalms ("delivered out as services for Israelites under the Law, yet no less adapted to the circumstances of Christians under the Gospel") and raised up as an example the "clemency and amiable character" of Joseph in the Book of Genesis. It expressed "indignant sentiments" against slavery ("human nature's broadest, foulest blot") and preached "the duty of forgiveness." The absence of overt anti-Jewish sentiments here—in contrast, for example, to those found in William McGuffey's Eclectic Third Reader (1837)—may have influenced Lincoln's later attitude toward the Jews. The values he gleaned from Lindley Murray's English Reader became ones that, as president, he would internalize and espouse.[13]

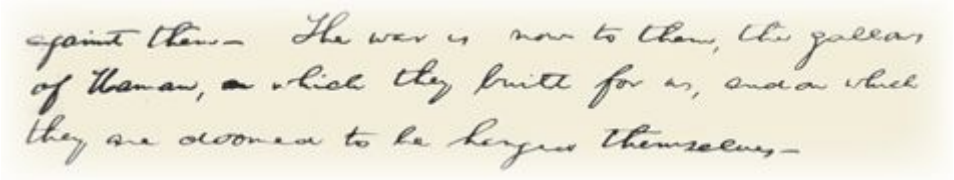
As for living, breathing Jews, what most distinguished Abraham Lincoln's upbringing from that of most other Americans of his day was that his parents and members of their church evinced no interest whatsoever in converting Jews to Christianity (or, for that matter, in bringing the gospel to the unchurched anywhere).

Instead, they fatalistically believed in predestination, in "election by grace given us … before the world began."[14] While America as a whole blazed with religious awakenings and witnessed the creation of countless benevolent organizations that encouraged missions and conversions to promote "truth and righteousness," the Calvinist Baptist church to which Lincoln's parents belonged disdained such movements and considered them utterly futile. One "not elected from the foundation of the world," these so-called Primitive Baptists believed, "was as changeless and as hopeless as if he were already in the bottomless pit."[15]



"FOR MRS. LUCY G. SPEED, FROM WHOSE PIOUS HAND I ACCEPTED THE PRESENT OF AN OXFORD BIBLE TWENTY YEARS AGO."

In 1841, a young and depressive Lincoln had been counseled by Lucy Speed, mother of his best friend Joshua, about the healing effects of the Bible—and faith. Remembering her advice to him twenty years later and now one month into his first term as president, Lincoln, for the only known time in his life, personally inscribes a photograph, here with a twenty-word note of gratitude to Lucy.
Shapell Manuscript Collection



"THE [MEXICAN] WAR IS NOW TO THEM, THE GALLOWS OF HAMAN," JUNE 12, 1848

A line showing Lincoln's familiarity with a portion of Judaic literature less known to most Christians; here Lincoln uses the metaphor of Haman hanging on the gallows, the first of two times that Lincoln would do so in his writings.
The Abraham Lincoln Association

The American Society for Evangelizing the Jews, established in 1816 in the very month that the Lincolns settled in Indiana, optimistically believed that Jews could be changed. It called upon Americans to "make every possible and proper exertion … to bring the Jews to the acknowledgement of Jesus Christ of Nazareth as the true Messiah." Reorganized as the American Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews, in 1820, the missionary organization attracted support from the likes of Elias Boudinot, former president of the Continental Congress; John Quincy Adams, a future president of the United States; the heads of Yale, Princeton, and Rutgers universities; and countless other Americans, most of whom had never actually met Jews but worked tirelessly to promote their conversion.[16]

The parents and neighbors of Abraham Lincoln, in contrast, were known as anti-missionary Protestants and complained that missionary societies improperly arrogated to themselves powers that properly lay with God alone. One anti-missionary journal specifically charged that the work of the American Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews was "at variance with the providence of God" and that "nearly all the conversions yet affected through the instrumentality of men have proved only worthless." The fate of everyone, including Jews, had long since been decided by God and was not subject to change, missionary opponents like Lincoln's parents believed.[17]

Abraham Lincoln never joined his parents' church or, for that matter, any church in his lifetime, but the Baptist Calvinist atmosphere that pervaded his adolescence left an indelible mark upon him. The conviction that all was predetermined, that "what is to be, will be, and no prayers of ours can reverse the decree," shaped his worldview.[18] That may be why he never associated himself with those who sought to Christianize the Jews or the Constitution. Skeptical of those who "knew" what God wanted, he preferred to make decisions based upon careful reasoning and then to let destiny play out on its own.[19]

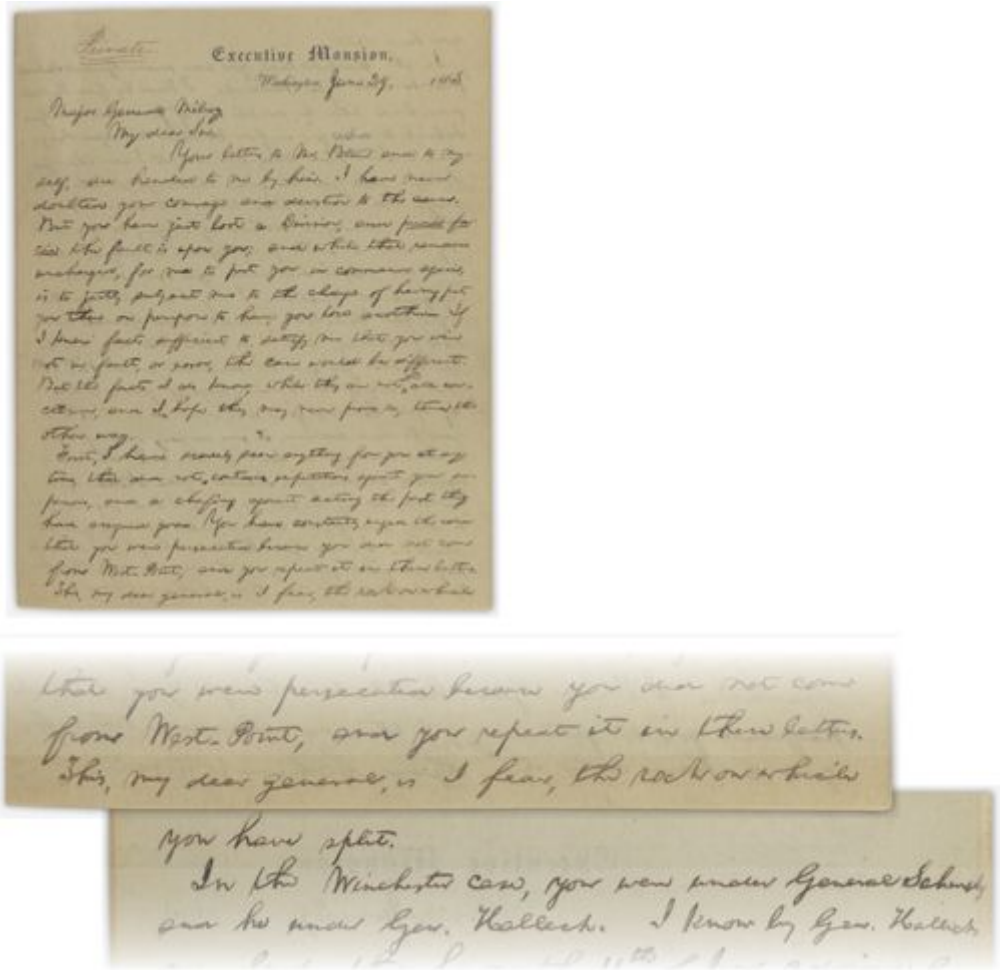
Whether missionized or left alone, Jews knew that negative images of themselves and their faith circulated widely in the United States. Jews, even if few in number, commonly experienced prejudice on the part of their neighbors. The Constitution, of course, guaranteed Jews the free exercise of their faith and legal equality on the federal level. President George Washington, in a celebrated letter in 1790, promised Jews that in America they would not just be tolerated but would enjoy religious liberty as an "inherent natural right." "The Government of the United States," he forcefully declared, "gives to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance."[20] But the people of the United States, many of them raised in places where Jews were hated and distrusted, did not always follow the government's lead.



Executive Mansion,

Washington June 29, 1863

Maj. Gen. Milroy

My dear Sir

Your letter to Mr. Nicolay and to my self, are handed to me by him. I have never doubted your courage and devotion to the cause. But you have just lost a battle, and pushed for this the fault is upon you; and while there remain reasons for me to put you in command again, it is fitting and proper that I should be clear of having put you there on purpose to have you lose another. If I have fault against a battle won, that you were not in fault or poor, the case would be different. But the fault I am hurt with is, that the enemy, after escaping from you, and hiding they know not where, have turned up in the other way.

Now, I have never put anything for you at any time, that was not, unless repelled, yielded to your wishes, even at a sacrifice against my judgment. You have asked, upon the score of your supposed services, that you were persecuted because you are not a West Point graduate, and you repeat it in this letter. This, my dear general, is I fear, the rock on which you have split.

In the Winchester case, you were under General Schenck, and he under Gen. Halleck. I know by Gen. Halleck

LINCOLN TO ROBERT H. MILROY, JUNE 29, 1863

Lincoln, having for months been frustrated by General Milroy's disobedience and battlefield failures, reprimands him here by employing the Old Testament (Numbers 20:11). Referencing when Moses had faulted in his judgment upon hitting the rock in the desert, Lincoln tells Milroy, "This, my dear general, is I fear, the rock on which you have split." Like Moses, Milroy's mistake had thus irreversibly sealed his own fate.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

How much popular anti-Jewish prejudice reached the ears of Abraham Lincoln growing up in Kentucky and Indiana cannot be known, but a rare admission of the general situation facing Jews appeared in a German-American newspaper, The Correspondent, in 1820, when he was eleven years old. "The Jews are not generally regarded with a favorable eye; and 'Jew' is an epithet which is frequently uttered in a tone bordering on contempt," the newspaper reported. "Say what you will, prejudices against the Jews exist here, and subject them to inconveniences from which other citizens of the United States are exempt."[21] In some cases, such prejudices stood in tension with more positive personal experiences with Jews—a dichotomy, as it were, between the "mythical Jew" and the "Jew next door."[22] Still, as non-Christians, Jews regularly were cast as outsiders in America; they stood apart from the mainstream and were deeply suspected.[23] Lincoln, we shall see, would work to change that. By the time of his death, he had done more than any previous president to promote Jews' advance in American society.

The painful position of Jews was illustrated, in 1809, just a few months after Lincoln was born, in North Carolina, when a legislator named Jacob Henry, married to a Christian, was threatened with expulsion from his seat in the House of Commons because, as a Jew, he did not accept the divine authority of the New Testament, as required by the state constitution. In a long, celebrated response, Henry declared that "if a man fulfills the duties of that religion, which his education or his conscience has pointed to him as the true one, no person, I hold, in this our land of liberty, has a right to arraign him at the bar of any inquisition." His colleagues, who liked him, agreed to let him keep his seat after that speech, but they refused to change the test oath that should legally have barred him. That remained on the books until after the Civil War.[24]

In Virginia, Thomas Jefferson, in the early nineteenth century, concluded from his wide readings that Jewish ideas of God and His attributes "were degrading and injurious" and that Jewish ethics "were not only imperfect, but often irreconcilable with the sound dictates of reason and morality." Writing to John Adams in 1813, he decried Jews' "wretched depravity of sentiment and manners"—a widely held view in America of that time. To be sure, he did not generalize from this ugly stereotype to the few Jews whom he knew personally. He saluted his friend Joseph Marx, for example, "with sentiments of perfect esteem and respect." He expressed what Marx described as "liberal and enlightened views" on Jewish affairs. In a remarkable letter to the Jewish leader Mordecai Noah, he even admitted that "the prejudice still scowling on your section of our religion … cannot be unfelt by ourselves." But so far as he was concerned, Jews were still outsiders. Though they remained so into the mid and late nineteenth century, Lincoln would never treat Jews as such, nor would he ever deride them in any of his writings as Jefferson had done in his letter to Adams.[25]

Perhaps the most broadly discussed controversy concerning American Jews while Abraham Lincoln was growing up took place in Maryland, where a community of over one hundred Jews was denied by state law the right to hold any "office of trust or profit" (including serving as lawyers and jurors) because they would not execute a "declaration of belief in the Christian religion." For twenty-eight years, beginning in 1797, efforts were made to change that provision—so at odds with the spirit of the U.S. Constitution[26]—but rural legislators stood fast, fearing the growing power of Baltimore (where most of Maryland's Jews lived). Opponents of the so-called Jew Bill laced their arguments with anti-Jewish rhetoric and derided Jews and their supporters as "enemies of Christianity." Finally, after newspapers and politicians across the country weighed in, a bill permitting Jews to substitute a declaration of belief "in a future state of rewards and punishments" passed, in 1825, by one vote. It became law on January 5, 1826.[27]

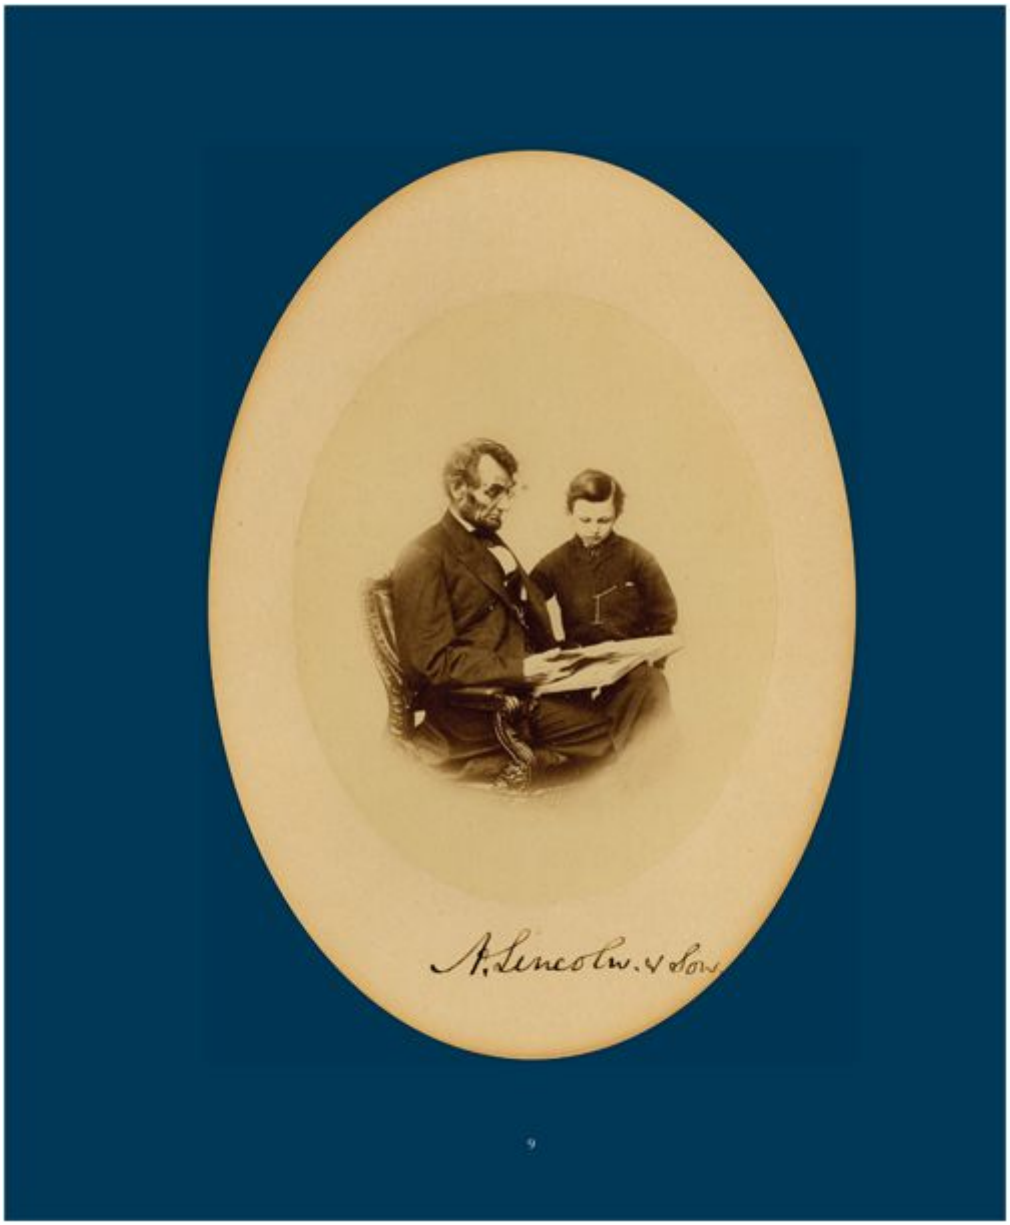
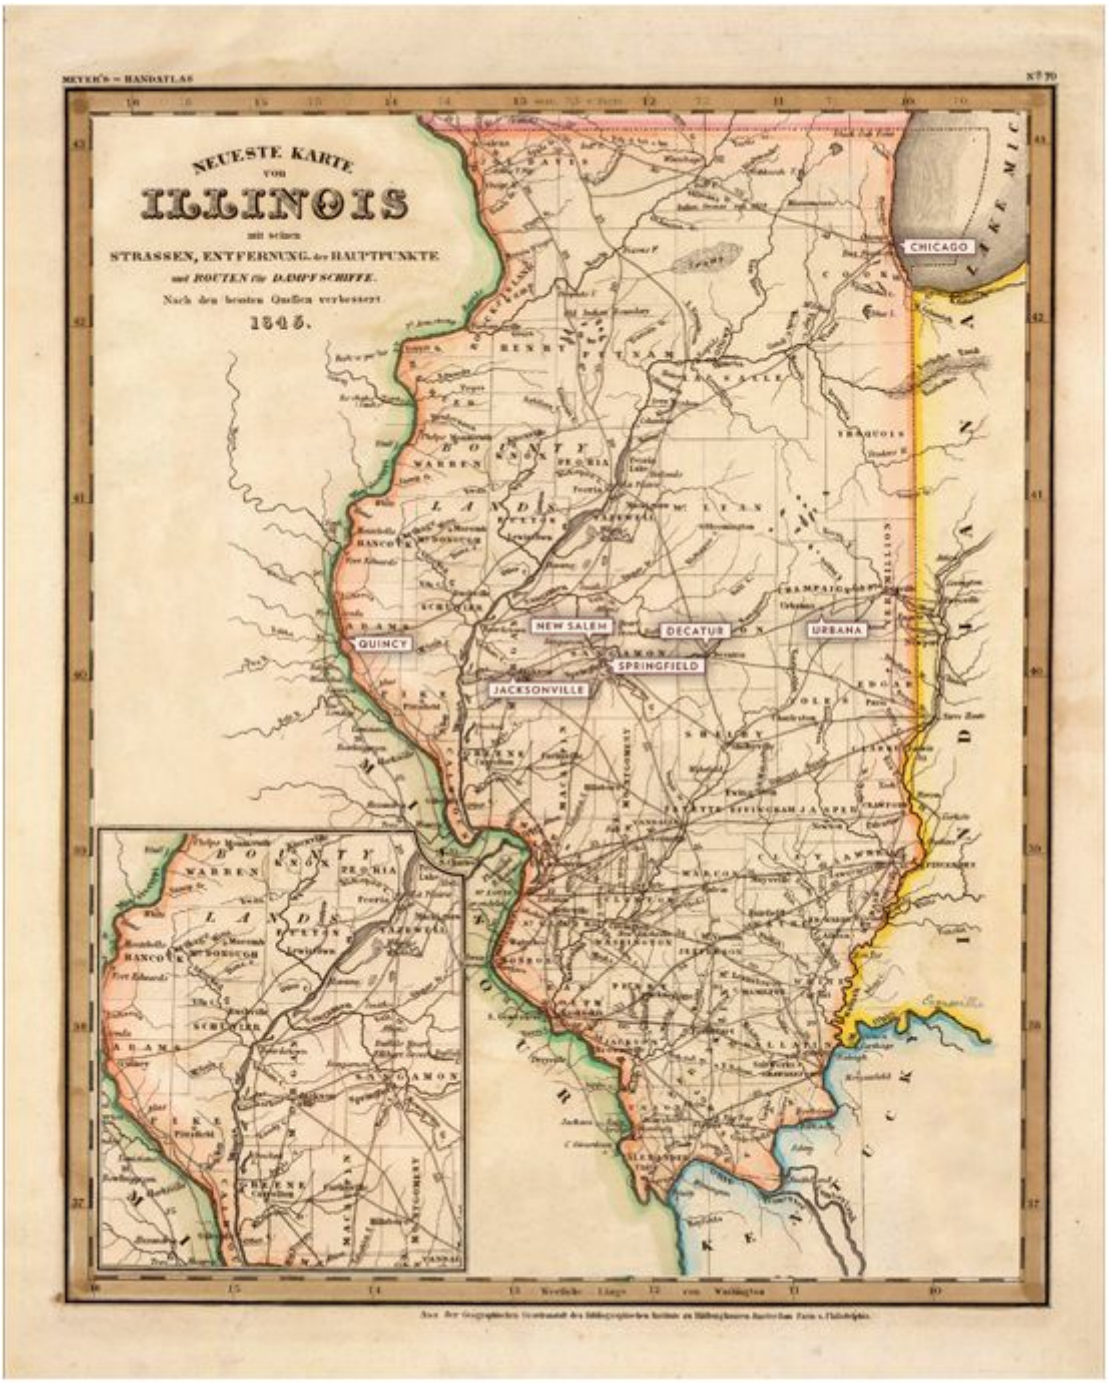
Whether, as a teenager, Abraham Lincoln followed the Maryland Jew Bill controversy or any other episode involving Jews is doubtful but impossible to know for certain. Most likely, his youthful image of the Jew was primarily shaped by what he learned at home, from his parents' church, and from his own reading. Based heavily upon Scripture and hearsay, his understanding of Jews and Judaism lacked the benefit of any real-world experience with the Jewish people. That he would only begin to acquire when he moved to Illinois and met Jews for the first time.



“A. LINCOLN AND SON.” FEBRUARY 9, 1864

One of only two known signed images of this famous photograph—“A. Lincoln and Son.”—has also become a testament to Lincoln’s personal convictions. Journalist Noah Brooks noted, “Lincoln explained to me that he was afraid that this picture was a species of false pretense. Most people, he thought, would suppose the book a large clasped Bible, whereas it was a big photograph album ... Lincoln’s anxiety lest somebody should think he was ‘making believe to read the Bible to Tad,’ was illustrative of his scrupulous honesty.”

Shapell Legacy Partnership



MAP OF ILLINOIS, 1845

The cities of Springfield, New Salem, Jacksonville, Quincy, Decatur, and Urbana were not only stops on Lincoln's legal circuit, but were also the main locations of Lincoln's early interactions with Jews.
David Rumsey Map Collection, with Shapell Manuscript Collection

CHAPTER TWO

AND THIS TOO SHALL PASS AWAY—NEVER FEAR

1830–1858

Jews preceded Abraham Lincoln's parents in seeking their fortune in Illinois. Back in 1773 and 1775, Jewish merchants—among them several members of the Franks family, Bernard and Michael Gratz, Joseph Simon, and Levi Andrew Levi—formed part of a land company that purchased title from "certain chiefs of the Illinois Indians" to substantial portions of southern Illinois and Indiana. They paid what in today's money would be less than one million dollars. After many years of legal wrangling, the U.S. Supreme Court, in a unanimous 1823 decision written by Chief Justice John Marshall, voided the purchasers' title. Private purchases of Indian land were illegal, the Court ruled, for only the government held the right to sell Indian land. The Jewish merchants lost their entire investment.[1]

Thomas Lincoln proved somewhat more fortunate when he arrived in Illinois in 1830. The land that he settled, on the north bank of the Sangamon River, near Decatur, was undeveloped and available. Aided by his son Abraham, now twenty-one years old and free of legal obligations to his parents, he built a log cabin, a smokehouse, and a barn, broke up acres of land for farming, and put up a fence. Henceforward, Illinois would be the Lincolns' home.

Abraham Lincoln soon relocated to the recently established village of New Salem, Illinois, farther west on the bank of the Sangamon River, partly to get away from his difficult father, and partly to strike out on his own as an adult. There he lived and worked. From there he set forth to defend his land against Indian "invaders" by enlisting to fight in the Black Hawk War.

Once he returned, in 1832, he made his first run for public office from New Salem—and lost. Subsequently, he served as postmaster of New Salem, participated in a public debating society, surveyed land, and frequented public meetings. "Every one knew him; and he knew every one," a local politician recalled.[2] As a result, in 1834, when Lincoln ran for public office again, he was elected to the Illinois state legislature. There, in February 1837, he helped to determine that the capital city of Illinois would be relocated from Vandalia to Springfield. Two months later, on April 15, having passed the bar, he left New Salem and moved to Springfield himself. His life would be exactly half over.

MUSTER ROLL OF CAPTAIN ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S BLACK HAWK WAR COMPANY, APRIL 28, 1832

Lincoln later called his 1832 election as captain by his fellow soldiers "a success which gave me more pleasure than any I have had since." But this win laid the groundwork for a loss, as he was still an active candidate for the Illinois State Legislature. When finally mustered out, his horse was stolen, and he had to canoe and walk home—losing valuable campaign time and thus the election.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

Chartered as a city in 1840, Springfield grew rapidly over the next twenty years; its population, which was less than 2,500 when Lincoln came to town, practically quadrupled. Many of the city's newcomers had emigrated from the German states, including a few Jews. By 1858, at least one prominent Jewish business considered Springfield its home: Hammerslough and Brothers Clothing, on the north side of the Public Square.[3]

Julius Hammerslough (1832–1908), who headed the family firm, had immigrated to the United States from Hannover in Lower Saxony, clerked in Baltimore, and, in his twenties, established himself in Springfield. There he became one of Abraham Lincoln's numerous acquaintances; likely, Lincoln purchased clothes in his store. Years later, the New York Times, in an obituary, described Hammerslough as a "warm friend of Abraham Lincoln." The industry paper Men's Wear, after his death, elevated him into one of Lincoln's "closest friends." Isaac Markens, in his seminal 1909 publication, Abraham Lincoln and the Jews, recorded that Hammerslough visited Lincoln "frequently at the White House" and once accompanied Mrs. Lincoln's sister, Elizabeth Edwards, to Washington, and also attended Lincoln's first inauguration.[4]

Hammerslough, who was twenty-three years Lincoln's junior, probably admired Lincoln more than he actually befriended him. Hammerslough and Brothers Clothing prospered during the Civil War, helping to outfit thirty-nine regiments of infantry and nine regiments of cavalry mustered into the Union army and trained at nearby Camp Butler. Subsequently, according to the firm's reports, its military trade "assumed a fabulous dimension," and by 1864 the Hammerslough name was supposedly known "to all the western armies, by each corps, division and by most every soldier." Having prospered, Julius Hammerslough, in 1868, sold his store to his brother-in-law, Samuel Rosenwald (father of the merchant prince Julius Rosenwald of Sears Roebuck fame), and removed to New York. There he became "one of the most prominent clothing manufacturers in the United States, widely known throughout the entire industry." He also founded and headed the Clothiers Association of New York.[5]

Hammerslough, throughout his life, was a proud and engaged Jew. In his twenties, in Baltimore, he served as secretary of Baltimore's Hebrew Assistance Society. In 1865, when Springfield's Jewish community grew large enough to support a synagogue, he became its first president. When funds were sought for a memorial to Lincoln in Springfield, he assumed the role of "special agent" to the "Hebrews" and, as we shall see, requested "their favorable action."[6] According to Markens, who interviewed him, Hammerslough was among those who met the body of the slain president on its return to Springfield.

In interacting with Hammerslough, Abraham Lincoln undoubtedly knew that he was a Jew; everybody in Springfield did. That is why it is so extraordinary that others considered Hammerslough (and he considered himself) to be a friend of Lincoln's. Comparatively few Christians in mid-nineteenth-century America boasted Jewish friends. Fewer than one American in 200, after all, was Jewish. Lincoln, we have seen, had no Jewish friends growing up and mostly knew Jews through the Bible. But once he did meet Jews, he displayed no prejudice whatsoever against them—no religious hatred, no antipathy to them as immigrants, no desire to convert them. To the contrary, the Jews he befriended during his years in Springfield shaped a positive assessment of Jews on his part. He came to know them as neighbors, clients, and political allies. By the time of his death, he had acquired far more Jewish friends and acquaintances than any American president before him.

POSTMASTERS

POSTMASTERS IN LINCOLN'S AMERICA were responsible not only for the transmission of private correspondence but also for the circulation of newspapers, magazines, and government documents. They were in a uniquely advantageous position to exchange information and control the flow of news. The postmaster could also peruse all the printed material that others received, a benefit of which Lincoln took advantage in helping to educate himself. With the mail delivered to the post office a few times a week and people generally coming to call for it in person, the postmaster also had occasion to meet his fellow citizens regularly—that is why politicians coveted the job. Since it not only carried a government salary but also permitted the postmaster to send and receive personal letters for free and to get one daily newspaper delivered for free, it became a plum patronage position.

From the perspective of those friends and acquaintances, the fact that they had interacted with a future president of the United States, however briefly, was absolutely breathtaking. In central Europe, where they had grown up, the idea that a mere Jew could interact on friendly terms with a future national leader would have been considered laughable. So-called Court Jews, who served as intermediaries between Jews and the government, almost never fully befriended the leaders with whom they interacted; they feared them. Jews who managed estates for aristocratic lords likewise knew "their place" (if not, the lord had his dogs remind them of it).[7] To speak of Lincoln as a friend, the way Hammerslough and many others did, bespoke the democratic ethos that distinguished America from aristocratic Europe. It underscored what Jews could accomplish under freedom.

Before he met Hammerslough, Lincoln had already known Louis Salzenstein, a Jewish storekeeper and livestock trader in Athens (pronounced ay-thens), Illinois, some seven miles from New Salem. Born in the village of Halsdorf in Hessen, Germany, about fifteen miles from Marburg, "Old Salty," as he was later dubbed, moved to Athens around 1843 and became a successful merchant. He was, many believe, the first Jew that Abraham Lincoln ever encountered. As a young man, Lincoln is said to have "often stopped at his store and his residence."[8] Salzenstein's store served as the regional post office. Later, Lincoln represented Salzenstein in a minor lawsuit and represented his litigious kinsman, Elias Salzenstein, in several lawsuits.[9] Salzenstein's clerk, Morris Myers, also a Jew—the families had known each other back in Halsdorf—had two sons, Albert and Louis, who would later purchase Hammerslough's store from Samuel Rosenwald and develop it into Myers Brothers, the largest department store in Springfield. In death, Louis, Elias, and other members of the Salzenstein and Myers families lie buried not far from Abraham Lincoln in Springfield's Oak Ridge Cemetery.[10]

During his Springfield years, Abraham Lincoln maintained far closer connections to another member of the Jewish faith: Abraham Jonas.[11] In all likelihood, Jonas was the first Jew whom Lincoln came to know well; he was the only recorded person in fact whom Lincoln ever directly called "one of my most valued friends."[12] The two men shared much in common. Both were named Abraham and known as "Abe." Both had familial roots in England. Both became renowned for their fair-mindedness and wit. Both were postmasters. Both served as Illinois legislators and as country lawyers. Both revered Henry Clay. Both developed into masterful orators. And both began their political lives as Whigs and moved on to become staunch Republicans. Exactly when they first met is uncertain, but for more than two decades they were friends and political allies.

Born about 1801 into an Orthodox Jewish family in Portsmouth, England, Abraham Jonas followed in the footsteps of his older brother, Joseph, and immigrated as a teenager to the United States, settling in Cincinnati in 1819. Joseph Jonas, the first long-term Jewish settler in Cincinnati, had preceded him there two years earlier. "The fiat had gone forth," Joseph later reported, "that a new resting place for the scattered sons of Israel should be commenced, and that a sanctuary should be erected in the Great West, dedicated to the Lord of Hosts, to resound with praises to the ever-living God."[13]

As if to underscore the religious character of their mission, Joseph and Abraham traveled to New York and married Rachel and Lucia Orah, the daughters of Shearith Israel's venerable religious leader, Gershom Seixas, the foremost Jewish "minister" of his time in North America. Soon afterward, in an effort "to conform as near as possible to the worship and ceremonies of our holy religion," the brothers, in 1824, helped to form Cincinnati's first Jewish congregation, Bene Israel. It is remembered as "the oldest synagogue west of the Alleghenies."[14]

A year later, tragedy struck—the kind of frontier tragedy that Lincoln in his early life knew all too well. First, Abraham and Lucia Orah lost their firstborn son. Then Lucia herself passed away, on June 17, 1825, at the age of twenty. Baby and mother were laid to rest in the city's first Jewish cemetery on the corner of Chestnut Street and Central Avenue in Cincinnati. Abraham must have been devastated by the loss. Years later, after he married Louisa Block, the orphaned daughter of a prominent Jewish pioneer of Richmond, Virginia, and Cape Girardeau, Missouri, he named his firstborn daughter, Lucia.[15]

Subsequently, Abraham Jonas left Cincinnati for the small community of Williamstown, Kentucky, on the road to Lexington about 150 miles northeast of where Lincoln was born. There he opened a store. Striking out on his own, he also embarked upon two pursuits that would claim much of his energy over the next decades: He founded a Masonic lodge and he plunged into politics. Freemasonry offered Jonas a forum where he could interact on an equal footing with non-Jews, emphasizing morality, charity, and belief in a Supreme Being, but nothing overtly Christian. Jews had been Masonic leaders in cities like Newport and Boston in the late eighteenth century, and leading Jews of Jonas's own day, like the New Yorker Mordecai Noah, were Masons as well. In America, unlike in Germany, Jews faced no discrimination in Masonic circles. So it was that in 1827, Jonas, who had once been a Master Mason in Cincinnati, founded Grand Lodge No. 85 and became its first Worshipful Master. Six years later, he was elected Grand Master of the Kentucky Grand Lodge, the highest Masonic position in that state.[16]

"... three others were elected, of whom I was not one..."

Private

Springfield, Ills. Sept 4. 1860

John Coulter, Esq

Dear Sir:

Yours of the 29th is received, and I presume I understand what has prompted you to write it. In 1832 I was first a candidate for the Legislature, with some ten or a dozen other candidates. Peter Cartwright, and three others were elected, of whom I was not one. In 1834 he, and I, and several others, again became candidates; he declined before the election, I ran the race through, and with three others, was elected. In 1835 he became a candidate to fill a vacancy in the State Senate, and his sole competitor, Job Fletcher, beat him by near six hundred majority. In 1836, 1838, & 1840, I was successively elected to the Legislature. In not being a candidate at either of those elections.

I then ceased to be a candidate for anything till 1846, when I ran for Congress. Mr Cartwright was my competitor, and I beat him, as I trusted, 1511 majority, being about equal to the party majority of the District. I was never a candidate for Congress at any other time, and never had any contest with Mr Cartwright other than as I have stated.

Please do not make this public.

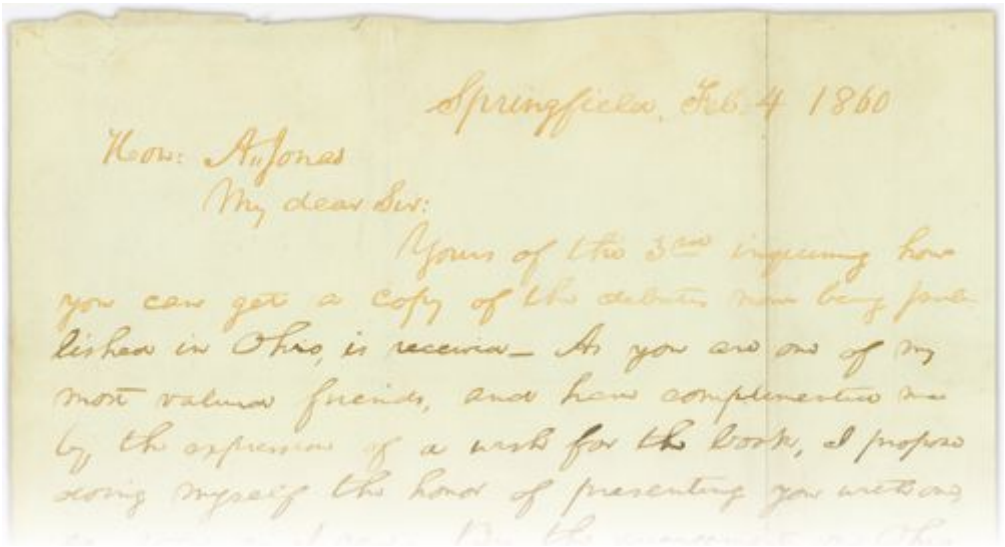
Yours truly

A. Lincoln

LINCOLN TO JOHN COULTER, SEPTEMBER 4, 1860

In an autobiographical sketch written while running for president in 1860, Lincoln noted that his 1832 loss for the State Legislature was the only time he was ever beaten by a direct vote of the people. Lincoln blamed no one and made no excuses; here, with the presidential election now just two months away, he was forthright about his loss twenty-eight years before, stating that four out of the fifteen candidates were elected, "of whom I was not one." At the same time, he noted his successes in the campaigns of 1834, 1836, 1838, and 1840.

Shapell Manuscript Collection



Springfield, Feb. 4 1860

Hon: A. Jonas

My dear Sir:

Yours of the 3rd inquiring how you can get a copy of the debates now being published in Ohio, is received. As you are one of my most valued friends, and how complimentary to me by the expression of a wish for the book, I propose doing myself the honor of presenting you with

"ONE OF MY MOST VALUED FRIENDS"

A striking example of the close Lincoln-Jonas bond. Lincoln, always a careful and self-conscious wordsmith, uses, for the only known time, a phrase directly acknowledging Abraham Jonas as "one of my most valued friends." Jonas was among the first to suggest in 1858 that Lincoln be the Republican nominee for president in 1860.

Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library & Museum

Abraham Jonas

Wells Family

His election came at a bad time. A wave of anti-Masonic sentiment swept the country in the late 1820s and early 1830s, following the disappearance of William Morgan, who had allegedly threatened to expose Freemasonry's "secrets" by publishing its rituals. Jonas might have feared that as a Jew and a Mason, his reputation would have taken a pounding, but he actually emerged unscathed. In fact, his personal popularity led to his election to the Kentucky House of Representatives.[17]

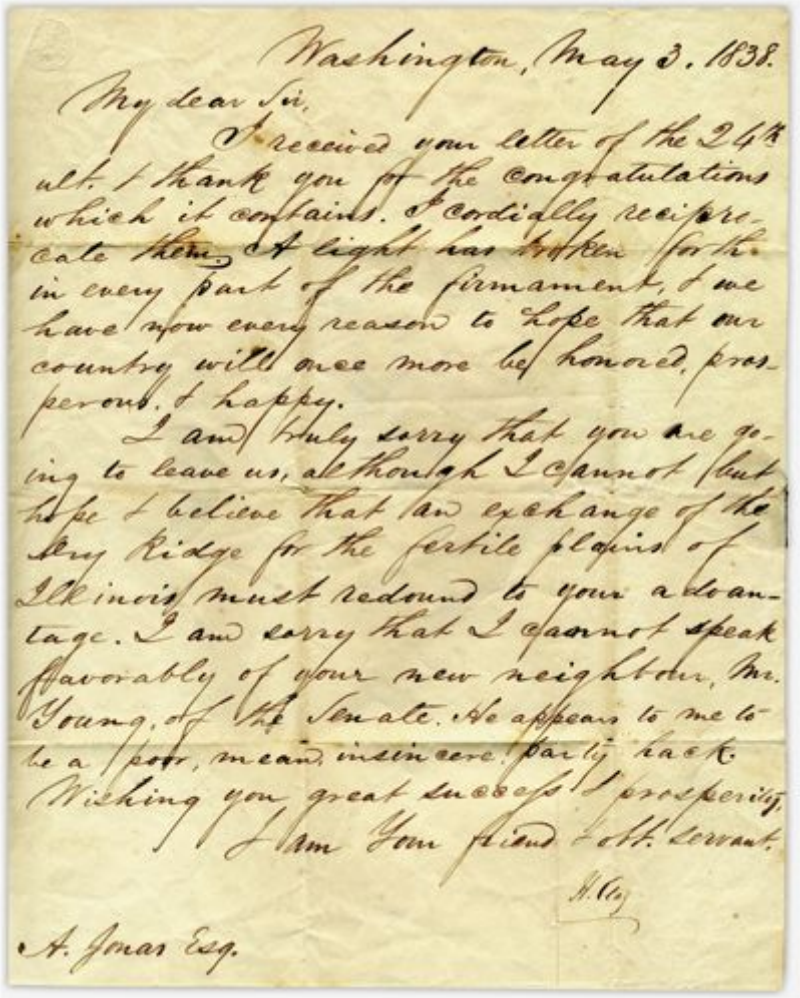
As a state legislator, Jonas encountered the greatest Kentucky politician of the day, Henry Clay, thrice speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives and thrice defeated for the presidency of the United States. Jonas idolized him, as did Lincoln, who met Clay at about the same time, and eulogized him in 1852. To Lincoln, indeed, Clay represented "my beau ideal of a statesman."[18] Lincoln and Jonas followed Clay into the Whig Party, studied his oratory, agreed with him concerning the evils of slavery and the need for the government to compensate slave owners in return for freeing their slaves (compensated emancipation), and both sought to emulate his political style. "All legislation, all government, all society, is formed upon the principle of mutual concession, politeness, comity, courtesy; upon these, every thing is based," Clay taught his mentees.[19] Lincoln and Jonas internalized that great lesson. The full extent of Jonas's interactions with Clay remains unknown. Upon hearing the news of Jonas's upcoming move to Illinois, he wrote, "I am truly sorry that you are going to leave us, although I cannot but hope & believe that an exchange of the Dry Ridge for the fertile plains of Illinois must redound to your advantage."[20] In 1842, four years after Jonas had settled in Quincy, Illinois, a growing commercial city at the point where Illinois met the Mississippi River, Clay still corresponded with him and noted, "we … miss you very much."[21]

The two would not meet again for several years. Meanwhile, Jonas devoted his early years in Quincy to his business and to Freemasonry. He opened a general store, established another business some fifteen miles away in Columbus, Illinois, and engaged in a fruitless effort to boost Columbus by opening a Masonic lodge there and by campaigning to upgrade the village (today home to approximately one hundred people) into a full-fledged county seat. He also helped to establish the Grand Masonic Lodge of Illinois and in 1840 was elected Most Worshipful Grand Master of that lodge. He was becoming known.[22]

"COMPENSATED EMANCIPATION"

COMPENSATED EMANCIPATION aimed to eliminate slavery by having the government pay slaveholders for the loss of their slave property. First touted by Henry Clay, the plan was aggressively supported by President Lincoln starting in 1862. He argued that this plan would not only end the war if adopted by the southern states, but would be far cheaper for the government than the cost of a prolonged war. Strategically, hoping to bring the war to an early conclusion, Lincoln first approached the border slave states still in the Union, arguing that their adoption of his plan would dash the Confederacy's hopes that these crucial four states (Maryland, Missouri, Kentucky, and Delaware) would secede and join them. The border states rejected compensated emancipation but remained in the Union. Meanwhile, some in the North insisted that slaveholders were undeserving of compensation and that the whole plan was unconstitutional. In the end, Washington, D.C. was the only territory in the United States that actually ended slavery through compensated emancipation. The District of Columbia Compensated Emancipation Act, signed by Lincoln on April 16, 1862, provided Union slaveholders with up to $300 per freed slave, which resulted in freedom for 3,185 slaves.

Lincoln, with his fine memory and sharp political instincts, doubtless took notice. It would also not likely have escaped his notice that Jonas, presumably influenced by his personal experience as a religious outsider and by his family ties with Mormon prophet Joseph Smith's Hebrew teacher, Joshua Seixas, displayed extraordinary sympathy toward local Mormons. Forced from their homes in Missouri, the Mormons had settled in the Illinois city of Commerce, which, in 1840, they renamed Nauvoo. As Grand Master of the Masons, Jonas permitted the establishment of a Masonic lodge in Nauvoo. He presided personally at the lodge installation (with the Mormon Prophet, Joseph Smith, serving as chaplain) and then initiated Smith into the Masonic order and instantly ("on sight") raised him to the rank of Master Mason, a rare honor.[23] "I hope and trust that the people of Illinois have no disposition to disturb unoffending people who have no disposition but to live peacefully under the laws of the country and to worship God, under their own vine and fig tree," Jonas declared, employing the same biblical metaphor that George Washington had used in his famous letter to the Jews of Newport.[24] Lincoln, characteristically, was much more reserved and said nothing about Mormonism until 1857.[25]



Washington, May 3. 1838.

My dear Sir,

I received your letter of the 24th ult. & thank you for the congratulations which it contains. I cordially reciprocate them. A light has broken forth in every part of the firmament, & we have now every reason to hope that our country will once more be honored, prosperous & happy.

I am truly sorry that you are going to leave us, although I cannot but hope & believe that an exchange of the Grey Ridge for the fertile plains of Illinois must redound to your advantage. I am sorry that I cannot speak favorably of your new neighbor, Mr. Young, of the Senate. He appears to me to be a poor, mean, insincere, partizan hack.

Wishing you great success & prosperity,

I am Your friend & obt. Servant.

H. Clay

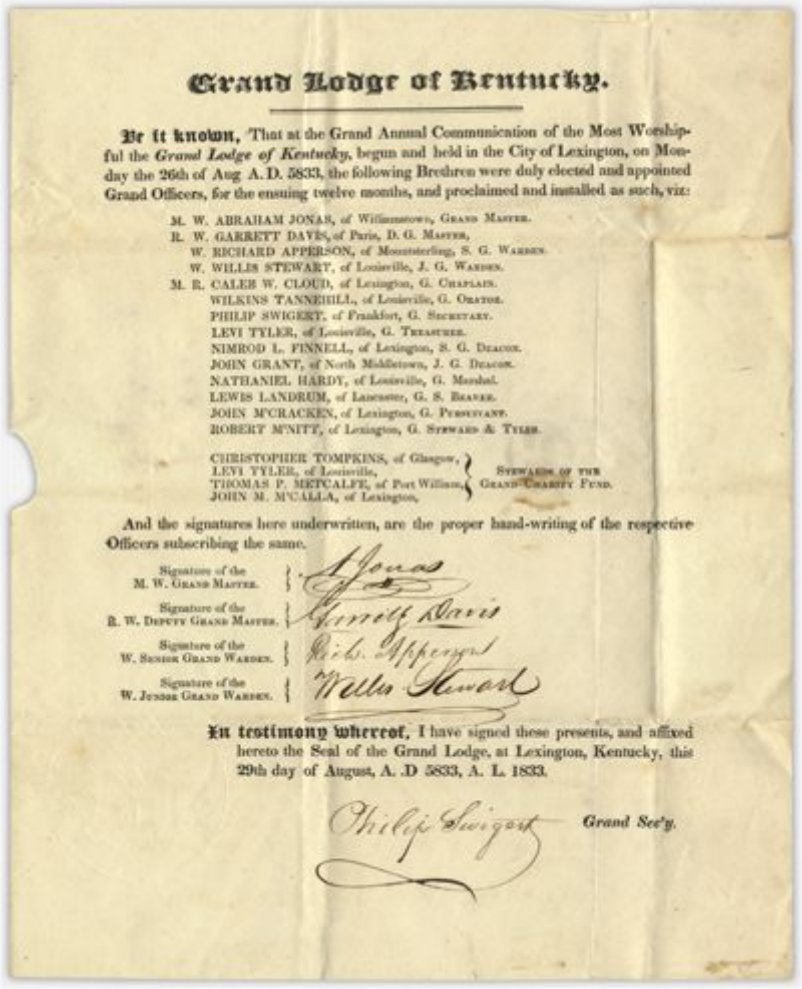
A. Jonas Esq.

HENRY CLAY TO ABRAHAM JONAS, MAY 3, 1838

For Abraham Jonas, like Lincoln, Henry Clay was his "beau ideal of a statesman." That Clay held Jonas in high regard, as well, is evidenced in this letter. Four years later, he would remark that Jonas is still very much missed.

Wells Family

Following the murder of Joseph Smith in 1843, Jonas, at the behest of the governor, courageously traveled both to Nauvoo and to surrounding non-Mormon communities, in a failed attempt to promote peace and restore order.[26] He was by then a familiar figure in the region and (with help from Mormon voters) had won a seat in the Illinois General Assembly.



Grand Lodge of Kentucky.

Be it known, That at the Grand Annual Communication of the Most Worshipful the Grand Lodge of Kentucky, begun and held in the City of Lexington, on Monday the 26th of Aug A. D. 5833, the following Brethren were duly elected and appointed Grand Officers, for the ensuing twelve months, and proclaimed and installed as such, viz:

M. W. ABRAHAM JONAS, of Williamstown, Grand Master.
R. W. GARRETT DAVIS, of Paris, D. G. Master,
W. RICHARD APPERSON, of Mountsterling, S. G. Warden.
W. WILLIS STEWART, of Louisville, J. G. Warden.
M. R. CALEB W. CLOUD, of Lexington, G. Chaplain.
WILKINS TANNEHILL, of Louisville, G. Orator.
PHILIP SWIGERT, of Frankfort, G. Secretary.
LEVI TYLER, of Louisville, G. Treasurer.
NIMROD L. FINNELL, of Lexington, S. G. Deacon.
JOHN GRANT, of North Middletown, J. G. Deacon.
NATHANIEL HARDY, of Louisville, G. Marshal.
LEWIS LANDRUM, of Lancaster, G. S. Bearer.
JOHN M'CRACKEN, of Lexington, G. Pursuivant.
ROBERT M'NITT, of Lexington, G. Steward & Tyler.

CHRISTOPHER TOMPKINS, of Glasgow,
LEVI TYLER, of Louisville,
THOMAS P. METCALFE, of Port William,
JOHN M. M'CALLA, of Lexington,
} Stewards of the Grand Charity Fund.

And the signatures here underwritten, are the proper hand-writing of the respective Officers subscribing the same.

Signature of the M. W. Grand Master. A Jonas
Signature of the R. W. Deputy Grand Master. Garrett Davis
Signature of the W. Senior Grand Warden. Rich. Apperson
Signature of the W. Junior Grand Warden. Willis Stewart

In testimony whereof, I have signed these presents, and affixed hereto the Seal of the Grand Lodge, at Lexington, Kentucky, this 29th day of August, A. D 5833, A. L. 1833.

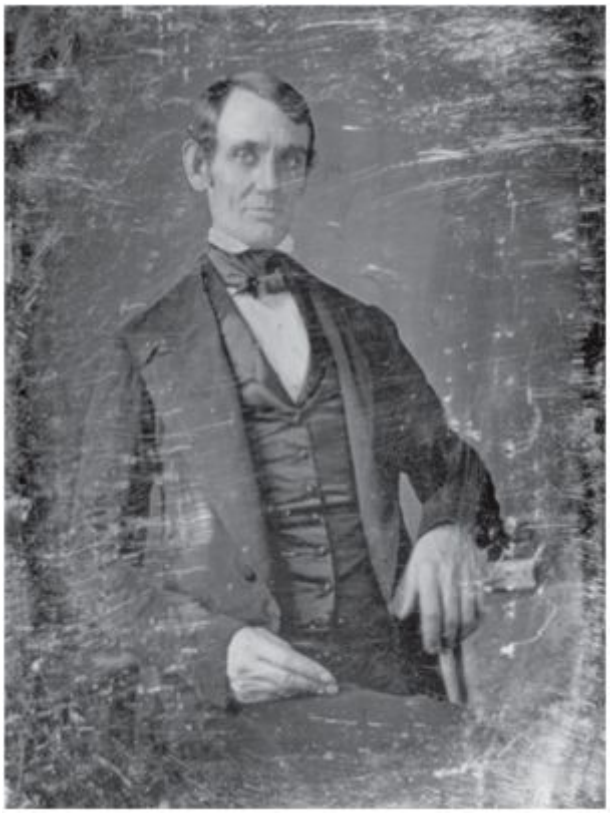
Philip Swigert Grand Sec'y.

A MASONIC DOCUMENT SIGNED BY ABRAHAM JONAS IN HIS CAPACITY AS GRAND MASTER OF THE GRAND KENTUCKY LODGE, AUGUST 29, 1833

Unlike some fraternal organizations, Freemasonry did not bar Jewish participation. Jonas founded this Kentucky chapter in 1832 and later would go on to found the Masonic Lodge in Quincy, Illinois, in 1846. Lincoln, who was not a Mason, was said to have nonetheless professed respect for the fraternity.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

No later than February 22, 1843, on Washington's Birthday, Abraham Jonas and Abraham Lincoln are known to have been in the same place at the same time. Whether or not the two men had met previously, this is the first recorded instance of them being together in the same location.[27] The annual commemoration of Washington's Birthday was celebrated that year in Springfield's Hall of Representatives. The Springfield Cadets attended, the Masons attended, many legislators attended, and Abraham Lincoln —no longer a legislator but still full of political ambitions—attended as well, with Jonas, a celebrated orator, delivering one of the principal addresses that day.

Jonas at that time was busy transitioning from commerce to the law. He read law with Orville Hickman Browning, one of Quincy's first and greatest lawyers, a handsome, well-bred Kentucky native who had moved to Quincy in 1831. Browning, in 1843, served as Jonas's colleague in the Illinois General Assembly; both men were Whigs.[28] Jonas also befriended Henry Asbury, another Kentuckian, who had likewise trained under Browning and then became his legal associate. In time, Asbury would leave Browning's firm and on June 1, 1855, become Jonas's law partner.[29] Both Browning and Asbury were friends with Abraham Lincoln—Browning and Lincoln had been friends since at least 1838.[30] Once admitted to the bar, on December 20, 1843, Jonas joined this circle and Lincoln befriended him as well.



ABRAHAM LINCOLN IN SPRINGFIELD, 1847

The earliest known image of Lincoln, then congressman-elect from Illinois. It is the first of 126 photographic images—40 beardless, 86 bearded—and the only one in which his hair is combed.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

As lawyers, Browning, Asbury, Jonas, and Lincoln all spent substantial amounts of time out of town, defending clients in Springfield, or in one of the scattered circuit courts. There, lawyers met and interacted, opposing one another in court and merrily fraternizing after court adjourned. Spending long hours in each other's company, they sized one another up, entertained one another (always a Lincoln forte), and talked politics.[31]

That Jonas became part of this select fraternity is no small matter. Dark eyed, slender, with black hair and an aquiline nose, he was always marked as a Jew. Gustav Koerner, a Lincoln acquaintance and an attorney in Belleville, Illinois, who served with Jonas in the General Assembly and later described him as "perhaps the best debater and the best politician on the Whig side," did not fail to mention his "Jewish extraction."[32] Nor, by the late 1850s, could anyone else have missed this fact, for the law offices of Jonas and Asbury in Quincy occupied a floor in the Jonas Building at the south-east corner of Fifth and Hampshire, one floor above S. & E. Jonas Hardware, operated by his brothers, and one floor below the Congregation B'nai Abraham synagogue, which the Jonas brothers had helped to establish.[33] Abraham Jonas, unlike some of his brothers, was not an observant Jew. He delivered speeches on the Jewish Sabbath, ate nonkosher foods, and on at least one occasion in 1854 dined openly with Abraham Lincoln and others at an "oyster saloon."[34] But his Judaism was still common knowledge. He was a Jew at heart and in action. Neither his fellow Quincy lawyers nor Abraham Lincoln seem to have held it against him.

Evidence of this may be found in the fact that three Quincy lawyers—Browning, his partner Nehemiah Bushnell, and a third lawyer named Archibald Williams—all supported Jonas when, in 1849, his name was put forward for the position of postmaster—a patronage post. A local blacksmith named Harrison Dills likewise put his own name forward for that position and wrote Lincoln for support. But even Dills conceded that Jonas was "a first rate man." Indeed, in a follow up letter to Lincoln, he offered to drop his candidacy in Jonas's favor: "if thare [sic] is any chance for Mr J," he wrote, "let me pass." That, in fact, is what happened. Thanks to his Whig friends, Jonas served as postmaster of Quincy, under appointments from Presidents Zachary Taylor and Millard Fillmore, from 1849 to 1852.[35]

The patronage job rewarded Jonas for his contribution to the Whig Party. Thanks to his keen mind and formidable oratorical skills he had become a respected party operative and a much-in-demand speaker at political gatherings. Once the Democrats returned to power in 1852, with the election of Franklin Pierce, Jonas naturally lost his position, but his loyalty to the Whigs continued unabated. In 1853, he chaired the party meeting that nominated candidates for local elections in Quincy. A year later, with national elections looming, he turned to the central question of the day—the extension of slavery into Kansas and Nebraska. Amidst what he described as probably "the warmest contest for Congress that we have ever had in this district," he personally "held forth for half an hour" on a cold, rainy night at a political meeting. He also sought to attract a more formidable speaker to boost Whig fortunes. So he wrote to Abraham Lincoln.[36]

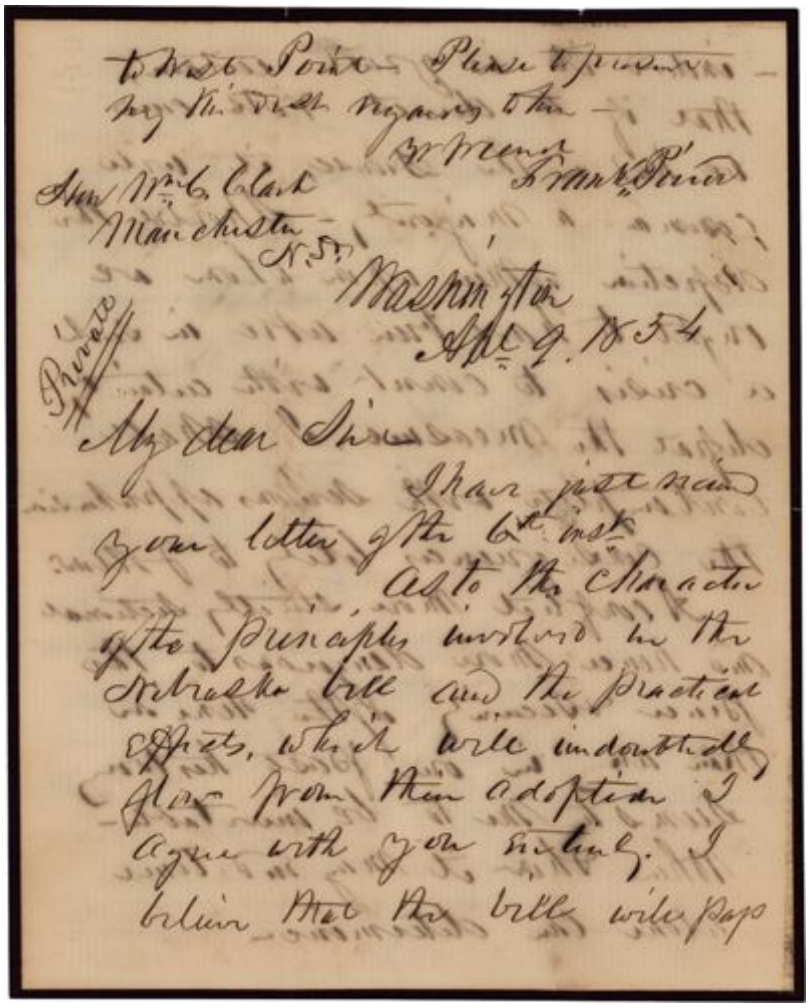
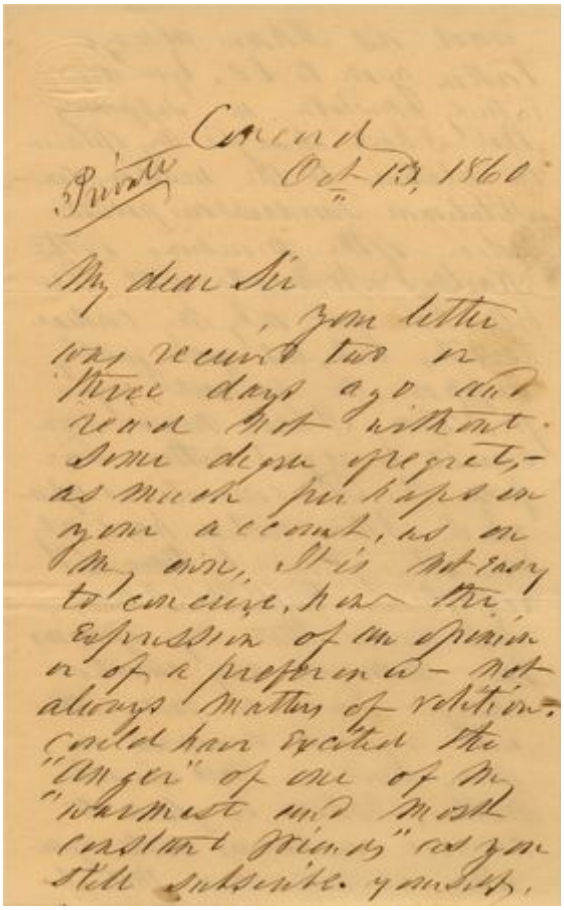
"The bill had not only my cordial assent but ... my earnest approbation. I have never seen cause to regret either. Far from it."



PRESIDENT PIERCE ON THE KANSAS-NEBRASKA ACT, APRIL 9, 1854



Concord
Private Oct 13, 1860

My dear Sir

Your letter was received two or three days ago and would not without some degree of regret, as much perhaps on your account, as on my own, fail to express my opinion on of a preference — not always matter of volition.
could have excited the "anger" of one of the "warmest and most constant friends" you still subscribe yourself.

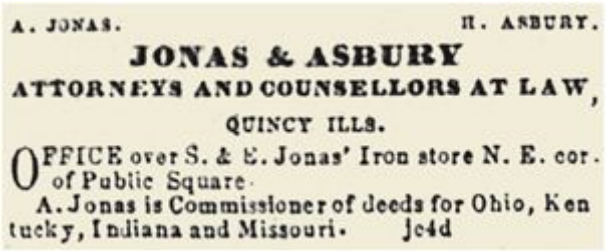
PIERCE DEFENDS THE ACT, OCTOBER 13, 1860

President Franklin Pierce, who signed the Kansas-Nebraska Act into law on May 30, 1854, here defends his support for the act. Six years later, on the very eve of rebellion, Pierce still stubbornly swore by "the wisdom, constitutional soundness and patriotic policy of the provisions" of the Kansas-Nebraska Act. "The bill had not only my cordial assent," he wrote, "but … my earnest approbation. I have never seen cause to regret either." Lincoln, Jonas, and the emerging Republican Party, however, thought differently. Lincoln would be elected president on the basis of his opposition to the expansion of slavery.

Shapell Manuscript Collection

HENRY ASBURY, IN UNIFORM AS PROVOST-MARSHALL OF THE QUINCY DISTRICT

A rare signed photo of Henry Asbury, Abraham Jonas's law partner for over twenty years. It was at a December 1858 meeting with publisher and power broker Horace Greeley in their law office that Asbury first suggested Lincoln's name as a possible presidential candidate, with Jonas immediately seconding the recommendation. Those two endorsements—the only of the evening—would, soon enough, prove instrumental in Lincoln's rise to the presidency.
Shapell Manuscript Collection



A. JONAS. H. ASBURY.

JONAS & ASBURY

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELLORS AT LAW,

QUINCY ILLS.

OFFICE over S. & E. Jonas' Iron store N. E. cor. of Public Square.

A. Jonas is Commissioner of deeds for Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana and Missouri. jc4d

ADVERTISEMENT OF JONAS-ASBURY LAW OFFICES, JUNE 21, 1855

An advertisement in the Quincy Daily Whig for the law practice of Abraham Jonas and Henry Asbury. Located in the Jonas family-owned building in Quincy, the site was a hive of activity in the 1850s. There was the S. & E. Jonas hardware store on the ground floor; the law offices of Jonas & Asbury on the second—where, on occasion, Abraham Lincoln had probably met with Jonas—and a nascent synagogue on the third.
Courtesy of Quincy Public Library

Abraham Lincoln had declared himself "thunderstruck and stunned" by Congress's 1854 passage of the Kansas-Nebraska Act and President Pierce's signing of it into law.[37] The act repealed the Missouri Compromise of 1820, which Lincoln and many others considered vital to the limitation of slavery, and left it up to the territory's voters ("popular sovereignty") to decide the question of slavery in Kansas and Nebraska when they applied for statehood. Previously, under the compromise engineered in part by Henry Clay in 1850, slavery in the lands acquired under the Louisiana Purchase had been banned above the Mason-Dixon Line, thirty-six and one-half degrees north of the equator. Now, with both pro- and antislavery advocates clamoring for access to the vast western territories captured in the Mexican War, as well as to the rich farmlands of the prairie; and with industrialists eager to complete the transcontinental railroad in 1854, Congress felt the need to find a different compromise so that these new territories could be opened up and settled—even with slave labor. Stephen A. Douglas, the wily Democratic senator from Illinois and formerly Quincy's representative in Congress, engineered what he thought would be a viable compromise, winning support from a majority of Democrats and Southern Whigs. But opponents of slavery's extension—including Abraham Jonas and Abraham Lincoln—were furious, for Douglas's "compromise" made possible slavery's extension all the way across the Kansas-Nebraska plains to the western shore. There it would have room to spread instead of dying out on its own, as they had previously expected. Lincoln, as a result, felt "aroused … as he had never been before."[38]

By the time Jonas wrote to him, on September 16, 1854, Lincoln had channeled this anger into action. He had immersed himself in the intricacies of the Kansas-Nebraska Act and took up the fight to reverse it. He lent support to the reelection bid of Congressman Richard Yates, who opposed the act. He debated Douglas's friend, John Calhoun, newly appointed surveyor general for the Kansas and Nebraska Territories. And he published an unsigned editorial in the Illinois Journal ridiculing the claim that the act did not "require slaves" to be sent into the territories. But he had not yet debated Douglas himself.[39] Moreover, his major statements in opposition to the Kansas-Nebraska Act still lay ahead. So it was extraordinarily prescient of Jonas to think to invite Lincoln to Quincy to counter Douglas and lend support to the Whig candidate, Archibald Williams, who was attempting to unseat Douglas's Democratic friend and successor in Congress, William A. Richardson. "[A]ll the Whigs here, would be much gratified if you could make it convenient and pay us a visit, while the little giant is here," Jonas wrote, using the nickname of the five-foot-four-inch Douglas. "It is believed by all who know you that a reply from you would be more effective, than from any other."[40]

Lincoln promised to come. But weeks before he arrived in Quincy, he took on the arguments of the "Little Giant" elsewhere, notably at the state fair in Springfield and in Peoria. Addressing large crowds, he focused on the immorality of slavery and on how it ran counter to basic tenets of the Declaration of Independence. The nation's founders, he insisted, sought to limit rather than to extend slavery. He called for the Missouri Compromise to be upheld. Audiences quickly warmed to this message. Privately, Douglas characterized Lincoln as "the most difficult and dangerous opponent that I have ever met."[41]

Lincoln arrived in Quincy on the night of October 31, just a week prior to Election Day. It was his first time ever in the city. Abraham Jonas, his host, accompanied him throughout his stay. Orville Hickman Browning took him to dinner and tea. Lincoln addressed a crowd on the Kansas-Nebraska Act, and after his speech, Jonas and others passed another hour with him and walked him to the Quincy House, where he spent the night.[42] The men doubtless talked politics. They knew that Williams's chances of winning were poor, though Lincoln hoped that his speech might give the Whig candidate "a little life."[43] One suspects that they likewise discussed the coming Illinois senatorial contest.

THE MISSOURI COMPROMISE AND POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY

THE MISSOURI COMPROMISE, passed in 1820, was an effort to preserve the delicate balance of power in Congress between states where slavery was permitted and ones where it was prohibited. Under its terms, Missouri entered the Union as a slave state and Maine as a free state. Except in Missouri, slavery was prohibited in the Louisiana Territory north of the 36° 30′ latitude line. In 1854, the Missouri Compromise was repealed by the Kansas-Nebraska Act, enacting what Senator Stephen A. Douglas (Illinois) called "popular sovereignty." It opened up the possibility that slavery would spread, since it left the issue of slavery to the vote of local residents.

Lincoln's candidates, Williams and Yates, both lost their election bids, but nationally, opponents of the Kansas-Nebraska Act, whom Lincoln had supported, did well—so well, that Lincoln in late 1854 felt emboldened to put his own name forth for the Senate. To win, he needed to secure a majority of votes from members of the state General Assembly who, in those days, were responsible for electing Illinois' senators. He turned to his political friends for help. Abraham Jonas responded at once and also provided critical intelligence concerning other possible candidates, including himself. “I have no pretension for that or any other office at this time,” he reassured Lincoln, nor, he added, did his fellow Whig lawyers from Quincy, Orville Hickman Browning and Archibald Williams. “I should prefer you to any other,” he promised, “and should be pleased to render you any service in my power.”[44] As it turned out, Jonas’s support did not suffice to win him the position; Lincoln stood a few votes short. So, on the tenth ballot, Lincoln cannily directed his supporters to vote for the Democrat Lyman Trumbull, whom he knew to be as angry at the Kansas-Nebraska Act as he was. He decided, one of his biographers observes, that “the long-term cause of stopping slavery trumped his short-term ambition.” Trumbull, thanks to this move, was elected. Lincoln, meanwhile, swallowed his disappointment at being defeated, and within three years both he and Trumbull stood together in the ranks of the new Republican Party.[45]

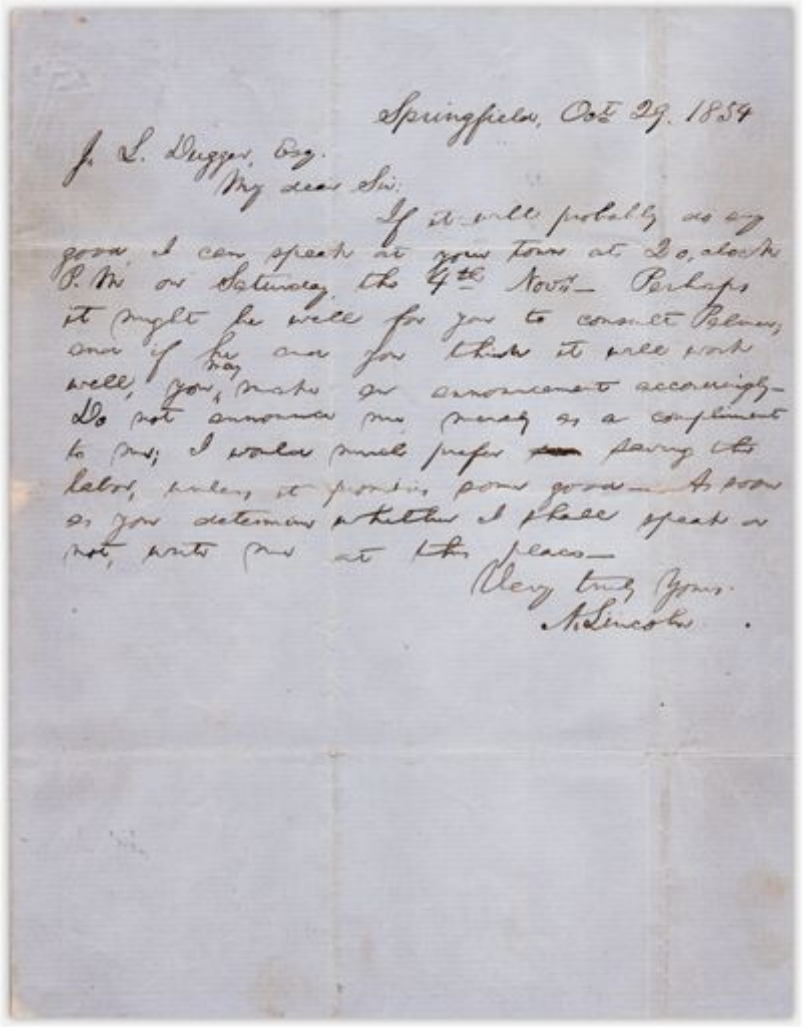
ABRAHAM JONAS TO LINCOLN, SEPTEMBER 16, 1854

In the earliest known letter between the two men, Abraham Jonas invites Lincoln to speak against the Kansas-Nebraska Act in Quincy. By the terms of the explosive act, slavery would be allowed to spread into the Kansas-Nebraska territories—and the vast new lands captured in the Mexican War—by a vote of the majority of its inhabitants. Emotionally and politically transformed by the act, lawyer Lincoln rushed headlong out of the political wilderness into political activism, catapulting him from the plains to the presidency within six years.

Courtesy of the Library of Congress



Springfield, Oct 29. 1854

J. L. Dugger, Esq.

My dear Sir.

If it will probably do any good I can speak at your town at 2 o'clock P. M. on Saturday the 4th Nov.— Perhaps it might be well for you to consult Palmer, and if he can for think it will work well, you may make the announcement accordingly. Do not announce me merely as a compliment to me; I would much prefer ~~him~~ saving the labor, unless it promises some good— As soon as you determine whether I shall speak or not, write me at this place—

Very truly Yours.
A. Lincoln.

LINCOLN TO JEFFERSON L. DUGGER, OCTOBER 29, 1854

Lincoln arranges to speak against the Kansas-Nebraska Act in support of Whig candidate, Archibald Williams. On that road trip through Illinois, Lincoln spent two days with Abraham Jonas: October 31 and November 1.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

Abraham Jonas and many other former Whigs joined them in that party, determined to halt the spread of slavery and promote the spread of freedom. Illinois Republicans eschewed radicalism and nativism, and attempted to build a broad-based coalition, focused around the issue of slavery's containment. They supported the Missouri Compromise, opposed the Kansas-Nebraska Act, and pledged to prevent the admission of any new slave states into the Union. This was likewise the position of explorer John C. Frémont, who became the Republican standard bearer in 1856. Lincoln and Jonas barnstormed on Frémont's behalf, with Lincoln reputedly delivering over fifty campaign speeches, though he did not know the candidate personally.

Jonas hoped that one of those speeches would be in Quincy during the crucial two-week period before the election, but at the last minute Lincoln begged off. "I am here at court, and find myself so 'hobbled' with a particular case, that I can not leave, & consequently, can not be with you on the 23rd," Lincoln wrote sorrowfully. "I regret this exceedingly, but there is no help for it." He asked Jonas to apologize in his name and signed the letter, "Your friend as ever."[46]

The word hobbled—set off with quotation marks—most likely clued Jonas as to the true reason why his "friend as ever" could not make it to Quincy. Family business had detained him in Urbana. Lincoln was working there to free his "hobbled" (he was literally crippled) ne'er-do-well stepnephew, Thomas Johnston (the son of his stepbrother, John D. Johnston), who had been jailed in Champaign for stealing a solid-gold watch from a local store owned by the family of William Green. Attorney Henry Clay Whitney of Urbana, one of the many young lawyers whom Lincoln befriended and assisted, recalled that after speaking at a mass meeting in the city, Lincoln had approached him, and the two of them went "on the sly" to the local jail to meet with the unfortunate Johnston, who also faced an earlier charge of theft. "I shall do what I can for him in these two cases," he quoted Lincoln as saying, "but that's the last. After that, if he wants to be a thief, I shan't help him any more."[47] Lincoln persuaded the judge and prosecutor to waive the larceny charges, if William Green and his family agreed not to press the case further, and then visited with the Greens, who, after hearing from Lincoln, seem to have taken pity on the crippled boy and forgave him for his crime. Accordingly, the case was dropped and Johnston released. The other charge of larceny against Johnston was settled in the same fashion. All of this took time, of course, and explains why Lincoln was "hobbled"—a double entendre—and precluded him from speaking in Quincy. The clever wordplay likewise bespeaks Lincoln's intimacy with Jonas. The quotation marks imply that the two men understood the unhappy family story behind the word hobbled. Lincoln had let Jonas in on what was otherwise an embarrassing family secret.[48]

Lincoln and Jonas put their ideological friendship on display in a more public way when both appeared on ballots as Republican electors in 1856. But because of the third-party candidacy of former president Millard Fillmore, representing the anti-immigrant American (Know-Nothing) Party, the Democrat, James Buchanan, eked out a plurality in the state, garnering 44.1 percent of its votes.[49] Buchanan also won the national election —with 45.3 percent of the vote. The election nevertheless proved beneficial to Lincoln, for Republicans won both the state governorship in Illinois and a majority in the General Assembly. As one of the Republican Party's most articulate spokesmen and strategists and runner-up for its vice presidential nomination, he was properly credited with this success, and thanks to press coverage of his speeches, his reputation outside of the state expanded as well. His admirers, like Abraham Jonas, looked to advance Lincoln's career.

Jonas soon had a new reason to admire Lincoln—one that was little known at the time and has been little remembered by biographers but that actually spoke volumes concerning the Republican hopeful's values, particularly his concern for racial justice. In the fall of 1856, a young man named John Shelby, one member of the small community of black residents in Springfield, Illinois (where there were but 171 black residents in 1850), traveled to St. Louis and hired himself out on a steamboat bound for New Orleans. Arriving in port, he clambered ashore without equipping himself with papers attesting to his status as a free person. He was promptly arrested and cast into prison. In New Orleans, it was a crime for blacks to be found on the street after dark without a written pass. While poor Shelby languished in jail, the steamboat that had hired him departed, leaving him at risk of being sold into slavery to pay off his prison expenses.[50]

Fortunately, Lincoln and Benjamin F. Jonas, the son of Abraham Jonas and a New Orleans attorney,[51] intervened to save him. Young Jonas, in an 1857 letter, indicated that he reached out to Lincoln after Shelby mentioned him as someone "who would take an interest in his behalf." He recognized the name Lincoln as belonging to "an old friend of my father," and contacted him. Benjamin Jonas's sister, Annie, by contrast, wrote some years later that it was Lincoln who actually took the first step, instructing her brother to free Shelby and to "charge the expense incurred to him." Lincoln's law partner, William Herndon, elaborated on that account (though without mentioning Jonas's name), recalling that Shelby's mother "came to us with the story of the wrong done her son and induced us to interfere in her behalf." According to him, the governors of Illinois and Louisiana both refused to act on the matter, so Lincoln and Herndon drew up a subscription list, "collecting funds enough to purchase the young man's liberty." What, in the end, is indisputable is that Lincoln dispatched to Jonas a draft for $69.30 (almost $1,700 in today's money) in order to redeem Shelby. This was enough to purchase his freedom from prison, return him safely to Springfield, and pay off a local official. Both Jonas and Lincoln waived their fees. For Lincoln, who kept the whole matter private, the episode reflected his deepest principles, his belief that "all men are created equal."[52]

FREMONT & BISSELL TICKET.

For Governor.
WILLIAM H. BISSELL.
For Lieutenant Governor.
JOHN WOOD.
For Secretary of State.
OZIAS M. HATCH.
For Auditor of State.
JESSE K. DUBOIS.
For State Treasurer,
JAMES MILLER.
For Superintendent of Public Instruction,
WILLIAM H. POWELL.
For Congress,
ELIHU B. WASHBURNE.

For Presidential Electors.
A. LINCOLN,
FREDERICK HECKER,
ELISHA P. FERRY,
JEROME J. BEARDSLEY,
WILLIAM FITHIAN,
T. JUDSON HALE,
ABRAHAM JONAS,
WILLIAM H. HERNDON,
H. P. H. BROMWELL,
F. S. RUTHERFORD,
DAVID L. PHILLIPS,

COUNTY TICKET.
For Clerk of Circuit Court,
GEORGE T. KASSON,
For District Attorney,
EDWARD S. JOSLYN.
For Sheriff,
JOHN EDDY.
For the Legislature,
LAWRENCE S. CHURCH.
LUTHER W. LAWRENCE.
For Coroner,
NAJAH BEARDSLY.

For Convention.

LINCOLN AND JONAS ON THE FRÉMONT BALLOT, 1856

Ballots in mid-nineteenth-century America generally listed the name of the presidential candidate at the top, and below it, those of the electors who had been elected to support him. In 1856, Lincoln and Jonas both appeared on the Illinois ballot as presidential electors under the Frémont ticket. Here Lincoln and Jonas represented the new Republican Party, which called itself, among other things, the "Anti-Nebraska Ticket." On Election Day, voters brought to the polling station the ballot of the candidate of their choice, gave their name to the registrar, who checked that they were eligible to vote, and then dropped these preprinted ballots into the ballot box.

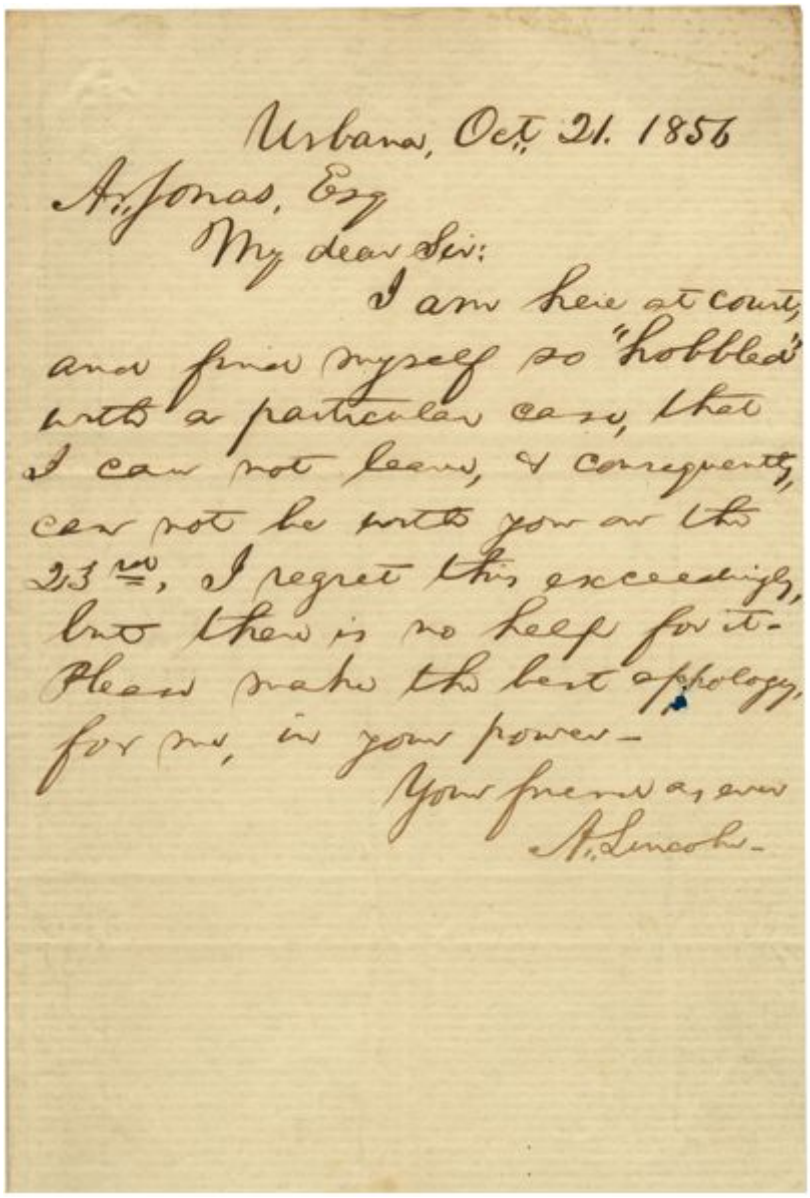
Rail Splitter Archives, New York City

"I am here at court and find myself so 'hobbled' with a particular case, that I can not leave."



Urbana, Oct. 21. 1856

A. Jonas, Esq

My dear Sir:

I am here at court, and find myself so "hobbled" with a particular case, that I can not leave, & consequently, can not be with you on the 23rd, I regret this exceedingly, but there is no help for it. Please make the best apology, for me, in your power—

Your friend as ever
A. Lincoln—

LINCOLN TO ABRAHAM JONAS: "HOBBLED," OCTOBER 21, 1856

Busy campaigning for the Republican ticket two weeks before the national election, Lincoln, having shared with Jonas an intimate family matter about a troublesome nephew of his, who was arrested for thievery, shares a humorous pun with Jonas about the situation. Getting the youth—who was, literally, crippled—out of jail, a sarcastic and frustrated Lincoln jokes, has "hobbled" his schedule, so that he cannot meet with Jonas as planned. He signed the letter: "Your friend as ever."
Shapell Legacy Partnership

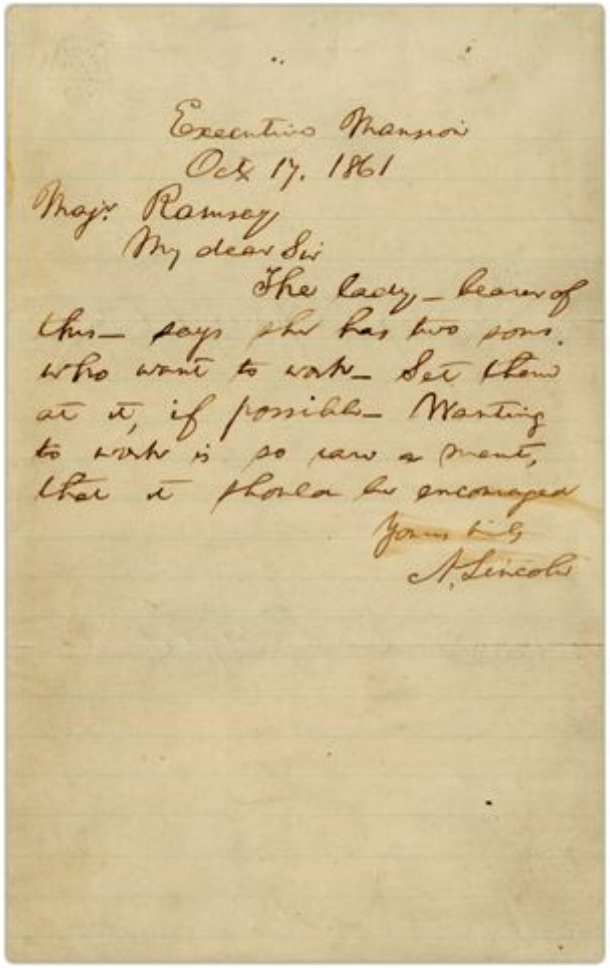
A VALUABLE LESSON FOR A WAYWARD NEPHEW: "WANTING TO WORK IS SO RARE A MERIT…"

HIS LIFE'S HISTORY, Lincoln said in an 1860 handwritten autobiographical sketch, could be summed up in a single sentence: "The short and simple annals of the poor." Had he chosen to elaborate, he might have added how it was, then, that a child of the impoverished frontier became president: "Work, work, work, is the main thing," he wrote in answer to an 1860 inquiry of how to obtain a thorough knowledge of the law. As much if not more than any other quality, Lincoln valued hard work—in contrast to the thievery of the nephew he was obligated to defend in court. Honest work was, he believed, the essential element in achieving individual success and social advancement.

Interestingly, Lincoln had, eight years before, been down a similar road with the boy's father—Lincoln's stepbrother—when Lincoln tried to lend a helping hand in the face of bad conduct: "You are not lazy, and still you are an idler. I doubt whether since I saw you, you have done a whole day's work in any one day." Lincoln biographer Carl Sandburg referred to the elder Johnston as "the most fascinating braggart and scalawag known to Lincoln's boyhood and youth."

Growing up on the Indiana frontier, Lincoln spent long days working with his father and as a hired hand to neighboring farmers. He taught himself the intricacies of land surveying; and when he decided to become a lawyer, he read and studied diligently; and when a lawyer, rode the circuit six months a year (when prairie lawyers traveled through large sections of Illinois to meet and advise clients who needed representation).

As president, he put in long hours attending to the countless details of running the country. But in running the vast federal bureaucracy, Lincoln discovered that not everyone in government shared his enthusiasm for tireless labor. So, when asked by a needy mother in October 1861 to supply army jobs for her eager boys, the new president was pleased to oblige with this letter of referral. "The lady—bearer of this—says she has two sons who want to work. Set them at it, if possible. Wanting to work is so rare a merit, that it should be encouraged." This brief but defining letter is one of the most personally revealing letters about Lincoln—the man.



Executive Mansion
Oct 17. 1861
Majr Ramsey
My dear Sir
The lady bearer of this says she has two sons who want to work. Set them at it, if possible. Wanting to work is so rare a merit, that it should be encouraged
Yours truly
A. Lincoln

LINCOLN TO GEORGE D. RAMSEY: "WANTING TO WORK…," OCTOBER 17, 1861

Shapell Legacy Partnership

The Dred Scott case, decided by the U.S. Supreme Court on March 6, 1857, ruled otherwise. Speaking for the Court, Chief Justice Roger B. Taney pronounced blacks "so far inferior, that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect." Constitutional freedoms, the Court decided, did not apply to blacks. As for the Declaration of Independence's assertion that "all men are created equal," the decision declared "that the enslaved African race were not intended to be included, and formed no part of the people who framed and adopted this declaration." Implicitly, it reduced blacks to a status below that of "all men" and doomed them to perpetual inequality.[53]

Lincoln, when this infamous decision came down, was out of politics. Having spent much of 1856 stumping for Frémont, he needed to focus on his law practice and rebuild his personal assets. But when Stephen A. Douglas, in a celebrated address, vindicated the Court's judgment, declaring that "the signers of the Declaration of Independence …

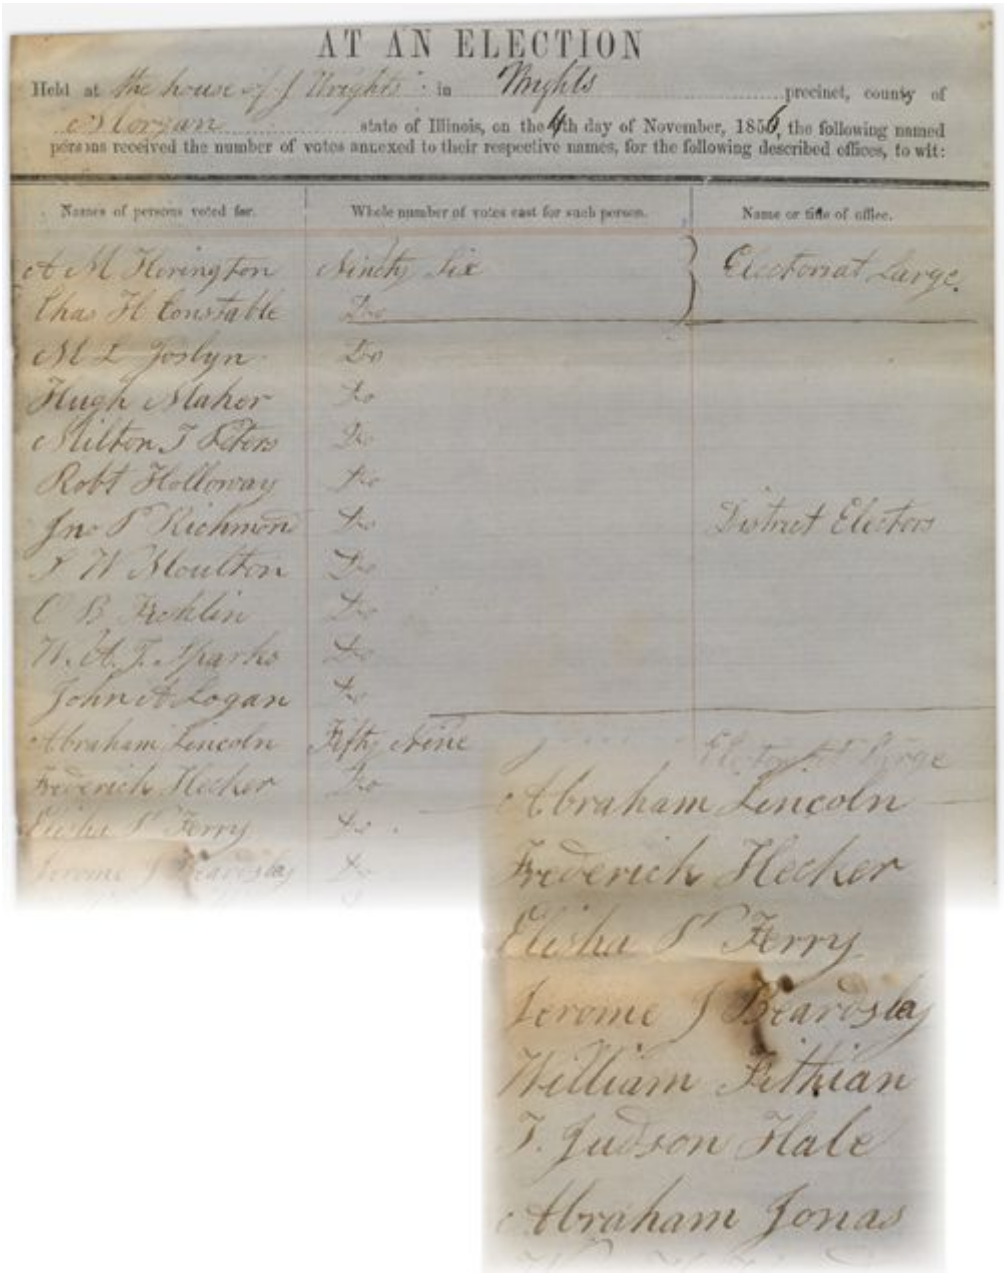
referred to the white race alone, and not to the African, when they declared all men to have been created equal," Lincoln felt compelled to reply. Douglas, he knew, would stand for reelection to the Senate in 1858, and he aimed to oppose him. Douglas's views, moreover, were anathema to Lincoln. He predicted, rightly, that the Dred Scott decision would one day be overruled and insisted that the Founders meant what they said when they celebrated the equality of all men. "They did not intend to declare all men equal in all respects," he conceded, but insisted that they did consider them "equal in 'certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.'" Thinking beyond the question of blacks, he looked forward to an America that viewed the goal of equality in terms of "progressive improvement." To him, the phrase "all men are created equal" was a "standard maxim for free society," something "constantly looked to, constantly labored for, and even though never perfectly attained, constantly approximated, and thereby constantly spreading and deepening its influence, and augmenting a happiness and value of life to all people of all colors everywhere."[54]

As Lincoln's law practice and professional reputation expanded and he was drawn back into politics, his circle of Jewish acquaintances expanded as well. Illinois' Jewish population was approaching 3,000 by the late 1850s, many of them involved in business and commerce. Several soon crossed Lincoln's path. A good example is Henry Rice, subsequently a leading figure in the manufacture and distribution of dry goods and in Jewish philanthropy. Born in 1834 in Bamberg, Bavaria, Rice arrived in the United States in 1850. Three years later, he settled in the small community of Jacksonville, Illinois, thirty-five miles from Springfield, and established a clothing store. Rice met Lincoln no later than 1857, when he served as a witness in a court case between Dewitt Gale and the local Morgan County Bank. Gale had sued the bank for nonpayment on a draft; the bank, which Lincoln defended, claimed that it had paid him in cash. Rice's testimony in the case does not survive, but Lincoln's client won the case.[55]

Years later, Rice recalled recommending Lincoln to several Cincinnati firms (probably ones belonging to Jewish relatives of his in that city) that required the services of an Illinois attorney. He also recalled meeting Lincoln again in Springfield following his election. As he recounted the story, the president-elect was on his way to the railroad station to pick up his wife and mentioned, in his typically folksy way, that Mary had been off on a shopping trip "to get some duds." Rice claimed to have called upon Lincoln once at the White House, where, he said, he was invited to stay for supper.

In 1861, as we shall see, Lincoln wrote a letter endorsing Rice for the position of sutler, a military storekeeper for the United States Army.[56]

As Lincoln traversed Illinois in 1858, as part of his campaign for the Senate, he continued to meet other Jews. In Chicago, he became acquainted with Henry Greenebaum, one of four prominent Jewish brothers who immigrated to the city from Eppelsheim, Germany, in the late 1840s. Greenebaum, in his twenties, served as a Democratic alderman in Chicago and had first met Lincoln in 1855. He remembered being "greatly impressed" by Lincoln's "congeniality," his "wealth of humor," and his "remarkable mental endowment." Lincoln, who served as judge in over 300 cases, presided in at least two cases concerning Henry Greenebaum's brother-in-law, German Jew Gerhard Foreman, in 1856 and 1857. In both cases, the court ruled in favor of Foreman's company. In 1858, Greenebaum later recalled, he "accompanied Lincoln on a walk during which he asked me for my support." Since Greenebaum, unlike many other politically engaged Chicago German Jews, was a Democrat and "strong political friend" of Stephen A. Douglas, he turned Lincoln down. Reflecting back years later, he described Lincoln as "the greatest man I ever met."[57]



AT AN ELECTION

Held at the house of J Wrights in Mgtls precinct, county of Morgan state of Illinois, on the 4th day of November, 1856, the following named persons received the number of votes annexed to their respective names, for the following described offices, to wit:

Names of persons voted for.	Whole number of votes cast for each person.	Name or title of office.
E M Harrington	Ninety six	Electors at Large.
Chas H Constable	Do
M L Joslyn	Do
Hugh Maher	Do
Milton T Peters	Do
Robt Holloway	Do
Jno S Richmond	Do	District Electors
J W Moulton	Do
C B Ricklin	Do
W A J Yarko	Do
John A Logan	Do
Abraham Lincoln	Fifty nine
Friedrich Hecker	Do
Elisha S Ferry	Do
Jerome J Bearss	Do

Abraham Lincoln
Friedrich Hecker
Elisha S Ferry
Jerome J Bearss
William Pethian
T. Judson Hale
Abraham Jonas

ILLINOIS POLL BOOK, 1856

In 1856, Lincoln and Jonas were among the organizers of the new Republican Party in Illinois, and their names appear repeatedly in these poll books from various Illinois precincts, evidence of their passionate involvement—always on the same side—in politics. On Election Day, election officials carefully recorded all of the information concerning the election—the candidates, the people who voted, and the sum of the votes—in these individual poll books containing the names of all registered voters.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

Lincoln formally kicked off his campaign to unseat Douglas at a special Republican nominating convention held in Springfield on June 16, 1858. There he delivered one of the finest speeches of his life. “A house divided against itself cannot stand,” he proclaimed, quoting a well-known teaching from the Gospels.[58] “I believe,” he explained, “this government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free.” Linking Douglas to what he portrayed as a conspiracy to secure slavery throughout the country, he sought to distance Illinois Republicans from Douglas. Ever distrustful of the leonine “Little Giant,” Lincoln insisted that Douglas was a determined opponent of human equality and a staunch advocate of slavery. (“For years he has labored to prove it a sacred right of white men to take negro slaves into the new territories.”) Quoting Ecclesiastes (9:4), he declared that “a living dog”—a modest reference to himself—“is better than a dead lion.” His own emotions, he knew, had been deeply stirred by slavery’s advances; Douglas, by contrast, was indifferent—“He don’t care anything about it.”[59]

Abraham Jonas and his partner, Henry Asbury, strongly supported Lincoln. In July, Asbury sent the candidate probing questions concerning Douglas’s stance on slavery. He particularly urged him to press Douglas. “Don’t let him dodge here; he must come out here,” he coaxed, encouraging Lincoln to challenge Douglas to explain how slavery might be limited anywhere in the United States.[60] By the time the letter arrived, Lincoln and Douglas had agreed to a series of seven debates across the state of Illinois. The sixth debate was scheduled for Quincy.

Before then, Lincoln agreed to spend a day between his first and second debates on August 21 and August 27, respectively, in the village of Augusta, some forty-one miles from Quincy, where a Republican convention to select a congressional and state senatorial candidate was taking place and Jonas thought that one of Lincoln’s “sledge hammer speeches” would “effect wonders.” “My mind is at once made up to be with you at Augusta on the 25th,” Lincoln promised.[61]

Good to his word, he made the journey, and Abraham Jonas, along with his son Edward, spent time with him. Edward, subsequently the only one of Jonas’s sons to fight for the Union, never forgot his encounter with Lincoln, who was drawn to children. “While my father was speaking,” Edward recalled, “I suddenly felt a tickling behind my ear. Thinking it a bug or fly I slapped vigorously, but upon its being repeated several times, I became suspicious and turned suddenly and caught the fly. It was Mr. Lincoln with a straw in his hand. He made it all right at once by catching me up with his long arm, drawing me to his side and talking to me very entertainingly until his turn came to address the assemblage.” Lincoln went on to address more than 1,200 people on the subject of slavery and then likely took counsel with the elder Jonas and Asbury concerning his forthcoming debate in Freeport, on August 27.[62]

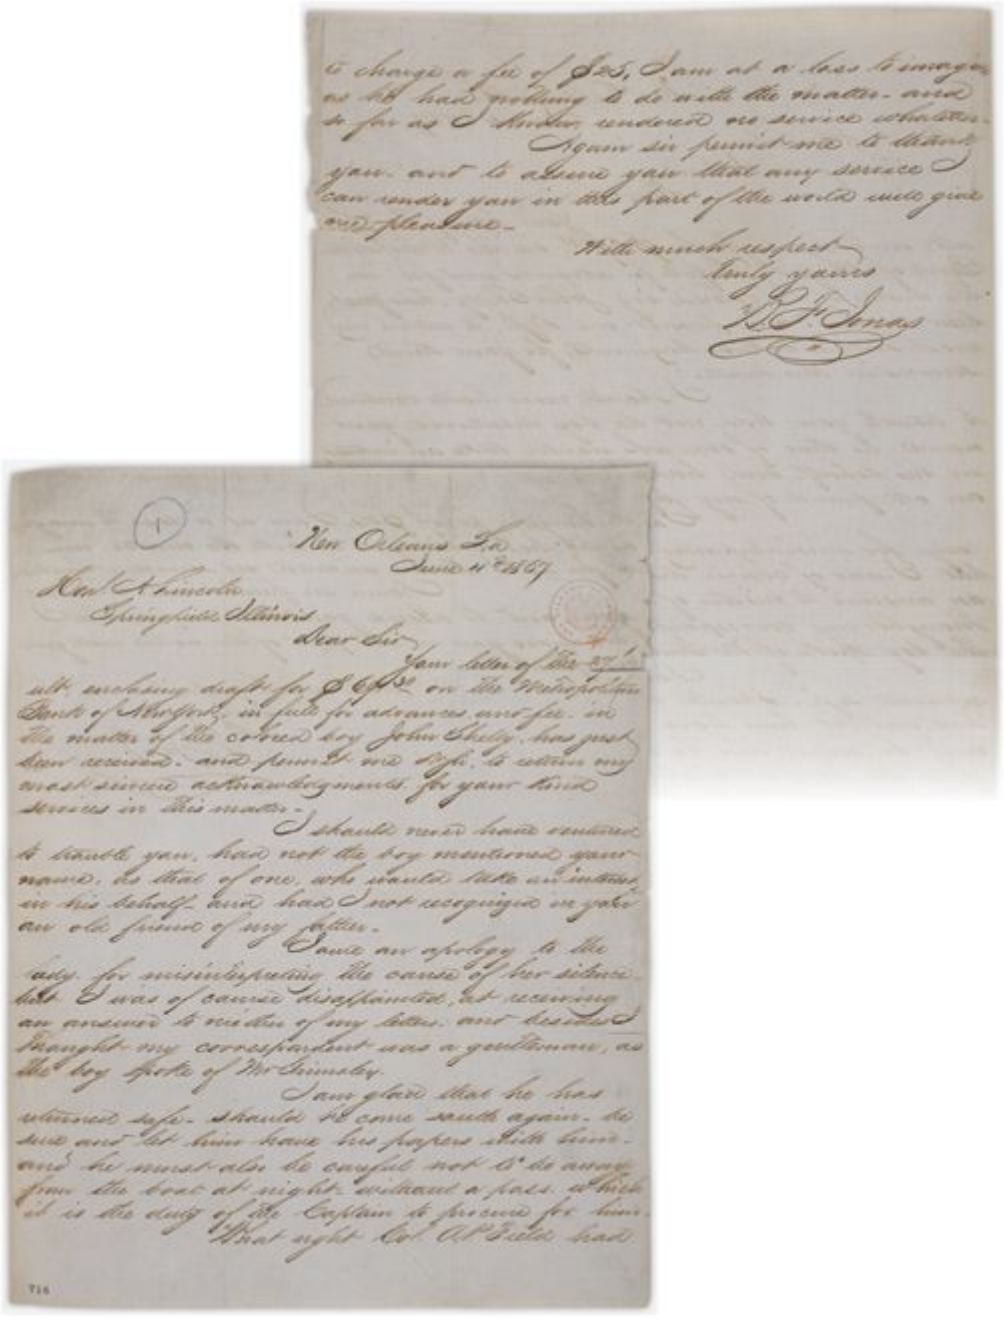
While Lincoln and Douglas were busy debating, Jonas did not sit idle. He was busy campaigning on Lincoln's behalf. In late September, for example, he helped bring 5,000 people to Warsaw, about thirty-four miles from Quincy, to hear Senator Lyman Trumbull speak out for the Republican Party. When Trumbull was delayed, Jonas himself rose to speak, addressing the crowd for two hours, "in which," a sympathetic local paper reported, "he held his audience spell bound."[63]

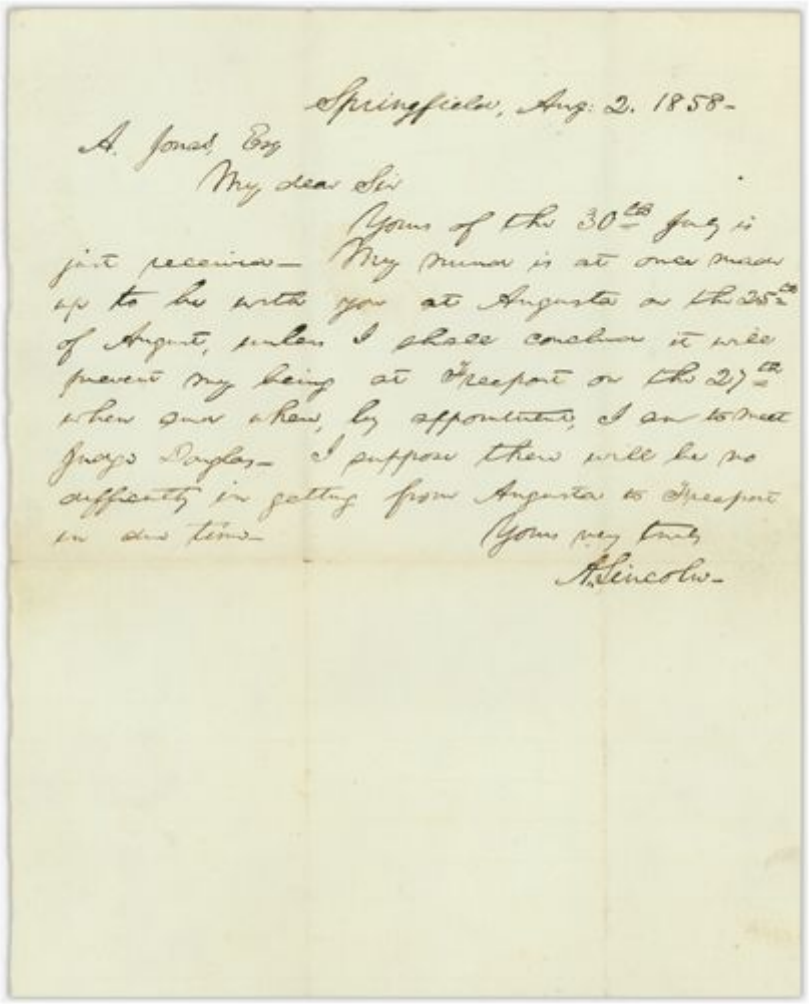


BENJAMIN JONAS TO LINCOLN, JUNE 4, 1857

Who wrote who first is unclear, but together Lincoln and Abraham Jonas's son, Benjamin, worked to get an unjustly held "free man of color" out of a New Orleans jail. Later the younger Jonas would, along with as many as four brothers, join the Confederacy. Nonetheless, he later recalled how "Mr. Lincoln always asked after us when he saw anyone from New Orleans during the war."

Courtesy of Library of Congress

"My mind is at once made up to be with you at Augusta on the 25th…"



Springfield, Aug: 2. 1858-

A. Jonas, Esq

My dear Sir

Yours of the 30th ult. is just received- My mind is at once made up to be with you at Augusta on the 25th inst. unless I shall conclude it will prevent my being at Freeport on the 27th- when and where, by appointment, I am to meet Judge Douglas- I suppose there will be no difficulty in getting from Augusta to Freeport in due time-

Yours very truly

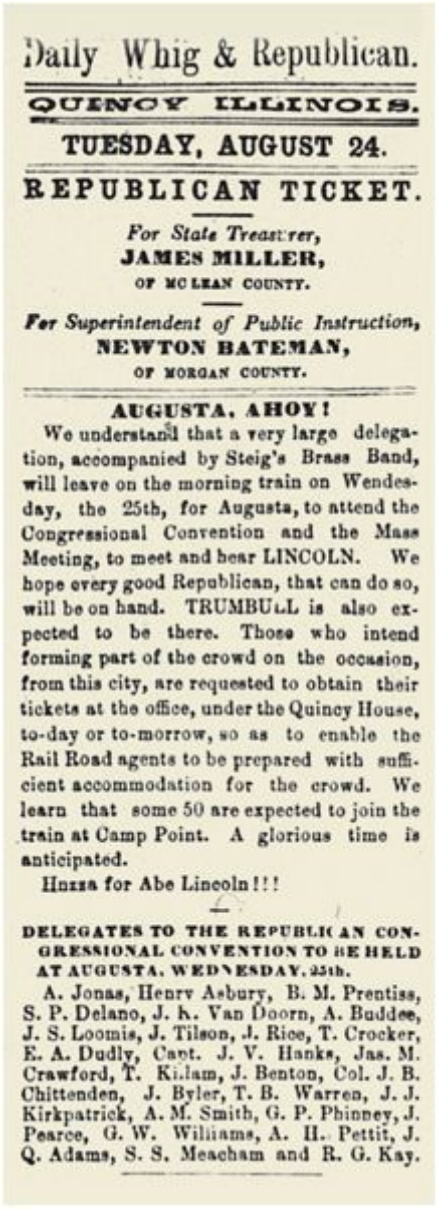
A. Lincoln-

LINCOLN TO JONAS, AUGUST 2, 1858

Summoned by Abraham Jonas in July 1858 to give another of his "sledge hammer speeches" on behalf of the Republican congressional candidates in Augusta, Illinois, Lincoln—although himself immersed in his own grueling race against Stephen A. Douglas for the Senate—heeded Jonas's political call to show up and speak. "My mind is at once made up to be with you at Augusta on the 25th," he replied here. It is noteworthy that Lincoln, who would first debate Douglas on the 21st and again, the second time, on August 27th, took Jonas's advice.

Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library & Museum

When Lincoln arrived in Quincy to debate Douglas, on October 13, Jonas, as chair of the local Committee on Arrangements, was one of his hosts. The law office of Jonas and Asbury, according to a retrospective account, served as "a kind of Lincoln headquarters."[64] Contemporary newspaper advertisements, signed by Jonas, encouraged voters to travel to Quincy for the debate, to "hear the true principles of the Republican Party expounded and the unsound doctrines of the Douglas Democracy exposed."[65] Jonas, who appreciated the importance of pageantry, also made sure that when Lincoln arrived on the morning train from Macomb, an elaborate procession accompanied him to the courthouse. Following the debate, doubtless also at Jonas's initiative, a "splendid torchlight procession" brought him to the patrician home of Orville Hickman Browning, where he spent the night (though Browning himself was away at court in Carthage).[66] The debate itself did not break new ground but did offer Lincoln an opportunity to spell out in pithy fashion the difference, as he saw it, between his Republican Party and Douglas's Democrats: "the difference of opinion, reduced to its lowest terms, is no other than the difference between the men who think slavery a wrong and those who do not think it wrong. The Republican party think it wrong—we think it is a moral, a social and a political wrong."[67]



Daily Whig & Republican.

QUINCY ILLINOIS.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 24.

REPUBLICAN TICKET.

For State Treasurer,
JAMES MILLER,
OF MCLEAN COUNTY.

For Superintendent of Public Instruction,
NEWTON BATEMAN,
OF MORGAN COUNTY.

AUGUSTA, AHOY!

We understand that a very large delegation, accompanied by Steig's Brass Band, will leave on the morning train on Wendesday, the 25th, for Augusta, to attend the Congressional Convention and the Mass Meeting, to meet and hear LINCOLN. We hope every good Republican, that can do so, will be on hand. TRUMBULL is also expected to be there. Those who intend forming part of the crowd on the occasion, from this city, are requested to obtain their tickets at the office, under the Quincy House, to-day or to-morrow, so as to enable the Rail Road agents to be prepared with sufficient accommodation for the crowd. We learn that some 50 are expected to join the train at Camp Point. A glorious time is anticipated.

Huzza for Abe Lincoln!!!

DELEGATES TO THE REPUBLICAN CONGRESSIONAL CONVENTION TO BE HELD AT AUGUSTA, WEDNESDAY, 25th.

A. Jonas, Henry Asbury, B. M. Prentiss, S. P. Delano, J. K. Van Doorn, A. Buddee, J. S. Loomis, J. Tilson, J. Rice, T. Crocker, E. A. Dudly, Capt. J. V. Hanks, Jas. M. Crawford, T. Kilam, J. Benton, Col. J. B. Chittenden, J. Byler, T. B. Warren, J. J. Kirkpatrick, A. M. Smith, G. P. Phinney, J. Pearce, G. W. Williams, A. H. Pettit, J. Q. Adams, S. S. Meacham and R. G. Kay.

THE QUINCY DAILY WHIG, AUGUST 24, 1858

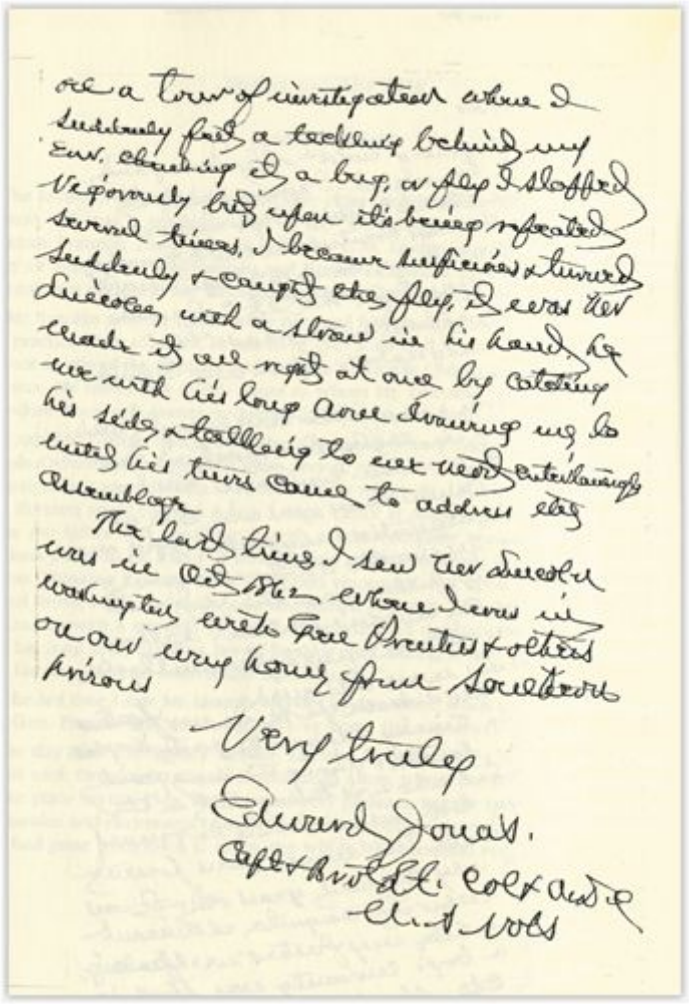
"Augusta Ahoy!" The local Quincy newspaper announces Lincoln's upcoming visit to Augusta: "Huzza for Abe Lincoln!!!"

Courtesy of the Quincy Public Library



EDWARD JONAS, "I SUDDENLY FELT A TICKLING BEHIND MY EAR…"

As Lincoln and Abraham Jonas's son Edward sat listening to the elder Jonas speak at an Augusta political event in the week between the first and second debates, the younger Jonas was playfully teased, he later recalled, by Lincoln himself.

Collection of John E. Boos

By the time he uttered those words in Quincy, Lincoln may have sensed that he was fighting a losing battle. Douglas's campaign chest was far richer than his, and years of gerrymandered voting districts and malapportioned seats in Illinois gave the Democrats a clear electoral advantage; the rule of "one man one vote" was not yet in force. In addition, Lincoln proved too radical for some voters. They feared, despite his denials, that a vote for him was a vote for abolition. Perhaps in an effort to steel himself (even as he reassured others that "we shall carry the day") Lincoln told one of those who met with him at Quincy, the humorist David R. Locke, that he would win the popular vote "but that Douglas would, nevertheless, be elected to the Senate, owing to the skillful manner in which the State had been districted in his interest." That is precisely what happened on Election Day. Lincoln won the popular vote but Douglas became senator. Yet even as he lost his Senate bid, Lincoln knew that he had advanced the cause of human equality, attracted nationwide attention to himself and his platform, and inflicted great political damage upon Douglas. “You can’t overturn a pyramid,” he reputedly observed, “but you can undermine it; that’s what I have been trying to do.”[68] In the aftermath, Henry Asbury wrote to thank Lincoln “for your noble canvass in behalf of Freedom.” Speaking, one suspects, for his law partner Abraham Jonas as well, he encouraged Lincoln not to “be persuaded by soreheads to abandon the positions you and we assumed in the late canvass until we have fought out the battle,” a hint that another, even more decisive electoral contest lay ahead. “I simply write to say,” Asbury concluded, “you have been and are right.” Lincoln sent him back a reassuring reply. “The fight must go on,” he agreed. “The cause of civil liberty must not be surrendered at the end of one, or even, one hundred defeats.”[69] He expressed similar sentiments to the chair of the Republican state central committee, his friend and de facto campaign manager, Norman B. Judd. “Let the past as nothing be,” he wrote him in the election’s aftermath. “For the future my view is that the fight must go on.” A day later, he consoled Judd with wisdom from the East, sometimes attributed to King Solomon and deeply important to his own psychological well-being. “And this too shall pass away,” he wrote, “Never fear.”[70]

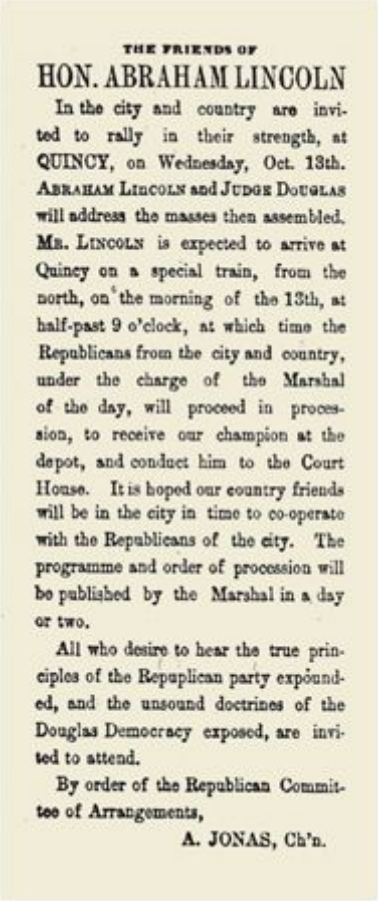
EDWARD JONAS RECALLS HIS FATHER'S FRIEND

The youngest Jonas son, Edward, the only son of Abraham to fight for the Union, fondly recalls in 1917 how Lincoln dressed, talked, listened, and debated in Quincy, fifty-nine years before: "Yes he was perfectly plain & easy to talk to … Mr. Lincoln was such a close listener. Yes Mr. Lincoln used to tell stories, when I happened to be present…"
Shapell Manuscript Collection

Confessing to Judd that in the wake of his defeat he was "absolutely without money now for even household purposes," Lincoln took a long view of his situation—much as he would repeatedly do later, following defeats in the Civil War. Looking ahead, he even promised to contribute $250 toward discharging his party's debt from the election, but only after a real estate investment he had earlier made with Judd was settled.[71]



THE FRIENDS OF

HON. ABRAHAM LINCOLN

In the city and country are invited to rally in their strength, at QUINCY, on Wednesday, Oct. 13th. ABRAHAM LINCOLN and JUDGE DOUGLAS will address the masses then assembled. MR. LINCOLN is expected to arrive at Quincy on a special train, from the north, on the morning of the 13th, at half-past 9 o'clock, at which time the Republicans from the city and country, under the charge of the Marshal of the day, will proceed in procession, to receive our champion at the depot, and conduct him to the Court House. It is hoped our country friends will be in the city in time to co-operate with the Republicans of the city. The programme and order of procession will be published by the Marshal in a day or two.

All who desire to hear the true principles of the Repuplican party expounded, and the unsound doctrines of the Douglas Democracy exposed, are invited to attend.

By order of the Republican Committee of Arrangements,

A. JONAS, Ch'n.

THE QUINCY DAILY WHIG, OCTOBER 7, 1858

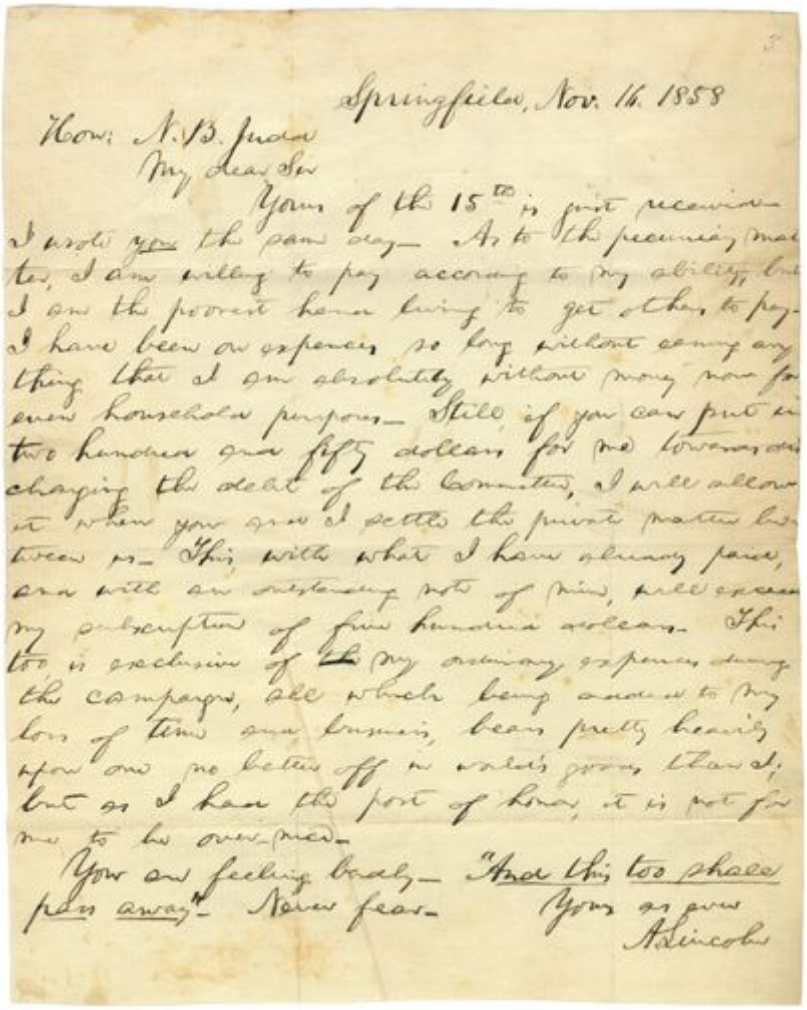
Jonas, as the Republican chairman of the committee for the Lincoln-Douglas debate in Quincy, published this invitation in the local papers: "The Friends of Hon. Abraham Lincoln ... are invited to rally in their strength ... to hear the true principles of the Republican Party expounded, and the unsound doctrines of the Douglas Democracy exposed." Jonas not only signed the printed invitation but introduced Lincoln to the crowd.
Courtesy of the Quincy Public Library

"I write merely to let you know that I am neither dead nor dying," Lincoln wrote reassuringly to a friend on December 12, 1858. His defeat still stung and he experienced moments of dark depression, but in one interview, he compared himself to a boy who, having had his finger squeezed pretty badly, "felt too big to cry and too badly hurt to laugh." He understood, in short, that he had not been wounded nearly as seriously as first he thought. "We shall," he vowed, "beat them in the long run."[72]

The passage of time, the renewal of his law practice, and a rising stream of much-needed income all likely contributed to Lincoln's improved demeanor. He also discovered, perhaps to his surprise, that he had become something of a national celebrity. Some even discerned in him presidential timber.

"You are feeling badly—'And this too shall pass away'—Never fear."



Springfield, Nov. 16. 1858

Hon: N. B. Judd
My dear Sir

Yours of the 15th is just received. I wrote you the same day. As to the pecuniary matter, I am willing to pay according to my ability, but I am the poorest human being to get others to pay. I have been on expenses so long without earning anything that I am absolutely without money now for even household purposes. Still if you can put in two hundred and fifty dollars for me towards discharging the debt of the Committee, I will allow it when you and I settle the private matter between us. This, with what I have already paid, and will on satisfactory note of mine, will exhaust my subscription of five hundred dollars. This too is exclusive of my ordinary expenses during the campaign, all which being added to my loss of time and business, bear pretty heavily upon one no better off in worlds goods than I, but as I have the part of honor, it is not for me to be over-much.

Your are feeling badly— "And this too shall pass away"— Never fear.

Yours as ever
A. Lincoln

LINCOLN TO NORMAN B. JUDD, "NEVER FEAR," NOVEMBER 16, 1858

Following his defeat in the epic 1858 Senate contest, Lincoln writes to campaign manager Judd. "You are feeling badly—'And this too shall pass away'—Never fear." The phrase came from an Eastern folktale attributed to King Solomon. Judd's disappointment would indeed soon pass away: within six weeks Lincoln would be proposed as a possible presidential candidate in the 1860 election.

Shapell Manuscript Collection

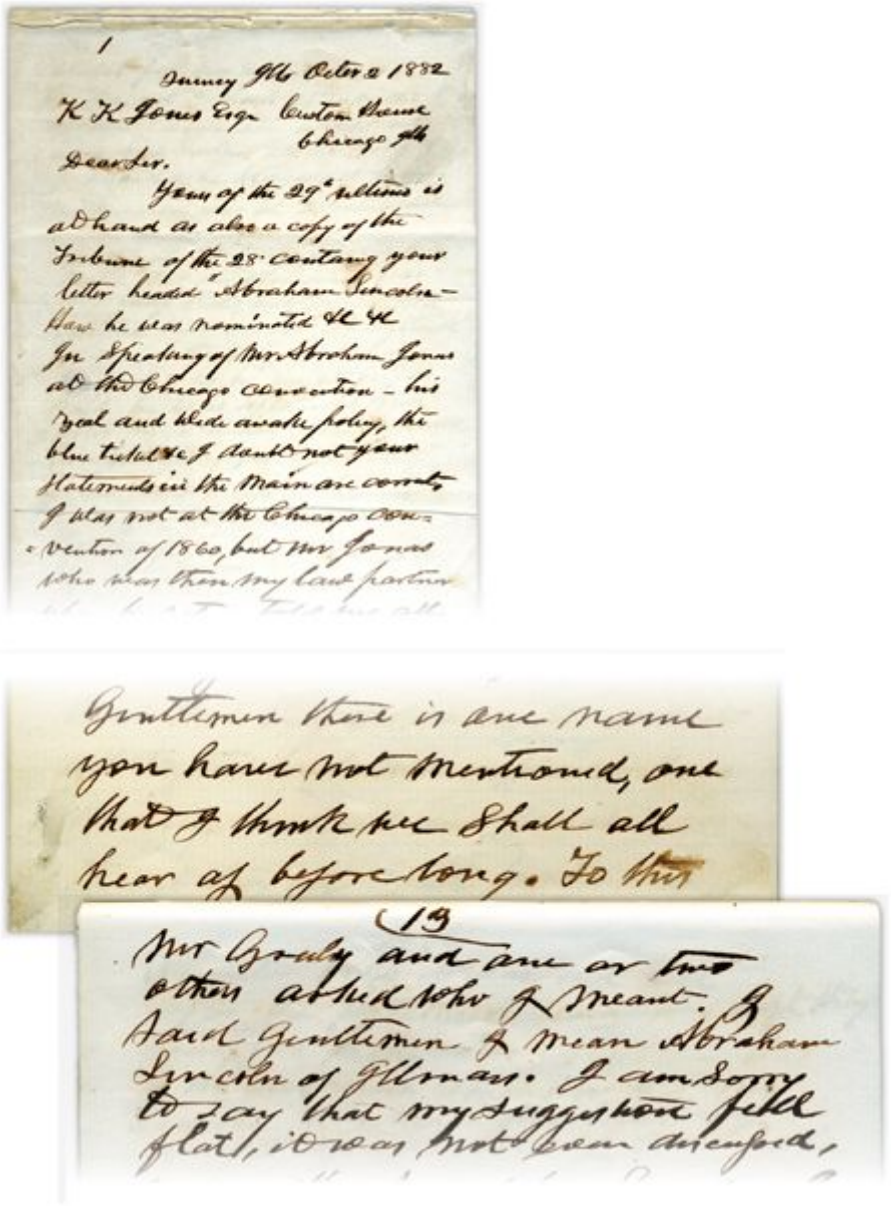
HORACE GREELEY

It was in Horace Greeley's presence in Jonas's law office that Lincoln's name first surfaced as a potential Republican presidential candidate for 1860.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

Abraham Jonas, whose political instincts were widely admired, promoted Lincoln's candidacy for the nation's highest office. When Horace Greeley, editor of the New York Tribune and one of the most influential political figures in the country, showed up in Quincy on December 26, 1858, Jonas called together his Republican friends to meet with him in the law offices of Asbury and Jonas. The talk dealt with "political matters," and Jonas, as well as the others in the room, openly criticized Greeley for his "benevolent attitude" toward Douglas in the senatorial campaign. When the talk turned to the upcoming presidential contest, various names were bandied about including William Seward of New York, Edward Bates of Missouri, and the elderly Supreme Court justice John McClean, whose dissent in the Dred Scott case made him a Republican hero. "Gentlemen, there is one name you have not mentioned," Henry Asbury recalled interjecting when he wrote of the meeting years later. "I mean Abraham Lincoln." The suggestion initially fell flat, Asbury remembered, but then his Jewish partner, Abraham Jonas, reinforced it. "There may be more in Asbury's suggestion than any of us now think," Jonas declared, as if in echo of Lincoln's "And this too shall pass away. Never fear." Events would soon prove both men correct.[74]

"Gentlemen, there is one name you have not mentioned, one that I think we shall all hear of before long ... I said

Gentlemen I mean Abraham Lincoln of Illinois."



Gentlemen there is one name you have not mentioned, one that I think we shall all hear of before long. To this

13

Mr Greely and one or two others asked who I meant. I said Gentlemen I mean Abraham Lincoln of Illinois. I am sorry to say that my suggestion fell flat, it was not seen accepted,

HENRY ASBURY TO K.K. JONES, OCTOBER 2, 1882

A twenty-two-page letter in which Jonas's law partner Henry Asbury details Lincoln's rise to the presidency—and the key role played throughout by Jonas. Recounted here is the meeting with Horace Greeley—put together at the last minute "with the indomitable energy & readiness, characteristic of Jonas" at their law office—in which Lincoln's name was first proposed as a candidate for president. Also described, in detail, is how Jonas orchestrated Lincoln's surprising nomination at the 1860 Republican Convention.

Jacob Rader Marcus Center of the American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio

ABRAHAM LINCOLN, 1858

The self-proclaimed "homeliest man in the State of Illinois" is generally thought to have sat for this beardless portrait in 1858, in Peoria. A slight variant of this pose, taken at the same sitting, was used in the 1860 presidential campaign poster about which young Grace Bedell, whose father had brought home the poster, famously wrote to Lincoln with advice on how to obtain more votes: "if you will let your whiskers grow ... you would look a great deal better for your face is so thin ... then you would be President."

Shapell Manuscript Collection

CHAPTER THREE

ONE OF MY MOST VALUED FRIENDS

1858–1860

"We have no chance in the world for the Catholics," Abraham Jonas argued, as he laid out a strategy for winning new recruits into the Republican Party's ranks. Writing to Senator Lyman Trumbull on the same December day as he talked politics with Horace Greeley in Quincy, Jonas urged the party to focus on political outsiders. Specifically, he proposed an effort, "preparatory to the fight of 1860," to win over "the liberal and freethinking Germans," the anti-Catholic "Know-nothings," and most interesting of all, "the Israelites."[1]

The context for Jonas's plan was "the Jewish abduction case at Rome," known as the Mortara Affair. Six-year-old Edgardo Mortara had been secretly baptized as an infant by his nursemaid in Bologna and, as a consequence, was torn away from his parents' Jewish home in 1858 and handed over to the Church to be raised as a Catholic. The case provided grist for the anti-Catholic mill in America and attracted enormous public attention. Yet when American Jewish leaders sought help from Secretary of State Lewis Cass and President James Buchanan in freeing the youngster, they were rebuffed. The administration solemnly explained that the United States had "neither the right nor the duty … to express a moral censorship over the conduct of other independent governments." In reality, the concern was that foreign governments might link the Mortara Affair to American slavery, which similarly turned a blind eye to the forcible separation of (slave) children from their parents. Fearful of being criticized for America's own immoral behavior, its leaders resolved not to criticize others.[2]

This decision to take no action on Edgardo Mortara's behalf, according to Jonas, "offended all my church" and presented the Republicans with a golden opportunity. "Could you not," he asked Trumbull, "introduce some Resolution into the Senate on the subject and get the Republican vote for it?" A vigorous resolution that was "anti-Cass in sentiment," he promised, would "make in this county [Adams County, Illinois] a change of 100 votes, and unite the Jewish [sic] all over the Union." Since he calculated that "in the free states there are 50,000 Jewish votes, two thirds of whom vote the democratic ticket," his goal, with the help of a Senate resolution, was to get those votes "all on our side" by Election Day.[3]

ABRAHAM JONAS STRATEGIZES WITH SENATOR LYMAN TRUMBULL, DECEMBER 26, 1858

The votes of 50,000 American Jews, Jonas contended, were up for grabs in 1860. The Buchanan administration, which had mishandled the outrageous Mortara Affair—in which a Jewish child was secretly baptized and then kidnapped and raised as a Catholic in Rome—had offended, Jonas declared, "all my church."

Courtesy of the Library of Congress

While Jonas was working behind the scenes to boost the Republican Party's ranks, Abraham Lincoln was busy with his law practice. His run for the Senate had, as he had earlier explained to Norman Judd, greatly reduced his income in 1858, and he was working hard to recoup. That meant fewer political engagements. "I regret the necessity of declining," he wrote in response to Judd's request to speak in Morris, Illinois. "This year I must devote to my private business." In a more colorful letter, he apologetically informed a prominent Republican who sought his presence in Keokuk, Iowa, that "I shall go to the wall for bread and meat, if I neglect my business this year as well as last."[4]

Attending to business, however, did not preclude Lincoln from keeping abreast of politics. "When you can find leisure, write me your present impressions of Douglas's movements," he wrote Lyman Trumbull early in 1859.[5] A few months later, he warned Republicans in Chicago not to be taken in by Stephen A. Douglas's ideas: "Judge Douglas," he charged, "would lead us inevitably to the nationalization of slavery."[6] Promoting the Republican Party and opposing the spread of slavery were Lincoln's primary political goals at this time. In response to those who sought to promote him as a candidate in the 1860 election, he modestly replied, "I do not think myself fit for the Presidency."[7]

"We should look beyond our noses"

LINCOLN TO SHUYLER COLFAX, JULY 6, 1859

Lincoln's strategy in 1860 was to avoid regional issues, which were likely to distract and divide Republicans and ruin their chances for a victory—what he called "apples of discord"—and instead "look beyond our noses" by focusing on the great issue that united them, namely to prevent the spread and nationalization of slavery.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

Evidence of nativism in the Republican ranks raised grave suspicions about the party, particularly among Germans and Jews, that threatened to upset Lincoln and Jonas's political calculations. Lincoln was particularly worried about "the movement against foreigners in Massachusetts," where, with Republican support, a popular initiative looked to impose upon foreigners a further two-year wait, following their naturalization, before they could vote or hold office. Lincoln urged Republicans to resist "the temptation in different localities to 'platform' for something which will be popular just there, but which, nevertheless, will be a firebrand elsewhere."[8] Nativists, however, ignored him.

Once the Massachusetts initiative passed, German-American papers expressed outrage at the new law, particularly since no similar wait time was imposed upon ex-slaves or free blacks who moved to the state. Carl Schurz, a leader of the German-American community (and a friend of many Jews and later of Lincoln) who had battled for social rights in his home country before escaping to the United States, delivered a celebrated address at Faneuil Hall in Boston entitled "True Americanism," where he spoke out boldly in favor of "toleration" and "equality of rights" and against the state initiative.[9] Other leaders of the German immigrant community demanded that Republicans everywhere speak out in opposition to what Massachusetts had done. The German-American vote, they hinted, hung in the balance. In a letter to Theodore Canisius, editor of Springfield's German newspaper, the Illinois Staats-Anzeiger, Lincoln lost no time ("I have written this hastily") in complying. His statement aimed not only to distance himself from nativism but to stress the consistency of his thinking, and his desire to elevate people of all kinds, blacks and foreigners included:

> As I understand the Massachusetts provision, I am against its adoption in Illinois, or in any other place, where I have a right to oppose it. Understanding the spirit of our institutions to aim at the elevation of men, I am opposed to whatever tends to degrade them. I have some little notoriety for commiserating the oppressed condition of the negro; and I should be strangely inconsistent if I could favor any project for curtailing the existing rights of white men, even though born in different lands, and speaking different languages from myself.[10]

Lincoln's law partner, William H. Herndon, delivered a major address on this same subject, published in the Daily State Journal on May 17, 1859, which explicitly included Jews among those deserving of equality. In distancing the Republican Party from nativism, he set forth a capacious vision of "freedom and justice to all" that ran parallel to Lincoln's own and was, for its time, extraordinary:

> I know of no distinction among men, except those of the heart and head. I now repeat that, though I am native born, my country is the World, and my love for man is as broad as the race, and as deep as its humanity. As a matter of course I include native and foreign people, Protestant and Catholic, "Jew and Gentile." I go the full length of justice to all men—equality among all American citizens and freedom to the race of man.[11]

Two weeks later, on May 30, Lincoln, using his own funds, purchased a printing press and type for the German-language Illinois Staats-Anzeiger, with the proviso that it promote Republican Party policies. His goal was to win over German Americans and to ensure that German-speaking voters, Gentiles and Jews alike, would be welcomed into the Republican camp.[12]

Meanwhile, Stephen A. Douglas was stumping for the Democrats. In Ohio, where both the governor and the legislature were on the ballot in 1859, Lincoln agreed to counter Douglas's appeals to "popular sovereignty" by delivering five public speeches over two days in Columbus, Dayton, Hamilton, and Cincinnati. The last of these, at Fifth Street Market in Cincinnati on September 17, 1859, attracted a crowd of thousands; it was "one of the best-attended events in Lincoln's career before he became president."[13] Cincinnati was by far the largest Ohio city at that time, with a population of some 160,000. As many as 10,000 of those residents were Jews; no Jewish community west of the Alleghenies was larger.[14] How many of those Jews turned out to hear Lincoln is unknown, but a lithograph produced for the event's fiftieth anniversary preserves the name "Rosenbaum" on a store sign atop the building from whose portico he spoke.[15] Jews must have heard something about his speech for it was broadly covered in the press and, according to one historian, "was the most widely read speech of his pre-presidency."[16]

LINCOLN'S FRIEND—AND ADVOCATE FOR JEWS—CARL SCHURZ

CARL SCHURZ, like Lincoln, was intimately acquainted with Jews and had come to know and respect them. His appreciation for Jews began back with his father in Liblar, Germany, who had a close Jewish friend whom he revered as honest and wise. Schurz befriended Jews at the University of Bonn and in German revolutionary circles, where he achieved great renown. Later, in America, where he settled in 1852, one of his closest friends was the pioneering Jewish pediatrician Abraham Jacobi. Schurz's wife, Margarethe Meyer, likewise grew up among Jews, and in America was sometimes mistaken for one. During the Civil War, Schurz, a staunch Republican, served as a brigadier general. The 82nd Illinois Infantry Company C, a Jewish company, served under him, and he often boasted of its commander, Edward S. Salomon.

Schurz remained close to the Jewish community throughout his life and spoke out frequently against anti-Semitism. "Jews have done as much as any other class of citizens,—nay … the Jews have, in proportion to their numbers, done far more," he declared in a salute to Jews in 1888 upon the dedication of a Jewish charity home. "I repeat this with all the greater willingness, as I have recently had occasion to observe the motive springs, the character and the aims of the so-called 'Anti-semitic movement'—a movement whose dark spirit of fanaticism and persecution insults the humane enlightenment of the nineteenth century.…"

Carl Schurz
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

In his more than two-hour-long address, Lincoln sought to calm those who accused him of dividing the country. He made clear that the Republicans had no intention of interfering with slavery where it already existed, such as across the river in Kentucky, but only opposed slavery's extension into new territories. Countering Douglas's ahistorical view that the nation's founders had allowed each state's citizens to decide the issue of slavery on their own, Lincoln reminded Cincinnatians that the reason why they had no slaves, unlike their across-the-river neighbors in Kentucky, was because the Founders had made that decision for them. The Northwest Ordinance of 1787 explicitly banned slavery and involuntary servitude in the territories that became Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin. Finally, Lincoln turned to the coming presidential election. Insisting that principles, not sectional issues, would determine who the Republican candidate was, he reassured his listeners that "there are plenty of men in the slave states that are altogether good enough … to be either President or Vice President." But he also warned against compromising principles or putting forth a man, like Douglas, who sought to be all things to all people. "He who is not for us is against us," he concluded, quoting the Gospels.[17] "He who gathereth not with us scattereth."

LINCOLN IN CINCINNATI

This lithograph commemorates the famous speech Lincoln gave there on September 17, 1859. "I think slavery is wrong, morally and politically," Lincoln declared. "I desire that it should be no further spread in these United States, and I should not object if it should gradually terminate in the whole Union."
Cincinnati Museum Center

"How would you feel if we nominated you for President?" a visitor asked Lincoln on the morning following his Cincinnati speech.[18] Lincoln's response to this enticing question is not known, but the widely publicized address catapulted Lincoln back into the presidential fray, positioning him in the ideological center of the Republican Party. Over the next seven months, he delivered thirty speeches in eight states and the Kansas Territory, greatly enhancing his national visibility and broadening his own familiarity with the country.[19] Consistent with the strategy that Jonas had laid out early in the campaign, Lincoln often met with "liberal and freethinking Germans" as well as "Israelites" on these trips; sometimes they were the same people.

So it was when Lincoln traveled to the Kansas Territory in December 1859. This was the farthest west that he ever traveled, and he did so at the invitation of some fifty-three Republican merchants, bankers, and businessmen, organized by Lincoln's friend and distant relative Mark W. Delahay. Their goal, with the coming presidential election in mind, was to win Kansas, "bleeding" from pitched battles between proslavery and antislavery activists, for the Republican Party. They assured Lincoln, who himself had plenty of experience in frontier communities, that they would try to make his "expenses light," his "visit agreeable," and his "welcome hearty."[20] Significantly, one of the signatories on this invitation was a pioneering Leavenworth Jew named Jonas (James) Wollman (1824–1905). The famed Wollman Skating Rink in New York is named for the Wollmans, whose descendants included the two brothers who founded the tax preparation company H&R Block. Born in Kempen-in-Posen, Prussia, where at one time he planned to become a rabbi, Wollman had arrived in the United States in 1851 and moved to Leavenworth soon after his marriage to Betty Kohn of St. Louis, in 1855. There he took advantage of the opportunities created by the Kansas-Nebraska Act and opened up a clothing store to service the many newcomers flooding into the well-located city. He soon expanded into dry goods, jewelry, books, and rubber goods. He also played an active role in the development of Jewish institutions in the city, including its first synagogue and cemetery. Wollman courageously sided with the minority in Leavenworth, many of them German immigrants like himself, who staunchly opposed the spread of slavery into the state. For a time, his store even occupied the same building as Delahay's antislavery newspaper, the Territorial Register. When "border ruffians" supportive of slavery's spread destroyed that paper in 1855, Wollman was taken into protective custody. He and his family were threatened with harm repeatedly; for a time, the Wollmans were driven from the city by proslavery forces and on several occasions his wife and infant daughter were detained. All this goes far to explain why Lincoln, who so vigorously opposed the spread of slavery into Kansas, sat down to dinner with the Wollmans on his visit to Leavenworth. Some sources claim that he dined with them and another local Jewish merchant family, Simon and Amalia Abeles, at the Delahay home. Others insist that it was the Wollmans themselves who hosted the dinner for Lincoln. Family lore holds that Betty Wolman was deeply impressed with Lincoln and predicted, when he departed, that someday the "great man" would "be President of the United States." It likewise recalls that Lincoln cradled the Wollmans' sixteen-month-old son, Henry, in his arms. What seems indisputable is that such interactions as he had with the Wollmans helped to further acquaint Lincoln with Jews. He understood that "Israelites" like them could form part of a new Republican coalition.[21]

THE WOLLMAN SHOP

On his visit to Leavenworth in 1859, which included a dinner or two with the Jewish leader and scholar Jonas Wollman and his family, Lincoln was quoted in the New York Daily Tribune as saying he regarded it as "one of the happiest events of his life."
The Kansas State Historical Society

Lincoln similarly met with Jews when he visited New York. He had been invited to New York in October 1859 in the wake of his widely publicized success in the Midwest. "We want to hear a speech from him, such a one as he delivered in Cincinnati," a New York lecture promoter explained to William H. Bailhache, coeditor of the Illinois State Journal.[22] Easterners hardly knew Abraham Lincoln, and he was excited by the opportunity to introduce himself but felt that he needed time to prepare.[23] His address, delivered on February 27, 1860, in the Great Hall of Cooper Union in New York City, was one of the most important of his career up to that time, and has been described as "the speech that made Abraham Lincoln president."[24]

ABRAM J. DITTENHOEFER

When Jewish lawyer Dittenhoefer met Lincoln on the day of the Cooper Union Address, he was impressed, and when they met again at Lincoln's hotel the day after, he was congratulatory—although Lincoln himself felt unsure his speech had been a success. In the 1864 reelection campaign, Dittenhoefer would become a Republican elector for Lincoln.
Museum of the City of New York

New York City was home to the largest Jewish community in the United States in 1860. Some twenty-seven synagogues and over forty-four Jewish charitable and educational societies served the city's 40,000 Jews. One out of every twenty New Yorkers was Jewish, the bulk of them recent immigrants from central Europe. Many of New York's Jews worked in the clothing trade. They depended for their livelihood upon Southern cotton and produced clothes destined for Southern markets. Many of them also had friends and relatives in the South. Unsurprisingly, therefore, they tended to sympathize with the South. Even if they expressed no personal support for slavery, preservation of the Union was still their paramount concern. As a result, the majority of Jews sided with the Democrats. A significant minority, however, especially Jewish liberals, freethinkers, and young people, vigorously disagreed. Horrified by the specter of slavery's spread, they gravitated toward the Republican Party. They were particularly interested in what a man like Abraham Lincoln had to say.[25]

How many Jews sat among the audience of over 900 that listened to Lincoln's address at Cooper Union is impossible to know.[26] But at least one, a young attorney named Abram J. Dittenhoefer (1836–1919), was actually sitting on the platform that night. Years later, he recounted what he had seen:

> Mr. Lincoln never ranted, but gave emphatic emphasis to what he wished especially to "put across" by a slowness and marked clearness of enunciation. His voice was unpleasant, almost rasping and shrill at first. Perhaps that was due to the fact that he found it necessary to force it. A little later, he seemed to control his voice better, and his earnestness invited and easily held the attention of his auditors.[27]

Dittenhoefer was only twenty-three when he witnessed the Cooper Union Address, but he had already made a name for himself in Republican circles. Born in the South, he had converted to antislavery in college, stumped for Frémont four years earlier, and then converted his father, a merchant, to the Republican cause. Explicit Jewish considerations, he confessed, prompted his conversion. Having read how Senator Benjamin Wade characterized Judah Benjamin, the proslavery Jewish senator from Louisiana, as "an Israelite with Egyptian principles," it struck Dittenhoefer "with great force that the Israelite … whose ancestors were enslaved in Egypt, ought not to uphold slavery in free America, and could not do so without bringing disgrace upon himself."[28]

LINCOLN AT COOPER UNION

On the night of February 27, 1860, at least 900 people heard Lincoln give one of the most famous speeches of his life. "No man ever before made such an impression," Horace Greeley proclaimed, "on his first appeal to a New York audience." The speech, punctuated by lyrical phrases, including "right makes might," made Lincoln, overnight, a national candidate.
Cooper Union

Dittenhoefer warmed toward Lincoln after hearing him at Cooper Union, especially when he forthrightly declared slavery wrong and opposed its spread yet promised, in moderate tones, "to let it alone where it is, because that much is due to the necessity arising from its actual presence in the nation." As for Lincoln's famous closing line, which reversed the standard aphorism and declared, "Let us have faith that right makes might and in that faith, let us, to the end, dare to do our duty as we understand it," Dittenhoefer recalled that he and those around him responded less than enthusiastically. Many, he concluded, "left the auditorium that night, as I did, in a seriously thoughtful mood." The next morning, according to Dittenhoefer, Lincoln himself questioned his performance—indeed, he was a harsh critic of his own speeches, even his greatest ones. "I am not sure," Dittenhoefer quoted him as saying, "that I made a success."[29]

Subsequently, after the speech had been widely reprinted and discussed, Dittenhoefer knew better; he described the Cooper Union address as "epoch-making." Most scholars agree. According to historian Harold Holzer, for example, "Abraham Lincoln did triumph in New York. He delivered a learned, witty, and exquisitely reasoned address that electrified his elite audience and, more important, reverberated in newspapers and pamphlets alike until it reached tens of thousands of Republican voters across the North. He … departed politically reborn."[30]

As Lincoln's bid for the Republican nomination gathered steam in 1860, requests poured in for copies of his major speeches, particularly his 1858 debates with Stephen A. Douglas. Voters who had not heard Lincoln with their own ears wanted to have the opportunity to read what he said, and Lincoln's supporters wanted to be able to quote him verbatim in speeches they made on his behalf. Lincoln had received requests for transcripts of his debates with Douglas at least as early as January 1859, but at that time he expressed no interest in their publication beyond the press. By late March, he was enthusiastic about publishing the debates ("I would really be pleased with a publication substantially as you propose"). He insisted, consistent with his character, that the publication be "mutual, and fair," reproducing transcripts from each side "as reported by his own friends."

Lincoln himself worked hard on the volume, which, like many a book, took longer than expected to appear. By February 1860, Abraham Jonas was impatient to obtain a copy and wrote directly to Lincoln: "I want to get a copy of the book publishing in Ohio containing the speeches of your self and Douglas in the Campaign of last year, can you procure me a copy, or advise me, how and where I can get one—"? Lincoln responded at once, reporting that the books "would not be out before March." In fact, they did not appear until April, just a month prior to the Republican Convention. In a particularly warm and impressive letter to a member of the Jewish community, Lincoln then proceeded, revealingly, to express his friendship for Jonas in singularly intimate terms ("you are one of my most valued friends") and to promise him one of the hundred gratis copies that had been allocated to him by the publisher. He kept his word. The copy he personally inscribed to Jonas of Political Debates Between Hon. Abraham Lincoln and Hon. Stephen A. Douglas, In the Celebrated Campaign of 1858 in Illinois survives to this day. The debates themselves went through eight editions, with some 50,000 copies distributed prior to the election, and became a campaign bestseller.[31]

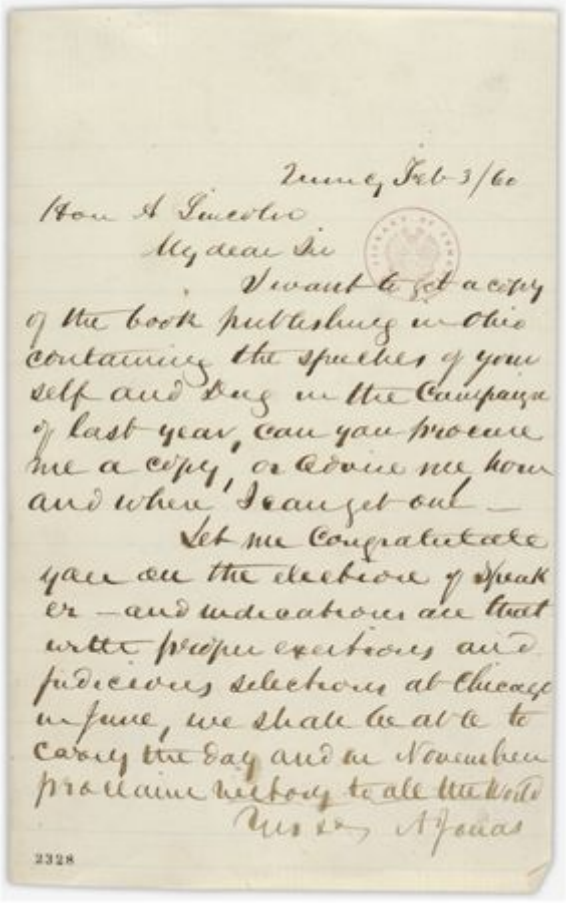
As one of Lincoln's most valued friends, Jonas was determined to see Lincoln nominated by the Republican Party for the presidency. Senator William H. Seward of New York, however, was the front-running candidate for that position. A staunch opponent of slavery, Seward in 1858 had incautiously warned of a coming "irrepressible conflict" between the North and the South. "The United States," he declared, "must and will, sooner or later, become either entirely a slaveholding nation, or entirely a free-labor nation." Fearing that such militant talk could doom his electoral chances, his advisors dispatched him on an eight-month tour of Europe and the Middle East, including, in September 1859, Jerusalem.[32] During that voluntary exile, Lincoln delivered his well-publicized speech in Cincinnati, which led to the success at Cooper Union and greatly improved his own chances for nomination.



Quincy Feb 3/60

Hon A Lincoln

My dear Sir

I want to get a copy of the book publishing in Ohio containing the speeches of yourself and Doug in the Campaign of last year, can you procure me a copy, or advise me how and when I can get one —

Let me Congratulate you on the decision of Speaker — and indications are that with proper exertions and judicious selections at Chicago in June, we shall be able to carry the day and in November proclaim victory to all the World

Yours truly A Jonas

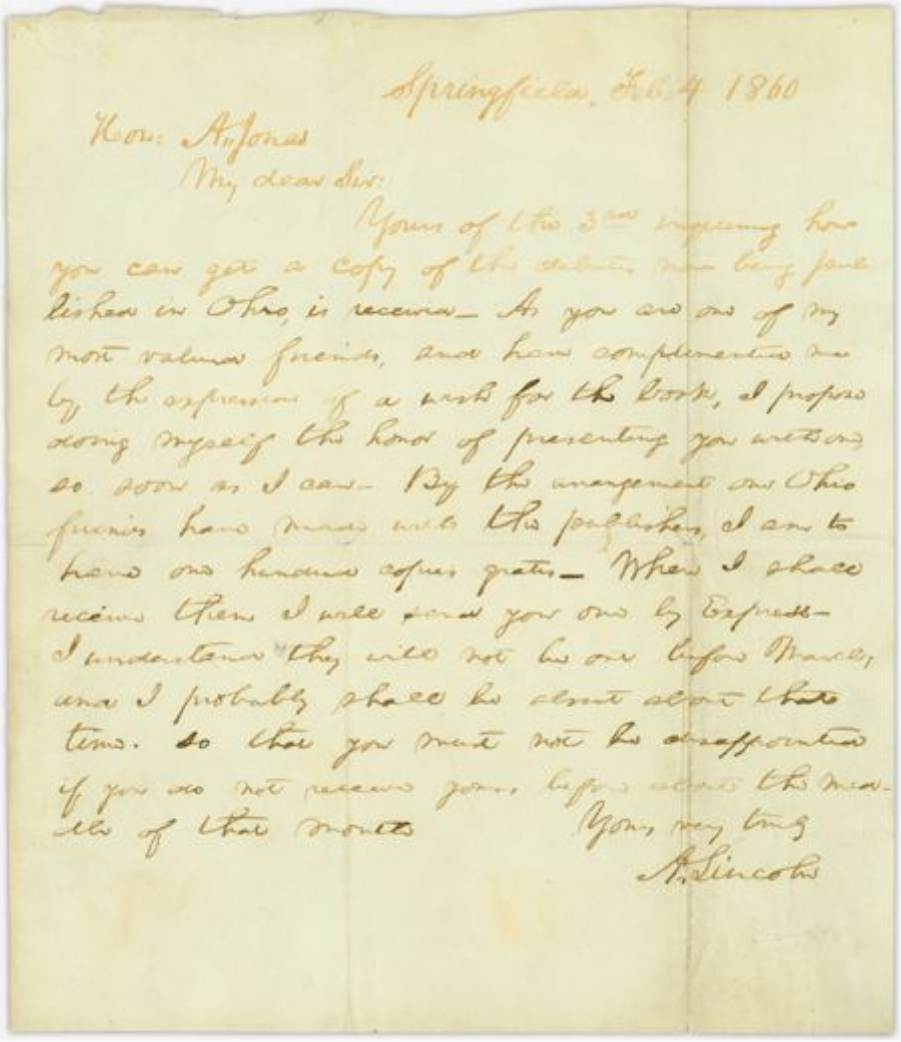
2328

ABRAHAM JONAS TO LINCOLN, FEBRUARY 3, 1860

Eager to obtain a copy of the Lincoln-Douglas debates book, Jonas predicts his friend's ascension to the presidency: "... at Chicago in June, we shall be able to carry the day and in November proclaim victory to all the World."

Courtesy of the Library of Congress

"As you are one of my most valued friends..."



Springfield, Feb. 4 1860

Hon: A. Jonas

My dear Sir:

Yours of the 3rd inquiring how you can get a copy of the debate now being published in Ohio, is received. As you are one of my most valued friends, and have complimented me by the expression of a wish for the book, I propose doing myself the honor of presenting you with one, as soon as I can. By the arrangement our Ohio friends have made with the publisher, I am to have one hundred copies gratis. When I shall receive them I will send you one by express. I understand they will not be out before March, and I probably shall be absent about that time. So that you must not be disappointed if you do not receive yours before about the middle of that month.

Your very truly

A. Lincoln

LINCOLN TO ABRAHAM JONAS: "… ONE OF MY MOST VALUED FRIENDS," FEBRUARY 4, 1860

Replying to Jonas's request from the previous day for a copy of the Lincoln-Douglas debates, Lincoln writes, for the only known time in his life, a phrase directly acknowledging what Jonas's friendship meant to him: "As you are one of my most valued friends, and have complimented me by the expression of a wish for the book, I propose doing myself the honor of presenting you with one, as soon as I can."
Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library & Museum

The other major Republican candidates for the presidency were Edward Bates of Missouri, Simon Cameron of Pennsylvania, and Salmon P. Chase of Ohio. With long careers in politics behind them, all of these men had significant enemies, personal and political. Lincoln, with much less national experience, aimed to be everybody's second choice. His plan was "to give no offence to others—leave them in a mood to come to us, if they shall be compelled to give up their first love."[33]

As Republicans gathered on May 16 for their convention in Chicago's cavernous 18,000-square-foot Wigwam—so-called because it was built to resemble an Indian loghouse—the goal of Jonas and other Lincoln supporters was precisely to encourage delegates "to give up their first love" and shift to favorite son Lincoln as an electable second choice. To do that, they had to prevent Seward from carrying the convention on the first ballot. Seward's supporters felt supremely confident. They enjoyed superior manpower, ample funding, and long political experience. But they underestimated the opposition, including Abraham Jonas. Though not himself a delegate, Jonas was present in Chicago and actively promoted Lincoln's cause among Midwest delegations. Jonas's law partner Henry Asbury's retrospective account, published by an Illinois party operative named K. K. Jones, reveals that beyond that first auspicious meeting with Horace Greeley, Jonas continued to play an important backstage role in the maneuverings that led to Lincoln's nomination.

"The evening before and the day of the nomination," Jones recalled, "it had become apparent that the Seward forces, abetted by the then Chairman of the National Committee [Edwin D. Morgan of New York], had manipulated the 'blue tickets' so that it was feared there would be a large majority of Seward men in the Wigwam when the nominating speeches were made. They were prepared for a grand display of enthusiasm when William H. Seward should be named, and intended thus to 'boom things.'" A huge pro-Seward demonstration, his supporters believed, would persuade wavering delegates to vote for Seward on the first ballot so as to align themselves with a winner. Abraham Jonas, according to Jones, got wind of the plan and "took it upon himself to counteract this nicely laid scheme." Some 10,000 people from Central Illinois and Indiana were rounded up to stage an even bigger convention demonstration when Lincoln's name was placed in nomination. To ensure that these outsiders could gain admission to the Wigwam, Lincoln's supporters did just what Seward's had done: they "manipulated" the blue admission tickets, printing extras which they distributed to their friends in order to pack the hall. "I have got the thing all fixed," Jones quoted Jonas as telling him. "Our friends are stationed in every part of this Wigwam, and when 'Old Abe' is put in nomination we will show our Eastern brethren what Western vim, Western endurance and Western enthusiasm can do." That, in fact, is what happened.

The nomination of Seward touched off, as expected, a "grand demonstration"—what the convention minutes describe as "prolonged applause and cheers." To the surprise of everyone, however, the nomination of favorite son Abraham Lincoln resulted in another grand "outburst of enthusiasm," described in the convention minutes as "immense applause and cheers." This was taken as a signal of the convention's fervor for Lincoln, especially since demonstrations on behalf of Bates, Chase, Cameron, and other candidates proved far more muted. Seward, as a result, failed to win the nomination on the first ballot. As Lincoln's supporters had hoped, numerous delegates then abandoned their "first love" and embraced Lincoln. He won the nomination on the third ballot.[34]

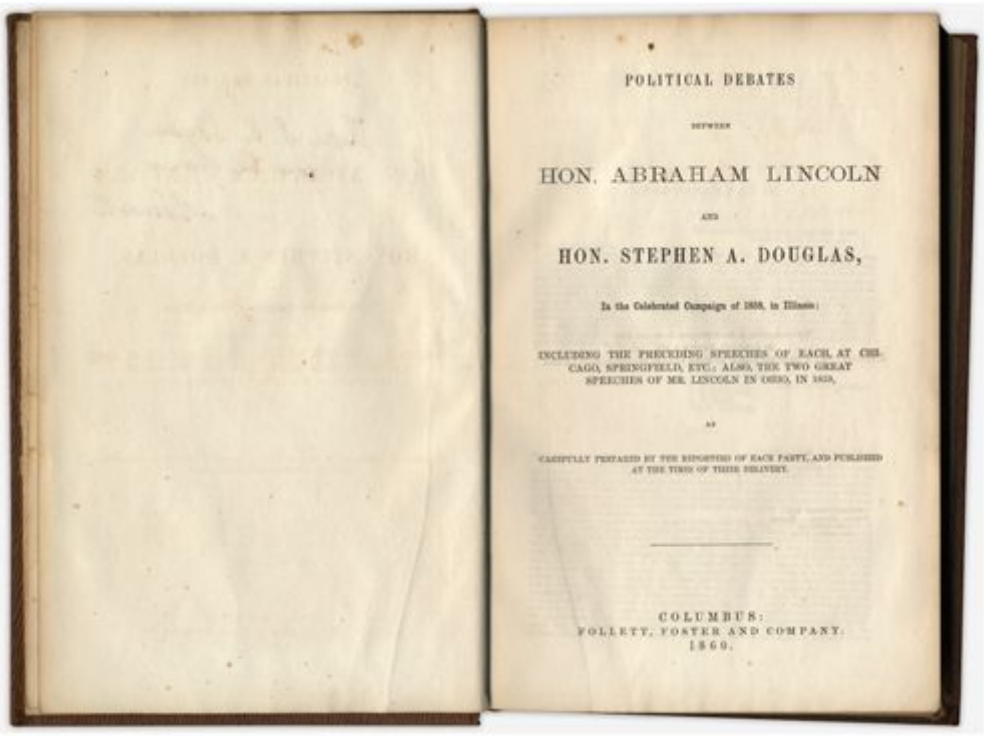
In addition to Jonas and Dittenhoefer, who attended the Republican convention in nonvoting capacities, at least one Jewish delegate actively participated and voted in the convention: Lewis Naphtali Dembitz (1833–1907) of Louisville, Kentucky. An Orthodox Jew, attorney, and polymath (he read twelve languages), Dembitz immigrated to the United States, along with relatives named Brandeis and Wehle, in response to the failed 1848 liberal revolutions in central Europe. He fervently opposed slavery and, like Lincoln and Jonas, revered Henry Clay; he even named one of his sons after him (another would later be named after Abraham Lincoln). At twenty-seven, he was already a significant Republican political leader in Kentucky and one of the city's leading lawyers. Consequently, he was appointed to the select committee that prepared the order of business for the convention. Tradition holds that he delivered a nominating address for Lincoln at the convention, but if so that was not recorded in the official proceedings. Dembitz did vote for Lincoln at the convention but never had the opportunity to meet him. Later, in addition to authoring many distinguished publications, he greatly influenced his talented nephew, the future Supreme Court justice Louis D. Brandeis, who changed his middle name to Dembitz in his uncle's honor.[35]

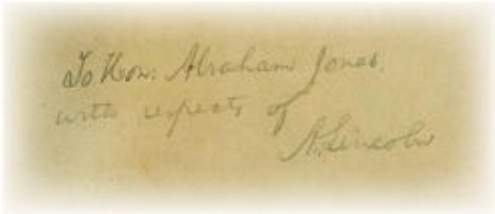


POLITICAL DEBATES

HON. ABRAHAM LINCOLN

HON. STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS,

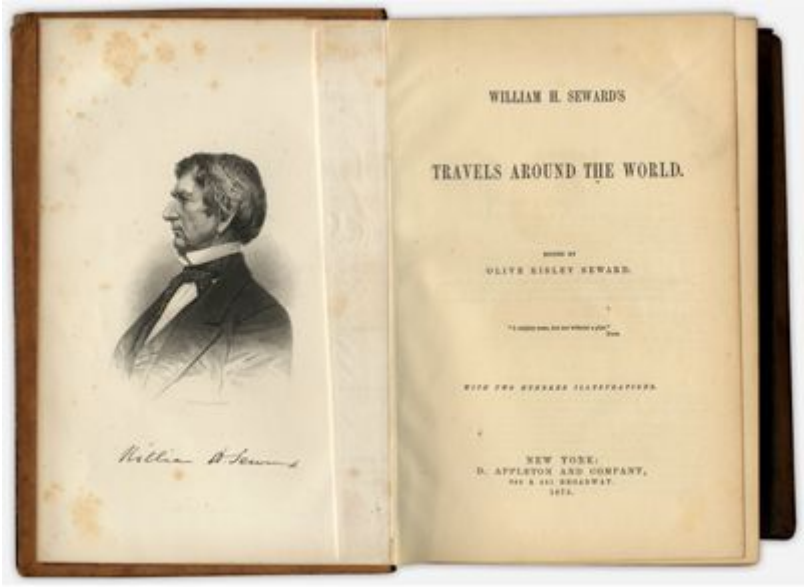
COLUMBUS:
FOLLETT, FOSTER AND COMPANY.
1860.



INSCRIBED LINCOLN TO ABRAHAM JONAS DEBATE BOOK, 1860

Of the hundred copies of the debates given to Lincoln by the publisher to distribute to friends, forty-two presentation copies are now known to exist, most of which are inscribed in pencil. Four copies, however, are in ink. Apparently, Lincoln noticed that the paper tended to absorb the ink, creating a spread-out, "feathery" pattern, and he therefore switched from pen to pencil.

Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library & Museum



WILLIAM H. SEWARD'S

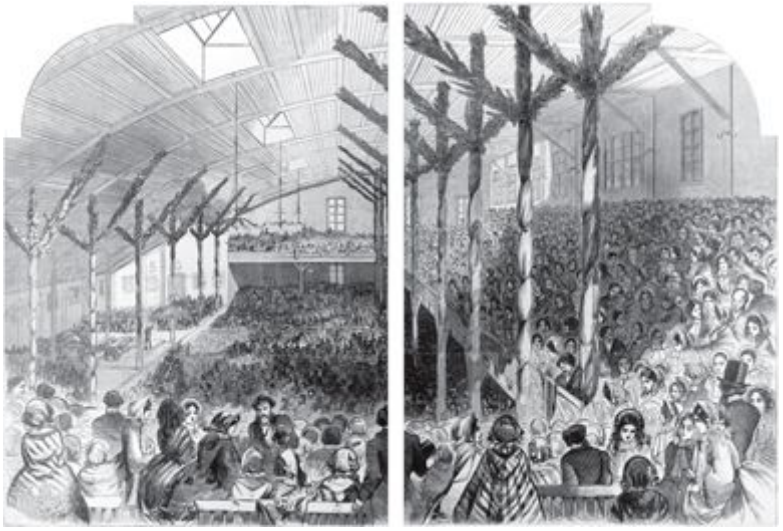
TRAVELS AROUND THE WORLD.

OLIVE RISLEY SEWARD.

NEW YORK:
D. APPLETON AND COMPANY,
1873.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD GOES TO JERUSALEM

In late 1859, as the front-runner for the Republican nomination, Senator Seward of New York traveled abroad, which included a trip to Jerusalem. The trip coincided with Lincoln's rise to prominence, and his transformative Cooper Union address. Seward visited the Holy Land a second time, in 1871.
William H. Seward's Travels Around the World, 1873



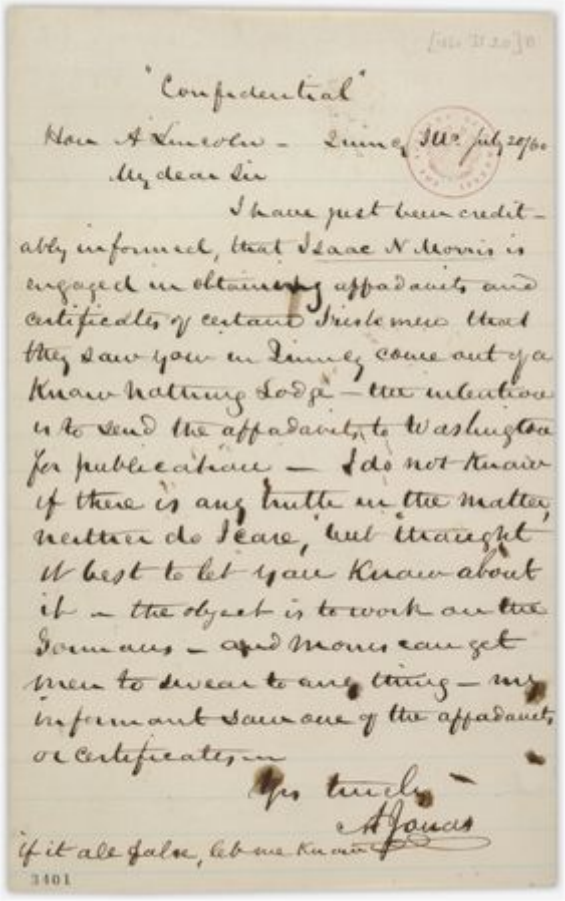
THE "WIGWAM" CONVENTION HALL, CHICAGO, MAY 18, 1860

In the Wigwam, on Lincoln's home turf of Illinois, Abraham Jonas and Henry Asbury played an important backstage role in the orchestrations that led Lincoln to maneuver the nomination away from Seward.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

The other Jewish delegate[36] at the convention was Moritz Pinner (1828–1911). Born in the Prussian province of Posen (today Poznan, Poland) and the son of a rabbi, Pinner immigrated to America in 1851 and soon became involved in abolitionism. He was one of those quintessential "liberal and freethinking Germans" and "Israelites" whom Jonas sought for the Republican coalition. In strife-torn Kansas, Pinner edited the uncompromisingly antislavery Kansas Post (which, when published in Kansas City, Missouri, was known as the Missouri Post.) At the state Republican convention in Missouri, reputedly attended by only 134 people, he played an active role, speaking out on behalf of his fellow Germans and opposing efforts to compel Republican delegates to cast their vote for the state's favorite son, Edward Bates. Though acquainted both with Bates and with Lincoln, Pinner favored William Seward. He resigned from Missouri's delegation when denied the right to vote his conscience and subsequently worked to undermine Bates at the Chicago national convention, greatly to Lincoln's advantage. As a result, he was not officially listed as a conference delegate from Missouri and did not cast any ballots.[37]

Pinner, like many of the other Jews committed to the Republican Party, spent the months following the Republican national convention campaigning for Abraham Lincoln. “I am satisfied with Mr. Lincoln,” he wrote to abolitionist Wendell Phillips. “I hold that out of Republ[ican] ranks no better man could have been selected. He is opposed to slavery in the abstract, is free in the expression of his sentiments on all subjects, is honest and therefore reliable.”[38] Abram Dittenhoefer recalled that he himself threw all his energy into the campaign, “and though young … was frequently making several speeches during a day and evening.” Days before the election, at Cooper Union, he claimed to have sung out “We are coming, Father Abraham, five hundred thousand strong,” as if in anticipation of James Sloan Gibbons’s famous 1862 Civil War poem of an almost identical name, set to music by Luther Orlando Emerson.[39] Abraham Jonas likewise addressed a series of meetings and rallies in Illinois, including ones in Quincy and Marceline. At a rally in Stones Prairie in Adams County, he spoke “eloquently” for an hour on “the principles of the Republican Party and in refutation of the false and slanderous assertations of the Douglasites,” reputedly before 10,000 people—some of whom, later in the day, staged an ugly riot.[40]

Jonas’s devotion to Lincoln and the Republican cause at that time was further evidenced in his confidential letter to Lincoln dated July 20, 1860, informing him that Illinois’ Democratic congressman, Isaac Newton Morris, was “engaged in obtaining aff[i]davits and certificates of certain Irish men that they saw you in Quincy come out of a Know-Nothing Lodge.” Central European immigrants opposed to slavery, like Moritz Pinner, Abram Dittenhoefer, and Lewis Dembitz, were a key component of Lincoln’s coalition, and they despised the anti-Catholic and anti-immigrant Know-Nothings. Tying Lincoln to an appearance in a Know-Nothing Lodge in 1854, Jonas knew, was a Democratic ploy to “work on the Germans.” However much Jonas was prepared to welcome Know-Nothings into the Republican coalition, he worried that tying Lincoln directly to the Know-Nothing cause might cost his close friend many votes.[41]



'Confidential'

Hon A Lincoln - Quincy Ill. July 20/60

My dear Sir

I have just been credibly informed, that Isaac N Morris is engaged in obtaining affadavits and certificates of certain Irishmen that they saw you in Quincy come out of a Know Nothing Lodge - the intention is to send the affadavits to Washington for publication - I do not know if there is any truth in the matter, neither do I care, but thought it best to let you know about it - the object is to work on the Germans - and Morris can get men to swear to anything - my informant saw one of the affadavit, or Certificates -

Yours truly

A Jonas

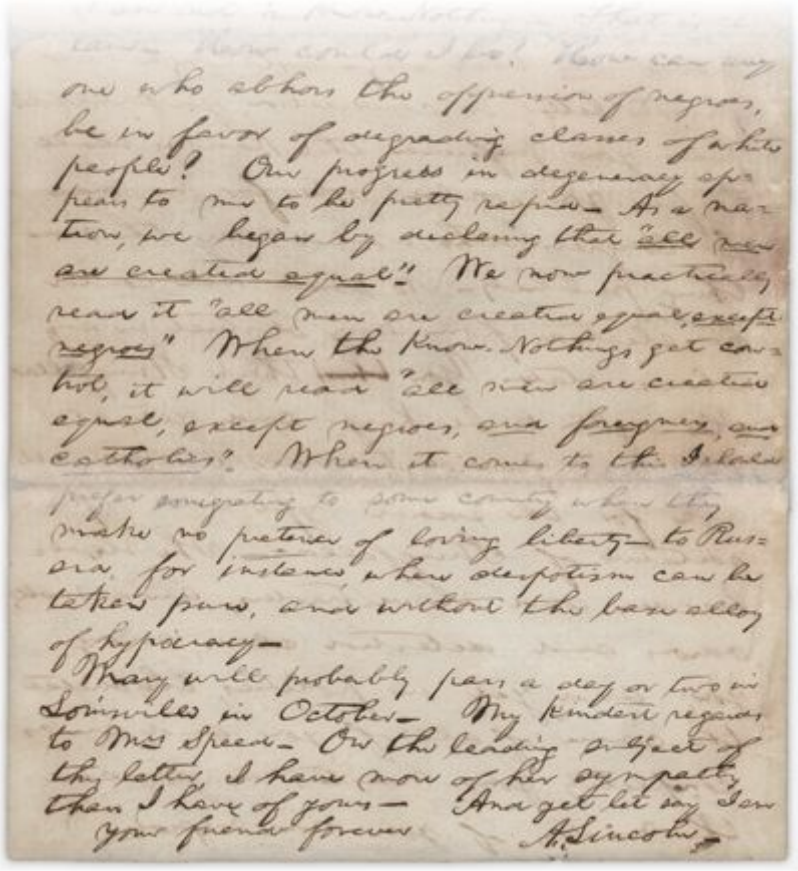
If it ale false, let me know

3401

ABRAHAM JONAS TO LINCOLN, JULY 20, 1860

Jonas writes to Lincoln to warn him that the Democrats are trying to paint him as anti-immigrant by gathering "aff[i]-davits" of Irishmen who claim they saw him coming out of a Know-Nothing Lodge in Quincy.

Courtesy of the Library of Congress



one who abhors the oppression of negroes, be in favor of degrading classes of white people? Our progress in degeneracy appears to me to be pretty rapid— As a nation, we began by declaring that "all men are created equal"! We now practically read it "all men are created equal, except negroes" When the Know-Nothings get control, it will read "all men are created equal, except negroes, and foreigners, and catholics" When it comes to this I should prefer emigrating to some country where they make no pretence of loving liberty— to Russia, for instance, where despotism can be taken pure, and without the base alloy of hypocracy—

Mary will probably pass a day or two in Louisville in October— My kindest regards to Mrs Speed— Of the leading subject of thy letter, I have more of her sympathy than I have of yours— And yet let me say I am

Your friend forever

A. Lincoln

LINCOLN TO JOSHUA SPEED: NOT A "KNOW-NOTHING," AUGUST 24, 1855

Nearly five years before his presidential campaign, Lincoln writes to his close friend Joshua Speed of his intense dismay for the "despotism" of the Know-Nothings, who, if in control, would maintain "all men are created equal, except negroes, and foreigners, and catholics"—the "foreigners," a term common at the time that included Jews.

Courtesy of the Massachusetts Historical Society

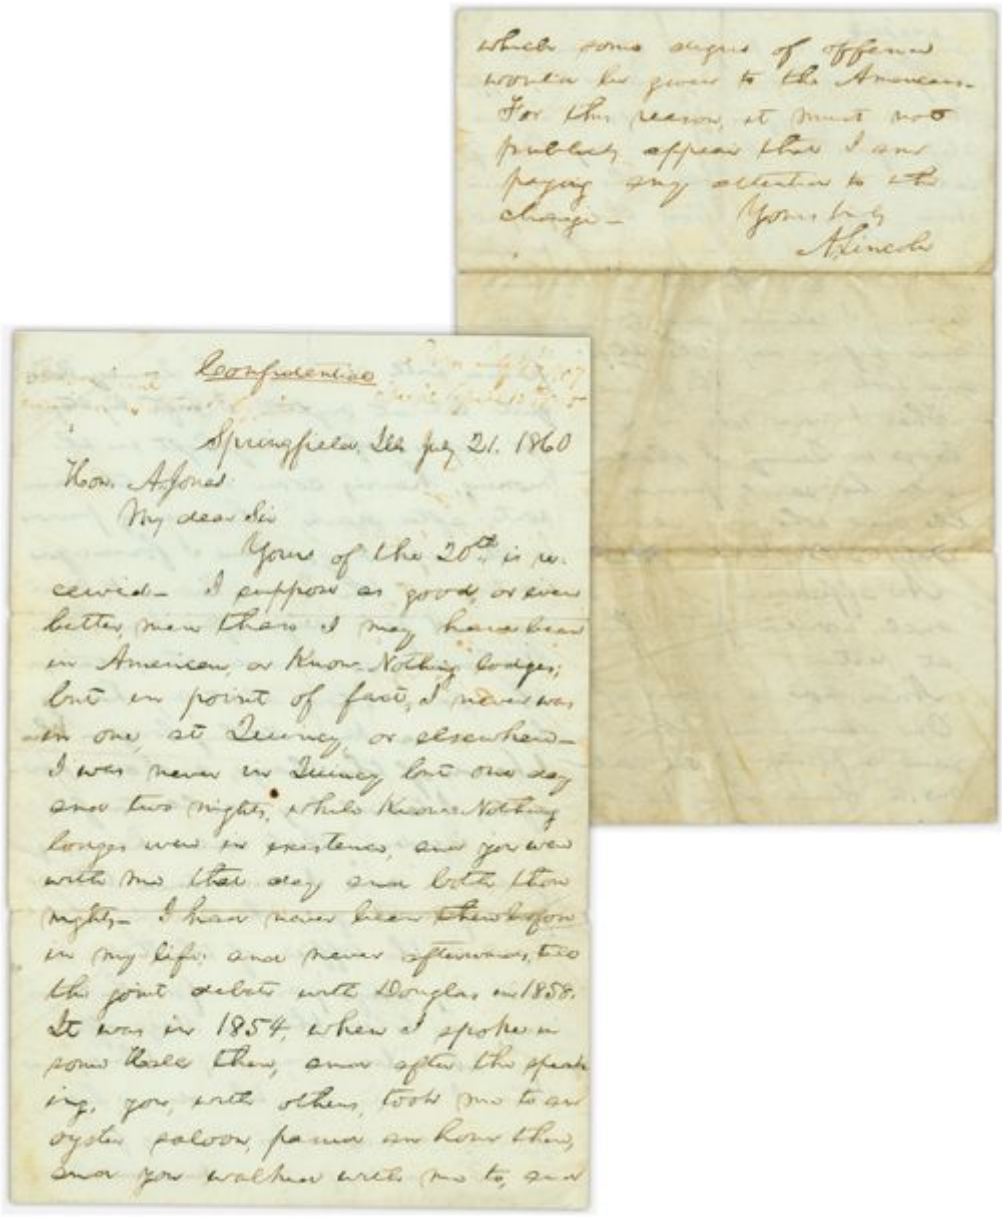
Lincoln must likewise have been worried, for he replied within twenty-four hours with a confidential letter of his own. "I suppose as good, or even better men than I may have been in American or Know-Nothing lodges," he observed, thereby distancing himself from the kind of guilt-by-association politics that Congressman Morris and so many others engaged in. "But in point of fact, I never was in one, at Quincy or elsewhere." Reminding Jonas that he "was never in Quincy but one day and two nights while Know-Nothing lodges were in existence, and you were with me that day and both those nights," Lincoln traced with astonishing precision his movements during that 1854 visit. He felt sure that affidavits from "respectable men … would put the matter at rest."[42]

Lincoln did not mention to Jonas that in a remarkable private letter to his friend Joshua F. Speed, back in 1855, he had unequivocally distanced himself from Know-Nothingism:

> I am not a Know-Nothing. That is certain. How could I be? How can any one who abhors the oppression of negroes, be in favor of degrading classes of white people? Our progress in degeneracy appears to me to be pretty rapid. As a nation, we began by declaring that "all men are created equal." We now practically read it "all men are created equal, except negroes." When the "Know-Nothings" get control, it will read "all men are created equal, except negroes, and foreigners, and catholics." When it comes to this I should prefer emigrating to some country where they make no pretence of loving liberty—to Russia, for instance, where despotism can be taken pure, and without the base alloy of hypocrisy.[43]

Yet, Lincoln cautioned Jonas to be discreet. "Our adversaries think they can gain a point if they could force me to openly deny the charge, by which some degree of offence would be given to the Americans," Lincoln wrote, referring to members of the nativist American Party, many of whose members (some of them also Know-Nothings) supported him. "For this reason it must not publicly appear that I am paying any attention to the charge." Jonas, himself a consummate politician, understood. Lincoln sought to personally disassociate himself from the taint of prejudice but could not afford, as a candidate, to lose the votes of those less enlightened than he was.[44]

"It was in 1854, when I spoke in some Hall there, and after the speaking, you, with others, took me to an oyster saloon, passed an hour there ... and you walked with me..."



Confidential

Springfield, Ill. July 21. 1860

Hon. Abram Jonas

My dear Sir

Yours of the 20th is received— I suppose as good, or even better, now than I may have been an American, or Know Nothing Lodges; but in point of fact, I never was in one, at Quincy, or elsewhere— I was never in Quincy but one day and two nights, while Know Nothing lodges were in existence, and you were with me that day, and both those nights— I have never been there before in my life; and never afterwards, till the joint debate with Douglas in 1858. It was in 1854, when I spoke in some Hall there, and after the speaking, you, with others, took me to an oyster saloon, famous on Know Nothing and you walked with me to, and

Which some degree of offense would be given to the Americans. For this reason, it must not publicly appear that I am paying any attention to the charge—

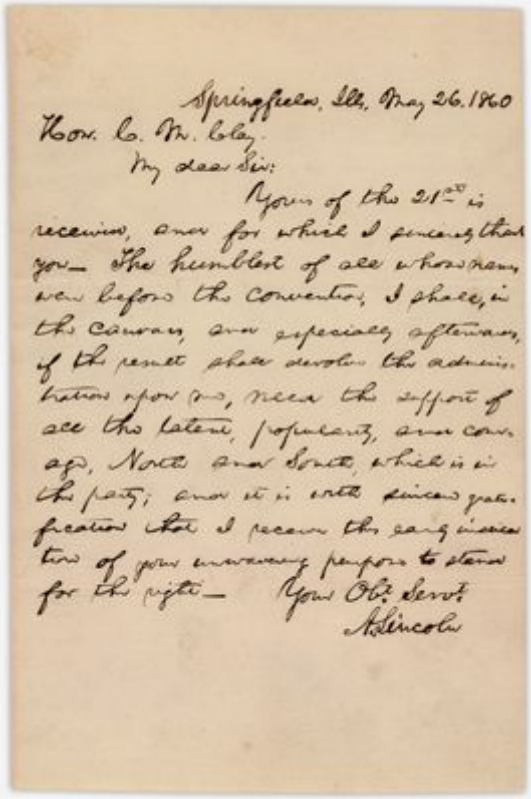
Yours truly

A. Lincoln

LINCOLN TO ABRAHAM JONAS, JULY 21, 1860

Replying confidentially to Jonas's letter of the previous day, Lincoln rebuts the charge that he was ever in a Know-Nothing Lodge. Lincoln recalls that Jonas was in fact the witness for his alibi: while indeed in Quincy at the time in question, he was with Jonas in an oyster saloon.

Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library & Museum



Springfield, Ill. May 26. 1860

Hon. C. M. Clay.

My dear Sir:

Yours of the 21st is receiving, and for which I sincerely thank you— The humblest of all whose names were before the Convention, I shall, in the canvass, and especially afterwards, if the result shall devolve the administration upon me, need the support of all the talent, popularity, and courage, North and South, which is in the party; and it is with sincere gratification that I receive the early assurance of your unwavering purpose to stand for the right— Your Ob. Servt.

A. Lincoln

LINCOLN TO CASSIUS M. CLAY: "THE HUMBLEST OF ALL," MAY 26, 1860

A week after receiving the nomination, Lincoln, here referring to himself as the "humblest of all whose names were before the convention," appeals to Cassius Marcellus Clay, a former rival for the nomination, in order to enlist his support in the upcoming campaign, and salutes his "unwavering purpose to stand for the right."
Shapell Legacy Partnership

Having been nominated as his party's candidate, Lincoln, consistent with the custom of his times, did not personally leave home to campaign. Within four days of his nomination he understood that "it will scarcely be prudent for me to leave home much, if any" until after the election.[45] Instead, as his correspondence with Jonas about the Know-Nothings indicates, he managed his campaign from Springfield. Thousands of supporters, including Moritz Pinner, came to visit him there.[46] He also received stacks of mail and telegrams from around the country and posed agreeably for photographs and portraits.

"Lincoln bears his honors meekly," Orville Hickman Browning, who was friendly with both Lincoln and Jonas, reported in his diary after meeting with the nominee.[47] This was a characteristic trait of Lincoln's and was especially evident during the almost six months between his nomination and election that Lincoln spent in Springfield. Perhaps, at age fifty-one, this humility sprang from his painful early life, lack of formal education, absence of wealth, and want of influential friends. Perhaps, he still saw himself as something of an outsider, like the Germans and Jews whom he befriended. Whatever the case, he described himself in a letter to the somewhat vainglorious antislavery reformer Cassius Marcellus Clay, cousin of Henry Clay, as "the humblest of all whose names were before the convention."[48]

Springfield, July 2 1860

D. L. Phillips, Esq

My dear Sir

Yours of the 27th. was received yesterday— Herewith is a general letter of introduction, and, I hope, suits your views—

Just now, the skies look bright— What clouds may hereafter rise, we know not—

Yours as ever

A. Lincoln

LINCOLN TO DAVID L. PHILLIPS: "JUST NOW, THE SKIES LOOK BRIGHT," JULY 2, 1860

"Just now, the skies look bright. What clouds may hereafter rise, we know not," Lincoln writes to political operative David L. Phillips. While the sentiment would prove prophetic of the coming storm of war, he also reflects on his improving chances for victory in November.

Shapell Manuscript Collection

Having lived his entire life, prior to his whirlwind elevation to national notice, as an ordinary person, Lincoln saw himself as unexceptional. He had been a day laborer, a small shopkeeper, a lawyer—and, politically, for most of his life, a failure. Now he was poised to claim the highest office in the land—and still he did not think himself, as he put it back in 1859, "fit for the presidency."[49] So, when the learned Pennsylvania judge William D. Kelley, an acquaintance and leading Republican, sought permission to inscribe a new legal work to him, Lincoln gratefully accepted the proffered honor, "begging only that the inscription may be in modest terms, not representing me as a man of great learning, or a very extraordinary one in any respect."[50]

During this time, as the Democratic Party split along sectional lines and contentiousness spread through its ranks, Lincoln grew increasingly hopeful concerning his election chances. The Democrats, unable to unite, held two conventions in Baltimore: Northern Democrats, after a clamorous debate, nominated Stephen A. Douglas on the fifty-seventh ballot, on June 18, while Southern Democrats nominated John C. Breckinridge on June 23. Against this background, on July 2, Lincoln wrote to David L. Phillips, a distant relative of abolitionist Wendell Phillips and, according to one scholar, "the leading Republican of Southern Illinois," that "just now, the skies look bright. What clouds may hereafter rise, we know not."[51] The poetic turn of phrase reflected long years of accumulated experience. Lincoln knew that bright political skies could darken at any time, and he may even have had a premonition of coming sectional strife. Still, he sensed, as he wrote later that same month to his vice presidential running mate, Hannibal Hamlin, that "the prospect of Republican success now appears very flattering."[52] By October, the die seemed cast. As congressional elections on October 9 swept the Republicans to victory in key Northern states, Lincoln wrote exultantly to William H. Seward three days later that "it now really looks as if the Government is about to fall into our hands. Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana have surpassed all expectation, even the most extravagant."[53]

The prediction, based on a careful analysis of voting trends, proved accurate. On November 6, 1860, Election Day, Lincoln won the four-way presidential contest with slightly less than 40 percent of the popular vote, capturing 180 out of 303 electoral votes. The Northern free states from Maine to Minnesota, plus California and Oregon, formed the core of his majority. This basically vindicated the electoral strategy that Jonas had crafted in his letter to Senator Trumbull back in December 1858. Lincoln, according to one analysis, "did especially well among younger voters, newly eligible voters, former nonvoters, rural residents, skilled laborers, members of the middle class, German Protestants, evangelical Protestants, native-born Americans, and most especially former Know-Nothings and Whig Americans."[54] How many Jews voted for him is hard to determine. He lost New York City, the largest Jewish community in the United States, and some estimates claim that German immigrants there, as well as Jews, voted against him by a two-to-one margin.[55] He also had trouble in other large Northern urban areas: only four of the North's eleven most populous cities (where Jews tended to live) gave him a majority. Unsurprisingly, he received very few votes—Jewish or non-Jewish—in the South. On the other hand, a study of the Chicago Jewish community (probably less than a thousand voters) determined that "the majority of the Chicago Jewish community … supported Lincoln over Douglas."[56] On balance, even if more Jews voted Democratic than Republican in 1860, the 50,000 or so Jewish voters made no difference whatsoever in the election results. Jews like Jonas and Dittenhoefer, however, did make a difference in helping to shape the six-year-old Republican Party's first national victory.

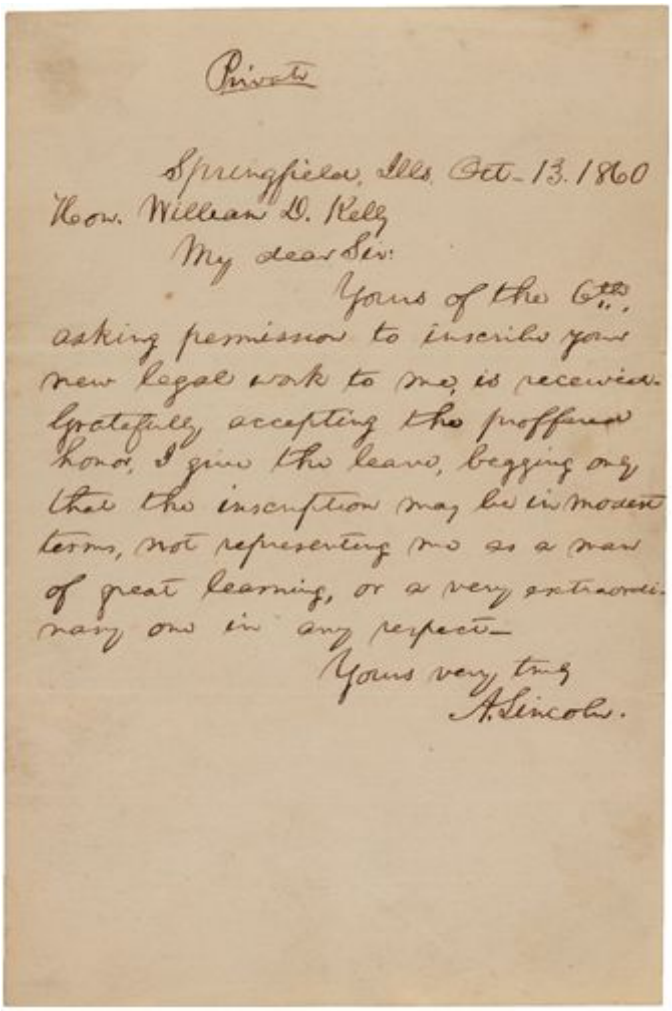
One of the 180 electors whose votes in the Electoral College made Lincoln's election to the presidency official was known to be Jewish. His name was Sigismund Kaufmann of New York (1826–1889). A prominent German-American who left Germany in the wake of the failed liberal revolutions of 1848, Kaufmann was active in the turnvereins, the German-American gymnastic societies founded by German liberals to promote sound bodies and sound minds. The socialistic Turnerbund that he established and headed in New York was not only dedicated to physical activity, but also "strongly encourage[d] true freedom, prosperity and education for all classes."[57] Kaufmann belonged to a synagogue and was involved in Jewish charitable activities but devoted most of his efforts to furthering the interests of the German immigrant community. As a political radical and staunch opponent of slavery, he strongly advocated the importance of German Americans voting for the Republican Party. This probably explains why he was rewarded with the opportunity to serve as a presidential elector. Lincoln and Kaufmann met, likely for the first time, at a reception for members of the Electoral College on February 19, 1861 in New York, and the president-elect "pleasantly remarked that he knew enough of German to know that the name [Kaufmann] meant merchant."[58] Subsequently, Kaufmann obtained Lincoln's autograph for a friend and advocated for German Americans in government and in the military. Tradition holds that President Lincoln offered him the post of minister to Italy but that he declined "on the ground that he could be more useful to his party at home."[59]

"… not representing me as a man of great learning, or as a very extraordinary one in any respect."



Private

Springfield, Ills. Oct. 13. 1860

Hon. William D. Kelly

My dear Sir:

Yours of the 6th., asking permission to inscribe your new legal work to me, is received. Gratefully accepting the proffered honor, I give the leave, begging only that the inscription may be in modest terms, not representing me as a man of great learning, or a very extraordinary one in any respect—

Yours very truly

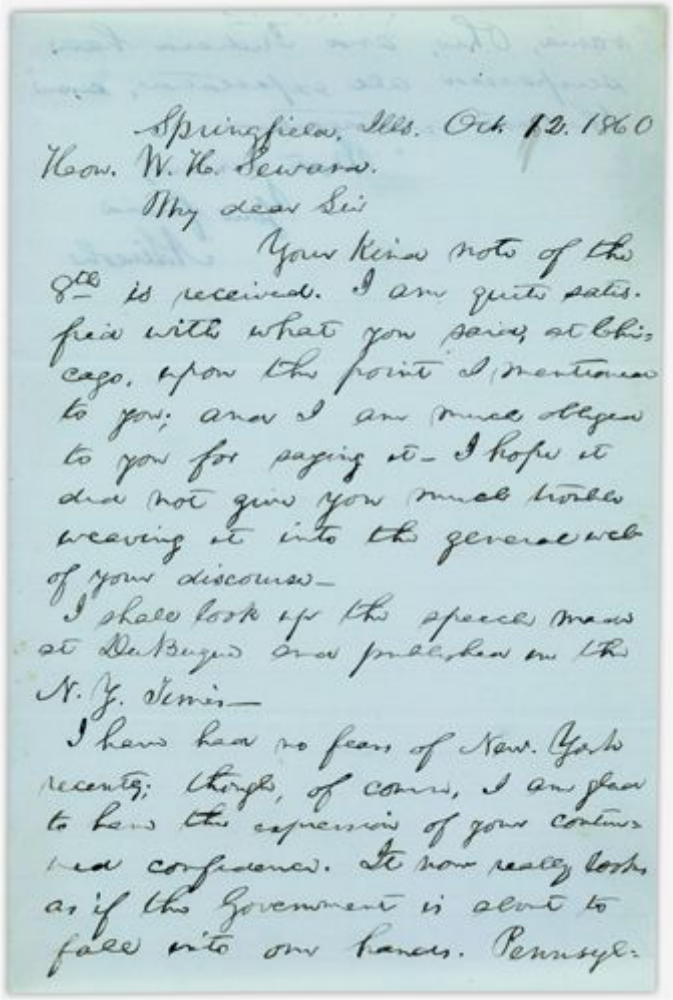
A. Lincoln.

LINCOLN TO WILLIAM D. KELL[E]Y: ON THE VERGE OF VICTORY, A TIMELESS LESSON, OCTOBER 13, 1860

Lincoln agrees to having a forthcoming legal book dedicated to him, though he tempers the honor by referencing his humble origins and lack of formal education: "... that the inscription may be in modest terms, not representing me as a man of great learning, or as a very extraordinary one in any respect." Though Lincoln was unschooled, he was not uneducated, having taught himself law, surveying, and military strategy.

Shapell Legacy Partnership

"... the government is about to fall into our hands"

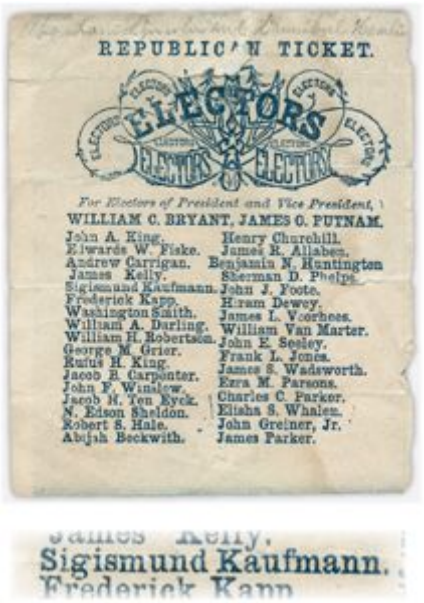


Springfield, Ills. Oct 12. 1860
Hon. W. H. Seward.
My dear Sir
Your kind note of the 8th is received. I am quite satisfied with what you say at Chicago, upon the point I mentioned to you; and I am much obliged to you for saying so. I hope it did not give you much trouble weaving it into the general web of your discourse.
I shall look up the speech made at Dunleith and published in the N. Y. Times.
I have had no fears of New York recently; though, of course, I am glad to have the expression of your confidence. It now really looks as if the Government is about to fall into our hands. Pennsyl-

LINCOLN TO WILLIAM H. SEWARD, OCTOBER 12, 1860

As congressional elections sweep the Republicans to victory in key Northern states, Lincoln writes to Seward that "the government is about to fall into our hands"—a phrase that suggests a sureness, a literal grasp, that he would use again at another heightened, hard-won, and long-sought moment: writing at the end of the Civil War, he says, "It is certain now that Richmond is in our hands."
Shapell Legacy Partnership

Before the electoral votes of Kaufmann and his fellow presidential electors were formally counted at a joint session of Congress on February 13, 1861, the results of the November election had unleashed a frenzy of political activity across the South. Fearing that Lincoln's ascension portended slave revolts and a perilous threat to the whole Southern way of life and the slave system that made it possible, the cry went out for secession. Declining to write for publication, so as not to exacerbate the seething tension, Lincoln stuck to his guns on secession, choosing to make his views known only through confidential letters. "My opinion is that no state can, in any way lawfully, get out of the Union, without the consent of the others."[60]



REPUBLICAN TICKET.

ELECTORS

For Electors of President and Vice President, WILLIAM C. BRYANT, JAMES C. PUTNAM.

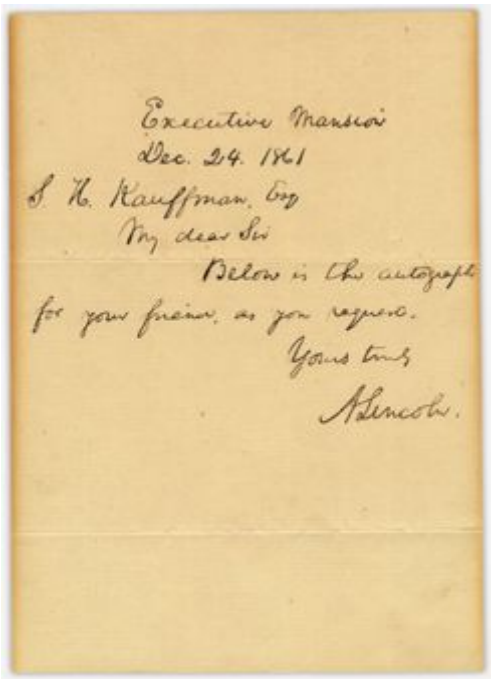
John A. King.	Henry Churchill.
Edwards W. Fiske.	James R. Allaben.
Andrew Carrigan.	Benjamin N. Huntington
James Kelly.	Sherman D. Phelps.
Sigismund Kaufmann.	John J. Foote.
Frederick Kapp.	Hiram Dewey.
Washington Smith.	James L. Voorhees.
William A. Darling.	William Van Marter.
William H. Robertson.	John E. Seeley.
George M. Grier.	Frank L. Jones.
Rufus H. King.	James S. Wadsworth.
Jacob B. Carpenter.	Ezra M. Parsons.
John F. Winslow.	Charles C. Parker.
Jacob H. Ten Eyck.	Elisha S. Whalen.
N. Edson Sheldon.	John Greiner, Jr.
Robert S. Hale.	James Parker.
Abijah Beckwith.

James Kelly.
Sigismund Kaufmann.
Frederick Kapp

SIGISMUND KAUFMANN, NEW YORK REPUBLICAN ELECTORAL BALLOT, 1860

When Lincoln first met the fiery Jewish refugee from the German Revolution of 1848, he knew enough German (or, some say, Yiddish) to say that he understood that "kaufmann" meant "merchant"—and "schneider" meant "tailor." Sigismund Kaufmann, however, was neither: instead, as a lawyer, he led New York's German Jews in supporting Lincoln and cast an electoral vote for him in 1861.

Rail Splitter Archives, New York City



Executive Mansion
Dec. 24. 1861

S. N. Kauffman, Esq
My dear Sir

Below is the autograph for your friend, as you request.

Yours truly
A. Lincoln.

LINCOLN TO SIGISMUND KAUFMANN, ESQ, THE COMMONALITY OF TWO LAWYERS, DECEMBER 24, 1861

On Christmas Eve, 1861, Lincoln does a favor for the influential representative of the German-Jewish Republican element, Sigismund Kaufmann. "Below is the autograph for your friend," Lincoln writes, "as you request."

Shapell Manuscript Collection

Just three days later, however, on December 20, 1860, South Carolina, the state with proportionally the largest black population in the country (57 percent), repudiated Lincoln's view. It became the first of seven states in the Deep South to secede from the Union prior to his inauguration. "South Carolina has resumed her entire sovereign powers, and, unshackled, has become one of the nations of the earth," the Charleston Mercury reported.[61] Eleven days afterward, Judah P. Benjamin, the senator from Louisiana whom Abram Dittenhoefer had heard called "an Israelite with Egyptian principles," delivered a spellbinding farewell to his Senate colleagues, expounding upon what he termed "The Right of Secession." "What may be the fate of this horrible contest, no man can tell, none pretend to foresee," he emotionally concluded, "but this much I will say: the fortunes of war may be adverse to our arms; you may carry desolation into our peaceful land, and with torch and fire you may set our cities in flames … but you never can subjugate us; you never can convert the free sons of the soil into vassals paying tribute to your power; and you never, never can degrade them to the level of an inferior and servile race. Never! Never!"[62]

As the nation teetered toward civil war, rumors of plots against the president and vice president-elect circulated. One of them reached Abraham Jonas in Quincy, and on December 30, 1860, he hastened to inform Lincoln. Expressing "great anxiety in regard to your personal safety and the preservation of our national integrity," Jonas reminded the president-elect that he had a "very large family connection in the south," including six children and other "near relatives" in New Orleans. Divided as those relatives were politically, they still maintained close familial ties. Jonas reported in confidence that he had learned from one of those relatives—he did not say which one, but it is tempting to think that it was his son, Benjamin, who had earlier worked with Lincoln to free John Shelby—"that there is a perfect organization, fearful in numbers and controuled [sic] by men of character and influence, whose object is to prevent the inauguration of Lincoln … if by no other means, by using violence on the person of Lincoln—men engaged in this measure are known to be of the most violent character, capable of doing any act necessary to carry out their vile measures." Alarmed, Jonas urged "precautionary measures," adding the salutation "with great devotion."[63] A day earlier, Sen. William H. Seward, soon to become Lincoln's secretary of state, passed along similar intelligence concerning a plot to seize the capital on or before the inauguration on March 4 ("you must not imagine that I am giving you suspicions and rumors—Believe that I know what I write.")[64] So it was that in a December 31 letter to Ohio governor Salmon P. Chase, soon to be nominated secretary of the Treasury, that Lincoln, as if summing up the last two weeks of 1860 and anticipating the even worse year to come, evoked the apocalyptic language of the Book of Daniel (9:25): "these troub'lous times."[65] On that last day of 1860, the image he saw reflected in the lion's den may well have been his own.

President James Buchanan, chastened by the election and aware that he had but a few months left in office, was by no means blind to these same "troub'lous times." In a message to the American people, he designated Friday, January 4, 1861, as a day to be "set apart for Humiliation, Fasting and Prayer throughout the Union."[66] In response, Rabbi Isaac Mayer Wise of Cincinnati, who considered the results of the 1860 election "one of the greatest blunders a nation can commit," was openly scornful. "Pray, Sir? No, it is too late. Either the Republican party must go overboard or the Union be dissolved."[67] For the most part, though, synagogues were "exceedingly well attended" on the fast day, with Jews reputedly just as focused on "the importance of the Union and the duty of its preservation" as their non-Jewish neighbors.[68]

Rabbi Morris Raphall (1798–1868) of New York's B'nai Jeshurun Congregation delivered the most memorable sermon of the fast day—so memorable that he was invited to repeat it eleven days later before the New-York Historical Society. An ordained Orthodox rabbi with impressive university credentials, Raphall possessed dazzling oratorical skills, and was once described as the first celebrity rabbi in American Jewish history. He had supported Douglas against Lincoln, opposed abolitionism, and distrusted those who justified antislavery on the basis of the Bible. "How dare you, in the face of the sanction and protection afforded to slave property in the Ten Commandments—how dare you denounce slaveholding as a sin?" he challenged the abolitionist preacher Henry Ward Beecher in his sermon. His own analysis of the Bible led him to believe that (1) slavery had existed since antiquity; (2) that it was "no sin," as slave property was expressly placed under the protection of the Ten Commandments; and (3) that the slave should be considered a person with rights "not conflicting with the lawful exercise of the rights of his owner." This, he believed offered a sound basis for sectional reconciliation: "If our Northern fellow-citizens, content with following the word of God, would not insist on being 'righteous overmuch,' or denouncing 'sin' which the Bible knows not, but which is plainly taught by the precepts of men—they would entertain more equity and less ill feeling towards their Southern brethren," he thundered. "And if our Southern fellow-citizens would adopt the Bible view of slavery, and discard the heathen slave code, which permits a few bad men to indulge in an abuse of power that throws a stigma and disgrace on the whole body of slaveholders—if both North and South would do what is right, then God … would mercifully avert the impending evil, for with Him alone is the power to do so."[69]

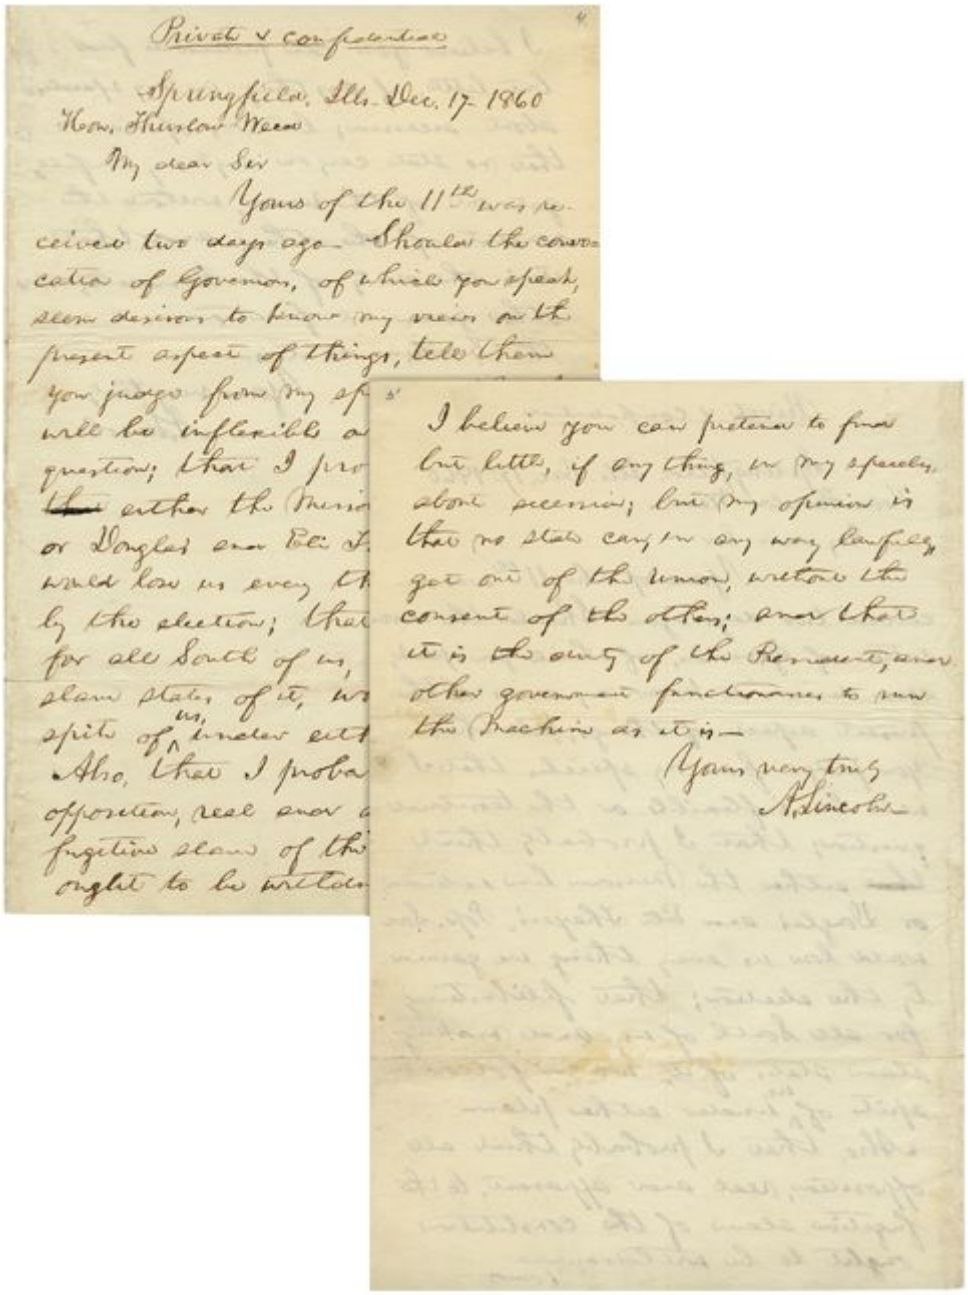
"No state can, in any way lawfully, get out of the Union, without the consent of the others."



Private & Confidential

Springfield, Ill. Dec. 17. 1860

Hon. Thurlow Weed

My dear Sir

Yours of the 11th was received two days ago. Should the convention of Governors, of which you speak, deem occasion to hear my views on the present aspect of things, tele them you judge from my speech that I will be inflexible on the question; that I prefer the Union as it is, to the Union as it would be with any part of it gone; that I am not for concession; that I am not for taking back anything we have said, or for letting any man take back anything he has said; that I am for executing the laws in all parts of the country, as they are, and that I am against any extension of slavery in any part of it. I believe you can pretend to find but little, if anything, in my speeches, about secession; but my opinion is that no state can, in any way lawfully, get out of the Union, without the consent of the others; and that it is the duty of the President, and other government functionaries to run the machine as it is.

Yours very truly

A. Lincoln

LINCOLN TO THURLOW WEED, DECEMBER 17, 1860

Just three days ahead of South Carolina's secession on December 20, Lincoln maintains his consistent posture: "No state can, in any way lawfully, get out of the Union, without the consent of the others," he declares. Lincoln also refers to Douglas's dreaded favorite slogan: Popular Sovereignty.
Shapell Legacy Partnership

THE UNION IS DISSOLVED

IN 1860, THE AMERICAN EXPERIMENT in democracy was less than ninety years old: no other government in the world was headed by an elected figure. Lincoln, profoundly conscious of his roles as both leader of the states and the preserver of their unity, insisted in December 1860 that no state could lawfully leave the Union without the consent of the others and had stressed in his Cooper Union address that this was indeed the intent of the Founders. To Lincoln, that the Union might be dissolved from within was no less than anathema. This is, perhaps, why the headline in the Charleston Mercury, "Union Is Dissolved," had not so much to do with slavery, which he so abhorred, but with democracy, which he so loved. Secession, to Lincoln, was an attack on the foundations of self-governance; and, looming ominously, raised the possibility of a catastrophic defeat for the cause of human liberty. "My paramount object in this struggle is to save the Union," he made clear to Horace Greeley in his famous August 22, 1862, letter, "and is not either to save or to destroy slavery. If I could save the Union without freeing any slave I would do it, and if I could save it by freeing all the slaves I would do it."

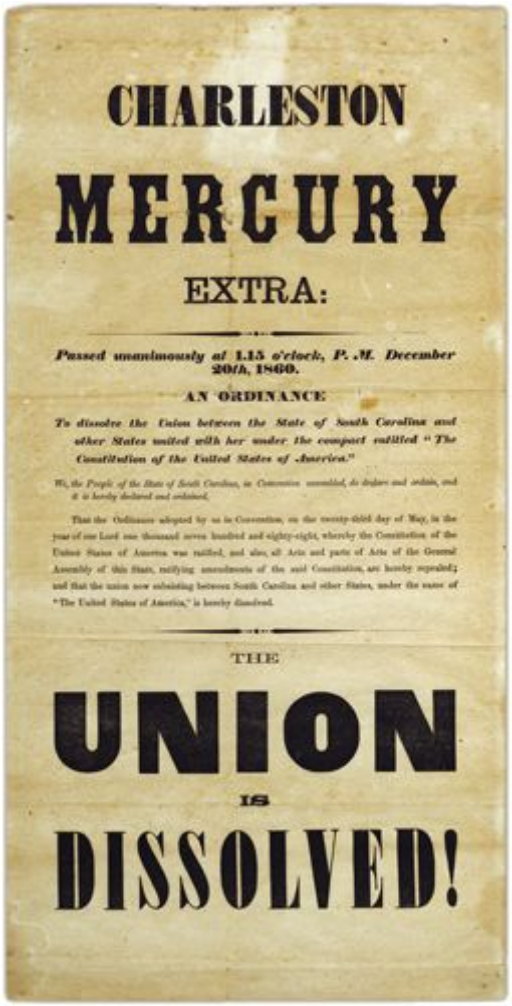
Lincoln, however, had other things to consider—pragmatic ones. His view of his official duty as president contrasted, he made clear, with his personal position on slavery. "I intend no modification of my oft-expressed personal wish that all men every where could be free," he told Greeley. Yet he clarified, in an April 4, 1864, letter to a Kentucky newspaper editor, that "if slavery is not wrong, nothing is wrong. I cannot remember when I did not so think and feel." But his lifelong goal of abolishing slavery would have to wait, for had he made the war only about slavery and not about secession, he would have lost the slaveholding border states, still in the Union, to the Confederacy—and perhaps the war itself. "I hope to have God on my side," Lincoln is reported to have said, "but I must have Kentucky."

Lincoln walked, then, a fine line indeed, for even if the war was fought over states' rights and secession, those rights included owning slaves and allowing the expansion of slavery into the western territories. Without slavery, there would have been no war between North and South. And what congressional legislation could not fix in the 1850s on the slavery question, war—and Lincoln's pen—ultimately would.



CHARLESTON

MERCURY

EXTRA:

Passed unanimously at 1.15 o'clock, P. M. December 20th, 1860.

AN ORDINANCE

To dissolve the Union between the State of South Carolina and other States united with her under the compact entitled "The Constitution of the United States of America."

We, the People of the State of South Carolina, in Convention assembled, do declare and ordain, and it is hereby declared and ordained,

That the Ordinance adopted by us in Convention, on the twenty-third day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, whereby the Constitution of the United States of America was ratified, and also, all Acts and parts of Acts of the General Assembly of this State, ratifying amendments of the said Constitution, are hereby repealed; and that the union now subsisting between South Carolina and other States, under the name of "The United States of America," is hereby dissolved.

THE

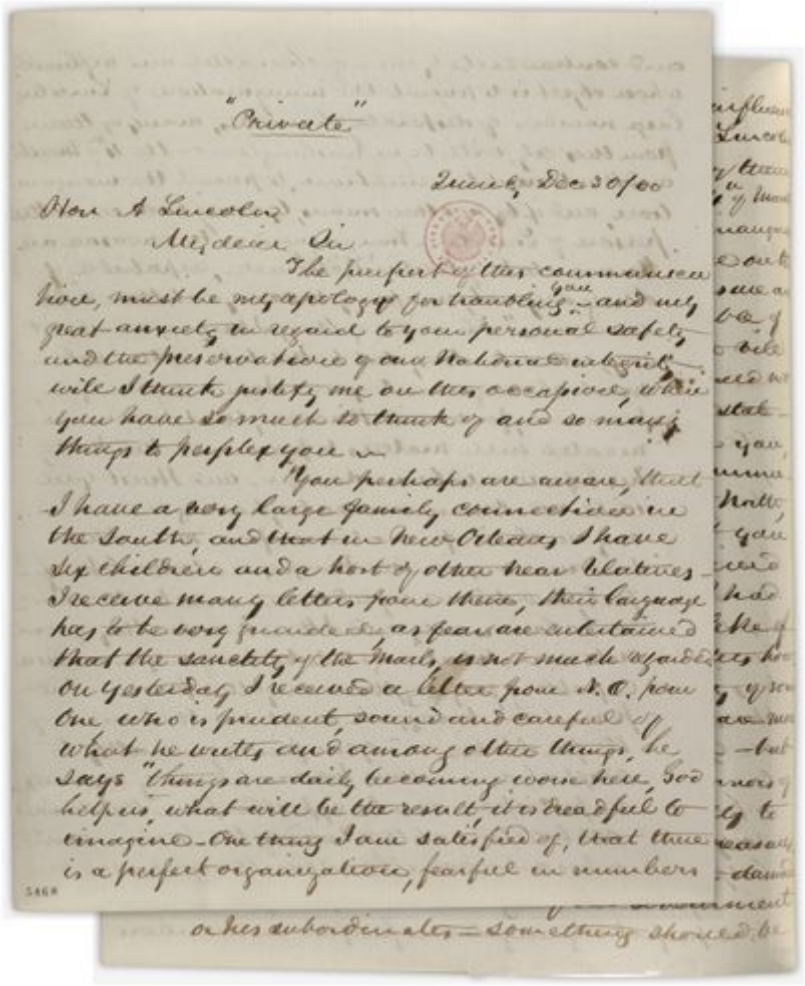
UNION

IS

DISSOLVED!

DECEMBER 20, 1860

Some seven weeks after Lincoln's election, South Carolina became the first Southern state to secede from the United States. This broadside, published by the Charleston Mercury, announces the unanimous adoption by South Carolina of an ordinance of secession, at 1:15 P.M., December 20, 1860.
Shapell Manuscript Collection



"Private"

Quincy, Dec 30/60

Hon A Lincoln

Mr dear Sir

The perfect ease with which the conspirators here, must be my apology for troubling you — and my great anxiety in regard to your personal safety, and the preservation of our National existence will I trust plead for me on this occasion, while you have so much to think of and so many things to perplex you —

You perhaps are aware, that I have a very large family connection in the South, and that in New Orleans, I have six children and a host of other near relatives — I receive many letters from them, their language has to be very guarded, as fears are entertained that the sanctity of the mails, is not much regarded — On yesterday I received a letter from N. O. from one who is prudent, sound and careful of what he writes and among other things, he says "things are daily becoming worse here, God help us, what will be the result it is dreadful to imagine — One thing I am satisfied of, that there is a perfect organization, fearful in numbers

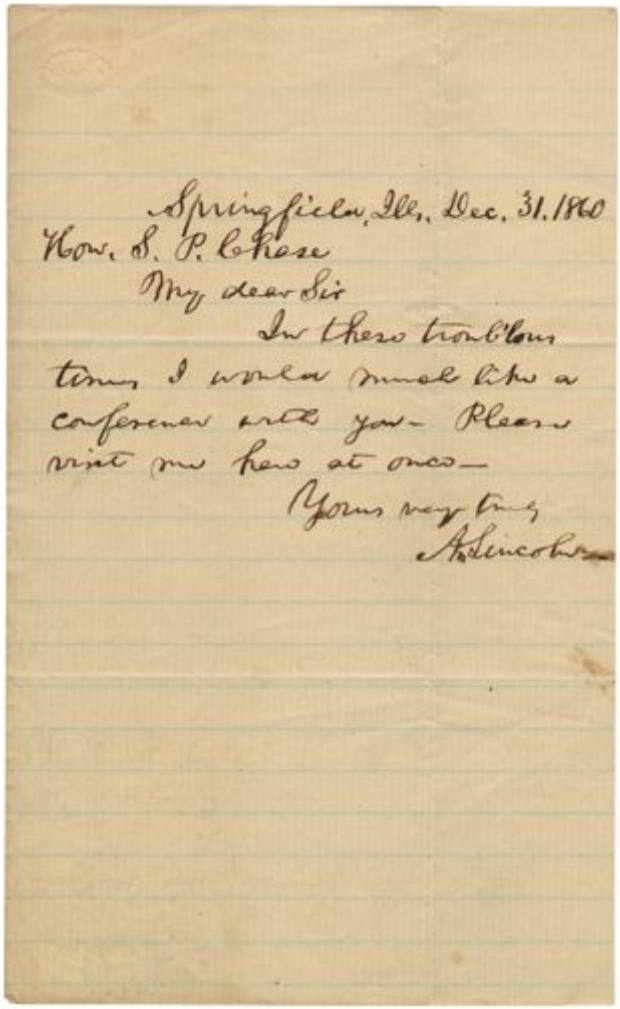
5468

& her subordinates — something should be

ABRAHAM JONAS TO LINCOLN, DECEMBER 30, 1860

Jonas warns Lincoln of a plot to assassinate him before Inauguration Day. His warnings did not go unheeded: Lincoln was smuggled into Washington, arriving in the dead of night ten days before the Inauguration.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

"In these troub'lous times"



Springfield, Ill., Dec. 31. 1860
Hon. S. P. Chase
My dear Sir
In these troublous times I would much like a conference with you- Please visit me here at once—
Yours very truly
A. Lincoln

LINCOLN IN THE LION'S DEN, DECEMBER 31, 1860

Secession, assassination, and war: as the country tore itself apart, Lincoln, in Springfield, strove to put together his cabinet. Now immersed "in these troub'lous times," Lincoln, echoing the biblical Daniel, acknowledges in a letter to Salmon P. Chase, the impending danger from all sides.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

THE ANTI-SEMITIC ABOLITIONISTS

BY DEFINITION, abolitionism was understood to mean, in its simplest form, the movement to achieve immediate and total abolition of slavery, and to many it also carried with it connotations of altruism, liberal-mindedness, tolerance, and respect for blacks. But there was another side—a darker side—to abolitionism, and that was the abolitionists themselves. Yes, blacks could be free, but they should be free blacks somewhere else. Colonization of blacks in foreign lands, outside the borders of the U.S., formed a big part of their beliefs. And for good measure, they were, to varying degrees, also anti-Semitic, especially the most famous of them, William Lloyd Garrison, who once called his opponent Mordecai Noah "a lineal descendant of the monsters who nailed Jesus to the cross…" Well-known clergyman Theodore Parker also often had vicious words for the Jews: their "intellect was sadly pinched in those narrow foreheads," he wrote—and, another time, said of Jews that "they did sometimes kill a Christian baby at the Passover or the anniversary of Haman's famous day."

Raphall's address echoed familiar Protestant arguments and was properly described as "very forcible if not novel."[70] Yet coming as it did from a learned rabbi, it received wide circulation, sparking fierce debate in both Jewish and non-Jewish circles. "Child of a thrice delivered race," one Christian poet scolded, "hast thou/no tears for those who still in bondage bow?"[71] The key debate concerned how the Bible should be interpreted and read. Within the Jewish community, supporters of Lincoln who opposed slavery condemned Raphall's literal reading of the biblical text and insisted on a more contextualized reading or one that focused on the spirit rather than on the letter of divine law. The radical reform rabbi David Einhorn, for example, who fiercely opposed slavery, argued vehemently that "the spirit of the law of God" enshrined in the creation story, where "God created man in his image" [Gen. 1:27], "can never approve of slavery."[72] The lay Jewish biblical scholar Michael Heilprin, whose brother was Lincoln's optician in 1864, mischievously wondered whether Raphall would support polygamy and concubinage, since both were also accepted by the Bible and practiced by the patriarchs.[73] On the other hand, one enthusiastic Protestant minister was so persuaded by Raphall's close textual reading, based on the Hebrew original, that he declared the rabbi's lecture to be "as true almost as the word of God itself."[74]

Raphall was far from being the only Jewish apologist for slavery. Rabbi Bernard Illowy in Baltimore used his Fast Day sermon to attack Lincoln and the Republicans. "Who can blame our brethren of the South," he declared, "for seceding from a society whose government can not, or will not, protect the property rights and privileges of a great portion of the Union against the encroachments of a majority misguided by some influential, ambitious aspirants and selfish politicians who, under the color of religion and the disguise of philanthropy, have thrown the country into a general state of confusion?" He, like Raphall, defended slavery on the basis of the Bible.[75]

Even Abraham Jonas's older brother, Joseph Jonas, in an address before the Ohio House of Representatives, defended slavery. He argued, likewise from the Bible, that the Negro slave descended from the serpent in the Garden of Eden and was cast into "slavery, without the power of rising in the scale of nations." Abolitionists, he charged, were sinfully "flying in the face of Providence, who has, for some grand purpose … condemned this race to slavery."[76]

The controversy over Morris Raphall's sermon brought unprecedented publicity to the supposed "Jewish view" on the slavery issue but only underscored, in the end, the complexity of the issue and the many different ways that biblical texts could be parsed. On the issue of slavery, the question of how properly to understand the Bible, and most other controversial issues through the Civil War years, the Jewish community did not speak, as Abraham Jonas had hoped they would, with a single voice. Instead, some Jews supported Lincoln and opposed slavery; some supported the Union and sought to compromise on slavery; and some justified slavery and hated Lincoln with a passion.

Chicago Jewish leader Abraham Kohn (1819–71) became one of those who supported Lincoln. Born and educated in Bavaria, Kohn immigrated to the United States in 1842. For a time, he peddled in New England, but in 1843 or 1844 he moved to Chicago and became the proprietor of a clothing store. On the Day of Atonement in 1845, Kohn participated in the first known Jewish religious service held in Chicago and subsequently helped to found its first synagogue, of which he was later president. In 1860, he also became the city's first Jewish clerk. By then, he had become active in politics as a staunch Republican, dubbed by his enemies "one of the blackest Republicans and Abolitionists."

Abraham Lincoln was introduced to Kohn as a Jewish leader by his friend, newly elected congressman Isaac N. Arnold, probably on his trip to Chicago following the election (November 21–25, 1860), and the two men spoke of their common devotion to the Bible.[77] Ten weeks later, when Kohn wrote Lincoln to recommend the appointment of a local attorney, Republican leader John W. Waughop, a Methodist, as resident minister to the Hague, he reminded Lincoln of his Jewish connections. "Being well acquainted with the Hebrew population of the City of Chicago," he assured the president-elect, "I know that the appointment of Mr. Waughop to that position would give entire satisfaction, indeed they would rejoice in it." "Mr. Waughop," he explained, "has taken great pains to encourage the Hebrews in the support of the Republican cause." While there is no evidence that Lincoln acted on the recommendation, one of his aides docketed the letter as coming "from a leading Jew" and appended a revealing note to the bottom of the letter, further evidence of the special interest Lincoln took in Jews: "I regard Mr. Kohn," it read, "as the best authority for his countrymen in Chicago."[78]

Later that same month, Kohn (described by one newspaper as "a Hebrew of the Hebrews") sent Lincoln a present, one of many he received as he prepared to leave his home in Springfield to take up residence in the White House. It was, according to one reporter, "an exquisitely executed picture of the American flag, with a Hebrew inscription filling the entire extent of the white stripes." The reporter described the gift as "gracefully designed, delicately executed, felicitously presented, and gratefully accepted." The Hebrew inscription, according to multiple contemporary sources, consisted of "the passage in the first chapter of Joshua; the 4th to the 9th verses inclusive." Lincoln and Kohn, who knew their Bible so well, understood how apt that passage was for a new leader about to cross the country to take up his duties in Washington under the threat of a looming war. Even reporters found the inscription "to be very appropriate." One supplied readers with an English translation from the King James Bible. "Be strong and of a good courage," the text concluded. "Be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed: for the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest."[79]

ABRAHAM KOHN, CIRCA 1865

A German-born Chicago clothier and city official, Kohn met Lincoln during the presidential campaign of 1860—and, as both an ardent Republican and devout Jew, saw in him, his daughter recalled, a leader like Moses, destined to free the slaves and save his nation.
KAM Isaiah Israel Congregation, Chicago, Illinois

KOHN FLAG

To his new friend Lincoln, departing to Washington as president-elect, Kohn sent this painted flag. In the white bars of the flag Kohn inscribed, in Hebrew, verses 4 through 9 of Joshua I, including: "Be strong and of a good courage ... Be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed: for the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest."

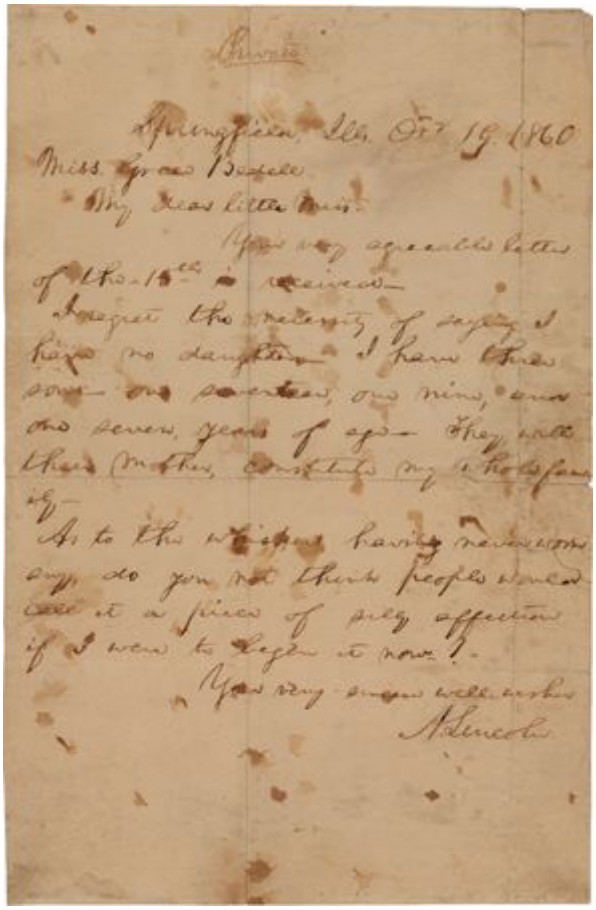
Courtesy of the Chicago History Museum

CAPTURING LINCOLN

Lincoln understood the political importance of his image. He sat for his photo some fifty times, including for the Jewish photographer Samuel G. Alschuler, with whom he met on at least two occasions. The images here reflect not only how Lincoln looked but how, approaching the presidency, that look changed: in 1860, he grew a beard.

Why Lincoln grew a beard is anyone's guess, but he himself gave the nod to an eleven-year-old girl named Grace Bedell. She wrote him that his face was too thin and that he would look better if he let his whiskers grow. Women like beards, Grace reasoned, so they would tease their husbands to vote for him. She promised, meanwhile, to try and get her older brothers to vote for him as well. Charmed by her letter, Lincoln, with his characteristic love of children, replied to "My dear Little Miss." "As to the whiskers," he wrote, "having never worn any, do you not think people would call it a piece of silly affection [sic] if I were to begin it now?" Though Lincoln was concerned about vanity and affectation, he nevertheless took her advice, though he had already realized a week earlier, that with "the government about to fall into our hands," he did not grow his beard to gain votes. He did, however, change the fashion of the times: for the next fifty years, all elected U.S. presidents, save for William McKinley, would have facial hair.

While famous for its connection to Lincoln's beard, Lincoln's letter to little Grace also shows Lincoln in a moment of quiet personal reflection: in response to her question about children, as the father of four sons he replies, "I regret the necessity of saying I have no daughters."



Private

Springfield, Ills. Oct 19. 1860

Miss Grace Bedell

My dear little Miss.

Your very agreeable letter of the 15th is received.

I regret the necessity of saying I have no daughters. I have three sons — one seventeen, one nine, and one seven, years of age. They will have a Mother, and all (my wife says) will be pleased with your kind offer.

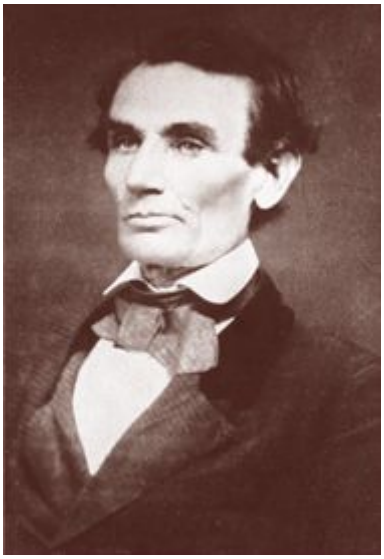
As to the whiskers having never worn any, do you not think people would call it a piece of silly affectation if I were to begin it now?

Your very sincere well wisher

A. Lincoln

LINCOLN'S FAMOUS LETTER TO GRACE BEDELL, OCTOBER 19, 1860

Shapell Legacy Partnership



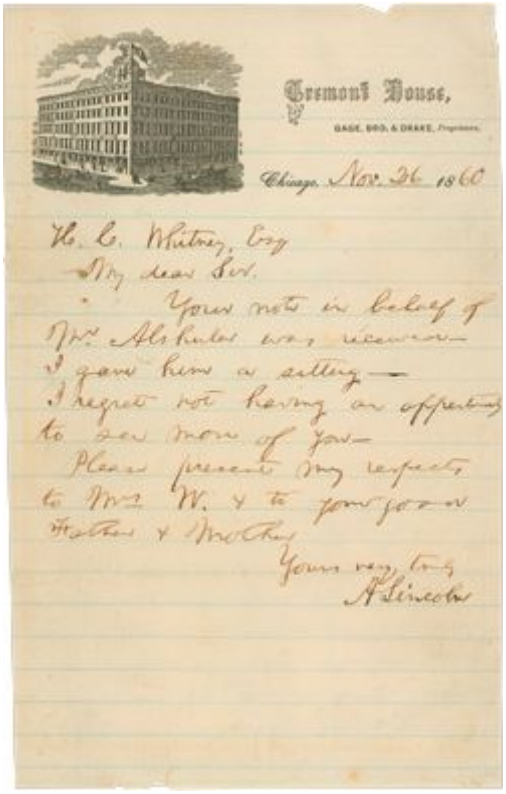
1858

Samuel Alschuler lent Lincoln his own velvet-trimmed coat for this photo taken by Alschuler in Urbana, Illinois, on April 25, 1858.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

"in behalf of Mr. Alschuler ... I gave him a sitting."

1860

Lincoln, now president-elect and with an early beard, again sits for Alschuler, in Chicago, on November 25, 1860.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress



President-elect Lincoln recalls sitting for Alschuler on the previous day; written on Fremont House Chicago stationery, November 26, 1860.

Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library & Museum

1861

Lincoln, in a signed photograph taken by Christopher German in Springfield, Ilinois, dated January 26, 1861, now with a full beard.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

INAUGURATION DAY, MARCH 4, 1861

Amid unprecedented military security and accompanied by President James Buchanan, Lincoln spoke movingly of peace and reconciliation with the rebellious South. "We are not enemies, but friends," he pleaded in his inauguration speech. Nonetheless, six weeks later, the Confederates fired on Fort Sumter, and the war began.
The Granger Collection

CHAPTER FOUR

WE HAVE NOT YET APPOINTED A HEBREW

1861–1862

Needing every ounce of the strength and the courage that Abraham Kohn, invoking the biblical Joshua, had wished upon him, Abraham Lincoln set forth on February 11, 1861, the eve of his fifty-second birthday, for Washington, D.C. Some one thousand people gathered early in the morning at Springfield's Great Western Railroad depot to see him off. Henry Greenebaum, the Jewish Democrat whom Lincoln had earlier wooed in Chicago, happened to be in Springfield for a legislative hearing that day and joined them. "I now leave," he heard Lincoln say, "not knowing when, or whether ever, I may return." In what Greenebaum recalled as "a very solemn and impressive speech," the president-elect described the task awaiting him as even "greater than that which rested upon Washington." South Carolina, Mississippi, Florida, Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, and Texas had all by then seceded from the United States, and, on February 8, the Confederate States of America, "invoking the favor of Almighty God," had formed a provisional constitution. Lincoln, affirming his own trust in God, "who can go with me, and remain with you and be every where for good," confidently hoped "that all will yet be well." He bid "an affectionate farewell" to everyone, and, according to Greenebaum, "moved us to tears."[1]

Lincoln's train stopped repeatedly along the route, a conscious effort to promote calm and acquaint Americans with their new president—"that I may see you," he said, "and that you may see me." Everywhere he was greeted by large crowds. In Cincinnati, where he left his train for the night, Rabbi Isaac Mayer Wise watched the eager throngs and was appalled. "The Philistines from all corners of the land congregate around their Dagon and worship him…," he complained, employing a biblical metaphor that, ironically, Lincoln himself might well have appreciated. "We can not tell why these extraordinary demonstrations, processions, banquets, &c., should be made." To Wise, an immigrant and a Democrat, the president-elect appeared inadequate; he described him, evoking a central European metaphor, as looking like "Der Landjunker das erste Mal in der Stadt, which [means], in good English, 'like a country squire for the first time in the city.'" "We have no doubt he is an honest man and, as much as we can learn, also quite an intelligent man," he concluded, "but he will look queer in the white house, with his primitive manner."[2]

HENRY GREENEBAUM

The German-born Greenebaum was an intimate friend of Stephen A. Douglas in Illinois, but he knew and liked Lincoln, becoming a Republican with the advent of the Civil War. Lincoln, he recalled, had "very broad views, had no prejudices whatever against any nationalities or classes and many of the most prominent Jews of Illinois supported him for the Presidency."
Chicago History Museum

ISAAC MAYER WISE

Though not denying Lincoln's honesty and intelligence, Rabbi Isaac Mayer Wise, a leading figure in the American Jewish community, was repulsed by Lincoln's primitive manner. A Northern Democrat, Wise was fearful of radicalism on both sides; and while not antislavery, his primary aim was to hold the Union together.

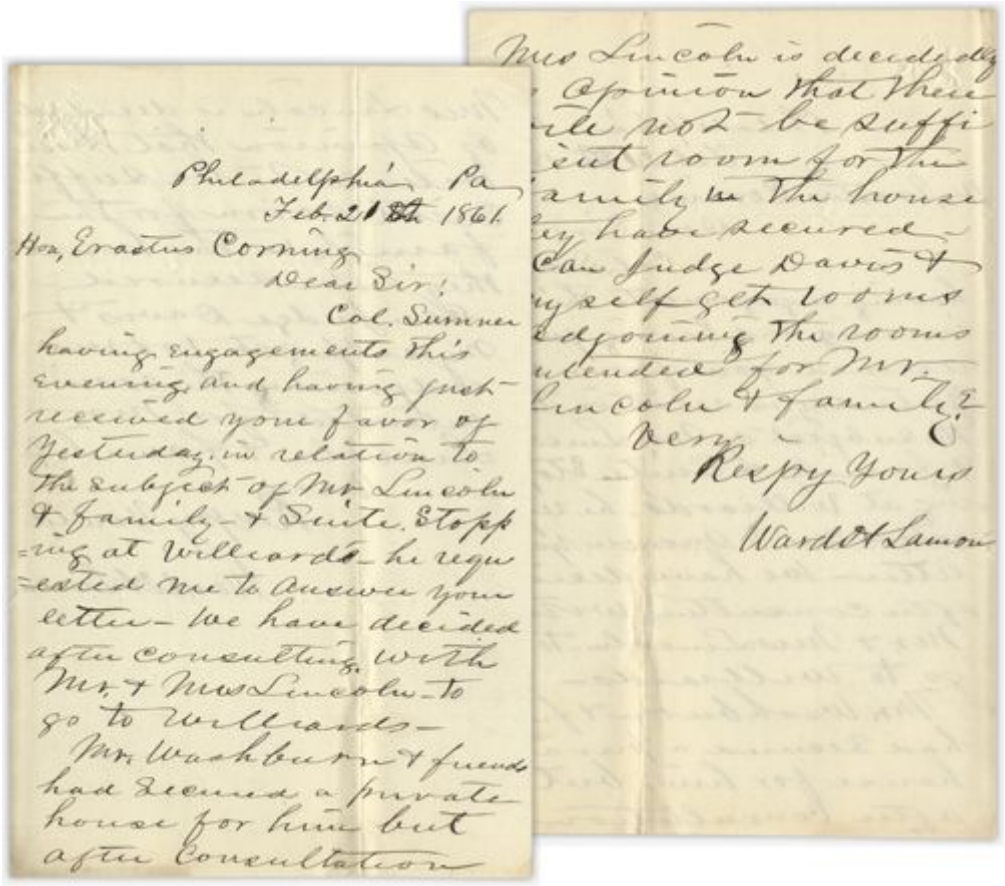
Jacob Rader Marcus Center of the American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio

Abram Dittenhoefer, the Jewish lawyer who had worked so hard to elect Lincoln, naturally disagreed. He was present on February 20 when the Democratic mayor of New York, Fernando Wood, hosted Lincoln, and described the president-elect as "more grave and serious" than before, an indication either of "fatigue or anxiety regarding the future." Lincoln, he sensed, was "a man carrying a burden that grew heavier day by day," understandably so in the wake of Jefferson Davis's inauguration two days earlier as provisional president of the Confederate States. Lincoln's remarks in response to Wood, in which he analogized the Union to a ship with passengers and cargo, and hinted that in order to save the ship it might be necessary to throw "cargo overboard," suggested to Dittenhoefer that the president-elect "had become bolder in the expression of his feeling against the continuance of slavery in the South." Looking back, he described what Lincoln said that day as an anticipation of the future, "the first gleam of emancipation."[3]

Many other Jews also gazed upon Abraham Lincoln as trains carried him across the country, a journey that covered 1,904 miles and the tracks of eighteen different railroad lines. In Philadelphia, in sight of the hall where the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution were originally framed, Lincoln repeated an ancient Jewish oath, inspired by Psalm 137. "May my right hand forget its cunning and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth," he declared, thinking of what the Founders had created, "if ever I prove false to those teachings." Implicitly, he here linked the most sacred documents of the United States to the sacred city of Jerusalem; Lincoln was very likely aware of how the portion of Psalm 137 continues: "If I do not remember you, if I do not consider Jerusalem, my highest joy."[4]



Philadelphia Pa
Feb. 21st 1861

Hon. Erastus Corning

Dear Sir!

Col. Sumner having engagements this evening, and having just received your favor of Yesterday, in relation to the subject of Mr Lincoln & family - & Suite. Stopping at Willards - he requested me to answer your letter - We have decided after consulting with Mr. & Mrs Lincoln - to go to Willards -

Mr. Washburn & friends had secured a private house for him but after consultation

Mrs Lincoln is decidedly opinion that there will not be sufficient room for the family in the house
they have secured -
Can Judge Davis & myself get rooms adjoining the rooms
intended for Mr.
Lincoln & family & very Respy Yours
Ward H Lamon

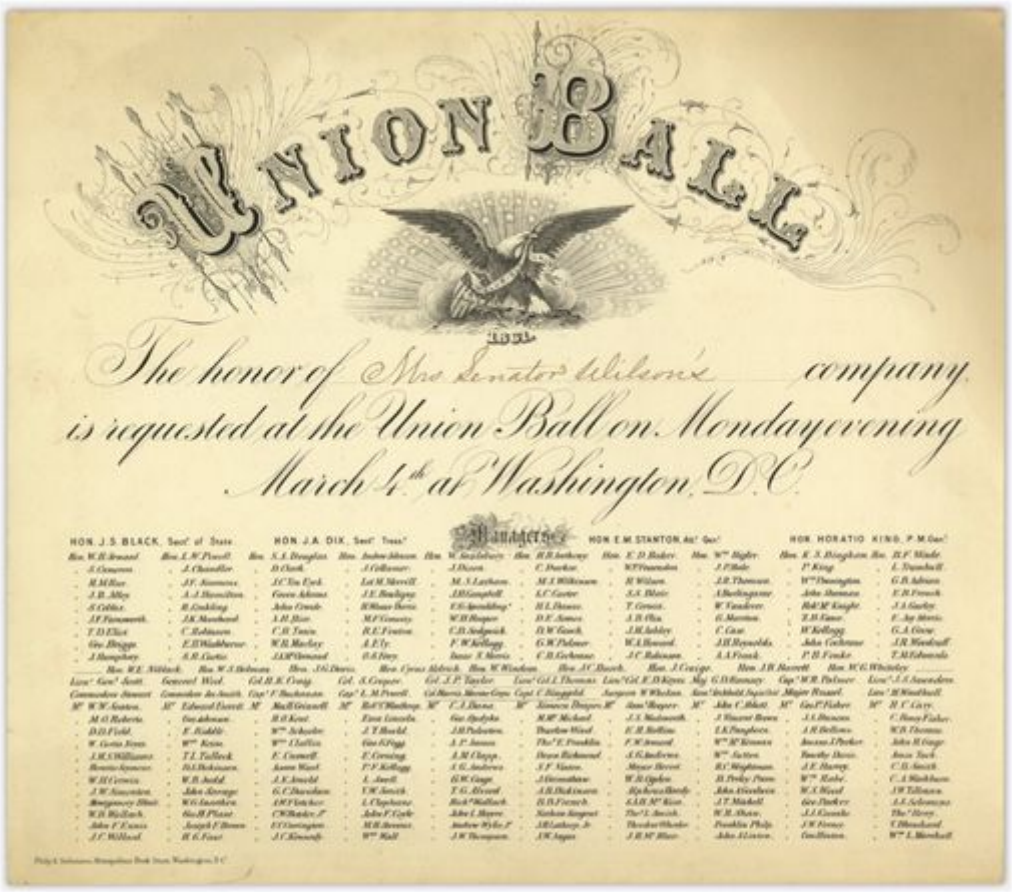
LINCOLN IS SAFELY DELIVERED TO WASHINGTON, FEBRUARY 21, 1861

Eight weeks after Abraham Jonas expressed concern over Lincoln's safety prior to the inauguration, Lincoln's friend and bodyguard Ward Lamon confirms that the president-elect will stay at a public hotel, Willard's, in Washington, for the ten days prior to his move into the Executive Mansion. Sadly, Lamon would be out of town four years later when the inadequately protected Lincoln was shot at Ford's Theatre.

Shapell Manuscript Collection

FIRST WASHINGTON SITTING, FEBRUARY 24, 1861

One day after sneaking into Washington from Baltimore under cover of darkness, Lincoln, exhausted and pensive, sits as president-elect for this photo—his first taken in Washington—by Alexander Gardner at Mathew Brady's studio.
Shapell Manuscript Collection



UNION BALL

1861

The honor of Mrs Senator Wilson's company is requested at the Union Ball on Monday evening March 4th at Washington D.C.

Managers

HON. J. S. BLACK, Secr. of State — HON. J. A. DIX, Secr. Treas. — HON. E. M. STANTON, Att. Gen. — HON. HORATIO KING, P. M. Gen.

Hon. W. H. Seward — Hon. J. W. Powell — Hon. S. A. Douglas — Hon. Andrew Johnson — Hon. W. Bigler — Hon. H. B. Anthony — Hon. E. D. Baker — Hon. W. Sprague — Hon. R. S. Bingham — Hon. B. F. Wade

S. Cameron — A. Chandler — D. Clark — J. Gilmore — J. Dixon — C. Durkee — W. P. Fessenden — J. Pitcher — P. King — E. Dyer Ashwell
M. M. Rice — J. F. Simmons — J. C. Du Cark — Lot M. Morrill — M. S. Latham — M. S. Wilkinson — H. Wilson — J. R. Thompson — W. Thompson — G. B. Adams
J. B. Alley — A. J. Hamilton — Green Adams — J. F. Bradley — J. D. Campbell — J. C. Carter — S. S. Blair — A. Shellingame — John Thomas — T. B. French
S. Colfax — R. Conkling — John Crisfield — Wm Kline Davis — V. Spaulding — H. L. Dawes — T. Gross — W. Vandever — Hd M. Knight — J. A. Gurley
J. F. Farnsworth — J. K. Moorhead — A. H. Rice — M. F. Conway — W. H. Hooper — D. F. Somes — A. B. Olin — G. Morton — T. B. Cane — F. Jay Morris
T. D. Eliot — C. Robinson — C. H. Train — R. E. Fenton — C. D. Sedgwick — D. W. Gooch — J. M. Ashley — C. Case — W. Kellogg — G. A. Grow
Geo. Briggs — E. D. Washburne — W. H. Hurley — A. E. Ely — F. W. Kellogg — G. W. Palmer — W. A. Howard — J. H. Reynolds — John Coltrane — J. R. Woodwell
J. Humphrey — A. R. Curtis — J. M. Edmond — D. A. Finny — Isaac N. Morris — C. B. Cochrane — J. C. Robinson — A. A. Frank — P. B. Fouke — T. M. Edwards

Hon. W. E. Niblack — Hon. W. A. Richardson — Hon. J. C. Davis — Hon. Cyrus Aldrich — Hon. W. Windom — Hon. J. C. Davis — Hon. J. Craig — Hon. A. B. Burritt — Hon. W. G. Whiteley

Lieut. Gen. Scott — Genl. Wool — Gd. B. R. Craig — Col. A. Cooper — Col. J. P. Taylor — Lieut Col. L. Thomas — Lieut Col. E. D. Keyes — Maj. G. D. Ramsay — Capt W. H. Palmer — Lieut. J. J. Saunders
Commodore Stewart — Commodore Jno Smith — Capt I. P. Buchanan — Capt S. M. Powell — Col Thos. Morris Cripps — Capt C. Sinnyfield — Surgeon W. Wharton — Asst Archibald Ingersol — Major Russell — Lieut. H. Wadsworth

Mr W. W. Seaton — Mr Edward Everett — Mr Mad'l Grinnell — Mr Rob't Winthrop — Mr C. J. Ihone — Mr Simeon Draper — Mr Asst Rogers — Mr John C. Hunt — Mr Geo P. Fisher — Mr H. C. Gray
M. O. Roberts — Geo Ashman — R. B. Kent — Elon Lincoln — Geo Opdyke — M. P. Michael — J. S. Wadsworth — J. Vincent Brown — J. S. Duncan — C. Henry Fisher
D. D. Field — F. Riddle — Wm Schaefer — J. T. Hoeld — J. B. Palmeter — Thurlow Weed — E. B. Bellow — J. K. Pangborn — A. H. Bellows — W. B. Thomas
W. Gates Jones — Wm Klein — Wm Chellis — Geo Grigg — A. P. Jones — Tho's E. Franklin — P. W. Arnaud — Wm M. Kinnan — Amasa J. Parker — John H. Gray
J. M. S. Williams — T. L. Tulluck — E. Cromwell — E. Corning — A. M. Clapp — Dean Richmond — A. G. Andrews — Wm Sutton — Timothy Davis — Amos Tuck
Horatio Seymour — D. S. Dickinson — Aaron Ward — P. P. Kellogg — S. L. Andrews — S. F. Vinton — Meyer Hecht — R. C. Wrightman — A. E. Burnig — C. G. Smith
W. H. Corwin — W. B. Astoff — A. K. Arnold — L. Jewell — G. W. Gage — A. Hemenhaus — W. B. Ogden — B. Perley Poore — W. W. Kohl — C. A. Washburn
A. W. Ainsworth — John Jessup — G. C. Thorndon — V. W. Smith — T. G. Alvord — A. B. Dickinson — Ryckman Bleeck — John Hendricks — W. S. Wood — J. W. Tillman
Montgomery Blair — Wm Hamilton — J. M. Fletcher — I. Clephane — Rich'd Wallach — D. D. French — S. S. M. Kee — A. T. Mudell — Geo Parker — A. S. Solomons
W. D. Wallach — Geo H. Plant — C. W. Butler, Jr — John F. Coyle — John C. Myers — Nathan Sargent — The's L. Smith — W. H. Shaw — J. J. Cassin — Tho's Berry
John F. Cuss — Joseph F. Brown — J. J. Cassin — M. B. Brown — Andrew Wylie Jr — J. M. Lathrop Jr — Theodore Wheler — Franklin Philp — J. W. Fenay — V. Blanchard
J. C. Willard — H. G. Foot — J. C. Kennedy — Wm Hall — J. W. Thompson — J. W. Jones — J. H. M. Blair — John A. Lowe — Cas Benton — Wm L. Marshall

C. B. Smith.
C. A. Washburn.
J. W. Tillman.
A. S. Solomons.
Tho's Berry.
V. Blanchard.
Wm L. Marshall.

INAUGURAL BALL INVITATION, MARCH 4, 1861

Listed as a "Manager" of Lincoln's celebratory Union Ball, to be held the night of the swearing-in, is Jewish activist, philanthropist, and businessman Adolphus Simeon (A. S.) Solomons.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

Inspired as some were by Lincoln's biblically inflected rhetoric, Jews remained divided in their views concerning the incoming president. As such, they were a microcosm of the nation as a whole. This was particularly evident in Baltimore, where, in order to avoid a suspected assassination plot, Lincoln arrived under cover of darkness at about 3:30 A.M. on Saturday morning, February 23, and made himself inconspicuous as he switched trains for the last leg of his journey to Washington. Baltimore at that time was home to as many as 7,000 Jews, and they spanned the spectrum. Some of the city's oldest and most Orthodox Jews, like the majority of the Cohen and Friedenwald families and Rabbi Bernard Illowy, loathed the Republican Party and openly sympathized with the slaveholding South. Radical Jews like Rabbi David Einhorn and his followers, many of whom had supported the failed 1848 revolutions in Europe, detested slavery and cheered on its Republican opponents (as a result, Einhorn would be forced to flee the city in April). The majority of Jews, in the middle, having voted for the Democrats, promoted peace and reconciliation. They sought at all costs to stem the secessionist tide that Lincoln's nomination had precipitated.[5]

PHILP & SOLOMONS STATIONERY EMBOSSMENT

Imprint from the firm of Philp & Solomons, founded by Jewish printer Adolphus S. Solomons. Official Executive Mansion stationery had never before been employed in the White House, and Lincoln wrote many of his first personal and official letters as president on plain Philp & Solomons imprinted stationery. A year after taking office, Lincoln received the first printing of official Executive Mansion-embossed stationery. Lincoln continued to use Philp & Solomon's stationery—including for one of five handwritten copies of the Gettysburg Address.

Ten days following his arrival in Washington, Abraham Lincoln was inaugurated as the sixteenth president of the United States. His celebrated inaugural address likewise sought to stem the secessionist tide. He promised his "dissatisfied fellow countrymen" that he would uphold the laws, and reiterated his promise not "to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists." His remarkable peroration, a literary masterpiece, pleaded for national reconciliation:

> We are not enemies, but friends. We must not be enemies. Though passion may have strained, it must not break our bonds of affection. The mystic chords of memory, stre[t]ching from every battle-field, and patriot grave, to every living heart and hearthstone, all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union, when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature.[6]

Unremarked, except by Jews, was Lincoln's specific reference to Christianity as a basis for resolving the sectional crisis. "Intelligence, patriotism, Christianity, and a firm reliance on Him, who has never yet forsaken this favored land," he declared, "are still competent to adjust, in the best way, all our present difficulty."[7] A dozen letters poured into the office of the Israelite protesting the president's remarks. "Why not take the advice of the writings and doings of Thomas Jefferson," one of them asked. It called upon Lincoln to speak out "in the name of humanity and not Christianity." Giving voice to perennial Jewish fears concerning the use of state power to advance the Christian faith to the disadvantage of others, the letter writer worried that Lincoln, in the future, might prove sympathetic to nationwide efforts to strengthen Christian Sunday closing ("blue") laws, as well as to the campaign to have "Christ be acknowledged by the Constitution."[8]

HONEST ABE

"MR. LINCOLN," HIS WIFE WROTE, "is almost a monomaniac on the subject of honesty." "On no terms would either male or female receive his signature to enable them to profit by our Government." In fact, even before he became president, tales concerning his integrity and magnanimity circulated, whether as a shopkeeper in New Salem or as a hardworking lawyer in Springfield collecting judgments for his clients. As president, he demanded the same standards of honesty from others whom he appointed to government office.

On April 5, 1861, he sent a memo that illustrates those exacting standards. "On to-day," he wrote, "and on the first fifth of each month, please to send me a Warrant for the amount of my salary as President of the United States." He had been inaugurated on March 4, and lest he be paid for four days (March 1–4) when he had not yet assumed office, he corrected the memo in his own hand and stipulated that his salary should thereafter be paid on the fifth of every month.

Two weeks later, on April 19, he displayed his standards of probity once again. "I am annoyed to know that my Bill at your house has not yet been paid," he wrote to the proprietor of Willard's Hotel, where he had stayed prior to his inauguration. "Receipt it & hand it to Mr. Nicolay & he will give a check for the amount." By the nineteenth, a week after hostilities began, Fort Sumter had fallen, and Lincoln, on that very day, was proclaiming a blockade of the South. Nevertheless, he took time out from his busy schedule to make certain that an overdue bill was paid.

Executive Mansion
April 5th 1861

Hon. S. P. Chase
Secretary of the Treasury

Dear Sir

On to-day, and on the 6th of each month, please to send me a Warrant for the amount of my salary as President of the United States

Your Obt Servt
A. Lincoln

LINCOLN'S TELLING ONE-WORD REVISION OF HIS SALARY VOUCHER

Shapell Legacy Partnership

TREASURY WARRANT No. 6010
TREASURY
United States
Washington April 5th 1861
Pay to Abraham Lincoln Pres. of the U.S. States DOLLARS
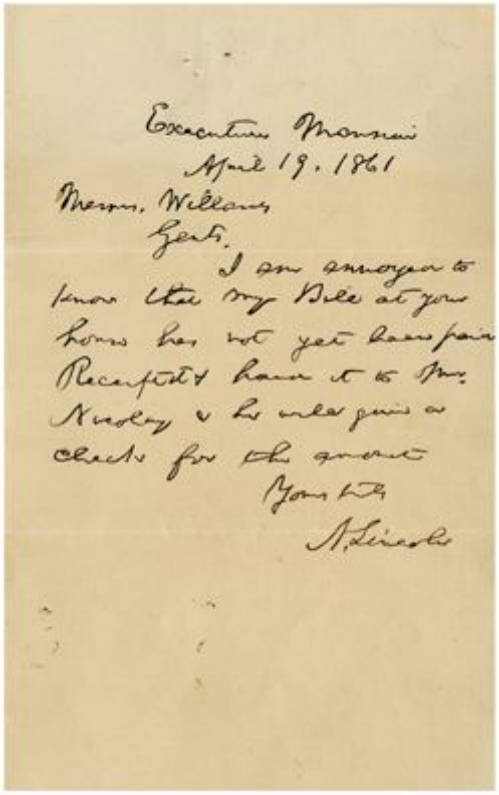
Registered April 5th 1861
Assistant Treasurer at New York
Register of the Treasury

THE CHECK, SHOWING THE CORRECT DATE—APRIL 5, 1861, WITH LINCOLN'S ENDORSEMENT

U.S. National Archives & Records Administration



Executive Mansion
April 19. 1861
Messrs. Willard
Gents.
I am annoyed to know that my Bill at your House has not yet been paid
Receipted & have it to Mr.
Nicolay & he will give you a check for the amount
Yours truly
A. Lincoln

LINCOLN PAYS HIS BILL TO WILLARD'S HOTEL
Shapell Manuscript Collection

Though no partisan of the president, Rabbi Isaac Mayer Wise, the editor of the Israelite, urged calm. "In Springfield religion is called Christianity," he wrote reassuringly, "because people there do not think of any other form of worship, hence Mr. Lincoln uses the same word to express the same sentiment." Observing that Lincoln's supporters at the polls included many infidels and atheists, he suggested that his "words must not be criticized too closely." "By and by," he patronizingly predicted, "he will learn the precise use and import of terms."[9]

The precise meaning of "Christianity" at that time was actually somewhat complex. Some in Lincoln's day used the word narrowly as a synonym for Protestantism, others as a synecdoche for religion as a whole. The status of religious outsiders, such as Catholics, Jews, Mormons, and Native Americans, lay much in dispute.[10] Moreover, for all of his appeal to Christianity, Lincoln may not even have considered himself a Christian. He grew up, we have seen, among Calvinist Baptists who believed in predestination. True Christians, according to them, had been selected as such when the world came into being. "I am not a Christian—God knows I would be one," he allegedly told Illinois' state superintendent of public instruction, Newton Bateman, in 1860.[11]

As for Jews, while they were known to be a distinctive "class" of Americans, much like Germans and Catholics, the fact that they were not Christian became an issue only when Jews felt excluded.[12] Otherwise, they mostly played down their religious differences and sought to fit in. Many of them, indeed, were better known as Germans than as Jews. Lincoln, from his previous interactions with Jews, had no reason to know that his reference to "Christianity" would offend them. Over time, as we shall see, he learned better.

Meanwhile, a call had gone out in the Jewish Messenger for "our people" to be "well represented" at the grand Union Ball held on inauguration night. However much Jews viewed themselves as a people apart ("our people"), they looked to participate as equals in public events of this sort. Over eighty Jewish families reputedly lived in Washington at that time. The noted Washington printer and bookstore owner Adolphus S. Solomons, who was Sabbath-observing and Orthodox, was even listed as a "manager" on the ball's official invitation. "The tickets are to be $10 each," the Messenger drolly reported, "admitting a gentleman and as many ladies as he may have the moral courage to bring with him."[13]

Some of those who paid to dance at the inaugural ball were office seekers. Prior to the 1883 Pendleton Civil Service Reform Act, patronage dominated most levels of government in the United States, on the theory that "to the victor belongs the spoils." Presidents rewarded their acquaintances and supporters with government jobs to cement their hold on power and promote party loyalty. As a result, within days of the inauguration, thousands of job seekers, of every faith and no faith, thronged the White House. Abraham Lincoln spent long hours seeking to identify whom he could depend upon to work hard and resist corruption.[14]

Ethnic and religious group leaders naturally paid close attention to presidential appointments, hoping that members of their own flock received their due. Jews were no exception. "The present government … has not given one single office to an Israelite," Rabbi Isaac Mayer Wise complained four weeks after Lincoln took office.[15] By then, Lincoln was actually preparing to make his first official appointment of a Jew to public office. On May 24, Wise himself happily announced the news: "Abraham Jonas has received the appointment of Post Master of Quincy by the direct nomination of President Lincoln."[16] Jonas, we have seen, had served in that position before, under Presidents Taylor and Fillmore. Having worked so hard to elect Lincoln, he sought the remunerative position once again. Soon after the November election, the Quincy Daily Herald reported that a petition was circulating in the community, "asking Abe Lincoln to appoint Abe Jonas postmaster." Democrats signed the petition as well. Orville Hickman Browning, in a letter to Lincoln in December, added his weight to the effort: "I would be glad to have our mutual friend Abram Jonas remembered in connection with the Post office at Quincy. He wishes the place, and, I think, ought to have it." Lincoln, preoccupied by the fall of Fort Sumter and the outbreak of war, seems to have delayed the appointment. Once he acted favorably, though, Jonas lost no time in extending patronage to friends of his own: "The new Post Master, Mr. Jonas has made the following appointments," the Quincy Whig Republican reported on May 25. "Edward Jonas, Principal Assistant; Simon P. Cohen, Book-Keeper; John Kinkle, Clerk." Two of those three early appointments went to Jews, one of whom was Jonas's own son.[17] dissatisfied, hold the right side in the dispute, there still is no single good reason for precipitate action. Intelligence, patriotism, Christianity, and a firm reliance on Him, who has never yet forsaken this favored land, are still competent to adjust, in the best way, all our present difficulty.

In your hands, my dissatisfied fellow countrymen, and not in mine, is the momentous issue of civil war. The government will not assail you. You can have no conflict, without being yourselves the aggressors. You have no oath registered in Heaven to destroy the government, while I shall have the most solemn one to "preserve, protect and defend" it.

7744

I am loth to close. We are not enemies, but friends. We must not be enemies. Though passion may have strained, it must not break our bonds of affection. The mystic chords of memory, stretching from every battle-field, and patriot grave, to every living heart and hearth-stone, all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union, when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature.

"BETTER ANGELS OF OUR NATURE," LINCOLN'S FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS, MARCH 4, 1861

A working draft of Lincoln's literary masterpiece, pleading for national reconciliation. Four years later, in his second inaugural address, Lincoln again concluded with words that indelibly marked American memory.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

Abraham Lincoln found himself engaged with matters concerning Jews thrice more around the time that Jonas became Quincy's postmaster, a sign of the growing numbers and significance of Jews in the United States, of Lincoln's own predilections, and of the president's changing priorities and responsibilities with the onset of the Civil War. On May 26, he dashed off a note to Secretary of War Simon Cameron concerning a Jew named Max Einstein. "I am very much inclined to accept Col. Einsteins Regiment," he wrote "and wish you would have it mustered into service as soon as possible."[18]

307

To the Senate of the United States.

I nominate Abraham Jonas to be Deputy Postmaster at Quincy, in the county of Adams, and State of Illinois, in place of W^m H. Condit removed; the said Abraham Jonas having been appointed during the last recess of the Senate.

Abraham Lincoln

Washington, July 10. 1861.

LINCOLN NOMINATES ABRAHAM JONAS, JULY 10, 1861

At the recommendation of Orville Hickman Browning, Lincoln nominates his long-time friend and political supporter, Abraham Jonas, to the position of Deputy Postmaster of Quincy, Illinois.
U.S. National Archives & Records Administration

Einstein (1822–1906), who immigrated to America from Württemberg in 1844, owned a successful ribbon and silk store in Philadelphia, but his passion was the military. During the 1850s, he served in various Pennsylvania militias and helped to found and lead the Philadelphia Flying Artillery Company, a unit that specialized in fighting on horseback, using recently introduced lightweight artillery. He also developed extensive political connections. As war loomed, in 1861, Einstein helped to organize the 27th Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry Regiment: at least half of its volunteers were German immigrants, and about 10 percent Jews. Embarrassed when rioters attacked the unprepared volunteers in Baltimore as they sought to make their way to Washington, the regiment was reorganized as a light artillery company, with Einstein, who was experienced in that area, serving as colonel. He personally traveled to Washington amid the patriotic fervor that swept the North following the fall of Fort Sumter, so as to offer his troops to Secretary of War Cameron, whom he had previously known as Pennsylvania's senator.

Although it was officially up to "state authorities" to supply militiamen in response to the call for 75,000 volunteers to suppress the Confederacy, Lincoln encouraged Cameron to accept the regiment anyway. At the first battle of Bull Run (Manassas), which the Union lost, the 27th Regiment covered the military's retreat, and according to some reports at the time, "Colonel Einstein's Regiment behaved gallantly." But Major General George B. McClellan, with whom Einstein had apparently clashed, wanted the regiment placed under new leadership. When, allegedly without authorization, Einstein traveled to Philadelphia to procure clothing and shoes for his troops, McClellan had him arrested. Subsequently, McClellan told Cameron that "the interests of the service demand Colonel Einstein's dismissal" since he was "in no respects fit to be a colonel." Accordingly, Einstein was honorably discharged on October 2, 1861. Yet Lincoln was apparently far from convinced of his unfitness, for less than twelve weeks later he nominated him to be U.S. consul to Germany at Nuremberg. The existing consul, Philip Geisse, whom Einstein was slated to replace, was appalled. Among other things, he complained that Einstein's "being an Israelite is much to his prejudice here." Ultimately, the Senate rejected Einstein's nomination.[19]

Anti-Semitism likewise bedeviled another one of Lincoln's consular appointees from that time, Charles L. Bernays. Editor of an antislavery German newspaper in Missouri, Bernays had been a delegate to the 1860 Republican convention and was one of several sympathetic editors whom Lincoln rewarded with consulships. In early June, Lincoln appointed him consul to Zurich, and the recess appointment subsequently sailed through Congress. Jews of the day seem not to have paid much attention to the appointment. Bernays, scion of a distinguished Jewish family, was nominally a Lutheran, baptized and confirmed as a child in Germany prior to his immigration, and was known in Missouri as a freethinker. According to Isaac Mayer Wise, "nobody" would consider him an "Israelite." Nevertheless, several Swiss citizens protested Bernays's nomination, both because they considered him a Jew and because he had criticized Switzerland for discriminating against Jews. Within six months, Lincoln prudently shifted him to Helsingør (Elsinore), Denmark, where his Jewish parentage seems not to have been an issue.[20]

The third matter concerning Jews that engaged Abraham Lincoln around the time that Abraham Jonas took office involved a European Jewish banking family, the Rothschilds. On May 28, Lincoln received a letter from the prominent New York attorney and former Democratic congressman Francis Brockholst Cutting, advising him "that impressions beneficial to our country will be produced by continuing to communicate with Europe, thro' the medium of the Messrs Rothschild."[21] One of Lincoln's greatest fears at that time was that Great Britain, which was dependent upon Southern cotton, angered by America's recently raised protectionist tariff (the Morrill tariff), and happy to see the United States weakened, might grant official recognition to the Confederacy in a bid to weaken America still more. Salomon James de Rothschild, the somewhat irresponsible twenty-six-year-old son of Baron James Mayer de Rothschild of France, who was on a prolonged visit to America, advocated precisely that policy in a letter home: "The sooner the great European powers recognize the Confederacy…," he wrote, "the sooner they will have fulfilled a mission of peace and humanity. Even more, it is in their own interest to do so, for the independence of the South will bring about free trade and will create an immense outlet for all our products and for those of England.… I am therefore begging you to use all your influence to have the Confederacy recognized as quickly as possible."[22]

What Cutting had discovered and revealed to Lincoln, however, was that the elder Rothschild's own Jewish agent in the United States, August (Aaron) Belmont (1813–1890), strongly disagreed with Salomon. The German-born Belmont, who mixed in high society, and was married (in a church) to the daughter of Commodore Matthew Perry, was a leading figure in the Democratic Party.[23] Opposed to Lincoln's election, he was nevertheless outraged by the attack on Fort Sumter and strongly advocated for the Union. "Your Statesmen & your press have at all times taken the most violent & uncompromising stand against Slavery," he reminded Baron Lionel de Rothschild, England's first Jewish member of Parliament, "and it is more than strange to see the British Government now give its moral countenance to a power, which … is based upon Slavery as its principal fundamental strength." Rebutting arguments by Lord John Russell and others that favored British recognition of the Confederacy, Belmont insisted that the South had rebelled from "a fear that their peculiar institution of slavery may hereafter be interfered with by the party which put Mr Lincoln into power." He warned that British interference would "only prolong the fratricidal war and entail ruin not only upon both sections of our country but upon the material interests & commerce of the world." Never a shrinking violet, he made sure that his letter would be read both by the British prime minister, Lord Palmerston, and by Salomon's father, Baron de Rothschild of Paris.[24]

Belmont visited Washington in June, offering advice on how to fund the war (he thought it would require "from 50 to 60 millions of dollars"—Belmont was off in his estimate by a factor of one hundred).[25] He also met privately with Abraham Lincoln. He even seems to have undertaken a secret mission into Confederate territory, though details of his trip remain shrouded in mystery. Later, from Paris, he conveyed to Lincoln confidential "impressions & convictions of highplaced & wellfavored parties" in England and France concerning foreign intervention, and offered suggestions on how to export enough cotton across the Atlantic to prevent the Europeans from entering the conflict.[26] Belmont's call for "an earnest effort towards reconciliation and peace," as if the Southern states have not seceded at all, later distanced him from Lincoln: "Broken eggs," Lincoln replied, employing a metaphor that he memorably used following the Emancipation Proclamation, to underscore that there could be no return to the earlier status quo, "can not be mended." As head of the Democratic Party, in 1864, Belmont actively opposed Lincoln's reelection.[27] Even when they clashed, however, Lincoln—unlike so many others of his time—never disparaged Belmont as a Jew. By contrast, former president James Buchanan (whom Belmont had helped to elect back in 1856) once privately described him as a "speculating German Jew." The New York Times portrayed him as "the agent of foreign Jew bankers." A colonel named Max Langenschwarz dismissed him as "Jew-President Belmont."[28] Lincoln sometimes respected Belmont and sometimes not, but never commented on his ancestry or religion.

Washington D.C. May 26th
1861.

Hon. Simon Cameron
Sec. of War.

Dear Sir,

I am very much inclined to accept Col. Einstein's Regiment and wish you would have it mustered into service as soon as possible if in any way consistent with our arrangements.

Yours Truly
A. Lincoln

LINCOLN TO SIMON CAMERON, APPROVING THE MUSTERING OF MAX EINSTEIN'S REGIMENT, MAY 26, 1861

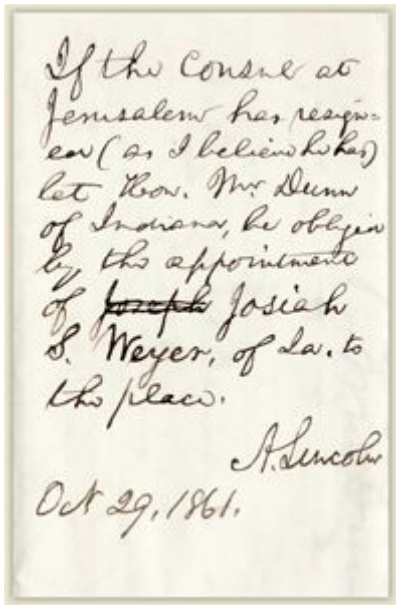
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

Colonel Max Einstein
Collection of Robert Marcus

Gift of a revolver to Colonel Max Einstein, presented "by his friends."
Courtesy of Shalom Lamm

LINCOLN'S APPOINTMENTS TO JERUSALEM

LINCOLN, WHO, according to his wife, Mary, told her on April 14, 1865, that he wanted to see Jerusalem before he died, shared a similar fate with his October 1861 choice for consul at Jerusalem: neither one of them ever got there. "If the Consul at Jerusalem has resigned, (as I believe he has)," Lincoln wrote, then he obliges the appointment of Josiah S. Weyer. But Weyer, of Iowa, had been trumped months earlier by a more politically viable candidate, Franklin Olcott of New York. Lincoln had simply forgotten that Olcott had been chosen. Albert Rhodes, who was appointed on February 23, 1864, was the last of four different consuls who served under Lincoln in the Holy Land.



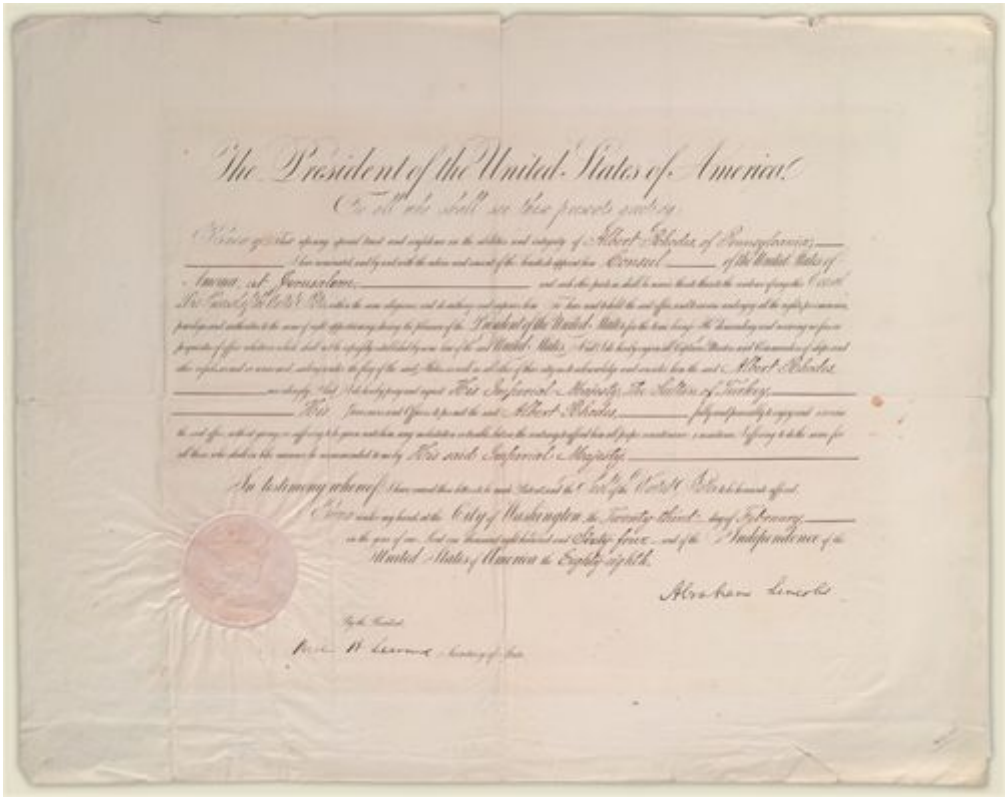
If the Consul at Jerusalem has resigned (as I believe he has) let Hon. Mr. Dunn of Indiana, be obliged by the appointment of ~~Joseph~~ Josiah S. Weyer, of Ia. to the place.

A. Lincoln

Oct 29, 1861.

LINCOLN'S ENDORSEMENT OF JOSIAH S. WEYER ON A LETTER FROM WILLIAM MCKEE DUNN, OCTOBER 29, 1861

Shapell Manuscript Collection



APPOINTMENT OF ALBERT RHODES AS CONSUL AT JERUSALEM, FEBRUARY 23, 1864

Brown University Library

Nor did ancestry and religion initially play much role in Lincoln's military appointments, which became increasingly numerous and significant in the months following the fall of Fort Sumter. As we previously noted, he appointed people, as far as possible, on the basis of merit. Such was certainly the case with regard to Alfred Mordecai, Jr., whom Lincoln, on August 10, 1861, appointed a second lieutenant.[29] Mordecai, twenty-one, was the scion of a distinguished and close-knit American Jewish family that dated back from before the American Revolution; he had relatives in both the North and the South. His father, Alfred Mordecai, Sr., received a classical and Jewish education, graduated first in his class at West Point in 1823, was a leader in the field of weapons and ammunitions development, and was probably the highest-ranking Jew of his day in the army. Varina Davis, the wife of Jefferson Davis, met him in the 1850s when her husband was U.S. secretary of war and was so impressed by the "Hebrew" that she felt she could understand, after seeing him, "how that race had furnished the highest type of mankind." In her memoirs, she went on to describe Mordecai's "habits of thought," "moral nature," and "private life" as being most admirable and praiseworthy; he was, she gushed, echoing the New Testament (John 1:47), "an Israelite without guile."[30]

Heavily recruited by the Confederacy once the Civil War began, even as he was overseeing the manufacture of cannon carriages meant to pound the Confederacy into submission, the elder Mordecai resolved his painful sectional dilemma by resigning from the military and sitting out the war in Philadelphia, forgoing honor and a comfortable salary. In so doing, he sought to "spare the feelings" of his wife and children, who favored the North; forbear taking up arms against his mother, siblings, and extended family, who all lived in and sided with the South; and preserve his ties to the army and the Union to which he had sworn loyalty.[31] None applauded his decision. Mordecai's son and namesake, whom Lincoln appointed, faced no similar dilemma. Likewise a West Point graduate ("near the top of his class"), and a lifelong Northerner, he identified with his Jewishness far less than his father (after the war, he was married, in a church, to a Christian).[32] His skills commended him to Lincoln.

AUGUST BELMONT

The wealthy German-born August Belmont was a New York Democrat who, as an international banker, was primarily concerned with preserving a peaceful economy. After Fort Sumter, however, he supported the Union cause and helped raise and equip the first German-American regiment.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

The same was true of the Jewish quartermasters whom Lincoln appointed. Quartermasters during the Civil War were responsible for the housing ("quarters"), transportation, clothing, and supplies of the troops. Their labors were described as "incessant." "The success of all military operations," one Civil War era study concluded, depended "in a great measure" upon the "promptness and efficiency" of the quartermaster.[33] Since a successful quartermaster required business and management skills in abundance, it comes as no surprise that a disproportionate number of Jews, many of whom had mercantile backgrounds, were called upon to fill these positions. One of the first whom Lincoln is known to have appointed was Moritz Pinner, the Jewish delegate from Missouri who had been present at the Republican national convention that nominated Lincoln for president in 1860. Pinner possessed both military and business experience, and General Philip Kearny of the First New Jersey Brigade asked that he be "appointed Quarter Master of his staff." In reply, Lincoln scrawled on the back of the letter, "Let Gen. Kearney be obliged, if it can be done consistently," and forwarded it on to Simon Cameron. Pinner received his commission a week later.[34]

HEBREW, ISRAELITE, JEW

AT DIFFERENT TIMES in his correspondence, Abraham Lincoln spoke of "Jews," of "Hebrews," and of "Israelites." All three terms were commonplace in his day, and they frequently were used interchangeably. Given the negative associations many Christians had with the word Jew, some considered Hebrew and Israelite more respectful terms. A name change, they thought, would improve Jews' overall status. Others, however, remained loyal to the word Jew, which had deep historical resonance. Revealingly, nineteenth-century American Jewish newspapers carried names like the Jewish Messenger, as well as the Hebrew Leader and the American Israelite.

The word Jew, in the end, did not disappear from the American lexicon. Instead, context generally determined whether it was being used respectfully, descriptively, or disparagingly. In Lincoln's case, whether he wrote about Jews, Hebrews, or Israelites, he never did so, as far as is known, in a disrespectful way.

Some fifty other Jews served as quartermasters for the Union during the Civil War, but with a single exception no mention of their being Jewish accompanied their appointment; they were appointed on the basis of their merit or connections.[35] In the Confederacy, there were also many Jewish quartermasters, including the quartermaster general of the entire army (derided by his enemies as "Jew Quarter-Master General"), Col. Abraham Charles Myers, for whom Fort Myers, Florida, is named.[36]

On one remarkable occasion—the "single exception" noted above—Lincoln appointed an assistant quartermaster precisely because he was a Jew. The individual involved, Cheme (Cherie) Moise Levy, was the son-in-law of Rabbi Morris J. Raphall of New York's Congregation B'nai Jeshurun. Before the war, as we have seen, Raphall defended slavery as biblically sanctioned, but once the war began he evinced ardent patriotism. His son, Alfred, was commissioned an officer and served with distinction in the Union army, later losing an arm in the fighting near Devil's Den at the Battle of Gettysburg.[37] The elder Raphall's son-in-law, probably with his father-in-law's backing, applied to be a quartermaster. "I believe we have not yet appointed a Hebrew," Lincoln responded in a note to Secretary of War Edwin M. Stanton on November 4, 1862. In fact, he was quite wrong in that belief, for, as we have seen, he had already appointed numbers of Jews, including quartermasters. Levy, however, was different: being Orthodox and well respected in New York, he was a public and visible Jew. That, indeed, is why Lincoln appointed him, because he was a "Hebrew" and because he was "well vouched as a capable and faithful man" (the word faithful, with typical Lincoln wordplay, carried a double meaning.) "Let him be appointed an Assistant Quarter-Master, with the rank of Captain," Lincoln ordered.[38]

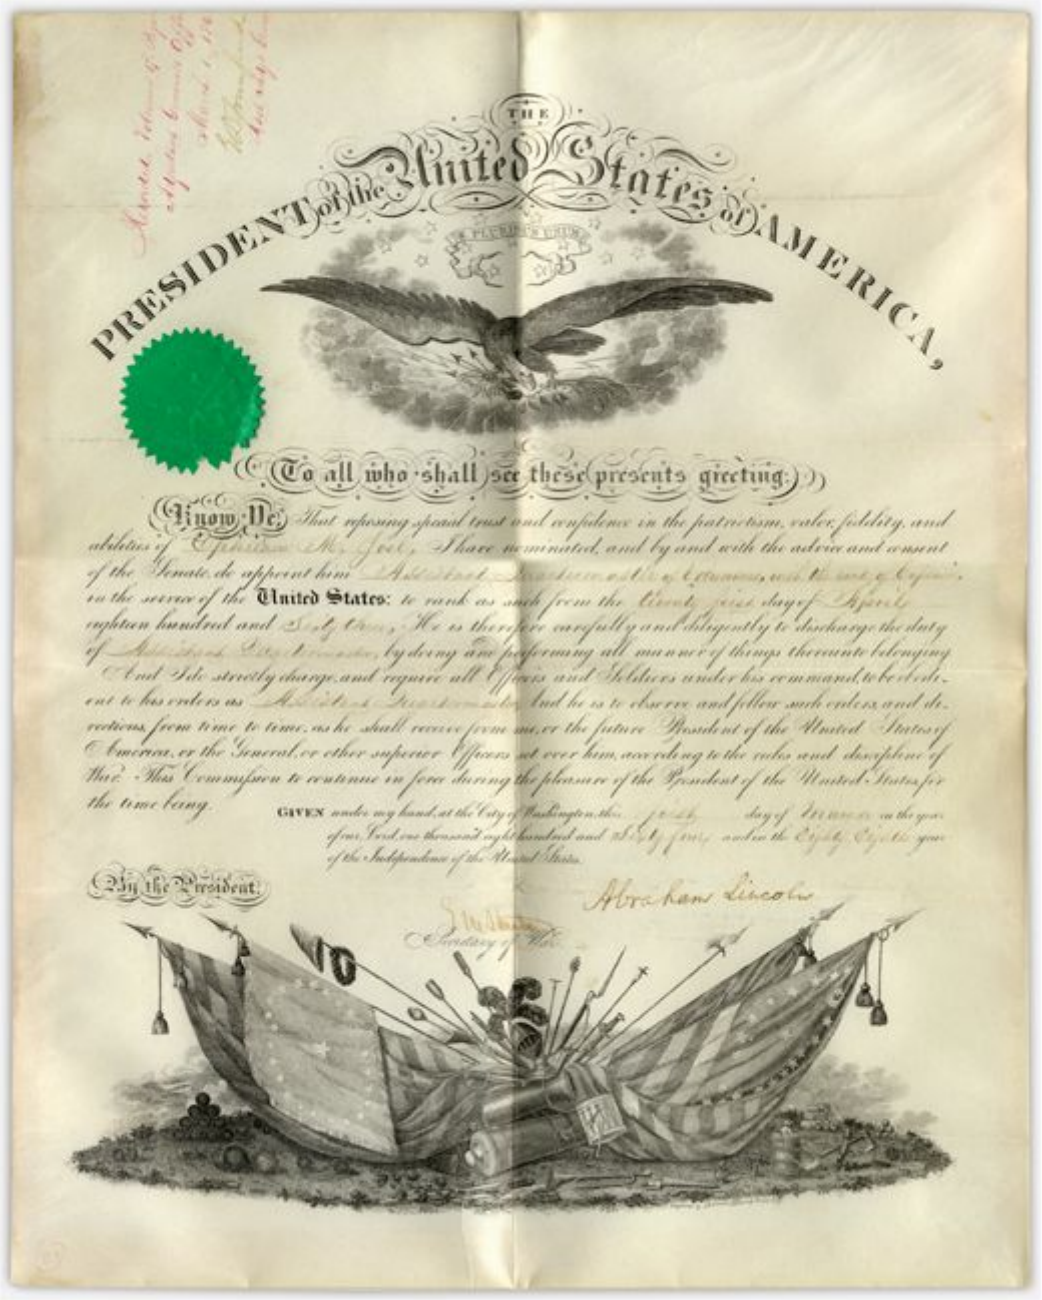
LINCOLN APPOINTS ALFRED MORDECAI, JR. A SECOND LIEUTENANT, AUGUST 10, 1861

Mordecai, a Jewish West Pointer, would go on to become one of the best-known ordnance officers in the United States Army; he retired as a general.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

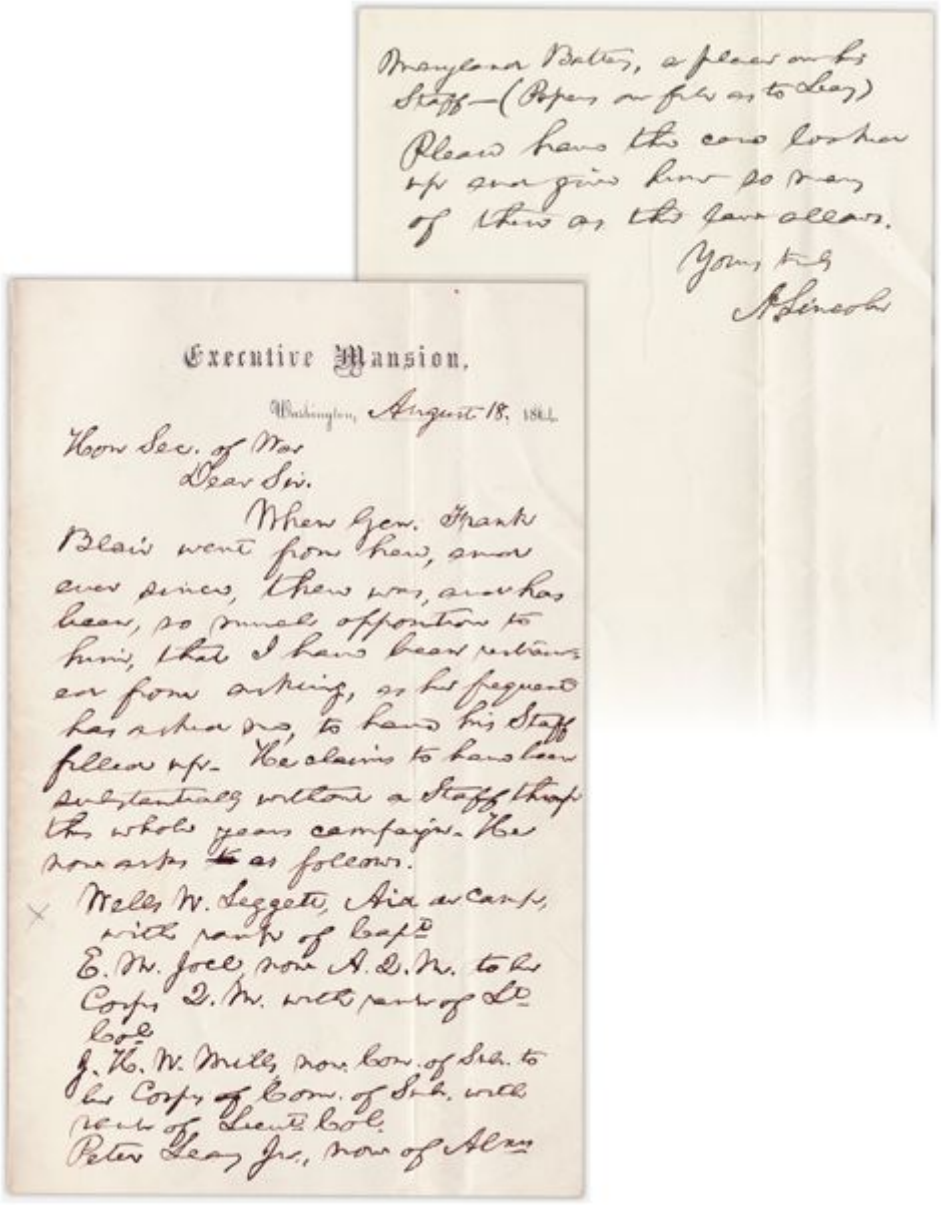
Alfred Mordecai, Jr.
Collection of Robert Marcus



LINCOLN PROMOTES JOEL QUARTERMASTER WITH THE RANK OF CAPTAIN, MARCH 1, 1864

Lt. Ephraim M. Joel, having been commended for his conduct at the end of the Vicksburg campaign, when he appropriated Confederate cannons for use by Union troops in the battle, is with this document raised by Lincoln to the rank of captain.

Shapell Manuscript Collection



Executive Mansion,

Washington, August 18, 1864.

Hon Sec. of War

Dear Sir.

When Gen. Frank Blair went from here, and ever since, there was, and has been, so much opposition to him, that I have been reluctant even from asking, as he frequently has others urged, to have his Staff filled up. He claims to have been substantially without a Staff through the whole years campaign. His now asks as follows.

Wells W. Leggett, Aid de Camp, with rank of Capt.

E. M. Joel, now A. Q. M. to the Corps Q. M. with rank of Lt. Col.

J. H. W. Mills, now Com. of Sub. to the Corps Com. of Sub. with rank of Lieut. Col.

Peter Leary Jr., now of Alex

Maryland Battery, a place on his Staff—(Papers on file as to Leary)

Please have this case looked up and give him so many of them as the law allows.

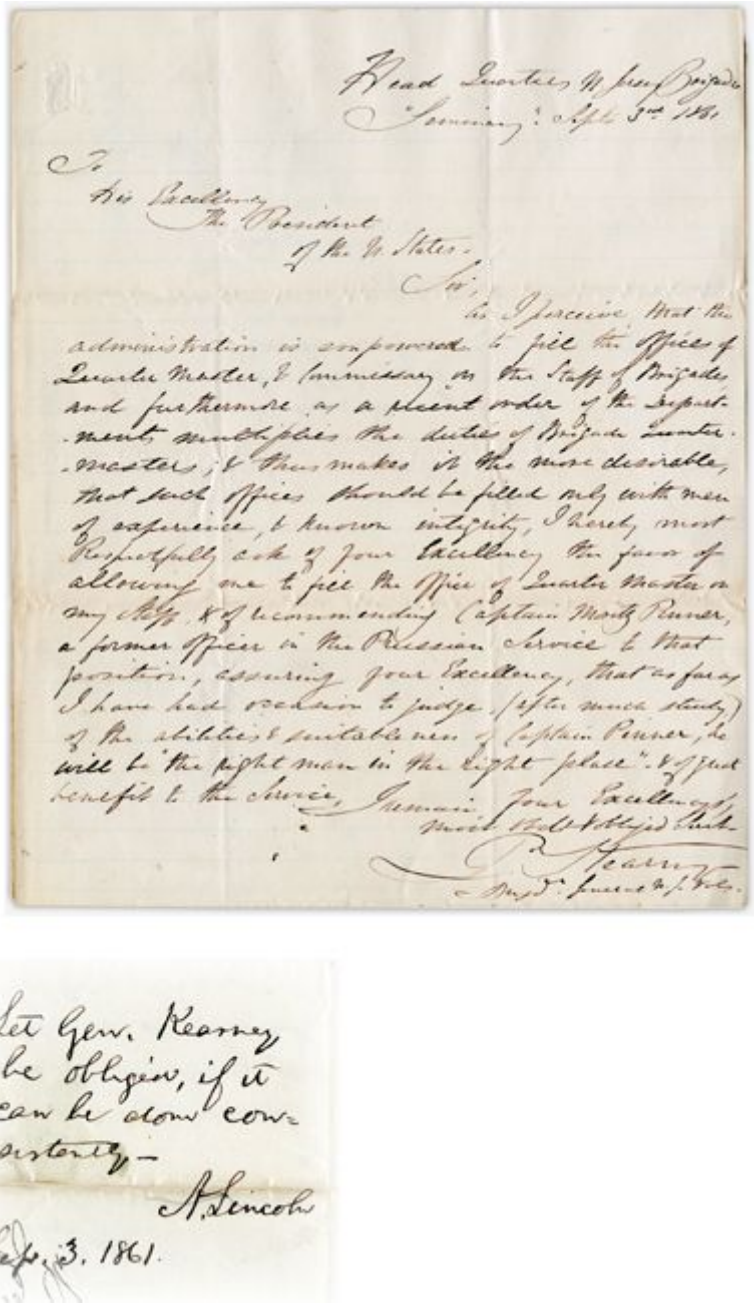
Yours truly

A. Lincoln

JOEL CONTINUES TO RISE IN THE RANKS, AUGUST 18, 1864

Lincoln appoints Ephraim M. Joel "now A.Q.M. to be Corps Q.M. with rank of Lt. Col. at the request of General Francis Preston Blair."

Shapell Manuscript Collection



Let Gen. Kearney be obliged, if it can be done consistently—
A. Lincoln
Sept. 3. 1861.

PHILIP KEARNY TO LINCOLN, SEPTEMBER 3, 1861, WITH LINCOLN'S ENDORSEMENT OF MORITZ PINNER

At the request of General Philip Kearny, Lincoln endorses the appointment of Moritz Pinner, who had been active in electing Lincoln the year before, as quartermaster for Kearny's staff.
William Clements Library, University of Michigan

Levy was soon hard at work in the capital and, on the side, distributed food and clothing to Jewish patients in Washington area hospitals.[39] Within less than a year, however, he was charged with "conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline," for signing a false certificate relating to the pay of men under his command. He secretly withheld half of one clerk's pay—upon the order of a commanding officer, he claimed—allegedly to prevent the man "from squandering one hundred dollars per month [on alcohol] to his own destruction." The sum involved was small, and Senator Samuel C. Pomeroy of Kansas apparently sought to intervene on Levy's behalf. Lincoln, however, was persuaded of Levy's guilt: "it makes too bad a record to admit of my interference—in fact, it could not be worse," he wrote. "To interfere, under the circumstances, would blacken my own character." Levy was therefore deprived of his rank and office in the army and "forever disqualified to hold any office of trust or profit in the United States."[40] Later, however, after hearing favorable reports on Levy from, among others, Richard Busteed (whom he had just appointed a U.S. district judge) and, it seems, after meeting personally with Rabbi Raphall, Lincoln reconsidered.[41] Justice was more important to him than being proven wrong.

On January 16, 1864, Lincoln renominated Levy as assistant quartermaster with the rank of captain. "Permit me to offer my sincere and heartfelt thanks for the generosity and justice with which you have treated my son-in-law Captain C. M. Levy," Raphall wrote him in gratitude. "My whole family unites with me in feeling that you are indeed his true benefactor."[42] Congress investigated and confirmed Levy's appointment, but Stanton blocked it; to him, "forever disqualified" meant just that. Senator Pomeroy protested to Lincoln that the original court martial was "an unjust imputation" and pleaded for Levy's reinstatement, but to no avail. It took another five years until, on February 18, 1869, outgoing president Andrew Johnson removed Levy's disability.[43]

If quartermasters like Levy needed business experience (and connections) to be appointed, so did sutlers, and a disproportionate number of them turn out to have been Jewish as well. Sutlers were not military personnel but civilians licensed by military commanders to market provisions to soldiers in the field. Theirs was a dangerous but lucrative line of work with a long history. In William Shakespeare's play Henry V, set in the Hundred Years' War, a soldier named Pistol declares, "I shall sutler be Unto the camp, and profits will accrue."[44] The word sutler comes from a root meaning "to follow a mean or low occupation" (the word soot comes from the same cognate), the implication being that the sutler profited from the harsh conditions of war. Perhaps for that reason, Jews had long been permitted to serve as sutlers, even in Europe. Yet, however scorned and distrusted they were, sutlers—much like frontier peddlers of the day—were also indispensable. They offered for sale necessary and desirable items—food, clothing, personal supplies, reading material, religious articles, and even, in one famous case, Passover provisions—not otherwise available where soldiers camped.[45]

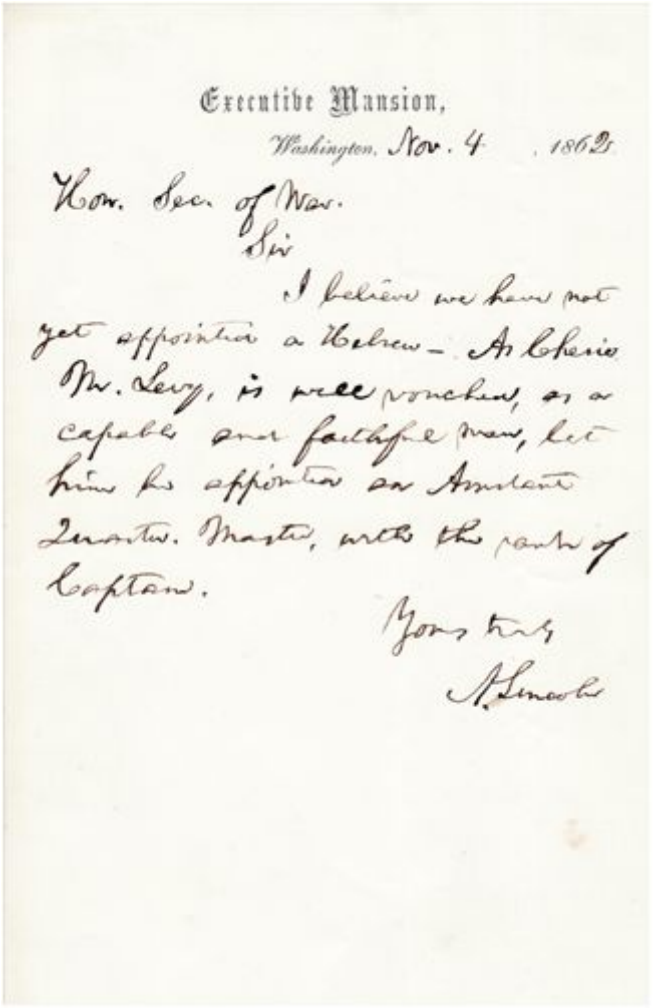
MORRIS RAPHALL

A powerful New York rabbi, he was both a defender of slavery and a Unionist. In 1861 Raphall became the first rabbi invited to deliver an opening prayer before Congress—which he did, to the dismay of some, in a prayer shawl and skullcap, and partly in Hebrew. He was also one of four rabbis to have had face-to-face meetings with Lincoln in the White House.
Collection of Robert Marcus

"I believe we have not yet appointed a Hebrew."



Executive Mansion,
Washington, Nov. 4 1862

Hon. Sec. of War.
Sir

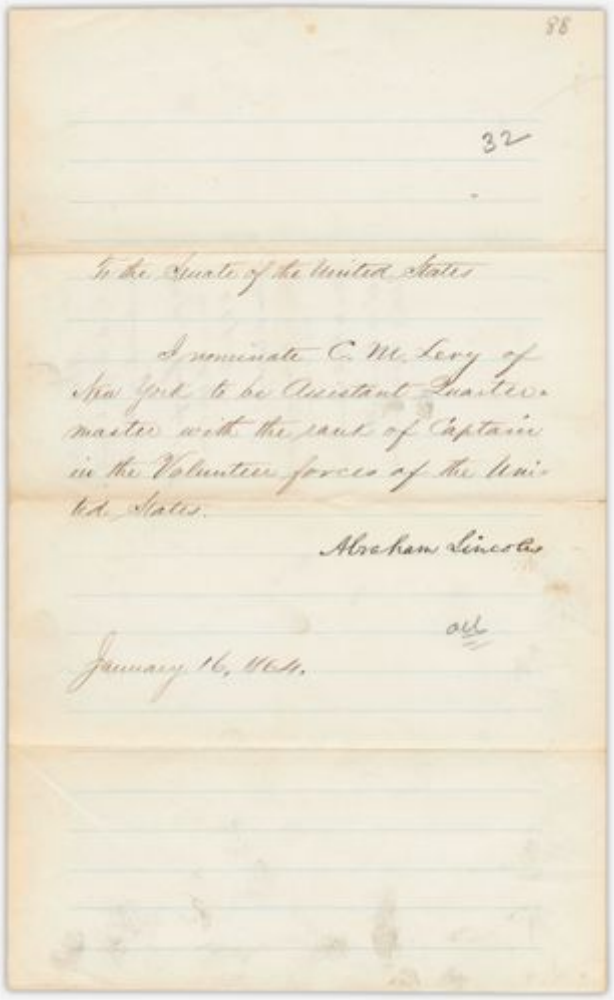
I believe we have not yet appointed a Hebrew — As there is Mr. Levy, is well vouched, as a capable and faithful man, let him be appointed an Assistant Quarter. Master, with the rank of Captain.

Yours truly
A. Lincoln

LINCOLN TO EDWIN M. STANTON: APPOINTING A "HEBREW," NOVEMBER 4, 1862

Lincoln makes a historic military appointment: because he has "not yet appointed a Hebrew," he names C. M. Levy—the son-in-law of New York's leading Ashkenazi rabbi, Morris Raphall—an assistant quartermaster with the rank of captain.

Shapell Manuscript Collection



LINCOLN AGAIN NOMINATES C.M. LEVY, JANUARY 16, 1864

In October 1863, Captain C. M. Levy was dismissed from the army on grounds of "conduct prejudicial to Good order and military discipline." Lincoln here renominates Levy for the same position he had nominated him for fourteen months earlier.
U.S. National Archives & Records Administration

During the first year of the Civil War, generals sought Lincoln's approval for the appointment of sutlers. "I have never had my attention particularly drawn to the appointment of Sutlers," Lincoln confessed in September 1861.[46] In the case of Henry Rice, the Jewish clothier from Jacksonville, Illinois, mentioned in Chapter 2, whom he and General John A. McClernand knew personally, the president wrote three months later that he did "not distinctly understand how Sutlers are appointed" and would "be obliged" if the War Department "would make or cause to be made" his appointment as a sutler.[47] Sutler tokens in denominations of 5, 10, 25, and 50 cents from the brigade of Illinois volunteers organized by General McClernand bear Rice's name, as well as McClernand's. Later, when the War Department wisely decided that commissioned officers should choose sutlers on their own, Jews continued to be disproportionately selected. At least two dozen Civil War sutlers are known definitively to have been Jews, and others had distinctively Jewish names, like Isaacks and Kohn.[48] What was essential, from Lincoln's perspective, was not religion or ethnicity but that a sutler, above all, be "a worthy and competent business man."[49]

Brigade Head Quarters.
Camp Cairo. Oct 29th 1861.
Henry Rice, late of Jacksonville Illinois, is hereby appointed Sutler of my brigade of Illinois Volunteers- designated and ranking by virtue of General Order No. issued by Brigadier General Grant Commanding the South East District of Missouri as the first brigade in said district- with all the rights and privileges and subject to all the restrictions, obligations and duties usually and properly appertaining to said office.
John A. McClernand
Brig. Gen. Comg.

JOHN A. McCLERNAND APPOINTS HENRY RICE, OCTOBER 29, 1861

Union General John A. McClernand appoints Henry Rice a sutler of his brigade of Illinois Volunteers.
Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library & Museum

Where religion did matter most was in the military chaplaincy. Chaplains had accompanied American soldiers into battle since colonial days. They served in the Revolutionary War and in each subsequent American military engagement, including the Black Hawk War, in which Lincoln had fought. Regiments generally elected their own chaplains—people whom they looked up to for spiritual sustenance, psychological support, and moral uplift—and most of those selected, unsurprisingly, were Protestant. While some opposed the chaplaincy as unconstitutional, a violation of church-state separation, Congress rejected that view, believing chaplains necessary to meet soldiers' religious needs. On the eve of the Civil War, some thirty post chaplains were authorized to serve in the armed forces of the United States.[50]

The outbreak of the Civil War led to a rapid buildup of the armed forces. To this end, in the summer of 1861, Congress provided for the appointment of new chaplains, one per regiment, to be elected by "vote of the field officers and company commanders." In a bid to ensure that only bona fide clergy were selected, Congress proposed an eligibility requirement: "The chaplain … must be a regular[ly] ordained minister of a Christian denomination."[51] A suggestion to make special provisions for the appointment of Roman Catholic chaplains, since so many Union recruits were Catholic, was voted down. Congressman Clement Vallandigham, an Ohio Democrat who opposed abolition and supported the South's right to secede, then moved to "strike out the words 'Christian denomination'… and in lieu thereof, to insert 'religious society.'" He explained that "there is a large body of men in this country … of the Hebrew faith" who were "excluded by this section." He also deemed the eligibility requirement a violation of the no-establishment clause of the First Amendment. His own proposal, he explained, would open the chaplaincy "to those at least who are of the Hebrew faith, and who, by the terms of the bill, are unjustly and without constitutional warrant, excluded from it." Vallandigham, however, was something of a congressional gadfly; many of his colleagues despised him, and later in 1863 he would be banished to the Confederate lines for the duration of the war. Moreover, having just voted down a special provision to aid Catholics, Congress was in no mood to think about Jews. The Vallandigham amendment was thus summarily rejected.[52]

General Mr. Clellan wishes Henry Rice to be Sutler at Cairo. I do not distinctly understand how Sutlers are appointed. ~~are appointed and~~ ~~paid~~, and I would be obliged if the War Department will make it come to me now, the one above mentioned.

A. Lincoln

Dec. 6. 1861.

LINCOLN APPROVES HENRY RICE AS SUTLER, DECEMBER 6, 1861

Rice, a German-born Jewish merchant from Jacksonville, Illinois, knew Lincoln personally. Rice had on occasion recommended Lincoln as a lawyer and later, during the war, dined with him at the White House. Lincoln approved the appointment of Rice as sutler in a handwritten note. He became, after the war, a leading philanthropist in New York City.
Shapell Manuscript Collection.

President Lincoln, on July 22, happily signed the congressional measure that expanded the armed forces. He apparently paid no attention to the eligibility requirement for chaplains. General Orders promulgated by the War Department back in May contained virtually the same requirements ("The chaplain … must be a regularly ordained minister of some Christian denomination"), and nobody had complained.[53] Most Americans imagined that the bulk of their countrymen were Christians of one sort or another. Vallandigham himself was conscious of this. His convoluted effort to explain why the bill's use of the term Christian was problematic is telling:

> While we are in one sense a Christian people and yet in another sense not the most Christian people in the world, this is yet not a "Christian Government," nor a Government which has any connection with any one form of religion in preference to any other form—I speak, of course, in a political sense alone.[54]

Isaac Mayer Wise, who was something of a one-man Anti-Defamation League in his day, had no similar difficulty in articulating his objections to the bill's language. "We were," he complained, "positively and unjustly deprived of a constitutional right."[55]

ABOUT SUTLERS

SUTLERS, ALTHOUGH CIVILIANS, were critical to the success of the army in the field. They sold what soldiers wanted, and they usually sold it on credit, which, to men who went an inordinate amount of time between paydays, was a blessing. At the sutler's store they could buy necessities like paper, ink, soap, polish, needles, and thread, as well as luxuries like sweets, tobacco, magazines, and sometimes even liquor. Sutlers, in fact, were the Civil War's equivalent of post exchanges—with one exception: they issued their own currency.

On the battlefield, soldiers without cash bought from the sutler. They would request a certain amount; the sutler would pay it out in tokens; and the soldiers would sign an order to the paymaster to repay the sutler (with interest) when funds arrived. Even when soldiers had money, they usually received their salaries in gold and silver coins in large denominations; there was a terrific shortage of small change. Sutlers solved that problem, too. They exchanged the large coins and bills for sutler tokens in the small amounts necessary to purchase the 5-, 10-, 25-, and 50-cent items that soldiers preferred.

A CIVIL WAR SUTLER AT HIS PLACE OF BUSINESS IN THE FIELD
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

HENRY RICE SUTLER TOKENS

A form of regimental currency used on the battlefield by soldiers—as credit and small change both—with which to buy what the army did not provide: notions, niceties, and often, in poorly equipped units, necessities. Here, we see all denominations from sutler Henry Rice.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

Proof of this deprivation was not long in coming. On July 18, four days before Lincoln signed the congressional measure, the 65th Regiment of the 5th Pennsylvania Cavalry (known as the Cameron Dragoons), which was commanded by a Bavarian-born Jew named Max Friedman and included over thirty Jewish mounted cavalrymen, elected Michael M. Allen, a liquor dealer, as its regimental chaplain. Though not ordained, Allen had studied Hebrew and the Code of Jewish Law in Philadelphia and was a capable lay reader of the liturgy as well as an active figure in Jewish communal life. Impressing his colleagues with his piety, concern for others, and abilities as a preacher, he apparently won their confidence. As chaplain, Allen led nondenominational services for the troops on Sunday and lectured on topics like "Peace and Harmony." He also translated letters and taught English to those "not very well conversant with the English language." Being a regimental and not a Jewish chaplain, he never led Jewish services but instead traveled when he could to nearby synagogues on Saturdays and Jewish holidays. Still, since he was neither a Christian nor a regularly ordained minister, his service as a chaplain contravened regulations. When the breach was brought to the public's attention by a visiting worker from the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA), Allen had no legal basis for remaining in office. On September 23, the fifth day of the Jewish holiday of Sukkot, he wrote in his daily journal, "sent in my Resignation as Chaplain."[56]

MICHAEL ALLEN

The first Jew to serve as a regimental chaplain, Allen was elected to the post by the soldiers of the 5th Pennsylvania Cavalry, known as the Cameron Dragoons.
Jacob Rader Marcus Center of the American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio

The field officers and company commanders of the Cameron Dragoons, several of whom were themselves Jewish, soon elected another member of the Jewish faith as their chaplain. One suspects that they did so purposely, as a test case, for the man they selected, Arnold Fischel, served as "teacher and lecturer" at New York's congregation Shearith Israel and was regularly described by the press as a "Reverend Doctor." His credentials exceeded those of many a Christian chaplain at that time, a few of whom were illiterate and impious. Secretary of War Simon Cameron, the namesake of the Dragoons, had no choice, nevertheless, but to reject Fischel's appointment. "You are respectfully informed … that the Chaplain appointed by 'the vote of the field officers and company commanders, must be a regular ordained minister of some Christian denomination,'" he informed Fischel on October 23. Had it not been for this legal impediment, he assured him, "the Department would have taken your application into its favorable consideration."[57]

A CIVIL WAR SEDER IN WEST VIRGINIA

THE CRITICAL ROLE played by sutlers in meeting the needs of troops in the field is well illustrated by the following story, recounted by Joseph A. Joel in the March 30, 1866, issue of the Jewish Messenger, of how a "thoughtful sutler," most likely G. W. Forbes, who was a "co-religionist," made it possible for twenty Jews in the 23rd Ohio regiment to observe the Passover seder in West Virginia in 1862. The commanding officer who permitted those troops to "keep the holydays" was General Rutherford B. Hayes, who went on to become the nineteenth president of the United States. Joel remained friendly with him and named one of his sons in his honor.

"Being apprised of the approaching Feast of Passover, twenty of my comrades and co-religionists belonging to the Regiment, united in a request to our commanding officer for relief from duty, in order that we might keep the holydays, which he readily acceded to. The first point was gained, and, as the Paymaster had lately visited the Regiment, he had left us plenty of greenbacks. Our next business was to find some suitable person to proceed to Cincinnati, Ohio, to buy us Matzos. Our sutler being a co-religionist and going home to that city, readily undertook to send them.… About the middle of the morning of erev Pessach [the Eve of Passover] a supply train arrived in camp, and to our delight seven barrels of Matzos. On opening them, we were surprised and pleased to find that our thoughtful sutler had enclosed two Hagodahs and prayer-books. We were now able to keep the seder nights, if we could only obtain the other requisites for that occasion. We held a consultation and decided to send parties to forage in the country.… About the middle of the afternoon the foragers arrived, having been quite successful. We obtained two kegs of cider, a lamb, several chickens and some eggs. Horseradish or parsley we could not obtain, but in lieu we found a weed, whose bitterness, I apprehend, exceeded anything our forefathers 'enjoyed'…

There, in the wild woods of West Virginia, away from home and friends, we consecrated and offered up to the ever-loving God of Israel our prayers and sacrifice.… enacting this commemoration of the scene that transpired in Egypt."

A RARE ASSOCIATION WITH AN 1862 BATTLEFIELD PASSOVER SEDER: A G.W. FORBES CIVIL WAR SUTLER'S TOKEN

Shapell Manuscript Collection

Cameron's letter, for all of its surface courtesy, mortified American Jews, for it confirmed that by official regulation and simply on account of their religion they were barred from the military chaplaincy. This placed the thousands of Jewish troops at a great disadvantage vis–à–vis their Christian counterparts, whose spiritual and pastoral needs were met by qualified chaplains. It also undermined constitutional guarantees of religious equality in which Jews had placed great faith. Since chaplains were "the most numerous, visible, and direct representatives of organized religion in the camps of the Civil War armies," the requirement that they be "of some Christian denomination" in effect rendered the whole Jewish faith illegitimate.[58]

Rabbi Isaac Mayer Wise looked to Congress to remedy this unhappy situation. He called upon Jews to "petition that body from all parts of the U. S.," to solicit signatures from their non-Jewish neighbors, and to send completed petitions "to your representative or senator." Six times in one issue of his newspaper, the Israelite, he printed the line "Forget not to attend to the petition to the Congress of the United States."[59] In response, a mass of petitions descended upon Congress, some from large communities like Baltimore (where Jews joined 700 Christians in urging a change in the law), and others from tiny communities like Columbus, Iowa, and Edinburgh, Indiana, where few if any Jews lived at all.[60]

PATRIOTIC COVER DEPICTING COLONEL MAX FRIEDMAN

Colonel Max Friedman was the founder of the 65th Regiment, 5th Cavalry—also known as the Cameron Dragoons—in which Jews were largely represented.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

CAMERON DRAGOONS

Into this largely Jewish regiment is enlisted one Joshua Pickering, on or about August 10, 1861; he served with Company G until his death at Darbytown Road, Virginia, on October 7, 1864. His commanding officer, Max Friedman, certifies his enlistment.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

The grandly named Board of Delegates of American Israelites, established in 1859 as the representative body of America's Jews but actually representing no more than a fifth of America's synagogues, believed that only President Lincoln's personal intervention would fix the problem. Though the Board too sent a "memorial" to Congress, it also took the unprecedented step of sending Rev. Dr. Fischel himself to Washington as its representative. His assignment was to lobby legislators, meet with the president, and, in addition, "take charge of the spiritual welfare of our coreligionists in the Camps & hospitals attached to the Department of the Potomac." Wisely, Fischel obtained letters of introduction from two non-Jewish friends of Lincoln's: the young U.S. district attorney of New York, Edward Delafield Smith, and former congressman and Republican stalwart Moses Hicks Grinnell. He also employed some back channels to get the president's attention. As a result, even though Lincoln's private secretary, John Nicolay, warned that prior to the adjournment of Congress Lincoln would have no time to read Fischel's letter, let alone see him, and even though hundreds of other petitioners were anxiously awaiting a moment of the president's precious time, Fischel refused to be discouraged. On Wednesday, December 11, 1861, he boldly called at the White House at 10:00 A.M. in hopes of gaining an audience with the president. Doubtless to the surprise of many, he was, according to the breathless letter he sent to the Board of Delegates that very day, "at once invited to his room and was received with marked courtesy." Lincoln read Fischel's materials, questioned him, and told him, according to Fischel, that "he fully admitted the justice of my remarks, that he believed the exclusion of Jewish chaplains to have been altogether unintentional on the part of Congress," and that he agreed "that something ought to be done to meet this case." With Congress in session, he refused to act unilaterally—as he had done in October, when without congressional authorization he made "a sort of quasi appointment" of three Protestant and two Catholic clergy to serve as hospital chaplains.[61] Instead, he told Fischel "that it was the first time this subject had been brought under his notice, that it was altogether new to him, [and] that he would take the subject into serious consideration." He then invited Fischel to call again "tomorrow morning" to hear his views.[62]

Instead of meeting with Fischel the next day, the president set aside time to consider a plan sent to him by George H. Stuart, chair of a newly formed Christian Commission, "to promote the spiritual and temporal welfare of the brave men in arms." The commission sought permission to distribute Bibles, hymnals, tracts, and other Christian religious publications to the troops and to sponsor prayer meetings and sermons of a revivalist nature. Lincoln, eager as usual to promote religious faith and charity, gave the plan his full support. "Your Christian and benevolent undertaking for the benefit of the soldiers, is too obviously proper, and praise-worthy, to admit any difference of opinion," he wrote. "I sincerely hope your plan may be as successful in execution, as it is just and generous in conception."[63]

In endorsing the work of the Christian Commission, however, Lincoln—who construed the word Christian very broadly—did not imagine that he was in any way shortchanging the needs of Jewish soldiers. To the contrary, two days later he reassured Fischel with the following letter: "My dear Sir: I find that there are several particulars in which the present law in regard to Chaplains is supposed to be deficient, all of which I now design presenting to the appropriate Committee of Congress. I shall try to have a new law broad enough to cover what is desired by you in behalf of the Israelites."[64]

The representatives of the YMCA were appalled.[65] Subsequently, one evangelical paper, which construed the word Christian narrowly, complained that if the law were changed, "one might despise and reject the Savior of men … and yet be a fit minister of religion." It warned that "Mormon debauchees, Chinese priests, and Indian conjurors" would stand next in line for government recognition—a tacit admission that the central issue under debate concerned the religious rights of non-Christians.[66]

Lincoln, working behind the scenes, effected a compromise. Instead of actually repealing the language requiring that a chaplain be of "some Christian denomination," congressional leaders acquiesced to let it stand. Then, they reinterpreted that language by construing it to read exactly as Jews and Lincoln wanted: "That no person shall be appointed a chaplain in the United States Army that is not a regularly ordained minister of some religious denomination." They won additional rank-and-file support by coupling this change to an amendment, strongly supported by the YMCA, that sought to improve the quality of the military chaplaincy as a whole by requiring candidates to present “testimonials of … present good standing” as well as a recommendation “from some authorized ecclesiastical body” or “five accredited ministers belonging to said religious denomination.” These revised qualifications, quietly buried in a bill that became law on July 17, 1862, entitled “An Act to define the Pay and Emoluments of certain Officers of the Army and for other Purposes,” finally opened the military chaplaincy to non-Christians. It represented a major political victory for the Jewish community, serves as a case study in Lincoln’s consummate political skills, and remains a landmark in the legal recognition of America’s non-Christian faiths.[67]

332 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington Dec 11 1861

My dear Sir,

Since I saw you on Monday morning, I have been incessantly at work to promote the object of my mission, and, as you will perceive from this letter, with considerable success. I arrived in Philadelphia on Monday morning and called at once on the Rev. I. Leeser and other Gentlemen who are getting up petitions to Congress, with the view of endeavoring conjoint and harmonious action on the part of all who are interesting themselves in this matter. In this I succeeded, so that the subject will be forced on the attention of Congress from many influential quarters at one and the same time. Mr Henry further obtained important letters of introduction to Senators. I started for Washington where I arrived on Tuesday evening, and went at once to work to obtain an interview with the President. All the influential

LINCOLN RECEIVES FISCHEL, DECEMBER 11, 1861

Fischel writes to Henry Hart, president of the Board of Delegates, that despite a long line of people, some of whom had been waiting for three days, Fischel is, almost unbelievably, immediately received by Lincoln, who promises to take the matter into consideration, and requests to see Fischel again the following day.

American Jewish Historical Society

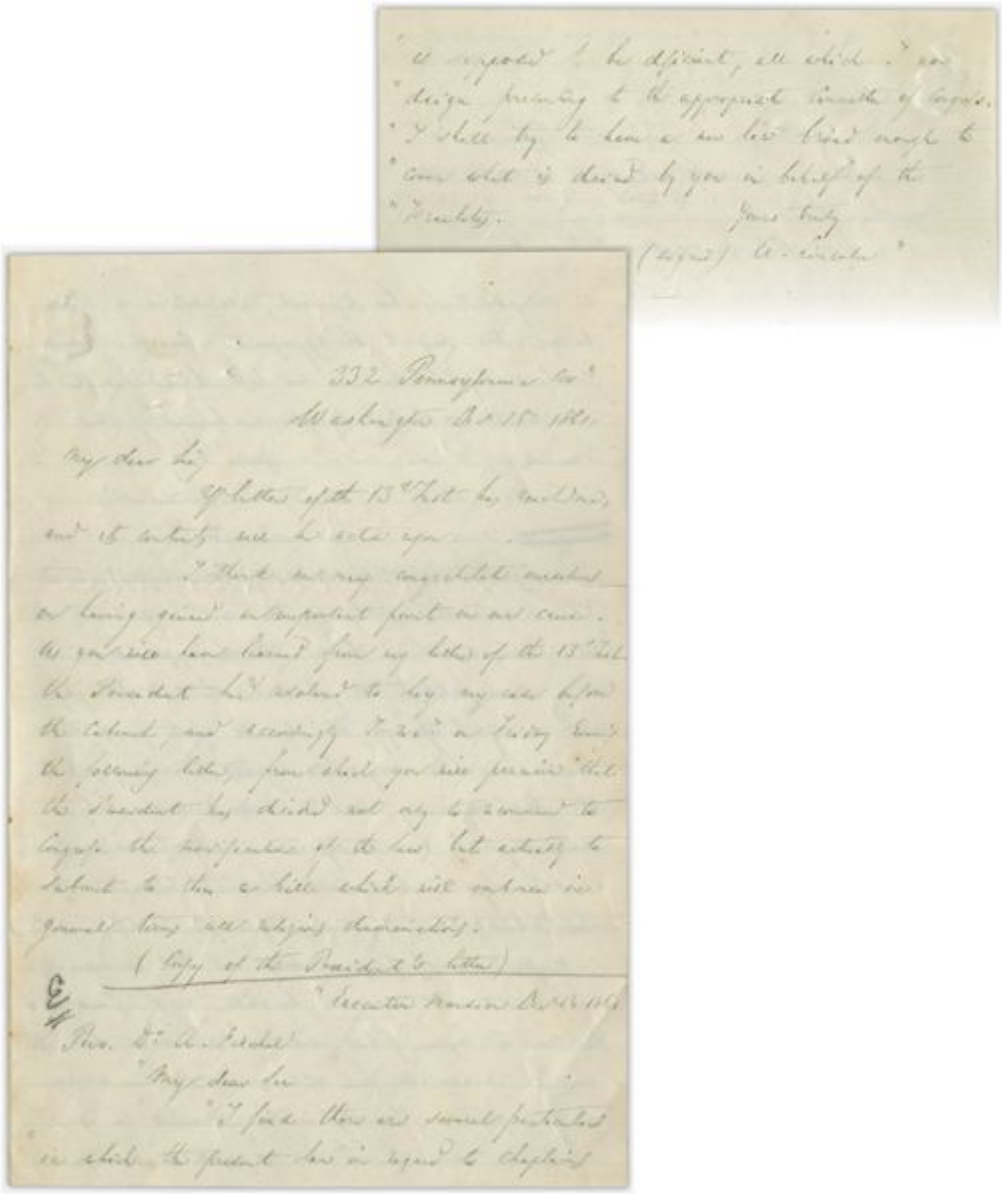
ARNOLD FISCHEL

Although the War Department had denied his request to become the Cameron Dragoon's military chaplain, as the regiment wished, a groundswell of Jewish insistence that Jews serving their country be allowed their own chaplains—and Fischel's own direct lobbying of Lincoln—led to a change in the law restricting military chaplaincies to Christians only.
American Jewish Historical Society

Abraham Lincoln demonstrated his support for the new legislation by appointing Jewish chaplains as soon as he was requested to do so. When, on August 21, Isaac Leeser and the Board of Ministers of the Hebrew Congregations of Philadelphia petitioned for a Jewish chaplain to meet the needs of the growing number of wounded Jewish servicemen in their area, Lincoln's secretary, John Hay, made clear to the surgeon general that the President would like this to be done. When, in short order, the surgeon general obligingly declared that it was "both legal and proper," the Board of Ministers recommended Rev. Jacob Frankel of Rodef Shalom congregation for the position. Lincoln accepted the recommendation, and in so doing fulfilled his promise to Fischel of nine months before. On September 18, 1862, Frankel became the first Jewish military chaplain in American history.[68]

The administration failed to be so obliging three weeks later when leaders of the Board of Delegates of American Israelites belatedly requested the appointment of a Jewish hospital chaplain in Washington, D.C. The man recommended, Arnold Fischel, was by all accounts highly deserving, having led the battle to amend the chaplaincy law, but a survey of the city's hospitals by the medical inspector general of the army located "but 7 Jews" and concluded that wounded Jewish soldiers were so few in number and so scattered "that it would be impracticable for a clergyman to find and attend to them." Lincoln, as a result, could make no appointment, and Fischel, whom the board had not paid and who was without funds, soon returned to Holland.[69]

"I shall try to have a new law broad enough to cover what is desired by you in behalf of the Israelites."



DECEMBER 15, 1861

Fischel's handwritten copy of Lincoln's famous chaplaincy letter written the previous day. "I shall try to have a new law broad enough to cover what is desired by you in behalf of the Israelites," Lincoln momentously wrote. Lincoln's original letter has apparently disappeared.
American Jewish Historical Society

Lincoln did appoint two other Jewish chaplains during the course of the war. On April 10, 1863, he appointed the first regimental Jewish chaplain, Rabbi Ferdinand Leopold Sarner, following the rabbi's election to that post by the heavily German-speaking 54th New York Volunteer Regiment. Sarner's impressive academic credentials

(a Ph.D. from the University of Hesse) coupled with his ability to preach in florid German seem to have had more to do with his appointment than his Judaism. In fact, some mistakenly considered him a German Lutheran! That he was actually a rabbi seems not to have impeded him from ministering to the needs of his mostly Christian regiment. Like Michael Allen and a host of subsequent Jewish chaplains, he apparently learned the art of non-denominational preaching.[70] A month later, on May 6, 1863, Lincoln appointed Rev. Bernard Gotthelf, the (unordained) leader of Louisville's Adas Israel congregation, to be a hospital chaplain in that city. Congressman Robert Mallory, a Lincoln ally, recommended the appointment, according to contemporary reports, because "a very respectable number of Jewish soldiers have been or are still receiving medical treatment at our hospitals." Local newspapers cheered the appointment, and Gotthelf ultimately served eighteen army hospitals, ministering to Jews and Christians alike.[71]

Lincoln's approach to the question of appointing Jews as chaplains bespoke his attitude not only toward Jews but toward religion generally. On the one hand, he was not initially troubled by the Christian provision in the chaplaincy law, for, as we have seen, the word Christian to him excluded no religious denomination. Nor did he display any compunction about endorsing the work of the "Christian Commission." Yet, evidence that Jews faced discrimination in the chaplaincy at once elicited his sympathy. To his mind all people of faith deserved to be treated equally. Thus, in addition to appointing Jews to the chaplaincy, Lincoln put forth the name of a Universalist minister named James Shrigley to be a hospital chaplain—upon the recommendation, among others, of Jewish congressman Leonard Myers. YMCA members opposed his appointment, Shrigley later recalled, because they considered him "not sound in his theological opinions." Among other heresies, they charged, he believed "that even the rebels themselves will finally be saved." Lincoln, however, was unmoved. "Well, gentlemen," Shrigley quoted him as replying, "if that be so, and there is any way under heaven whereby the rebels can be saved, then, for God's sake and their sakes, let the man be appointed"—and he was.[72]

ISAAC LEESER

German-born American, author, editor, and publisher of The Occident and American Jewish Advocate, Leeser was one of the most important Jews in nineteenth-century America, well known as the first translator of the Jewish Bible into English. The idea that Jews, North and South, would kill one another, was anathema to him. Throughout the conflict, then, he confined himself to strictly Jewish issues—and when he finally did write to Lincoln, it was merely to request the appointment of a Jewish hospital chaplain in Philadelphia.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

LINCOLN APPOINTS A JEWISH CHAPLAIN

Jacob Frankel of Philadelphia, commissioned a hospital chaplain by Lincoln, became the country's first Jewish military chaplain on September 18, 1862.
Congregation Rodeph Shalom

In November 1864, Lincoln expressed willingness to make an even more controversial appointment. The 1st Wisconsin Heavy Artillery unanimously elected a Spiritualist medium named Ella E. Gibson (Hobart) as their chaplain; she was ordained a minister by the Religio-Philosophical Society of St. Charles, Illinois. "She is a woman," Lincoln pointed out to Secretary of War Edwin M. Stanton, when the nomination came to his attention. "The President has not legally anything to do with such a question, but has no objection to her appointment." Stanton, though, declined to appoint her "on account of her sex."[73] Still, the fact that Lincoln himself had no objection to the appointment bespeaks the breadth of his religious vision. Perhaps because he himself grew up as something of a religious outsider, he considered other religious outsiders—Jews, Universalists, and Spiritualist women among them—to be worthy of inclusion not only within the panoply of American religion but within the military chaplaincy as well.

From a Jewish perspective, Lincoln's frequent appeal to Americans as a "Christian people" nevertheless remained problematic. This was brought home in late 1862 when he issued an executive order concerning Sabbath observance within the armed forces. "The importance for man and beast of the prescribed weekly rest, the sacred rights of Christian soldiers and sailors, a becoming deference to the best sentiment of a Christian people, and a due regard for the Divine will," Lincoln declared, "demand that Sunday labor in the Army and Navy be reduced to the measure of strict necessity." Christian religious leaders from New York had lobbied for such an order, and in issuing it Lincoln echoed George Washington, who in 1776 had urged his troops "to live and act as becomes a Christian soldier defending the dearest rights and liberties of his country."[74]

There were, however, a hundred times more Jews in the country and in the armed forces than there had been in Washington's day, and to them, Lincoln's declaration was an affront. "Are we equals in this land?" Isaac Leeser demanded in his newspaper soon after the order appeared. He wondered in an editorial why those who observed the Sabbath on Sunday were protected, "while everything is done to make the observance of the Seventh day burdensome to the Jew." "Is this equality," he asked, "or are the rights of the minority of no importance in the eyes of the law-makers and the law-dispensers?"[75]

To reinforce his point, Leeser reprinted a moving letter to Lincoln (dated December 4, 1862) by a German-Jewish immigrant named Bernhard Behrend, the father of Adajah Behrend, an enlisted hospital steward. "I gave my consent to my son, who was yet a minor, that he should enlist in the United States army," Behrend wrote. "I thought it was his duty, and I gave him my advice to fulfill his duty as a good citizen, and he has done so. At the same time I taught him also to observe the Sabbath on Saturday, when it would not hinder him from fulfilling his duty in the army. Now I do not want that he shall be dragged either to the stake or the church to observe the Sunday as a Sabbath." Pleading for "justice," Behrend asked Lincoln "to proclaim in another order, that also all those in the army who celebrate another day as the Sunday may be allowed to celebrate that day which they think is the right day according to their own conscience."[76] No reply from Lincoln is extant. Nor is Behrend's letter included in standard collections of Lincoln's correspondence. One suspects, however, that the Jewish community's complaints reached Lincoln's ears. Significantly, he never again, in his official correspondence, referred to Americans as a "Christian people," nor did he pay further heed to those who sought to publicly identify the government with Christianity. Instead, within a few weeks, Isaac Mayer Wise heard Lincoln reassure Jewish leaders that he would by no means allow any citizen to be "wronged on account of his place of birth or religious confession."[77]

Executive Mansion
Aug. 23. 1862

Surgeon

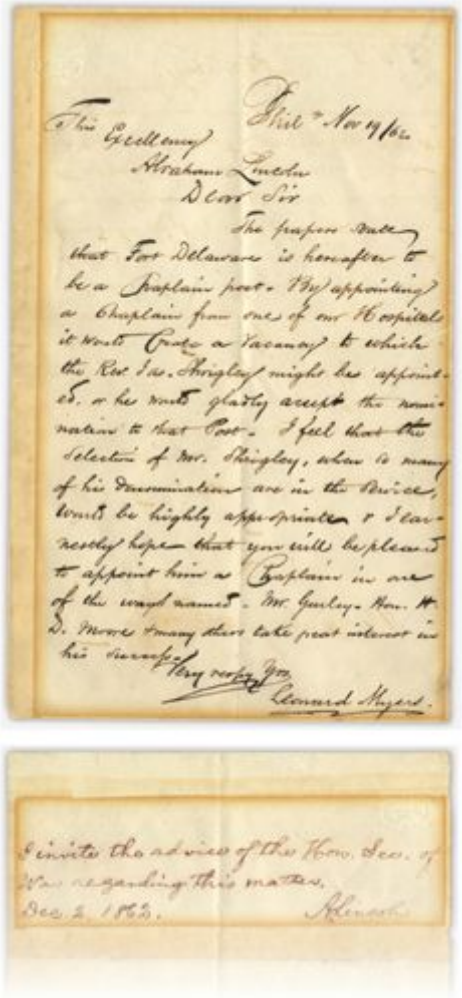
The President directs me to refer the enclosed communication to you with the request that you will favor him with your opinion in regard to the legality and propriety of granting the request of the Board of Hebrew Ministers.

Your Obt. Servt
John Hay

DOCKET BY JOHN HAY ON A LETTER FROM ISAAC LEESER TO LINCOLN, AUGUST 23, 1862

Tasked with writing Lincoln during the ongoing chaplaincy legislature reform, Leeser declared that as "Many Israelites are serving in the army of the United States … it is to be expected that not a few persons of our persuasion will … require spiritual no less than bodily care." A Jewish chaplain appointed by the president was needed now, he told the president. Lincoln's secretary, John Hay, directing Leeser's letter to the surgeon general, noted that the president wanted this to be done. And, within a matter of days, so it was.

Courtesy of the Library of Congress



Phil[a] Nov 19/62

His Excellency
Abraham Lincoln
Dear Sir

The paper state that Fort Delaware is hereafter to be a Chaplain post. By appointing a Chaplain from one of our Hospitals it would Create a Vacancy to which the Rev Jas. Shrigley might be appointed, & he would gladly accept the nomination to that Post. I feel that the Selection of Mr. Shrigley, when so many of his Denomination are in the Service, would be highly appreciated & I sincerely hope that you will be pleased to appoint him a Chaplain in one of the ways named. Mr Gurley Hon. W. D. Moore & many others take great interest in his success.

Very respy Yr
Leonard Myers.

I invite the advice of the Hon. Sec. of War regarding this matter.
Dec 2. 1862. A Lincoln

LEONARD MYERS TO LINCOLN, NOVEMBER 19, 1862

To the Jewish Civil War-era Republican congressman Leonard Myers goes this distinction: he was elected from a district with notably few co-religionists. This helps to explain, then, his request as a newly elected congressman on behalf of James Shrigley, a Gentile clergyman seeking appointment. On December 2, 1862, Lincoln forwards Myers's request and begins a correspondence with Myers that would last through the rest of Lincoln's life.

Shapell Manuscript Collection

Lincoln's reassurance to Jewish leaders came in response to the most notorious official act of anti-Semitism in American history. On December 17, 1862, General Ulysses S. Grant issued a sweeping order, known as General Orders No. 11, expelling "Jews as a class" from his war zone (the Department of the Tennessee), stretching from Northern Mississippi to Cairo, Illinois, and from the Mississippi River to the Tennessee River.[78]

For months, Grant had been worried about cotton speculators and smugglers in the area under his command. Since some of the men his troops caught were Jews, he became persuaded that all smugglers, speculators, and traders were Jews, whether they were actually Jewish or not. Just as Southerners dubbed all Northerners "Yankees," whether or not they hailed from New England, so Grant and others in the military often characterized all smugglers and traders as "Jews." Grant wanted as few of them in the area under his command as possible.

In July 1862, Grant ordered the commander of the District of the Mississippi to "examine all baggage of all speculators coming South," and to turn back those who were carrying gold ("specie"). "Jews," he admonished, "should receive special attention." In August, a soldiers' newspaper quoted Grant as calling Jews "a nuisance." It intimated that he had plans to "abate" that nuisance. Nothing happened for several months, but on November 9, as he prepared to move south in preparation for the decisive battle at Vicksburg, Grant tightened his regulations against Jews: "Refuse all permits to come south of Jackson for the present," he ordered. "The Isrealites [sic] especially should be kept out." The very next day he strengthened that order: "no Jews are to be permitted to travel on the Rail Road southward from any point … they are such an intolerable nuisance that the Department must be purged for [sic] them." Writing in early December to General Sherman, whose quartermaster had created problems by selling cotton "to a Jew by the name of Haas," Grant explained that "in consequence of the total disregard and evasion of orders by the Jews my policy is to exclude them so far as practicable from the Dept."[79]

But until December 17, Grant had not gone so far as to expel Jews from his department. Indeed, when Colonel John Van Deusen Du Bois, on December 8, 1862, angrily ordered "All Cotton-Speculators, Jews and other Vagrants having no honest means of support, except trading upon the miseries of their Country" to leave Holly Springs, and gave them "twenty-four hours or they will be sent to duty in the trenches," Grant insisted that the draconian order be rescinded. "Instructions from Washington," he reminded Du Bois, "are to encourage getting Cotton out of the country."[80] Notwithstanding his private opinions and actions, Grant understood that he still had to publicly uphold President Lincoln's policy, which permitted those loyal to the Union to trade in cotton.

All that changed on December 17. Grant, according to multiple sources, received a visit that day from his sixty-eight-year-old father, Jesse R. Grant, accompanied by members of the prominent Mack family of Cincinnati, significant Jewish clothing manufacturers. Harman, Henry, and Simon Mack, as part of an ingenious scheme, had formed a secret partnership with the elder Grant. In return for 25 percent of their profits, he agreed to accompany them to his son's Mississippi headquarters, act as their agent to "procure a permit for them to purchase cotton," and help them secure the means to transport that cotton to New York.[81]

ULYSSES S. GRANT

Having failed in the antebellum military—failed, even worse, in civilian life—his rise from colonel to general in chief of the Armies of the United States was, perhaps, the unlikeliest, but most deserved, in military history. Yet his issuance of what he would later call his "Jew Order," expelling the Jews from parts or all of the states of Tennessee, Kentucky, Illinois, and Mississippi, tarnished his reputation.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

According to journalist Sylvanus Cadwallader, an eyewitness, General Grant waxed indignant at his father's crass attempt to profit from his son's military status and raged at the Jewish traders who "entrapped his old father into such an unworthy undertaking." He refused to provide the permit, sent the Macks homeward "on the first train for the north," and in high dudgeon, immediately issued the order expelling "Jews as a class" from his territory.[82] Jesse R. Grant's involvement in this scheme provides "a psychological explanation" for General Orders No. 11, according to John Y. Simon, the scholarly editor of The Papers of Ulysses S. Grant. In a classic act of displacement, the general "expelled the Jews rather than his father."[83] market. A great deal of smuggling is going on in the Holly Spring Army. But this is mostly managed by Union men & Jews instigated by a sense of gain. It is not our Chattey' [illegible] eyes to the fact that the entire South is united against us.

WILLIAM T. SHERMAN TO PHILEMON B. EWING, NOVEMBER 2, 1862

Written just two days before Lincoln's official handwritten request for the appointment of C.M. Levy, a "Hebrew," and during a time of intense anti-Semitism, Sherman reports in passing, "A great deal of smuggling is going on in the Holly Spring Army, but this is mostly managed by Union men and Jews instigated by a sense of gain." This pervasive prejudice would help give rise, a month later, to Grant's notorious General Orders No. 11, whereby all Jews were to be driven from his area of control. The order would be countermanded by Lincoln immediately after it first was brought to his attention.

Shapell Manuscript Collection

Fortunately for the thousands of Jews who lived in the territory under his command, Grant was soon distracted. Less than seventy-two hours after what Grant would later call his "Jew order"[84] was issued, his forces at Holly Springs were raided by 3,500 Confederate troops led by Major General Earl Van Dorn. Simultaneous raids to the north by troops of the dreaded Confederate cavalryman General Nathan Bedford Forrest, inflicted significant damage to Grant's army and tore up fifty miles of railroad and telegraph lines. Communications to and from Grant's headquarters were disrupted for weeks by these surprise attacks. As a result, news of Grant's order expelling the Jews spread slowly and did not reach army headquarters in a timely fashion—sparing many Jews who might otherwise have been banished.[85]

U. S. MILITARY TELEGRAPH.

Bolivar Dec 17th 1862

By Telegraph from Hd Qrs 13th Army corps Dept of the Tenn

Oxford Dec 17th 1862.

Genl Order No 11-

The Jews as a class violating every Regulation of trade established by the Regular Dept & also Dept orders, are hereby Expelled from the Dept within twenty four hours from the Receipt of this order. by Post commander. they will see that all of this class of People are furnished with passes and required to leave and any one returning after such Notification will be

GENERAL ORDERS NO. 11

When Grant expelled the Jews "as a class" from the area under his command, he perpetrated the most blatant state-sanctioned act of anti-Semitism in American history. Later, when Lincoln rescinded the order, and later still, when running for president, Grant claimed the "order was made and sent out without any reflection." In fact, he said, it had been drafted by a subordinate and that he, Grant, in the press of warfare, had approved the decree without even looking at it.
Chicago History Museum

To be sure, some Jewish traders in the vicinity of Grant's army in northern Mississippi were treated roughly. A "Mr. Silberman" from Chicago, temporarily in Holly Springs, was reportedly imprisoned for twelve hours just for the "crime" of seeking to telegraph General Grant to find out if the expulsion order he received was genuine. An unnamed young Jewish trader and his fiancée, traveling through Grant's department on their way east, described in the Jewish Record how they were detained, forbidden to change out of wet clothes, robbed of their horse and buggy, verbally abused, and also had one of their trunks burned and their pockets picked in the wake of the order. Their expulsion, if not their mistreatment, was explained by Brigadier General James Tuttle, commander of the Union garrison in Cairo, Illinois, with the utmost simplicity: "you are Jews, and … neither a benefit to the Union or Confederacy."[86]

HENRY MACK

In December 1862, Grant's frustration and anger with the cotton speculators and rapacious businessmen trading illegally in the conquered areas of the South was only exacerbated by the knowledge that his father, Jesse Root Grant, was one of them. Henry Mack, Jesse's partner, was a prominent Jewish clothing manufacturer from Cincinnati.
Jacob Rader Marcus Center of the American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio

But it was only when Grant's order reached Paducah, Kentucky, eleven days after it was issued, that a whole community of Jews found itself expelled. On Sunday, December 28, 1862, Paducah's provost marshal, L. J. Waddell, sent Cesar Kaskel and every other Jew in the city an official notice ordering them "to leave the city of Paducah, Kentucky within twenty-four hours after receiving this order." Women and children were expelled too, and in the confusion—so it was recalled years later—one baby was almost forgotten, and two dying women had to be left behind in the care of neighbors.[87]

As they prepared to leave their homes, Cesar Kaskel and several other Jews sent a telegram to President Lincoln, describing their plight and pronouncing themselves "greatly insulted and outraged by this inhuman order, the carrying out of which would be the grossest violation of the Constitution, and our rights as good citizens under it."[88]

The president, in all likelihood, never saw that telegram because of the attacks on the telegraph lines. He was also at this time busy preparing to issue the Emancipation Proclamation (January 1, 1863). The irony of his freeing the slaves while Grant was expelling the Jews was not lost on some contemporaries. The Memphis Daily Bulletin published the two documents one above the other. The juxtaposition of these events also shaped the responses of several Jewish leaders to Grant's order. They feared that Jews would replace blacks as the nation's stigmatized minority.[89]

Fearing the worst, Kaskel wasted no time. "On my way to Washington, in order to get this most outrageous and inhuman order of Major General Grant countermanded," he announced in the press. He begged the journalists to whom he told his story "to lend the powerful aid of the press to the suffering cause of outraged humanity [and] to blot out as quick as possible this stain on our national honor."[90]

Arriving in the nation's capital just as the Jewish Sabbath was concluding on January 3, Kaskel called at once upon Cincinnati's outgoing Republican congressman, John Addison Gurley, who enjoyed ready access to the White House. Together, they immediately went over to see President Lincoln.

Lincoln turned out to have no knowledge whatsoever of the order, for it had not reached Washington. According to an oft-quoted report, he resorted to biblical imagery in his interview with Kaskel, a reminder of how immersed he was in the Bible and how, like many nineteenth-century Americans, he linked Jews to ancient Israel, and America to the Promised Land:

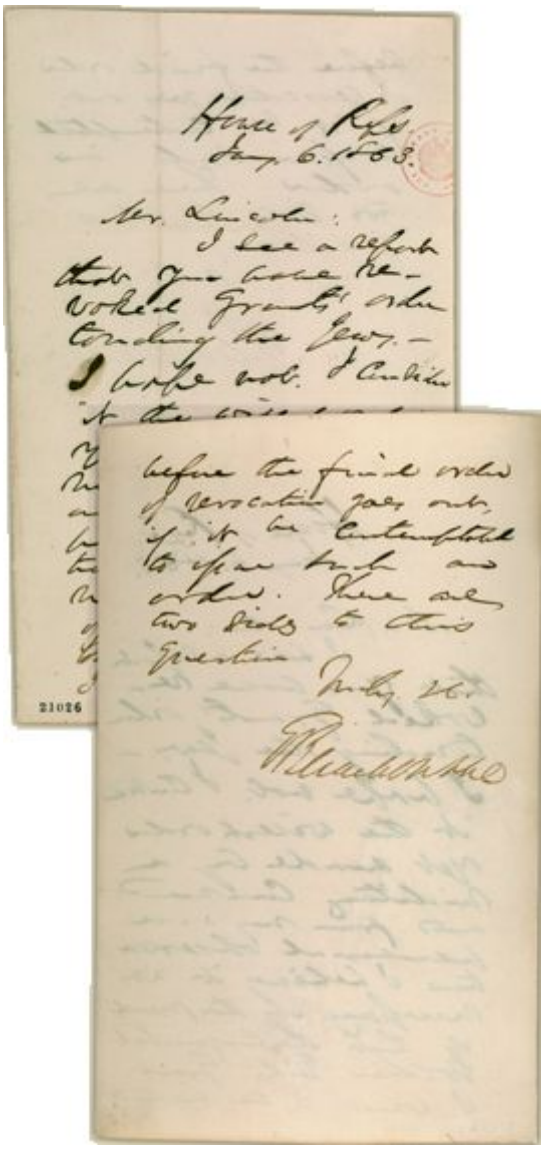
> LINCOLN: And so the children of Israel were driven from the happy land of Canaan?
>
> KASKEL: Yes, and that is why we have come unto Father Abraham's bosom, asking protection.
>
> LINCOLN: And this protection they shall have at once.[91]

Whether or not such a conversation actually took place, when Lincoln did hear about the order, he instantly instructed the general in chief of the army, Henry Halleck, to countermand General Orders No. 11. On January 6, 1863, several urgent telegrams went out from Grant's headquarters in obedience to that demand. "By direction of the General in Chief of the Army at Washington," they read, "the General Order from these Head Quarters expelling Jews from this Department is hereby revoked."[92]

GENERAL ORDERS NO. 11: "THE WISEST ORDER YET MADE BY A MILITARY COMMAND"

ANTI-SEMITISM was not only evident among Lincoln's cabinet and generals; it also was apparent in members of Congress. Elihu Washburne, an associate of Lincoln's since their days as attorneys in Illinois and a long-standing congressman from that state, as well as a frequent correspondent with the president, wrote immediately to Lincoln on the day that Lincoln revoked Grant's order expelling the Jews, hoping the report of its revocation was incorrect. "I consider it the wisest order yet made by a military command." Believing it "necessary," he pressed Lincoln to reconsider before it was made official. Washburne, a committed abolitionist, ironically, supported emancipation for blacks yet expressed contempt for Jews.

Elihu Washburne
Courtesy of Library of Congress

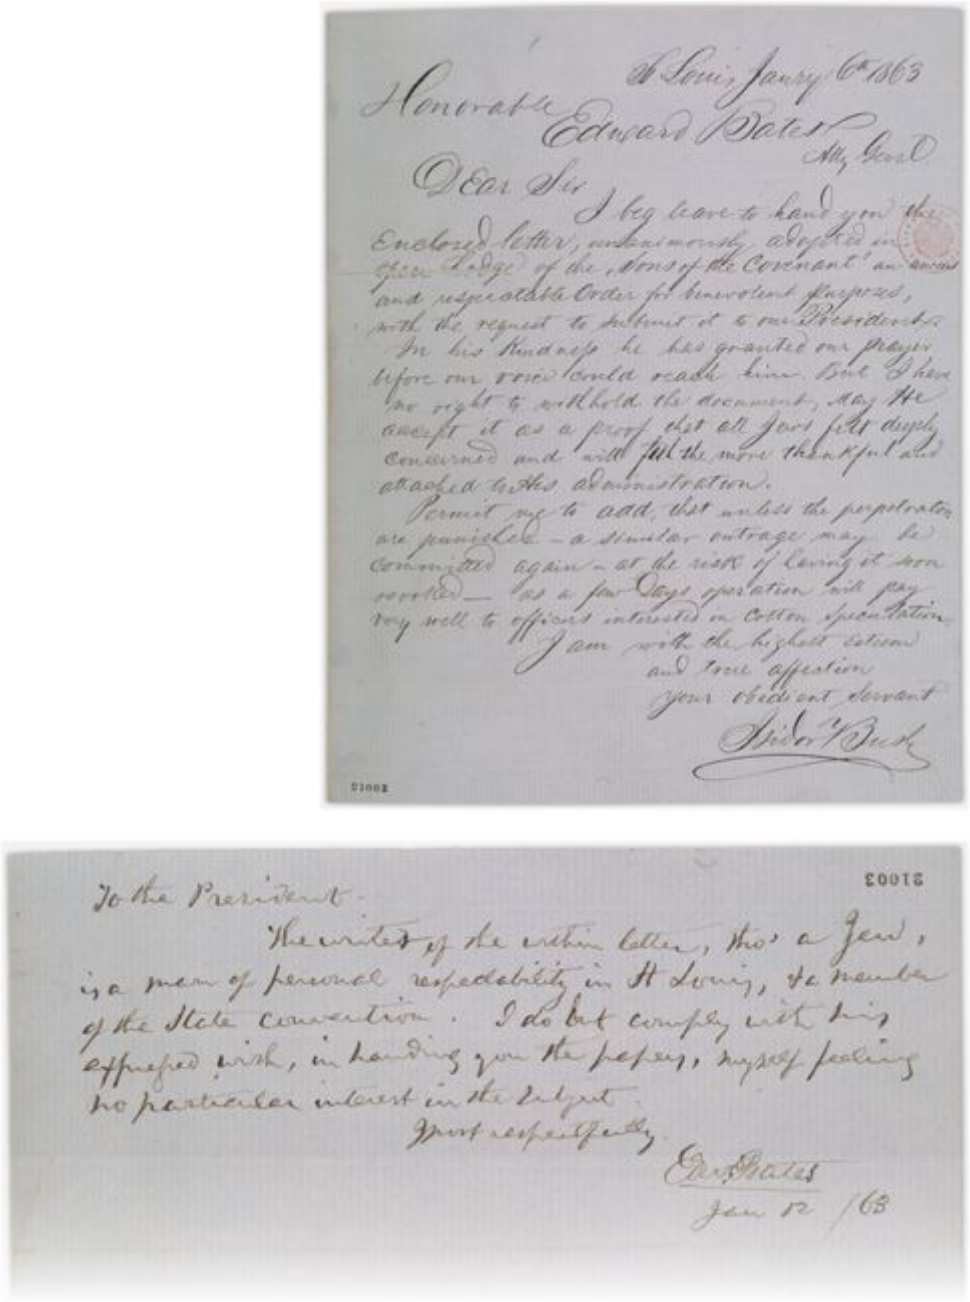


Elihu Washburne to Lincoln, January 6, 1863
Courtesy of Library of Congress

Some days after Lincoln acted, an eloquent plea from B'nai B'rith's Missouri lodges, addressed to the president, reached Washington. It described Jews as a "class of loyal citizens" who had been "driven from their homes, deprived of their liberty, and injured in their property without having violated any law or regulation" and who were "sacrificing their lives and fortunes for the union and the suppression of this rebellion." It called upon the president "to annul the Order and to protect the liberties even of your humblest constituents." Disappointingly, Attorney General Edward Bates, who forwarded this poignant document to Lincoln, expressed "no particular interest in the subject."[93]

Lincoln proved far more solicitous. When on January 7 a delegation of Jewish leaders arrived in Washington to thank him for revoking General Orders No. 11, he carved out time to meet with them. According to Isaac Mayer Wise, who participated in the meeting and wrote a widely circulated account of what transpired, the president reaffirmed that he knew "of no distinction between Jew and Gentile" and promised that he would allow no citizen to be "wronged on account of his place of birth or religious confession." "To condemn a class," he emphatically continued, "is, to say the least, to wrong the good with the bad. I do not like to hear a class or nationality condemned on account of a few sinners."[94]

"... tho a Jew, is a man of personal respectability in St. Louis."



St Louis, Janry 6th 1863

Honorable Edward Bates
Atty Genl

Dear Sir

I beg leave to hand you the Enclosed letter, unanimously adopted in Open Lodge of the Sons of the Covenant an ancient and respectable Order for benevolent purposes, with the request to submit it to our President. In his kindness he has granted our prayer before our request could reach him. But I have no right to withhold the document, May He accept it as a proof that all Jews felt deeply Concerned and will feel the more thankful and attached to this Administration.

Permit me to add, that unless the perpetrators are punished - a similar outrage may be committed again - at the risk of Leaving it soon recorded - as a few days operation will pay very well to officers interested in Cotton speculation.

I am with the highest esteem and true affection your obedient servant
Isidor Bush

21003

To the President.

The writer of the within letter, tho' a Jew, is a man of personal respectability in St Louis, & member of the State convention. I do but comply with his request, in handing you the papers, myself feeling no particular interest in the subject.

Most respectfully
Edw. Bates
Jan 12 /63

21003

ISIDOR BUSH TO EDWARD BATES, JANUARY 6, 1863

The B'nai B'rith petition had been sent to Lincoln by acquaintance Isidor Bush, in care of Attorney General Edward Bates, who, in forwarding the petition to the president, noted that Bush "tho a Jew, is a man of personal respectability in St. Louis."
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

By revoking General Orders No. 11, ensuring that the chaplaincy was opened up to Jews, and appointing numerous Jews to public and military positions of trust, Lincoln dramatically improved the status of Jews in the United States. He impressed even those like Rabbis Raphall and Wise who had earlier opposed his election. Many who regularly interacted with Lincoln—including military men, Evangelical leaders, even his own attorney general—displayed no similar sympathies. They exhibited unabashed prejudice against Jews and Judaism. By contrast, during his first two years in office, Lincoln displayed extraordinary sensitivity toward Jews and Jewish interests. More than any previous president, he befriended Jews, defended Jews, and promoted Jewish equality.

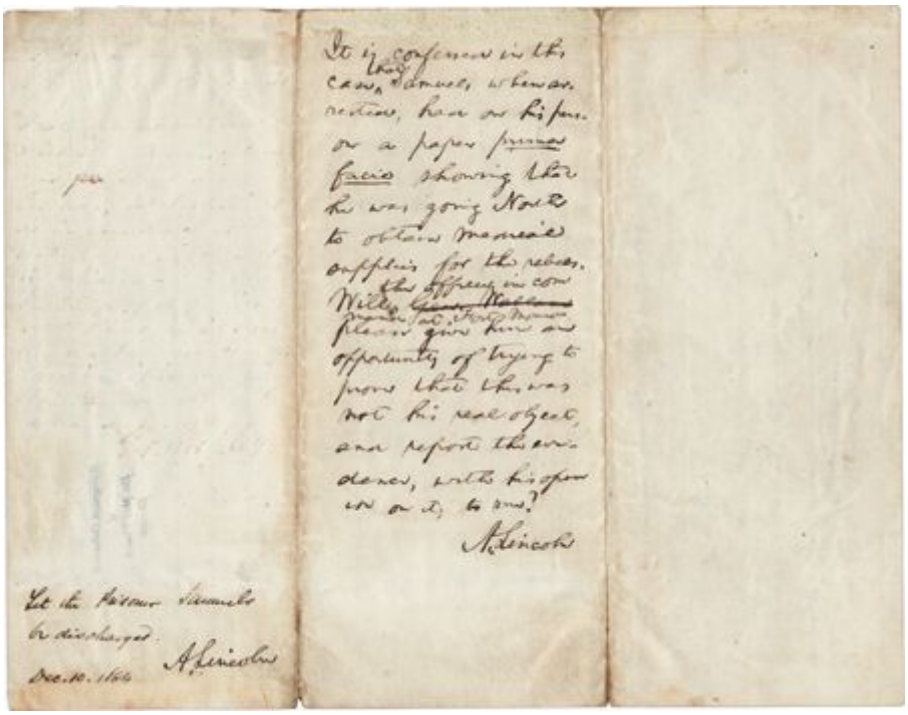
THE ANTI-SEMITIC GENERALS

Generals Butler, Sherman, McClellan, and Grant were, Lincoln knew, prejudiced at best and persecutory at worst. The letters illustrated here bear unhappy but vivid witness to the anti-Semitism of Lincoln's military leaders.



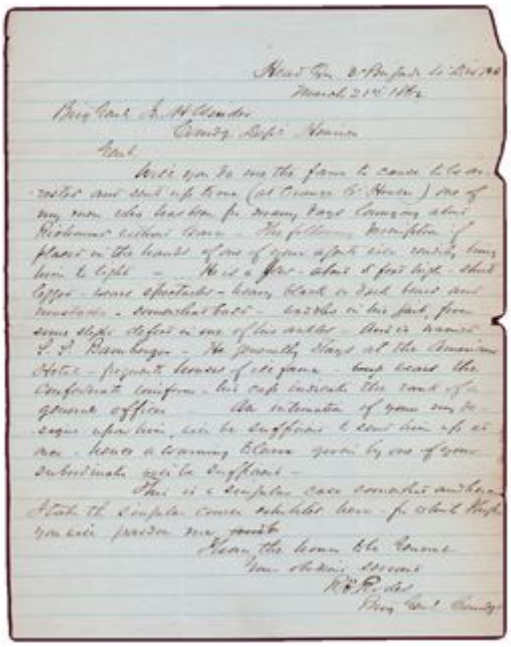
It is [illegible] in the case of Samuels, whereon reciting, here or his pet. or a paper prima facie showing that he was going North to obtain medicines supplies for the rebels, the [illegible] in com Willey [illegible] please give him an opportunity of trying to prove that he was not his real object, and report the evidence, with his petition or it, to me.
A. Lincoln

Let the prisoner Samuels be discharged.
Dec. 10. 1864
A. Lincoln

BENJAMIN F. BUTLER TO LINCOLN, SEPTEMBER 15, 1864

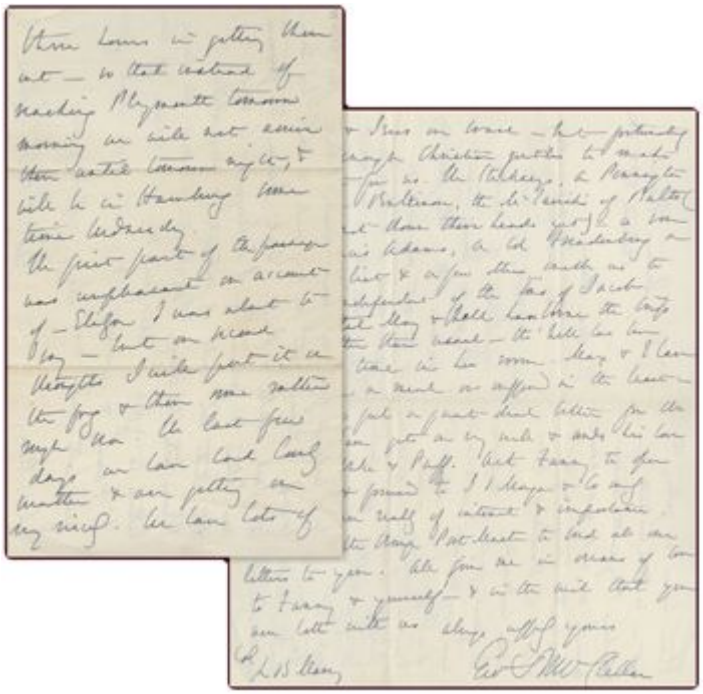
Butler—whose anti-Semitism had been called to Lincoln's attention in the past, in particular in an instance involving Jews who fell into Butler's hands at Fortress Monroe—arrested Abraham Samuels, a Jewish Virginian accused in 1864 of trying to pass through the Union lines to obtain medical supplies for the Confederate army. While trusting Butler as a general, Lincoln nonetheless ordered Butler on September 15, 1864 to give Samuels the "opportunity of trying to prove" that his objective was not criminal, and then, having reviewed the evidence, Lincoln ordered him freed on December 10, 1864. It would take two orders—and three months—until Butler finally acceded to Lincoln's request to free Samuels.

Shapell Manuscript Collection



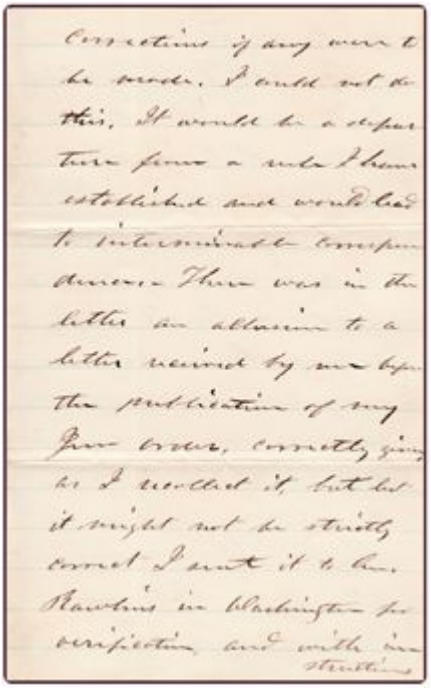
ROBERT EMMETT RODES

Anti-Semitism was also rampant in the South during the war. Confederate general Robert Emmett Rodes requests on March 21, 1862 that an AWOL "Jew" be arrested and sent to him at once; he proceeds to describe Major Salomon S. Bamberger in the most unflattering terms—and suggests he may be found in a brothel.
Shapell Manuscript Collection



GEORGE B. McCLELLAN

"We have lots of Germans and Jews on board," General McClellan complains of shipmates in 1875, "but fortunately there are enough Christian gentiles to make it pleasant for us … & a few others enable us to be quite independent of the sons of Jacob."
Shapell Manuscript Collection



Correction if any were to be made. I could not do this. It would be a departure from a rule I have established and would lead to interminable comparisons. There was in the letter an allusion to a letter received by me before the publication of my Jew order, correctly giving it I recollect it, but that it might not be strictly correct I sent it to Mr. Rawlins in Washington for verification and with his

ULYSSES S. GRANT, THE PUBLICATION OF "MY JEW ORDER…," AUGUST 14, 1868

Running for president in 1868, General Grant wrote to his father, concerned that his infamous "Jew order" of six years before, which expelled the Jews as a class from the area of his command, might haunt him in seeking votes from among the "Israelites." Grant's father, Jesse, had been embroiled in the controversy surrounding the issuance of the order.

Shapell Manuscript Collection

FIRST READING OF THE EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN

Lincoln, as portrayed in Francis Bicknell Carpenter's famous rendering of the event, reads to his cabinet his preliminary Emancipation Proclamation on September 22, 1862.
U.S. Senate Collection

CHAPTER FIVE

I MYSELF HAVE A REGARD FOR THE JEWS

1863

"Another year commenced, and with it perhaps a new era in the history of the country, certainly a new era for liberty," a nineteen-year-old Jewish telegraph operator named Edward Rosewater wrote in his diary on January 1, 1863.[1] Rosewater, born in Bohemia, had immigrated to the United States with his parents when he was thirteen years old and in the summer of 1862 began work as an army telegrapher in the War Department telegraph office, located in the old library opposite the office of Secretary of War Edwin Stanton. He was one of eight operators working there and the only Jew. Abraham Lincoln spent a great deal of time in the telegraph office. "Every morning about 8 o'clock [he] comes in to read Dispatches which are copied into books," Rosewater wrote to his future wife, Leah. "His house being next to this, he is here often." Rosewater and the other young telegraphers enjoyed many an interaction with the president. "Sometimes," he wrote Leah, "he tells an anecdote, or reads a Story aloud and laughs (You could hear him ½ mile)."[2]

On January 1, Rosewater joined a large crowd of local residents at the president's traditional New Year's Day reception at the Executive Mansion. "The President looked rather cheerful," he recorded. "His whiskers cut within an inch of his face, [he] stood in [the] center of [the] room and shook hands with everyone."[3] Following the reception, at 4:00 P.M., Rosewater reported to his post at the telegraph office. Lincoln, meanwhile, ascended to his study. His hands still quivering from the hours spent shaking hands at the reception, he prepared to affix his signature to the Emancipation Proclamation. "I never in my life," he declared, "felt more certain that I was doing right than I do in signing this paper." Though his arm remained "stiff and numb," he was determined that no trembling be reflected in his signature, lest some conclude that "he had some compunctions." The document is signed in a bold, clear hand.[4] At eight that evening, Rosewater, who was still on duty, transmitted the official text of the Emancipation Proclamation from the telegraph office. As Lincoln watched, he tapped out the epoch-making words that freed over 3 million slaves: "And upon this act, sincerely believed to be an act of justice, warranted by the Constitution, upon military necessity, I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind, and the gracious favor of Almighty God."[5]

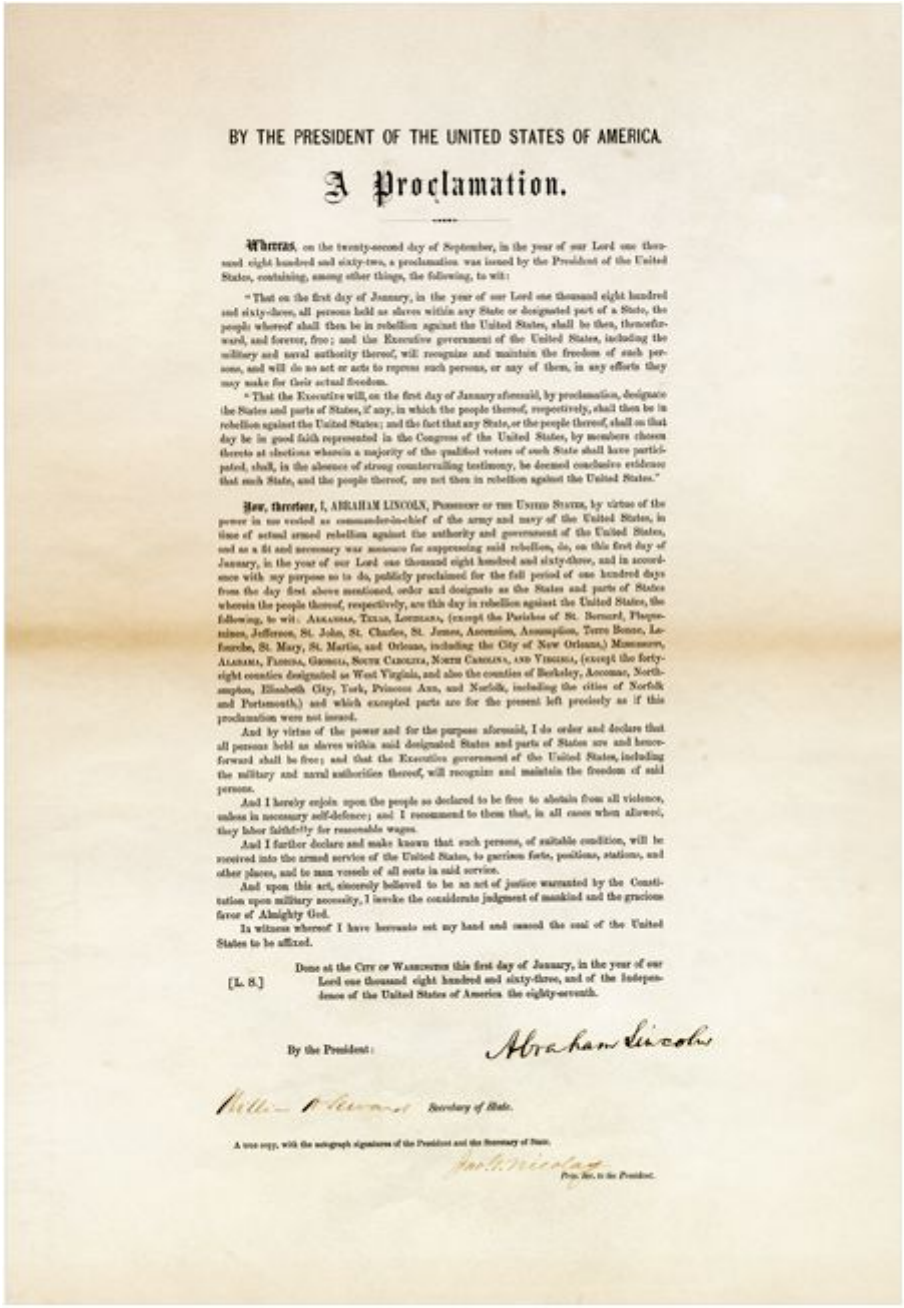
Rosewater, a staunch opponent of slavery, had every reason to be proud of his role in telegraphing to the world news of the "new era for liberty." He became a Republican politician after the war, then served for years as editor of the Omaha Bee. Other Jews, however, doubted the president's actions. The Jewish Record of New York, for example, deplored the Emancipation Proclamation. "To proclaim the African equal to the surrounding races, would be a farce," it declared.[6] Isaac Mayer Wise, noting support for the Proclamation from groups that aimed to write Christianity into the Constitution, likewise warned against those who sought "to free the black and enslave the white man."[7] Isaac Leeser, recalling Grant's order expelling the Jews, wondered whether the ultimate aim of the proclamation was "to give freedom to the negro, only to bring expulsion from the Union territory to the descendants of the Hebrew race."[8] On the other hand, the young Washington Jewish lawyer Simon Wolf personally congratulated Lincoln on the historic proclamation. In his memoirs, he quoted Lincoln's perceptive reply: "It was not only the negro that I freed, but the white man no less."[9] Rabbi Henry Vidaver of Warsaw, who arrived in America on the eve of the Civil War, marshaled biblical language to describe the Emancipation Proclamation to readers of the Hebrew newspaper Hamagid in Europe: "All slaves purchased in perpetuity by residents of the South are from this day forth free men," he exulted. He understood, as Lincoln himself did, that the Emancipation Proclamation was transformative and final.[10]

Lincoln explained just how final the Emancipation Proclamation was in a letter to Major General John A. McClernand, a friend and fellow lawyer from Illinois, who deemed the action a mistake. "I have issued the emancipation proclamation, and I can not retract it," Lincoln explained, recalling a biblical injunction from the Book of Esther ("… for the writing which is written in the king's name, and sealed with the king's ring, may no man reverse.")[11] To drive the point home, he also employed what he called a "coarse but an expressive" figure of speech that, we have seen, he employed only once before, in a letter to the Jewish political powerbroker August Belmont: "Broken eggs can not be mended."[12]

On the very same day—January 1, 1863—that Edward Rosewater transmitted Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation over the telegraph lines, Lincoln's podiatrist (the nineteenth-century term was chiropodist), Issachar Zacharie, his closest Jewish friend after Abraham Jonas and a "favored family visitor at the White House,"[13] began his brief career as a spy, appointed by the president himself. Zacharie was something of a mystery man; historians consider him one of Lincoln's "most enigmatic intimates."[14] He spelled his name in multiple ways (Issachar, Issacher, Issachor, Isachar, Zacharie, Zacharia, Zachariah). He concealed the year of his birth; it was more likely 1825 than oft-cited later dates.[15] He hid the place of his birth; although sometimes listed as Charleston, it was actually Chatham in North Kent, England. He also provided conflicting stories concerning his immigration. Only thanks to a surviving ship's manifest, do we now know that he arrived from England on August 24, 1832, in care of his parents, Jonathan and Amelia Zacharia.[16] He especially tried to mask his lack of education, pretending to have studied with great doctors and to have written learned books, when in fact he had trouble writing standard English (most of his letters were written for him by others) and admitted to friends that "I lack education."[17] In 1844, in another act of concealment, he married Mary Anne Lawson in Philadelphia in a ceremony performed by a Baptist minister.[18] For some time, he lived with his wife's non-Jewish family, but like many intermarried Jews of the time, he also maintained ties with members of the Jewish community, later insisting that "I have always been proud to acknowledge that I was an Israelite." Abraham Lincoln certainly knew him as a Jew.[19]



BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A Proclamation.

Whereas, on the twenty-second day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, a proclamation was issued by the President of the United States, containing, among other things, the following, to wit:

"That on the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, all persons held as slaves within any State or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforward, and forever, free; and the Executive government of the United States, including the military and naval authority thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons, and will do no act or acts to repress such persons, or any of them, in any efforts they may make for their actual freedom.

"That the Executive will, on the first day of January aforesaid, by proclamation, designate the States and parts of States, if any, in which the people thereof, respectively, shall then be in rebellion against the United States; and the fact that any State, or the people thereof, shall on that day be in good faith represented in the Congress of the United States, by members chosen thereto at elections wherein a majority of the qualified voters of such State shall have participated, shall, in the absence of strong countervailing testimony, be deemed conclusive evidence that such State, and the people thereof, are not then in rebellion against the United States."

Now, therefore, I, ABRAHAM LINCOLN, President of the United States, by virtue of the power in me vested as commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, in time of actual armed rebellion against the authority and government of the United States, and as a fit and necessary war measure for suppressing said rebellion, do, on this first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and in accordance with my purpose so to do, publicly proclaimed for the full period of one hundred days from the day first above mentioned, order and designate as the States and parts of States wherein the people thereof, respectively, are this day in rebellion against the United States, the following, to wit: Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, (except the Parishes of St. Bernard, Plaquemines, Jefferson, St. John, St. Charles, St. James, Ascension, Assumption, Terre Bonne, Lafourche, St. Mary, St. Martin, and Orleans, including the City of New Orleans,) Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, and Virginia, (except the forty-eight counties designated as West Virginia, and also the counties of Berkeley, Accomac, Northampton, Elizabeth City, York, Princess Ann, and Norfolk, including the cities of Norfolk and Portsmouth,) and which excepted parts are for the present left precisely as if this proclamation were not issued.

And by virtue of the power and for the purpose aforesaid, I do order and declare that all persons held as slaves within said designated States and parts of States are and hereforward shall be free; and that the Executive government of the United States, including the military and naval authorities thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of said persons.

And I hereby enjoin upon the people so declared to be free to abstain from all violence, unless in necessary self-defence; and I recommend to them that, in all cases when allowed, they labor faithfully for reasonable wages.

And I further declare and make known that such persons, of suitable condition, will be received into the armed service of the United States, to garrison forts, positions, stations, and other places, and to man vessels of all sorts in said service.

And upon this act, sincerely believed to be an act of justice warranted by the Constitution upon military necessity, I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of Almighty God.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington this first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and of the Independence of the United States of America the eighty-seventh.

[L. S.]

By the President:

Abraham Lincoln

William H. Seward, Secretary of State.

A true copy, with the autograph signatures of the President and the Secretary of State.

John G. Nicolay, Priv. Sec. to the President.

THE LELAND-BOKER EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION

Lincoln authorized this signed souvenir edition of his keystone Emancipation Proclamation to be sold at Philadelphia's Great Central Fair in June 1864, in order to raise money for the war effort. At $10 apiece, however, not all of them sold—and those that remained were given away to libraries. Today, of the forty-eight copies signed by Lincoln, only twenty-six are known to exist.

Shapell Manuscript Collection

A central mystery concerning Zacharie concerns how he became such a skilled and successful chiropodist, celebrated by such luminaries as Henry Clay, John C. Calhoun, and, of course, Lincoln himself. Chiropody was a brand-new field in Zacharie's day—the word had only come into existence in 1785—and it was far from a respectable one.

Medical science paid scant attention to foot discomforts, and surgeons considered problems like corns and bunions beneath their dignity; they relegated them to lowly "corn cutters" some of whom dabbled in folk medicine and dentistry on the side. The skills needed to alleviate foot discomforts were thus learned from those experienced in the field and were often passed down from parents to children.[20]

The first serious English-language medical text on foot care, A Treatise on Corns, Bunions, the Diseases of Nails, and the General Management of the Feet (1845), was written by a proud and communally active Jew named Lewis Durlacher, of London, who served as "surgeon-chiropodist" to three successive British monarchs and was also the son, father, and grandfather of chiropodists. An American edition of his well-regarded work was published in Philadelphia soon after the London edition appeared.[21]

Another early British chiropodist, a German immigrant of uncertain background named John Eisenberg, likewise published a book on chiropody in 1845. Entitled Surgical and Practical Observations on the Diseases of the Human Foot with Instructions for their Treatment to which is added Advice on the Management of the Hand, the volume was expensively produced and elegantly written, but its contents (including veiled attacks on Durlacher) were greeted with scorn. "Fine semblance, no substance," the reviewer for the British and Foreign Medical Review concluded. "We warn our readers all and sundry against meddling with the charming cheat."[22] A medical journal for surgeons dismissed the work as "scarcely deserving of even the brief attention we have given to it."[23] Little more is known about Eisenberg, but in 1860, Issachar Zacharie would pirate his book and publish most of it under his own name in America. He also borrowed six illustrations from Durlacher's book for his own, again without any acknowledgment.[24]

Much as he undoubtedly learned from these books, Zacharie must also have had a teacher to train him in the science and art of chiropody. Who that was remains another of Zacharie's many mysteries. On one occasion, he published a "certificate," purportedly from the great English surgeon Sir Astley Paston Cooper (1768–1841), dated 27 June 1837, attesting that "I. Zacharie studied the profession of Chiropodist under me."[25] Since Zacharie was no more than twelve years old in 1837 and living in poverty in the United States, while Cooper died in England in 1841, that claim is easy to reject. Zacharie dedicated both editions of his book Surgical and Practical Observations on the Diseases of the Human Foot (1860, 1876) to the great American surgeon Valentine Mott, who had studied under Cooper. “I am indeed rejoiced that this tribute of my respect and admiration has been accepted by you, and that you consider the labors of an humble individual, upon a neglected branch of knowledge, not unworthy [of] your kind protection and consideration,” he wrote. Strangely, that dedication is dated 1844, sixteen years before the first edition of his volume had even appeared in the United States, and it stops short of saying that Zacharie himself had studied with Mott, which he almost certainly did not.[26] It seems more likely that Zacharie studied chiropody in Philadelphia where the first chiropody office ever known in the United States was opened in 1841 by an English-born Jew named Julius Davidson.[27] Had he, as an obituary claims, also studied under Dr. Thomas Dent Mutter, the eminent professor of surgery at Philadelphia’s Thomas Jefferson Medical College, he would not likely have considered himself lacking in education.[28] Much still remains mysterious about Zacharie’s life and training, but this much is known with certainty: he was living in Philadelphia with his wife’s family and his own two small children when the census taker found him in 1850, and beginning several years before then, in his twenties, he started taking testimonials from public figures whose feet he successfully treated.[29]

> “… broken eggs can not be mended. I have issued the emancipation proclamation and I can not retract it.”

Executive Mansion.

Washington, January 8, 186[illegible].

Major General McClernand

My dear Sir

Your interesting communication by the hand of Major Scates is received. I never did ask nor ever was willing to accept less, than for all the States, and the people thereof, to take and hold their places, and their rights, in the Union, under the Constitution of the United States. For this alone have I felt authorized to struggle, and I seek neither more nor less now. Still, to use a coarse, but an expressive figure, broken eggs can not be mended. I have issued the emancipation proclamation, and I can not retract it.

After the commencement of hostilities I struggled nearly a year and a half to get along without touching the "institution"; and when finally I concluded to touch it, I gave a hundred days fair notice of my purpose, to all the States and people, within which they could have turned it wholly aside, by simply again becoming, each, my good citizen of the United States. They chose not to do so.

As to any dread of my having a purpose to prolong or retain this power, for personal safety, or for any object connected with myself, you can calculate me as free as you are.

I think you would better not make this letter public; but you may rely confidently on my standing by whatever I have done in it. Please write me if anything more comes to light.

Yours very truly

A. Lincoln.

LINCOLN TO JOHN A. McCLERNAND, JANUARY 8, 186[3]

Lincoln would later tell the artist Francis Bicknell Carpenter that "as affairs have turned out," the Emancipation Proclamation was "the central act of my administration, and the great event of the nineteenth century." But the "turning out" was not without contention, and Lincoln emphatically defended his proclamation: "broken eggs can not be mended," he declared. "I have issued the emancipation proclamation, and I can not retract it."

Shapell Legacy Partnership

Shrewdly, Zacharie began by soliciting commendations from doctors in Philadelphia and nearby Baltimore. They attested, in testimonials dating as early as August 27, 1846, that his "method"—avoiding use of the knife, spilling no blood, minimizing pain, maximizing comfort, and operating quickly—was "rational" and "scientific." They also addressed him as "Doctor," a professional degree that he ambitiously aspired to but never actually attained.[30] On a trip to the nation's capital, the freshly titled "doctor" courageously employed his method on the corns of Lincoln's "beau ideal," Senator Henry Clay. "I take pleasure in saying," Clay wrote in a January 29, 1848, testimonial, "that Dr. Zacharie operated on me for Corns, with perfect comfort, and to my entire satisfaction, and I derived great and immediate benefit from the exercise of his skill and judgment."[31] That commendation naturally opened many doors to the young chiropodist, and within the year he had won additional testimonials from such luminaries as Senators Lewis Cass, Thomas Hart Benton, and John C. Calhoun.[32]

For several years during the gold rush, Zacharie and his family lived in California. He was the only chiropodist listed in the San Francisco city directory of 1856 and is remembered as the "pioneer practitioner in that city."[33] Much like Abraham Jonas when he moved to Kentucky, he also became a leader in Freemasonry, a meeting ground where upwardly mobile Jews and Protestants could safely interact. In keeping with the air of mystery that he so frequently projected, he became especially devoted to Masonry's Order of the Secret Monitor, influenced by Dutch Masonry, which focused upon mutual assistance ("to search out and call upon any Brother who may be in danger or distress, or who may have fallen into ill health or may be in need of fraternal monition, sympathy, consolation or assistance"). Years later he would bring that secretive order back to England, becoming its first Supreme Ruler.[34]

In 1858, Zacharie returned from California and took up residence in New York. By then, he boasted of having collected some "1500 certificates" attesting to his skills from "some of the most eminent men in the United States." Though still only in his thirties, he was well on his way to becoming chiropody's foremost American booster. The New York Atlas characterized him that year as "the most successful operator of his class ever known in New York" and gushed that "professors of chiropody" of his type were nothing less than "benefactors of the human race."[35]

One of the "eminent men" whose feet Zacharie treated in New York was the esteemed poet and longtime editor of the New-York Evening Post, William Cullen Bryant. Known to be "an indefatigable walker," Bryant regularly tramped three miles to and from work and was once said to have walked forty miles in a single day.[36] So it is, perhaps, not surprising that he became particularly interested in chiropody. "Diseases of the feet," he knew, were the cause "of great suffering and inconvenience, and few persons are wholly exempt from them." After watching Zacharie in action in 1859, Bryant praised his "knowledge of the structure of the human foot and the consummate dexterity of his operations." He also became one of his patients.[37]

INSCRIBED COPY OF ZACHARIE'S BOOK

Zacharie published Surgical and Practical Observations on the Diseases of the Human Foot in 1860—which shared, at the very least, the exact same title of a book published abroad, by another chiropodist, years earlier. While his authorship is suspect, he was nonetheless an expert healer, not only of foot complaints but of hand and back maladies as well.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

Office of The Evening Post, 41 NASSAU STREET, COR. LIBERTY.

New York: August 21. 1862

My dear Sir.

The bearer of this is Dr. I. Zacharie, a chiropodist of marvellous skill, as I have had occasion to experience, and desired that I would say to you what I know of him. He is a regularly educated surgeon, whose operations on the feet are performed with a nicety delicacy and dexterity about it truly surprising. If you or any of your family are incommoded with any delicate skeleton of the feet, he will be happy to give proof of his skill. I am Sir,

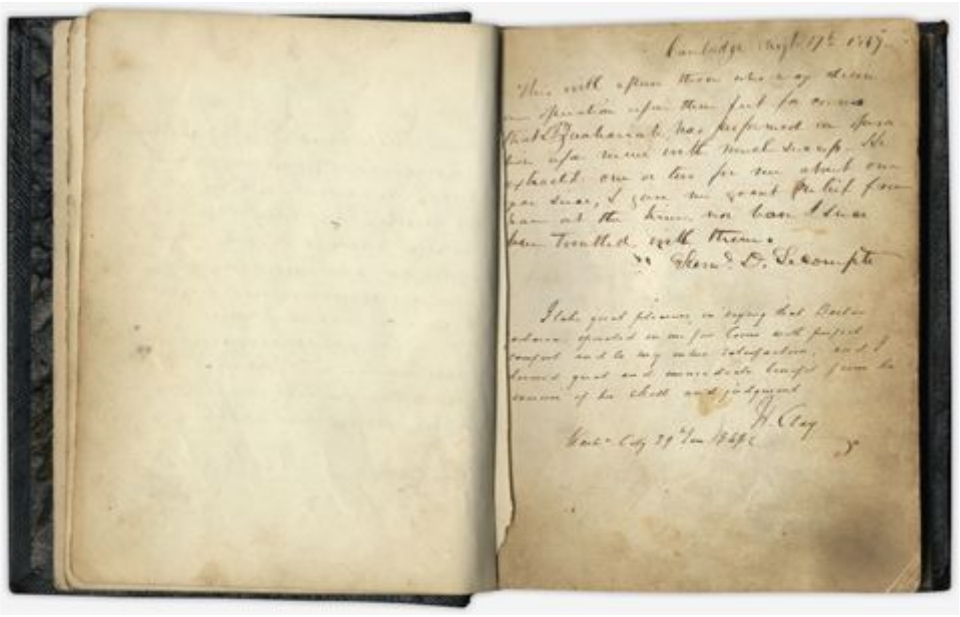
Truly yours W C Bryant

Mr. Lincoln.

THE INTRODUCTION, AUGUST 21, 1862

With this letter of introduction to Lincoln, Issachar Zacharie began his unique connection with the president—the end of which, just as at the beginning, would see him as a man of mystery. Here William Cullen Bryant, the powerful editor of the New-York Evening Post, tells the president of the chiropodist's "marvelous skill."

Shapell Manuscript Collection



TESTIFYING TO ZACHARIE

Some of the 1500 testimonials of Issachar Zacharie's skill that he had personally assembled, which included Henry Clay, John C. Calhoun, Lewis Cass, Thomas Hart Benton, William H. Herndon, as well as top Union generals.

Shapell Manuscript Collection

In the summer of 1862, with the Civil War raging, Northern morale ebbing, and William A. Hammond, an energetic young surgeon general newly installed in Washington committed to the establishment of a permanent hospital and ambulance corps for the military,[38] a plan was hatched, perhaps by Zacharie himself, to improve the lives of soldiers by establishing a chiropody corps "to inspect the feet of the men and keep them in order for marching." Bryant, who loved the idea, agreed to recommend Zacharie to be its chief. "His skill in this branch is truly astonishing," he informed Secretary of War Edwin Stanton and then expounded at length on the "importance of maintaining the feet of our soldiers."[39] On the same day, August 21, 1862, Bryant provided Zacharie with a personal letter of introduction to Abraham Lincoln. He had been one of Lincoln's earliest New York supporters, served as emcee when Lincoln spoke at Cooper Union, and often corresponded with him. He expected that his recommendation would carry weight with the president, and probably for that reason, his carefully chosen words focused more on Zacharie's medical skill than on his executive abilities:

> The bearer of this note, Dr. I. Zacharie, a chiropodist of marvelous skill, as I have had occasion to experience, has desired that I would say to you what I know of him. He is a regularly educated surgeon, whose operations on the feet are performed with a nicety, delicacy and dexterity which is truly surprising. If you or any of your family are incommoded with any disease whatever of the feet, he will be happy to give proof of his skill.[40]

These letters became part of a small-scale lobbying effort on behalf of Zacharie and the proposed chiropody corps. George Opdyke, the Republican mayor of New York City, penned a letter of his own to Lincoln in praise of Zacharie ("I beg to commend him to your favorable consideration as the Chief of a Corps of Chiropodists which, I learn, and I hope truly, is to be organized for the benefit of the country, by keeping in good marching condition, the feet of those who go forth to fight our battles").[41] Rufus F. Andrews, surveyor of the Port of New York, gave Zacharie a letter of introduction to Lincoln as well, most likely the catalyst for the first meeting between Lincoln and Zacharie three weeks later.[42] The New-York Evening Post and the New York Herald likewise published articles favoring the chiropody corps.[43] The Herald colorfully depicted Zacharie as being "distinguished by a splendid Roman nose, fashionable whiskers, an eloquent tongue, a dazzling diamond breastpin, great skill in his profession, an ingratiating address, a perfect knowledge of his business and a plentiful supply of social moral courage."[44] Zacharie himself, meanwhile, kept Stanton and Hammond informed of these tributes, and pleaded for "favorable consideration."[45]

Custom House, New York.
Surveyor's Office, (27 and 29 Pine Street)
Aug. 29th 1862.

His Excellency
Abraham Lincoln
President

I take great pleasure in introducing to you my friend Dr. Zacharie who visits Washington on a highly patriotic mission, which he will explain to you. If you can give him a hearing, & examine his testimonials, I feel quite certain

THE CATALYST FOR THE FIRST MEETING, AUGUST 29, 1862

Adding to the recommendation from William Cullen Bryant just a week before, New York Custom House official Rufus F. Andrews also recommends Dr. Issachar Zacharie to Lincoln—this time, as a friend "who visits Washington on a highly patriotic mission." This missive was most likely the catalyst for the first meeting between Lincoln and Zacharie three weeks later.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

In September, Zacharie traveled to Washington to argue his case in person. According to published reports, he treated the feet of three generals, George McClellan, Ambrose Burnside, and most important of all in terms of his later career, Nathaniel P. Banks. He also treated Secretary of State William Seward, and other members of the cabinet.[46] Then, on September 20, he met with Abraham Lincoln, probably for the first time, and in the course of just five days would treat Lincoln for back, wrist, and foot problems. "Dr. Zacharie, has, with great dexterity, taken some troublesome corns from my toes," the president wrote in a testimonial striking for its lack of pretentiousness.

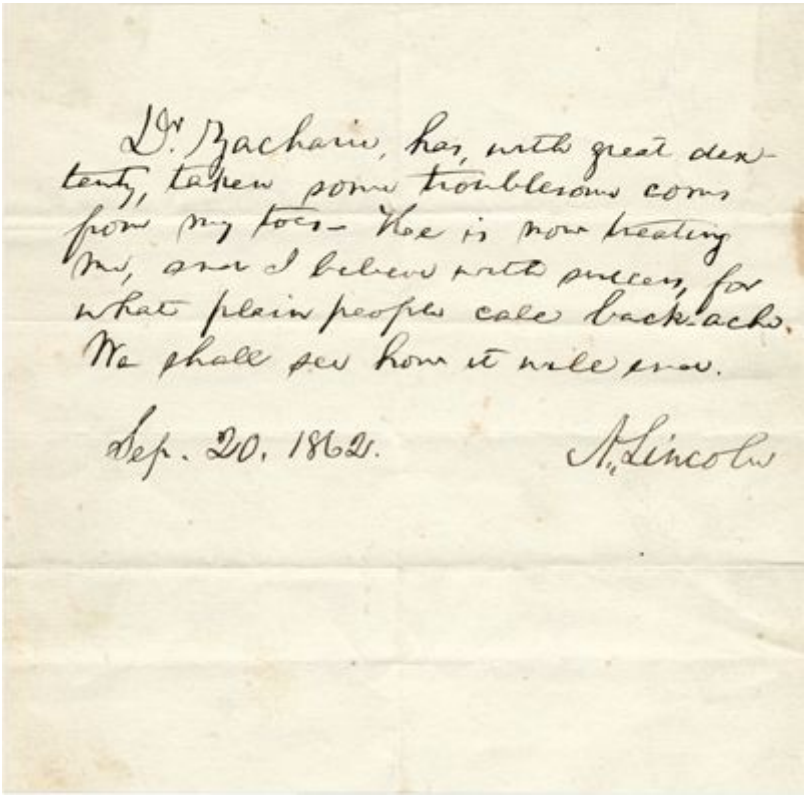
"He is now healing me, and I believe with success, for what plain people call back-ache. We shall see how it will end."[47]

Apparently it ended well, for two days later, on September 22, the very day that he delivered the preliminary Emancipation Proclamation to his cabinet, announcing his decision to emancipate slaves on January 1, 1863, Lincoln made time during a momentous week to pen a more formal testimonial attesting that he had met with Dr. Zacharie in the Executive Mansion. Presumably, Zacharie presented to him his plan for the chiropody corps; he also again treated Lincoln's famously painful feet. "Dr. Zacharie has operated on my feet with great success, and considerable addition to my comfort," Lincoln wrote.[48]

Three days after that, on September 25, which happened to be the first day of Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year, the president invited Zacharie back into his office seeking treatment for a sprained wrist.[49] In the meanwhile, on September 23, Lincoln had co-signed, along with William Seward, yet another testimonial for Zacharie, this one likely written with Surgeon General Hammond in mind. Noting "numerous testimonies of the highest character," as well as their own "personal experience," Lincoln and Seward endorsed Zacharie's "very great success … in operating upon corns, bunions & other troubles of the feet," and expressed their "desire that the Soldiers of our brave army may have the benefit of the Doctor's surprising skill."[50] Stanton followed that up the next day with a thirty-day pass to Zacharie, "for the purpose of operating upon the feet of the soldiers for corns, bunions" in and around Washington.[51]

New Yorkers seem to have assumed, following all of these testimonials and accolades, that Zacharie's mission had been crowned with success. Vanity Fair, a humorous New York weekly, went so far as to publish an anonymous "Ode to Dr. Zacharie"—might it have been the work of William Cullen Bryant?—praising the chiropodist's skill and celebrating his appointment to the military.[52]

"Dr. Zacharie … is now treating me, and I believe with success, for what plain people call back-ache."



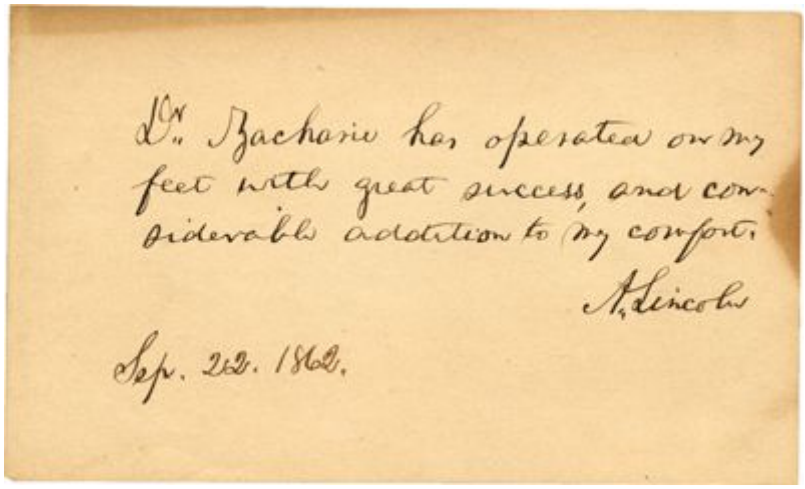
Dr. Zacharie, has, with great dexterity, taken some troublesome corns from my toes— He is now treating me, and I believe with success, for what plain people call backache. We shall see how it will end.

Sep. 20. 1862. A. Lincoln

THE FIRST LINCOLN TESTIMONIAL, SEPTEMBER 20, 1862

Of all the hundreds of testimonials affirming the wondrous talents of Issachar Zacharie, this is the most interesting: "Dr. Zacharie, has, with great dexterity, taken some troublesome corns from my toes—He is now treating me, and I believe with success, for what plain people call back-ache. We shall see how it will end." It is the first of three such testimonials Lincoln would write for Zacharie, written within three days of one another, and suggests that from the very beginning, Lincoln found something compelling in the able and affable doctor. It also serves as yet another example of Lincoln's striking humility: for having been for the first twenty-one years of his life a manual worker, he had yet to forget what "plain people call back-ache."

Shapell Manuscript Collection



Dr. Zacharie has operated on my feet with great success, and considerable addition to my comfort.

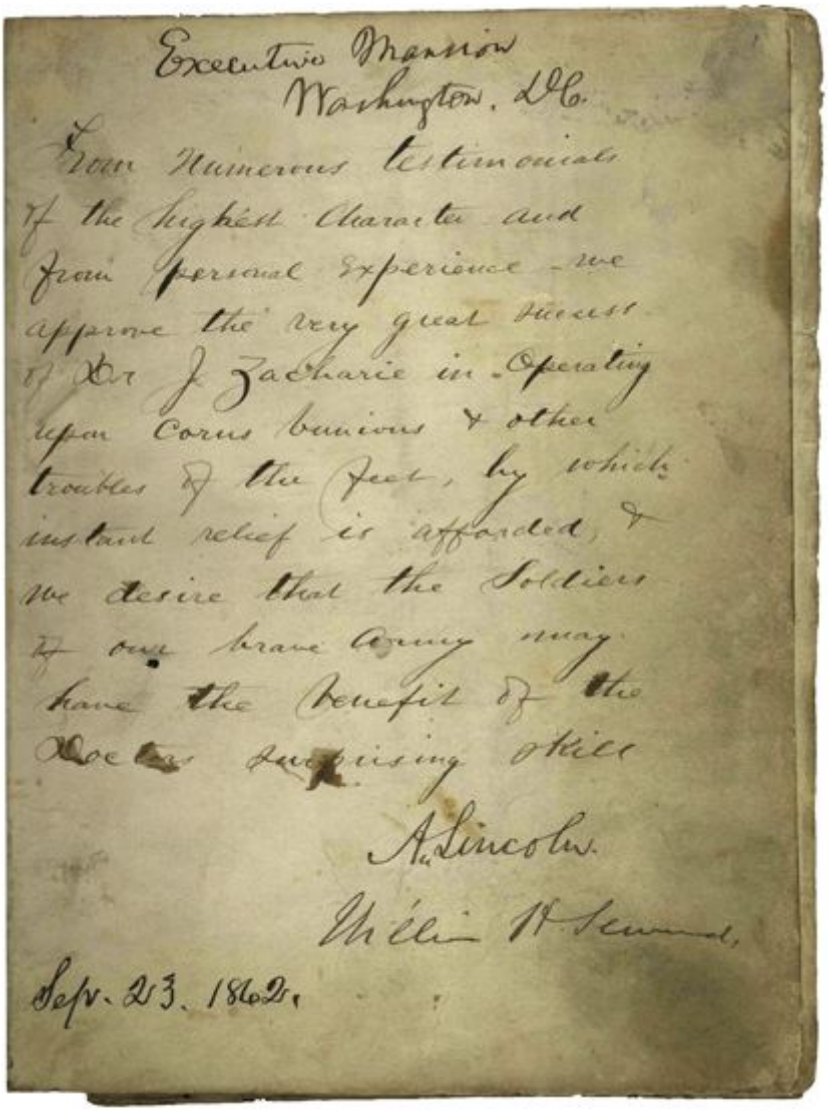
A. Lincoln

Sep. 22. 1862.

THE SECOND TESTIMONIAL: A SURPRISING GESTURE ON A LANDMARK DAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1862

Within five days of Antietam, the single bloodiest battle in American history, and on the very day that Lincoln issued his preliminary Emancipation Proclamation to his cabinet, he found time to gratify Zacharie's request for a second endorsement.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

"... we desire that the soldiers of our brave army may have the benefit of the Doctor's surprising skill."



Executive Mansion
Washington, D.C.

From Numerous testimonials of the highest character and from personal experience we approve the very great merit of Dr J Zacharie in Operating upon Corns bunions & other troubles of the feet, by which instant relief is afforded, & we desire that the Soldiers of our brave Army may have the benefit of the Doctors surprising skill

A. Lincoln.

William H. Seward,

Sept. 23. 1862.

THE THIRD TESTIMONIAL, SEPTEMBER 23, 1862

Lincoln wrote yet another endorsement of Zacharie's "surprising skill" in "operating upon corns, bunions and other troubles of the feet." Here, in a document headed, dated, and signed by him, and signed as well by Secretary of State Seward, both men testify "from personal experience" to the "instant relief" provided by the good doctor, and express their desire that the soldiers bravely serving have access to the same.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

Surgeon General Hammond, who like so many surgeons seems to have held chiropody in low esteem, paid no heed to any of this. He received any number of well-intentioned suggestions from politicians and citizens extolling treatments and remedies of every kind (Bryant, for example, was a great devotee of homeopathic medicine[53]), and with his elevated sense of professionalism, Hammond proceeded to reject most all of them—even when they came addressed to him from the president of the United States.[54] Just a few days after he met with Zacharie, to take one instance, Lincoln specifically requested Hammond to allow a Dr. S. W. Forsha of Ohio to treat soldiers with a special "balm" that, Forsha had promised, would "insure ninety percent of all the flesh wounds to be well and the Soldiers to be in a healthy condition and fit for duty within thirty days." Hammond ignored the request; when it was repeated, he bluntly informed the president that Forsha was nothing but "an ignorant quack."[55] What Hammond thought of Zacharie at the time has not been preserved, but in 1864, when he was dismissed, the surgeon general admitted that he had refused to sanction the "corn doctor['s] … entrance into the army, although he was supported by the President and other prominent politicians."[56] As a result, notwithstanding all of the many endorsements Zacharie collected, including those of Lincoln and Seward, no chiropody corps came into being.

Nevertheless, Lincoln, Seward, and Banks—new friends whom the affable chiropodist made in Washington after treating their feet successfully—all tried to assist him. Banks, on October 6, recommended Zacharie's skills ("I have experienced the benefit of his professional skill and commend him to your favor") to the commander of Fort Monroe, John A. Dix. Zacharie later claimed to have relieved the feet of some 5,000 soldiers at the Virginia fort. He published an advertisement claiming that "all soldiers having corns, bunions or bad nails upon their feet, can have them cured without pain" and declared in capital letters that he was serving "UNDER THE AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR."[57] But there is no evidence that he received any such authority or military commission, and he never was paid. In 1874, when he sought retroactive compensation for his work, Congress's Committee on War Claims scornfully turned him down, insisting that he had been merely "plying his vocation; and voluntarily sought to pursue the same in the lines of the Union Army."[58]

Zacharie, who made up in ambition, imagination, and determination whatever he lacked in education, returned to Washington after seven weeks at Fort Monroe with a new and highly secretive plan. After meeting with Lincoln, who appreciated his skills and took a personal liking to him, Zacharie exultantly wrote Seward that, pending a kind word from him, he would "obtain what I desire": the opportunity to accompany General Banks to New Orleans.[59] The very next day, on November 25, Lincoln wrote a revealing letter to Banks providing his consent:

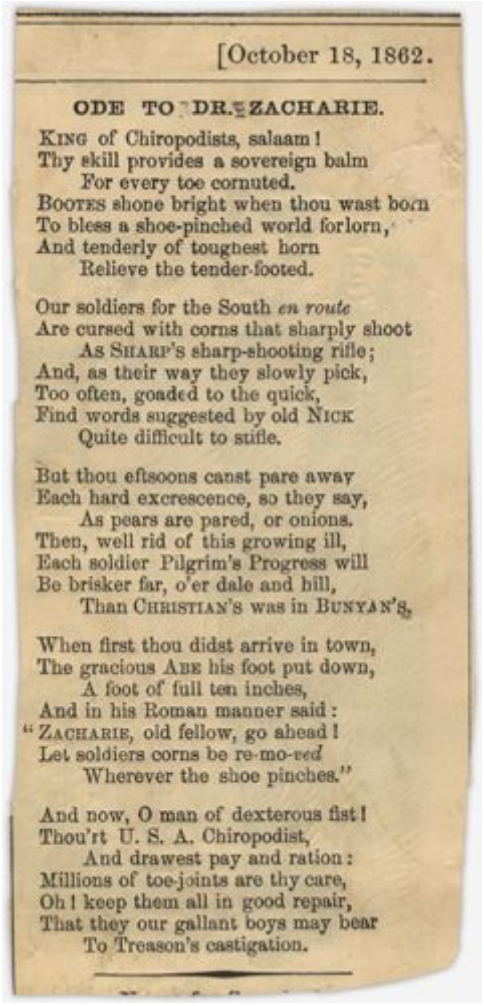
> Dr. Zacharie, whom you know as well as I do, wishes to go with you on your expedition. I think he might be of service, to you, first in his peculiar profession, and secondly, as a means of access to his countrymen, who are quite numerous in some of the localities you will probably visit. This, however, is not an order, nor a request even, for you to take him; but a permission merely, excepting his case from a general prohibition which I understand to exist.[60]

Banks, at the time, was collecting men and matériel for a secretive expedition, by boat, to New Orleans. Lincoln had appointed him to replace the unpopular General Benjamin F. Butler as commander of what was then known as the Department of the Gulf. A key goal of Banks's mission was to pacify the population and win its goodwill so as to entice Louisiana back into the Union.[61] As Lincoln clearly knew, Jews (many of them intermarried and assimilated) played an outsized role in the politics of the region. On the eve of the Civil War, Judah P. Benjamin had been Louisiana's U.S. senator; Henry M. Hyams, its lieutenant governor; and Edwin Warren Moise, the speaker of its legislature—all of them Jews.[62] Overall, as many as 2,000 Jews lived in New Orleans. Butler, a notorious anti-Semite, had alienated Jews during his tenure, jailing several of them and insulting all of them ("my experience with men of the Jewish faith or nation," the general explained, "has been an unfortunate one."[63] Butler, in a letter to the attorney general in October 1862, wrote: "They are Jews who betrayed their Savior & also have betrayed us."[64])



[October 18, 1862.

ODE TO DR. ZACHARIE.

KING of Chiropodists, salaam!
Thy skill provides a sovereign balm
For every toe cornuted.
BOOTES shone bright when thou wast born
To bless a shoe-pinched world forlorn,
And tenderly of toughest horn
Relieve the tender-footed.

Our soldiers for the South en route
Are cursed with corns that sharply shoot
As SHARP'S sharp-shooting rifle;
And, as their way they slowly pick,
Too often, goaded to the quick,
Find words suggested by old NICK
Quite difficult to stifle.

But thou eftsoons canst pare away
Each hard excrescence, so they say,
As pears are pared, or onions.
Then, well rid of this growing ill,
Each soldier Pilgrim's Progress will
Be brisker far, o'er dale and hill,
Than CHRISTIAN'S was in BUNYAN'S.

When first thou didst arrive in town,
The gracious ABE his foot put down,
A foot of full ten inches,
And in his Roman manner said:
"ZACHARIE, old fellow, go ahead!
Let soldiers corns be re-mo-ved
Wherever the shoe pinches."

And now, O man of dexterous fist!
Thou'rt U. S. A. Chiropodist,
And drawest pay and ration:
Millions of toe-joints are thy care,
Oh! keep them all in good repair,
That they our gallant boys may bear
To Treason's castigation.

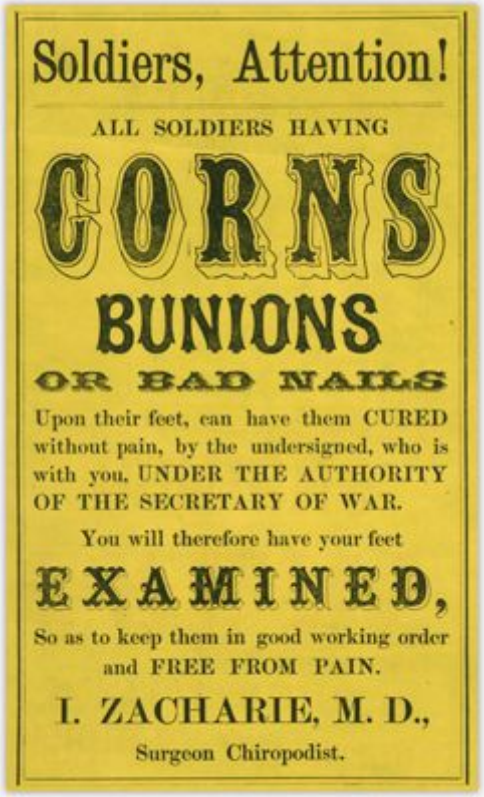
"ODE TO DR. ZACHARIE": OCTOBER 18, 1862

From the first, and short-lived, incarnation of Vanity Fair magazine—then a Manhattan-based humorous weekly published between 1859 and 1863—came this "Ode to Dr. Zacharie," celebrating his well-known friendship with President Lincoln. Though published anonymously, it may have been authored by William Cullen Bryant.
Vanity Fair

Lincoln, who understood what a great mistake that policy had been, hoped that Zacharie, being Jewish himself and with his Jewish connections in New Orleans,[65] could win back the affections of his Jewish "countrymen" by surreptitiously promoting pro-Union sentiments among them. He assumed that Zacharie's chiropody skills would come in handy for Banks as well. As to the "general prohibition" to which Lincoln referred in his letter to Banks, that seems to have been a reference to General Ulysses S. Grant's orders of November 9 and 10 barring Jews from traveling south. "Refuse all permits to come south of Jackson for the present," the general had ordered. "The Isrealites [sic] especially should be kept out."[66]

Zacharie received his official instructions from General Banks on January 1, 1863, when his intelligence mission commenced. “In pursuance to your instructions from the President,” the general wrote, “I desire you during your continuance in the city to mingle freely with its people of all classes, especially with your own countrymen; to ascertain and report as far as possible the nature of its public opinion, as well as the opinion of individuals.” In addition, like any spy, he was instructed to be on the lookout for “the plans of the public Enemy, the character of his troops … the extent of their supplies and ammunition, and the different organizations of which their army may be composed.” “Spare no expense in obtaining that which is of importance,” Banks added.[67]

Zacharie soon set to work. He collected information on firms sending supplies to the Confederacy. He passed along reports (some accurate, some not) on Confederate troop movements. He gathered information on the misdeeds of General Butler. He promoted the work of his patron, General Banks, whom he fawningly compared, in one of his letters to Lincoln, to the man he knew Lincoln idealized, Henry Clay.[68] And, just as he had been instructed to do, he spent a great deal of time aiding Jews. He befriended Jews whom General Butler had offended and hired selected Jews to gather intelligence for him. He met with the most revered Jewish religious leader in New Orleans, Rev. James K. Gutheim, a prominent Confederate supporter who faced banishment to the Confederacy for refusing to take the oath of allegiance to the man he called “the Dictator of Washington,” and offered him kind words of reassurance. To his superiors, he soothingly explained that “in his heart” Gutheim “wishes the Union restored.… It is his wife who influences him.”[69] He also met with scores of other Jews who, as “registered enemies,” needed to leave town. “The Doctor,” the New York Herald reported, “appears to have taken them under his wing; for he has been beset with them morning, noon and night, and his elegant apartments at the St. Charles Hotel have sometimes been crowded with Israelites, waiting his leisure, in order to obtain his advice as to what they should do.”[70] Amid these exertions, he reassured the president that he was meeting with success, “not only among my own people but among the most wealthy & influential of citizens.” Radiating optimism, he wrote that “the people every day are becoming more favorably disposed to the Government.”[71] He sent similar reports to Banks and Seward.[72]



ZACHARIE BROADSIDE

Under the imprimatur of "the Authority of the Secretary of War," Zacharie advertises his painless podiatry in this broadside, circa 1862.
Maine Historical Society

Empowered to hire assistants to help him gather intelligence, Zacharie hired local Jews of long acquaintance and had the inspired idea of disguising them as peddlers to give them some "good excuse" for their travels through the state. He thought that providing them with "merchandise for sale" would provide "a cloak to their real object."[73] Other intelligence gatherers in New Orleans, like George S. Denison, the acting collector of customs and undercover spy for Treasury secretary Salmon P. Chase, knew nothing of this and deeply suspected Zacharie. The chiropodist's own Jewish background only compounded such suspicions; one scholar writes of Denison's "lack of tolerance for foreigners in general and Jews in particular."[74] In correspondence with Chase, Denison wrote derisively that one of Zacharie's "Israelite friends" sought to "take a large stock of goods to Donaldsonville. The reason given is the same as before —that the Dr. wants his friends' cooperation, which would be imperfect unless said friend pretends to be selling goods." Denison, of course, did not "believe a word of it." He described Zacharie as a "vulgar little scoundrel … who takes bribes, and whose only object is to make money."[75] Louisiana's military governor, George F. Shepley, viewed Zacharie's activities, including his allegiance to Banks, as proof that "the Christ killers … have it all their own way."[76] Even former congressman Michael Hahn, who was born of Jewish parents but did not identify as Jewish, expressed doubts about Zacharie. "The general report prevails here," he wrote Lincoln, "that he obtains important commercial and other privileges from the government officers here for persons who pay him heavy sums of money &c. This should be stopped."[77]

Whether Zacharie actually succumbed to the corruption and theft that characterized the Department of the Gulf while he was there, or whether instead his financial dealings served as camouflage for the larger goal with which Lincoln had entrusted him is disputed.[78] When he departed, even General Banks, who knew of the accusations against him, seemed uncertain. "Doctor Zacharie," he wrote Seward, "has been the subject of remark on the part of some parties here who suspect him of speculation. There is much crimination and recriminations among officers of the government on this subject in which I have no part and of which I have no knowledge. I can only say that Doctor Zacharie has had no favors whatever from the Government and has asked for none at my hands."[79]

In March, Zacharie was called east to confer with the president. "Will have the honor of seeing you in day or two," he telegraphed him from New York soon after he arrived there.[80] Their meetings were secret, but it is known that the former Democratic Jewish congressman, Emanuel B. Hart (who was friendly with Seward), was present. Zacharie had agreed to help set up an exchange of Southern cotton for Northern goods and that was likely on the agenda. Zacharie may also have been involved in an abortive plan to buy cotton directly from Southern planters to help overcome the drastic shortage of cotton affecting mills both in the North and in Europe. There may even have been some more ambitious plan afoot to find an end to the war—for when the meetings concluded, Seward authorized an enormous $5 million line of credit for Banks for an unspecified purpose (the funds were never used).[81] Whatever the case, Zacharie departed "quite agitated on account of the great responsibility" resting upon him, and expressed the hope to Lincoln, who placed so much trust in him, that "everything will be consummated to realize your best wishes."[82]

Coincident with the meetings with Zacharie in March 1863, Lincoln was visited by a long-bearded Canadian self-proclaimed prophet with fiery eyes and hair below his shoulders. His name was Henry Wentworth Monk (1827–96), and his object was nothing less than to end the Civil War, restore the Jews to Palestine, save mankind from doom, and promote world peace. After close study of the Book of Revelations, Monk, in 1852, had renounced property and wealth, ceased to cut his hair or adorn his body, and became a man with a mission. He set off for the Land of Israel, arriving on New Year's Day, 1854, and joined the Christian agricultural settlement established by the Anglican convert John Meshullam in Artas, near Bethlehem. It was there that Monk met the young Pre-Raphaelite painter William Holman Hunt, who painted his portrait and used him as his model for Christ. Monk returned to Canada after eighteen months and published his A Simple Interpretation of the Revelation (1857). He thought to settle permanently in Jerusalem until Hunt's patron, the great English art critic John Ruskin, challenged him to prove his prophetic powers by bringing the American Civil War to an end. That challenge explained Monk's sudden appearance at Lincoln's door.[83]

Executive Mansion,

Washington, Nov. 25, 1862.

Major General Banks

My dear Sir:

Dr. Zacharie, whom you know as well as I do, wishes to go with you on your expedition. I think he might be of service to you, first, in his peculiar profession, and secondly, as a means of access to his countrymen, who are quite numerous on in some of the localities you will probably visit. This, however, is not an order, nor a request even, for you to take him; but a permission merely, excepting his case from a general prohibition which I understand to exist.

Yours very truly

A. Lincoln

LINCOLN TO NATHANIEL BANKS, RECOGNIZES JEWS AS ZACHARIE'S "COUNTRYMEN," NOVEMBER 25, 1862

Lincoln urges General Banks, newly in command of the Department of the Gulf, to make somewhat mysterious use of their mutual friend, Dr. Zacharie. "He might be of service, to you, first, in his peculiar profession," he suggests, "and secondly, as a means of access to his countrymen, who are quite numerous in some of the localities you will probably visit." Lincoln's use of the term countrymen suggests his understanding, steeped in the Old Testament, that the Jews did not comprise just a religion but also a people and a nation. He would use this term repeatedly when referring to Jews.

John Hay Library, Brown University Library

Standing among the crowd that regularly gathered in hopes of winning an audience with the president, Monk's Christ-like appearance naturally caught Lincoln's attention; he was ushered in. According to the description of what followed, quoted from a contemporary letter by Monk's biographer, Monk presented his peace plan, which entailed each side giving up its central war objective, and Lincoln jocularly dismissed it. He then inquired how Canadians viewed his Emancipation Proclamation. That led to a remarkable exchange:

> MONK: Why not follow the emancipation of the Negro by a still more urgent step—the emancipation of the Jew?
>
> LINCOLN: The Jew—why the Jew? Are they not free already?
>
> MONK: Certainly, Mr. President, the American Jew is free, and so is the English Jew—but not the European. In America we live so far off that we are blind to what goes on in Russia and Prussia and Turkey. There can be no permanent peace in the world until the civilized nations, led, I hope by Great Britain and the United States, atone for what they have done to the Jews—for their two thousand years of persecution—by restoring them to their national home in Palestine, and making Jerusalem the capital city of a reunited Christendom.
>
> LINCOLN: That is a noble dream, Mr. Monk, and one shared by many Americans. I myself have a regard for the Jews. My chiropodist is a Jew, and he has so many times "put me on my feet" that I would have no objection to giving his countrymen "a leg up." But the United States is, alas, at this moment a house divided against itself. We must first bring this dreadful war to a victorious conclusion, which no compromise can do—and then, Mr. Monk, we may begin again to see visions, and dream dreams. Then you will see what leadership America will show to the world![84]

Lincoln's parting comment to Monk, an apt and clever wordplay that subtly poked fun at the dreams of the self-proclaimed prophet, drew upon the ancient words of the Hebrew prophet, Joel: "Your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions."[85] Joel's promise of restoration in the aftermath of the punishing blows inflicted by "my great army which I sent among you" may also have provided solace to the beleaguered president. He was already looking forward to leading America in a post–Civil War world.

Even more significant was Lincoln's unequivocal assertion that "I myself have a regard for the Jews," the most direct statement of respect for Jews attributed to him during his lifetime, and one that comports with his friendships and actions since he first became personally acquainted with Jews back in New Salem.

Many, including Generals Butler, Sherman, McClellan and Grant, held different views. A visiting English lawyer, strategist, and scholar named Edward Yates similarly warned Lincoln in a letter that the Jews were the "most venomously opposed" to his administration, the "perpetual enemies of liberty [and] progress,… animated by the worst feelings toward the communities on which they prey & fatten & for which they never labor or fight," and were "the spies & most malignant aiders of the Rebels & of every corrupt thing." He urged that not "a single Jew shd on any pretense be allowed to pass or be within or near the lines."[86] Lincoln's "regard for the Jews" though led him systematically to ignore all such suggestions. Earlier, as we have seen, he had appointed a "Hebrew" as an assistant quartermaster just two days after General Sherman had warned against smuggling on the part of "Jews instigated by a sense of gain."[87] He had also appointed Jewish chaplains and abrogated an order expelling Jews "as a class," over the objection of cabinet members and generals. As for Zacharie, not only did the president describe him to Monk as "my chiropodist," he also indicated that his feet benefited from Zacharie's gentle ministrations "many times"— far more often than standard chronologies of his day-to-day activities preserve.[88] The clever wordplay ("he has so many times 'put me on my feet' that I would have no objection to giving his countrymen 'a leg up'") is vintage Lincoln and reprises the very word—countrymen—that Lincoln had previously used in characterizing Zacharie's fellow Jews. The account indicates that Zacharie was on Lincoln's mind at that time and hints at his belief that through Zacharie he could reach out to other Jews—Zacharie's "countrymen"—as well.

It was likely this belief that brought Zacharie, in September 1863, face-to-face with the most prominent Jew and the highest-ranking member of the Confederate cabinet: its secretary of state, Judah P. Benjamin. Zacharie's patron, General Banks, had long advocated a negotiated settlement to end the Civil War "with honor to the North and without humiliation to the South." He thought that a deal based upon gradual emancipation, with compensation for the loss of slave property, might end the bloodshed and also cast him in the role of peacemaker and statesman, perhaps even propelling him to the presidency.[89] In July 1863, Banks sent his first emissaries into the Confederacy to talk peace. Zacharie was supposed to have been among them and spent two hours with Abraham Lincoln setting forth his plans, but officials in Washington eventually denied him a pass—partly because they distrusted him and partly because the more radical members of the cabinet opposed negotiations with the Confederacy.[90] Zacharie's friends Martin Gordon Jr. of New Orleans (a relative of Jefferson Davis)[91] and David Pretts did make it to Richmond, and Gordon reported back that many Southerners wanted peace and were sympathetic to just the kind of plan that Banks had proposed.[92] Meanwhile, Lincoln secretly recalled Zacharie to Washington, sat closeted with him for two days, and promised him "every facility to carry out my plans." He also provided him with an introduction to Major General John Gray Foster at Fort Monroe, mentioning the "high degree" of confidence in which Banks held Zacharie. In coded language ("any kindness you may show him will be appreciated by me"), he ordered Foster to help Zacharie pass through the lines to the Confederate capital of Richmond. Zacharie, in evident excitement, shared the news with Banks, whose presidential dreams he artfully fed. "If I am successful," he assured him, "you as well as I are made for life."[93]

I MYSELF HAVE A REGARD FOR THE JEWS

The self-proclaimed "Prophet" Henry Wentworth Monk, here depicted in 1858 by William Holman Hunt, shared a conversation with Lincoln about restoring Jews to their homeland, in which Lincoln proclaimed, "I myself have a regard for the Jews."
National Gallery of Canada

On September 27, 1863, Zacharie met with Judah P. Benjamin—once in the company of several other Confederate leaders, and then, unexpectedly, again at night alone. The recent Confederate surrender of Vicksburg, coupled with the bloody defeat at Gettysburg, where 20,000 Confederate soldiers fell in battle, had darkened the mood in Richmond. Benjamin's hopes for European intervention on the Confederacy's behalf were dimming fast. Still, Benjamin insisted to visitors that "self-government" had to be the basis for any peace—"All we are struggling for is to be let alone."[94] Whether, in private conversation, he intimated to Zacharie that further concessions were possible is unknown, but whatever transpired when they met face-to-face, the chiropodist came away from the encounter overcome with excitement. The fawning letter that he sent to Benjamin the very next day shows him eager to ingratiate himself with the Jewish secretary of state. He expressed joy "that the confederate flag was waving over my head," treacherously declared that "I would gladly join the armies of the confederacy if I did not know that I could be of more service to you from where I am," and closed suggestively with the hope that Benjamin would "never regret the interview we had last night."[95] A day later—having been denied the opportunity to visit his father in Savannah—Zacharie was safely back in the Union. "Just returned," he telegraphed Lincoln. "Will be with you tomorrow afternoon."[96]

Zacharie spent two hours debriefing the president. During that time, he later reported to Banks, Lincoln "lock[ed] his doors … preventing any person from having access to him" and "seemed to be delighted with my revelations." According to the New York Herald, those revelations included a far-fetched plan, a variant of one suggested by the respected political leader Francis Preston Blair Sr., to restore the Confederate states to the Union while assisting the Confederate government and armies to capture Mexico for the Confederacy, with Jefferson Davis to be its president. Lincoln's cabinet, which had not received prior notice of Zacharie's mission, was unenthusiastic—especially in the wake of the battlefield successes that made Union victory so much more likely. "Send for Genl. Banks. He is your friend and you can trust him with your confidence in carrying out any negotiation, and let me go down and tell Benjamin," Zacharie implored.[97] Lincoln found the conversation exhausting. "I have been so worn down today," he wrote, begging the forgiveness of chemist and patent officer Benjamin Sherwood Hedrick, for not meeting with him. Though Lincoln promised to reflect on Zacharie's "happy thought," he clearly had no intention of handing the role of peacemaker over to a potential rival. Instead, he and Seward ordered Zacharie to "lay quiet until the time arrives for them to act."[98] Zacharie, meanwhile, became more and more impatient. Lincoln, he complained, "reminds me of the man that won the Elephant at a Raffle. He does not know what to do with it."[99] A week later, he concluded that the president "lacks stability. He has it in his powers to stop all fighting in 24 hours if he would follow out my program."[100] By the end of December 1863, having still heard nothing from Lincoln and Seward, Zacharie expressed "no confidence in them—they are affraid [sic] if they make Peace—that their party will not like it."[101] By then, Zacharie understood that his hopes of seeing Benjamin again and negotiating, along with General Banks, an end to the Civil War were effectively dead. Before long, ads promising that "corns, bunions, inverted nails, enlarged joints, and diseases of the foot cured without pain or inconvenience to the patient by Dr. Zacharie" returned to New York's newspapers.[102]

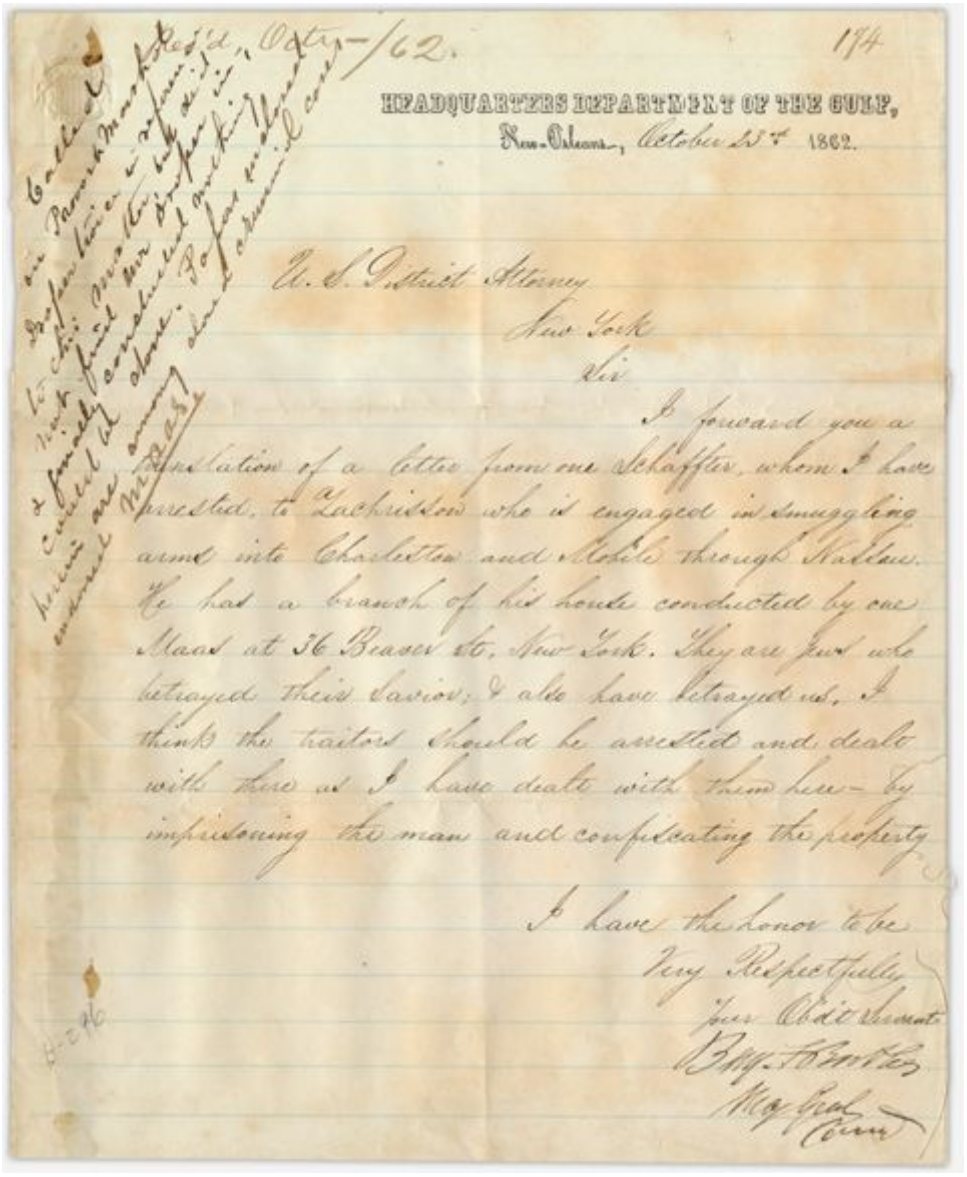
What briefly drew Zacharie back to Washington early in 1864 was the age-old Jewish commandment to redeem the captive. A request came to him to help free Goodman L. Mordecai, a young Jewish Confederate from Charleston who had been imprisoned in Washington, D.C. The twenty-four-year-old Mordecai was the son of one of South Carolina's wealthiest Jewish merchants, Benjamin Mordecai, remembered for his "magnificent" donation of $10,000 (the equivalent in today's money of about $250,000) to advance the interests of his "noble commonwealth" when it seceded from the Union. The younger Mordecai had also loyally served the Confederate army and then worked as a commercial agent for South Carolina blockade runners. While attempting to cross the Potomac Bridge into Washington, he was captured and incarcerated in the Old Capitol prison. Friends of Mordecai's, including the prominent New York Jewish businessman and communal leader Samuel A. Lewis (whose niece, Ada, was Mordecai's fiancée), interceded with Lincoln, and Zacharie personally visited with the president to procure the young man's release. On February 4, when Mordecai and Zacharie came to Lincoln's office to say thank you, the garrulous chiropodist let drop that Mordecai "had fought against the government and that [his] father at that time was prominent in the Confederacy." According to the account Mordecai published many years later, Lincoln grasped his hand and responded, "I am happy to know I am able to serve an enemy!"[103]

"They are Jews who betrayed their Savior; & also have betrayed us."



HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
New-Orleans, October 23d 1862.

U. S. District Attorney
New York
Sir

I forward you a translation of a letter from one Schaffter, whom I have arrested, to Zachrisson who is engaged in smuggling arms into Charleston and Mobile through Matlam. He has a branch of his house conducted by one Maas at 56 Beaver St. New York. They are Jews who betrayed their Savior, & also have betrayed us. I think the traitors should be arrested and dealt with here as I have dealt with them here - by imprisoning the man and confiscating the property

I have the honor to be Very Respectfully
Your Obdt Servant
Benj. F. Butler
Maj Genl Comd

BENJAMIN F. BUTLER'S ANTI-SEMITISM

General Benjamin F. Butler, military governor of New Orleans, was notorious for, among other things, his anti-Semitism. Writing of arrested smugglers on October 23, 1862, he says, "They are Jews who betrayed their Savior; & also have betrayed us."

Shapell Manuscript Collection

JUDAH P. BENJAMIN, FEATURED ON THE CONFEDERATE $2 BILL

Judah Philip Benjamin's appearance as the first Jew on American currency was not his only remarkable achievement. The second Jewish United States senator, he was the first to serve as a professing Jew and the first Jew to be considered for nomination to the United States Supreme Court (he declined two offers). When his home state of Louisiana seceded, he became the first Jewish cabinet member, serving the Confederacy as attorney general, secretary of war, and, until its collapse, secretary of state. After the war Benjamin fled to England, where he became a successful barrister.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

Six weeks later, after another plea from Zacharie, Lincoln also freed the chiropodist's Savannah nephew Jacob [James] G. Cohen, who was imprisoned in Philadelphia—either justly, for running the blockade, or, as he insisted, unjustly, while trying to escape from the Confederacy. Cohen, in a letter, had pleaded with his "dear uncle" to "properly represent my case to the President at Washington & get my release," and on March 16, writing on that same letter, Lincoln responded with typical magnanimity: "Let this man take the [loyalty] oath of Dec. 8 and be discharged."[104]

Lincoln's magnanimity on these two occasions restored Zacharie's devotion to the president and probably explains the two gifts that he sent to the Executive Mansion in 1864: a barrel of hominy in February ("eat it with much enjoyment"), and a box of fine pineapples in May.[105] His success in freeing Jewish captives likewise explains the highly unusual testimonial reception accorded him on May 7, 1864, at his private residence in New York. There he was thanked for exerting "his influence" and employing his "power through the clemency of the President, to aid many … and enable them to return to the North and to freedom," as well as "for his efforts" during the war "to soften the hardships and alleviate the distresses of our [Southern] co-religionists." The lavish present tendered him on that occasion by those "in whose behalf [his] noble and fraternal efforts were so successfully used," makes clear how many felt indebted to him for using his position and influence with the president to render important "services towards the Israelites of America."[106]

While Issachar Zacharie was tending feet, collecting intelligence, assisting Jews caught up in the fighting, and working to end the war, thousands of other Jews, at least 20 percent of eligible Jewish males, were serving as battlefield soldiers. Lincoln was well aware of their contributions. When he revoked Ulysses S. Grant's order expelling the Jews, he explicitly explained, through General Halleck, that he did so because it "proscribed an entire religious class some of whom are fighting in our ranks."[107] He also knew about the heavily immigrant 82nd Regiment in his home state of Illinois, commanded by one of his German-American political friends, Friedrich Hecker. It included what became known as the "Jewish Company" in the Civil War, Company C. Chicago's Jews raised $11,000 (equivalent to about $250,000 today) in recruiting bonuses for those who signed up to fight in the company's ranks, and a high proportion of its soldiers, as well as its company commander, Colonel Edward S. Salomon, were Jews.[108]

Office U. S. Military Telegraph.
WAR DEPARTMENT.
The following Telegram received at Washington, 6.35P M. Sept 29 1863.
From Fort Monroe
Dated, September 29
His Excellency
A Lincoln P.U.S.
Just returned. Will be with you tomorrow afternoon
Zacharie

SEPTEMBER 29, 1863

A telegram from Zacharie to Lincoln stating, "Just returned. Will be with you tomorrow afternoon."
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

I have been so worn down to day, that I must beg Mr. Hearn to excuse me.
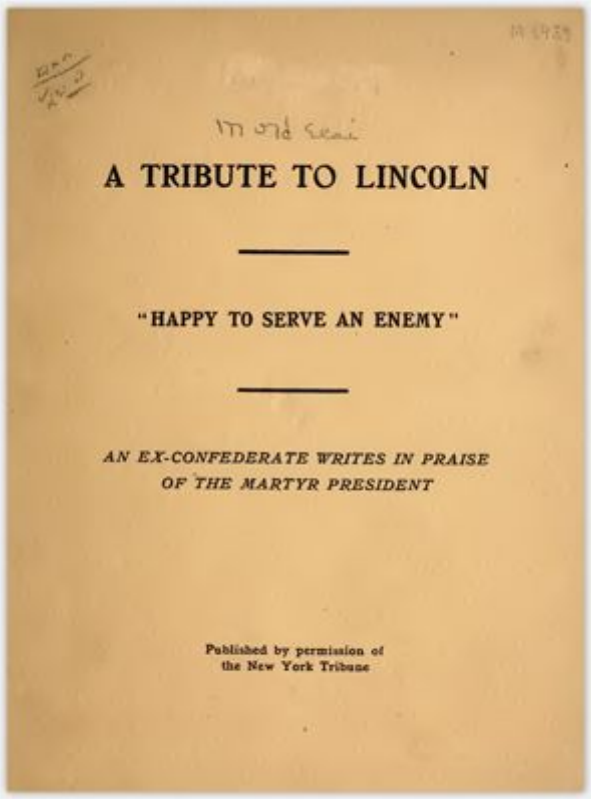
Sept 30 1863 A Lincoln

"WORN DOWN," SEPTEMBER 30, 1863

Lincoln spent two hours with Zacharie on September 30, 1863, behind closed doors, discussing the latter's secret peace mission, and afterward, Lincoln was too "worn down," he writes here, to even meet with another caller—and so begs to be excused. That the card is written in pencil, rather than the more labor-intensive process of pen and ink, suggests his exhaustion.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

The 82nd Illinois Regiment made its reputation at the Battle of Gettysburg, Pennsylvania (July 1–3, 1863), when, according to a standard account, "Colonel Salomon with the 82nd, made a charge upon the pits in his front, driving the Confederates back.… During the three days' fighting, Colonel Salomon had two horses shot from under him while leading his regiment." Some 131 of the soldiers under his command were killed, wounded, or captured during the battle.[109]



A TRIBUTE TO LINCOLN

"HAPPY TO SERVE AN ENEMY"

AN EX-CONFEDERATE WRITES IN PRAISE OF THE MARTYR PRESIDENT

Published by permission of the New York Tribune

"HAPPY TO SERVE AN ENEMY"

Confederate Prisoner of War Goodman Mordecai's grateful account of how Zacharie, "an influential friend of the President," procured his release from jail. Lincoln, he recorded, was "happy to serve an enemy."
New York Daily Tribune

One hundred forty miles away, in Philadelphia, Sabato Morais, the religious leader of Mikveh Israel Congregation, mounted the podium to speak on Saturday, July 4, not knowing how the battle in Gettysburg had turned out. "The murky clouds which have long hovered all over the American horizon [are] gathered at length menacingly nearer to our houses," he cried. "Behold, my hearers! The deplorable consequences and weep. The dust raised by the feet of invasion has tarnished our escutcheon. Havoc and devastation rage in our borders." Unusually that year, the anniversary of America's independence coincided with the seventeenth day of the Hebrew month of Tammuz, the anniversary of the day when the walls of Jerusalem were breached prior to the destruction of the Second Temple. That mournful commemoration and the fear that the same Confederate forces that had penetrated into Northern territory in Gettysburg might soon threaten Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, D.C., led Morais to a fervent prayer: "Encircle Pennsylvania with Thy Mighty shield, protect the lives of her inhabitants." Still, in spite of all the gloom, he remained mindful of July 4 and what that meant. His sermon memorably recalled independence as "the event which four score and seven years ago brought to this new world light and joy."[110]

Whether Abraham Lincoln borrowed the phrase "four score and seven years ago" from Morais for the commemorative address that he delivered at Gettysburg on November 19 cannot be known.[111] While both may independently have reworked the famous King James translation of Psalm 90:10 ("The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years"), it is also possible that Lincoln read Morais's sermon, which was published in the Jewish Messenger. Other Morais sermons certainly made their way to the president. The prominent Philadelphia publisher Abraham Hart, who was the president of Mikveh Israel, sent him one in April 1862 because he thought that Lincoln would appreciate how it "breathes Loyalty to the Union without exultation, or being Triumphant over the loss of our misguided Brothers in the South."[112] He also sent him a later Morais sermon advocating sympathy and charity for Civil War victims and their families. It was acknowledged on January 9, 1864, by John Hay.[113]

Far more important for Jews than the adaptation of the biblical quote was the fact that Lincoln, in his Gettysburg Address, managed to strike an appropriately religious tone without being in any way parochially Christian. While Edward Everett, in his two-hour oration at Gettysburg, invoked Christianity no fewer than five times,[114] Lincoln, having been enlivened to Jewish sensitivities, may purposely have employed the novel and more inclusive phrase "this nation, under God." In so doing, he paid silent homage to the Jews who had fallen side-by-side with Christians at Gettysburg and reimagined America in language that embraced Jews as equals.

Eight weeks after the Battle of Gettysburg, on Saturday, August 29, 1863, Jews and Christians once again fell side-by-side. This time, though, they were executed as deserters by order of the United States government. The executions took place before

25,000 troops assembled at Beverly Ford on the Rappahannock River in Virginia. The five men shot included two Protestants, two Catholics, and one Jew.[115]

Desertion plagued the Union army during the Civil War: some 200,000 soldiers reputedly deserted just between 1863 and 1865. Ideology motivated some of these deserters. Others deserted to take care of family. Still others deserted because they were mistreated, or not paid, or frightened, or because they suffered from what would today be called combat fatigue. A few, though, sought to enrich themselves by enlisting, pocketing recruitment bounties, and then deserting in order to "enlist" again, usually under a different name. Desertion, whatever its cause, sapped military morale and endangered the war effort. Seeking to combat it, military leaders urged that deserters be tried and publicly executed, as a warning to others.[116]

Let this man take the oath of Dec. 8.
and be discharged.

A. Lincoln

March 16, 1864.

To Secretary of Navy.

A FAVOR FOR ZACHARIE, MARCH 16, 1864

Zacharie's nephew J. G. Cohen, a rebel accused of blockade-running, would owe much to his uncle's friendship with Lincoln, beginning with this note, written on the back of Cohen's impassioned plea for help from his uncle, forgiving his allegiance to the Confederate army. "Let this man take the oath of Dec 8 and be discharged," a common and required oath of loyalty to the Union.

U.S. National Archives & Records Administration

EDWARD SELIG SALOMON

Colonel Edward Selig Salomon was a German-Jewish immigrant who enlisted in the 24th Illinois as a first lieutenant. A hero of Gettysburg and Atlanta, he won quick promotions for battlefield bravery and rose to command the 82nd Illinois, Hecker's German and Jewish regiment organized in Chicago. Later brevetted a brigadier general, he remained active in veterans' affairs for the rest of his life.

Collection of Robert Marcus

SALOMON'S PISTOLS

Popular with those above and those below, Edward Salomon gravitated after the war to politics, first becoming the clerk of Cook County, Illinois, a role in which he was celebrated and honored by the local citizens with the presentation of these dueling pistols.

Shapell Manuscript Collection

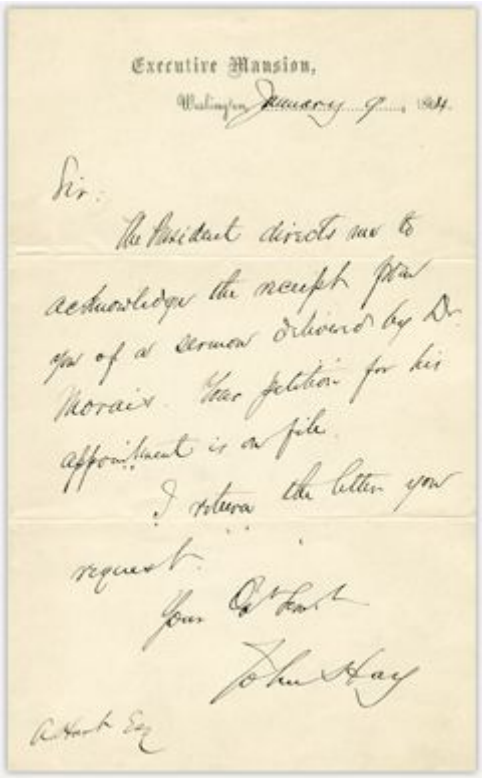
Abraham Lincoln preferred to be merciful when it came to deserters. "When I think," he once explained to Congressman Henry L. Dawes, "of these mere lads, who had never before left their homes, enlisting in the enthusiasm of the moment for a war of which they had no conception and then in the camp or on the battle field a thousand miles from home, longing for its rest and safety, I have so much sympathy for him that I cannot condemn him to die for forgetting the obligations of the soldier in the longing for home life. There is death and woe enough in this war without such a sacrifice."[117] Lincoln therefore spared the lives of many condemned soldiers, especially if they were willing to reenlist and fight.

The Jewish lawyer Simon Wolf recounted the story of one such reprieve in his memoirs. Wolf, accompanied by Republican Thomas Corwin, a former Ohio senator who was a lawyer in Washington at the time, came to the White House at 2:00 A.M. to plead for the life of a condemned Jewish soldier. The soldier had deserted his unit allegedly in order to be with his mother, "who was on her death bed." She had begged to see him so as to "give him a parting blessing." Lincoln, Wolf recalled, listened sympathetically but explained that he was under pressure from Secretary of War Stanton to crack down on military deserters and that it was "impossible to do anything." Wolf nevertheless made a final plea: "Mr. President," he entreated, "what would you have done under similar circumstances? If your dying mother had summoned you to her bedside to receive her last message before her soul would be summoned to its Maker, would you have been a deserter to her who gave you birth rather than a deserter in law but not in fact to the flag to which you had sworn allegiance?" Lincoln, perhaps recalling being summoned to the bedside of his own dying mother when he was just nine years old, was clearly moved. He "ordered a telegram to be sent to stop the execution." The reprieved soldier, according to Wolf, returned to his regiment and died heroically at the Battle of Cold Harbor.[118]

SABATO MORAIS

The Italian-American rabbi Sabato Morais, passionately antislavery and pro-Lincoln, preached on Lincoln's, and the nation's, suffering.

Courtesy of the Library at the Herbert D. Katz Center for Advanced Judaic Studies, University of Pennsylvania



Executive Mansion,

Washington January 9, 1864.

Sir:

The President directs me to acknowledge the receipt from you of a sermon delivered by Dr. Morais. Your petition for his appointment is on file.

I return the letter you request.

Your Obt Servt

John Hay

A. Hart Esq

JOHN HAY TO ABRAHAM HART, JANUARY 9, 1864

Lincoln's secretary, John Hay, thanks Abraham Hart, the president of Mikveh Israel synagogue, for sending Lincoln a Thanksgiving sermon by Dr. Sabato Morais. The letter was written six weeks after the Gettysburg Address, in which Lincoln's indelible line of "four score and seven years ago" might have been directly borrowed from Morais's July 4 sermon, given earlier that year.

Shapell Manuscript Collection

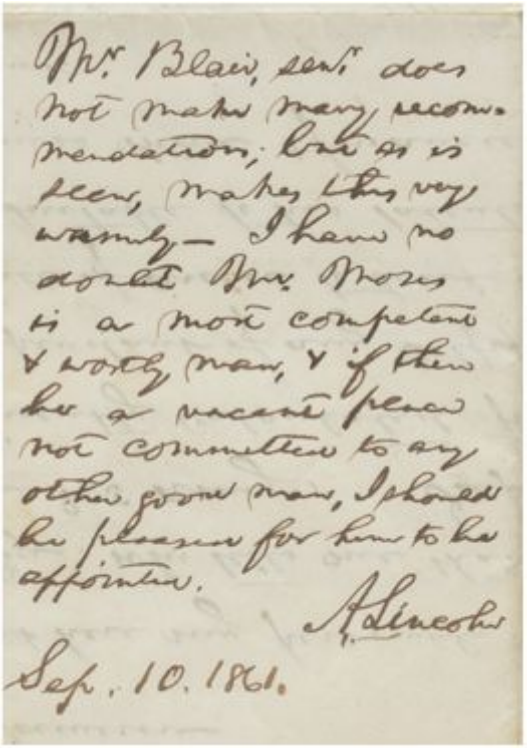
JEWISH SOLDIERS SERVING LINCOLN: A SAMPLING

THE WAR PROVIDED one of the most central and crucial meeting points for Lincoln to interact with Jews and they with him: over 7,000 Jewish men served Lincoln in the Union army. The broader documentation of Lincoln's involvement with Jewish soldiers is the evidence of this meeting point of the thousands of Jews who faithfully served Lincoln and the Union cause. Jewish patriotism was a product of a number of instrumental factors, namely: high rates of Jewish immigration to the U.S. in the late 1850s, the strong desire of Jews to integrate into American society, of Jews identifying with the values Lincoln was embodying in fighting the war, and a sense that Lincoln was welcoming them into his army.

The Shapell Roster of Jews in the Service of the Union and Confederate Armies and Navies During the American Civil War period of 1861–1865 is based on a parallel section in Simon Wolf's, The American Jew as Soldier, Patriot and Citizen, and provides remarkable evidence of Jewish patriotism—on both the Union and Confederate sides. With military records now consolidated and placed under the control of the U.S. National Archives and Records Administration, the Shapell Manuscript Foundation was able to expand and correct the Wolf study by about 1,500 Jewish names, while also eliminating numerous duplicate entries.

BREVET LIEUTENANT ISAAC MOSES OF NEW YORK

Collection of Robert Marcus



Mr. Blair, sen. does not make many recommendations, but as is seen, makes this very warmly— I have no doubt Mr. Moses is a most competent & worthy man, & if there be a vacant place not committed to any other good man, I should be pleased for him to be appointed.

A. Lincoln

Sep. 10. 1861.

LINCOLN RECOMMENDS ISAAC MOSES: "I HAVE NO DOUBT MR. MOSES IS A MOST COMPETENT & WORTHY MAN," SEPTEMBER 10, 1861

Courtesy of the Library of Congress

BADGE OF BREVET CAPTAIN AARON LAZARUS OF PENNSYLVANIA

Shapell Manuscript Collection

SERGEANT LEOPOLD KARPELES OF PENNSYLVANIA, WINNER OF THE MEDAL OF HONOR

Collection of Robert Marcus

BREVET BRIGADIER GENERAL FREDERICK KNEFLER OF INDIANA, CONSIDERED THE HIGHEST RANKING JEW IN LINCOLN'S ARMY

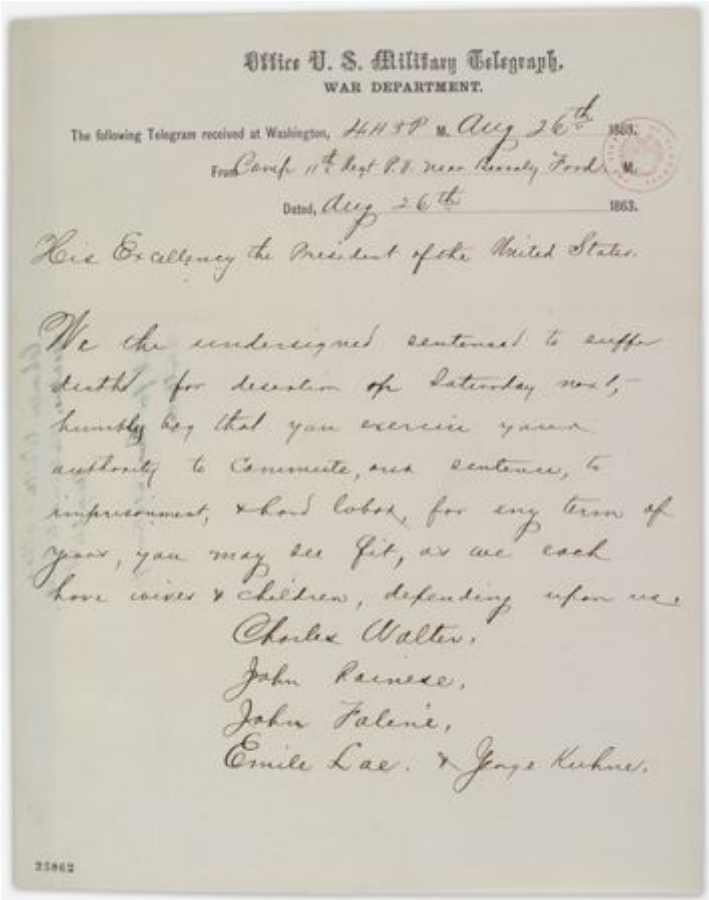
Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center of the American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio

COLONEL MARCUS M. SPIEGEL OF OHIO WAS MORTALLY WOUNDED DURING THE RED RIVER CAMPAIGN

Collection of Jean Powers Soman

LEOPOLD NEWMAN OF NEW YORK, WAS WOUNDED AT THE BATTLE OF CHANCELLORSVILLE, AND REPORTEDLY RECEIVED THE COMMISSION OF BRIGADIER GENERAL WHILE ON HIS DEATHBED–FROM LINCOLN HIMSELF

Collection of Robert Marcus



Office U. S. Military Telegraph.
WAR DEPARTMENT.

The following Telegram received at Washington, 4H 8P M. Aug 26th 1863.
From Camp 11th Regt P.V. near Beverly Ford Va.
Dated, Aug 26th 1863.

His Excellency the President of the United States.

We the undersigned sentenced to suffer death, for desertion on Saturday next, humbly beg that you exercise your authority to Commute our sentence, to imprisonment & hard labor for any term of years, you may see fit, as we each have wives & children, depending upon us.

Charles Walter,
John Rainese,
John Faline,
Emile Lae. & Jaye Kuhne.

25862

WALTER, RAINESE, FALINE, LAE, AND KUHNE TO LINCOLN: "HUMBLY BEG," AUGUST 26, 1863

The five condemned men appeal to Lincoln for clemency in a telegram dated August 26, 1863.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

Stories like that of Wolf circulated widely during Lincoln's presidency. In addition to all of his other duties, Lincoln became the "pardoner-in-chief," extending clemency to hundreds of prisoners convicted by civil courts and hundreds more convicted by military ones. Where judges and generals called for justice, he often responded with mercy.[119]

But the case of the five men sentenced to die at Beverly Ford proved different. They were charged with being "bounty jumpers," for they had enlisted and been paid to serve as substitutes for conscripted men, in exchange for payments of hundreds of dollars, and then deserted. Unlike most deserters, in this case, prosecutors claimed, it was greed—not fear—that drove them to run away. The five had signed up with the 118th Pennsylvania and were caught and arrested on August 13, 1863. Seven days later, they were court-martialed and sentenced to die by firing squad. On August 25, the men pleaded with General Meade to defer their sentence, since there were neither priests nor rabbis available to help them "in preparing to meet our God." They sought mercy on behalf of their wives and children and asked that their sentences be commuted "to hard labor instead of death, as we think we have been wrongfully sentenced; as we, being foreigners, were led astray by other soldiers, who promised us there would be no harm done."[120] Meade was unmoved. He was determined, he wrote Lincoln, to execute the men to "deter others from imitating their bad conduct."[121]

Washington, D. C. August 27 1863

Major General Meade
Warrenton Va

Walter, Rainear, Fahn, Lee, & Kuhn appeal to me for mercy, without giving any reason for it whatever. I understand there are very flagrant cases, and that you deem their punishment as being indispensable to the service. If I am not mistaken in this, please let them know at once that their appeal is denied.

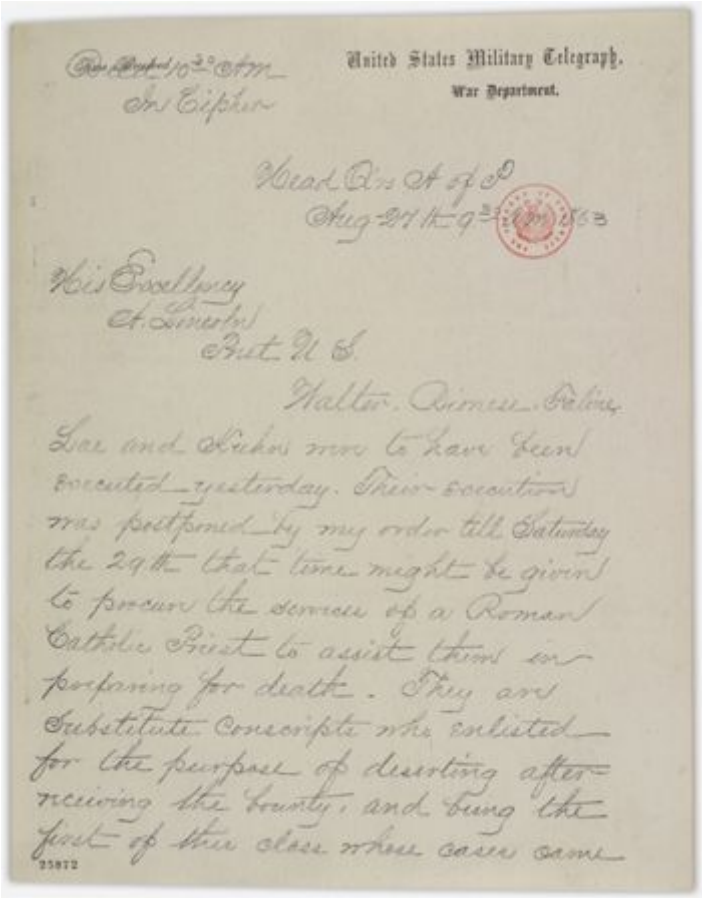
A. Lincoln

LINCOLN TO GEORGE MEADE: "THEIR APPEAL IS DENIED," AUGUST 27, 1863

At 9:00 A.M., Lincoln responds to the appeal of the soldiers condemned to death by allowing General George Meade, in the face of these "flagrant cases," to proceed as he deems fit.
Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library & Museum



United States Military Telegraph.
War Department.

In Cipher

Head Qrs A of P
Aug 27 1863

His Excellency
A. Lincoln
Pres U S

Walter Reinee Relay

Lee and Kirkham were to have been executed yesterday. Their execution was postponed by my order till Saturday the 29th that time might be given to procure the services of a Roman Catholic Priest to assist them in preparing for death. They are Substitute Conscripts who enlisted for the purpose of deserting after receiving the bounty, and being the first of this class whose cases came

25872

GEORGE MEADE TO LINCOLN, AUGUST 27, 1863

General Meade confirmed Lincoln's telegram of a half hour earlier, and added that he had postponed the execution in order to procure the services of a Roman Catholic priest; curiously, Meade made no mention to Lincoln of the need for a rabbi.

Courtesy of the Library of Congress

BENJAMIN SZOLD

The Hungarian-born rabbi Benjamin Szold of Baltimore lobbied Lincoln to commute the death sentence of a Jewish bounty jumper. Still leaving the door open, the final decision, the president insisted, had in this case to be made by General Meade—and he wished him success on his mission. It is likely that only with Rabbi Szold's visit did Lincoln come to know that one of the deserters was Jewish.
Jewish Museum of Maryland

The following day, August 26, the condemned men sent a telegram to Lincoln, likewise requesting commutation of their sentences to "imprisonment & hard labor, for any term of years."[122] Unaccountably, they failed to repeat to the president the reason why they felt, as foreigners, that they had been wrongfully sentenced, likely sealing their fate. Since they appealed for mercy "without giving any ground for it whatever," Lincoln turned them down at 9:00 a.m. the next day: "I understand these are very flagrant cases," he informed Meade in a telegram, "and that you deem their punishment as being indispensable to the service. If I am not mistaken in this, please let them know at once that their appeal is denied."[123]

Meade responded at once: The "execution was postponed by my order till Saturday the 29th that time might be given to procure the services of a Roman Catholic Priest to assist them in preparing for death. They are substitute conscripts who enlisted for the purpose of deserting after receiving the bounty, and being the first of this class whose cases came before me, I believed that humanity the safety of this Army, and the most vital interests of the Country, required their prompt execution as an example.… In view of these circumstances I shall therefore inform them their appeal to you is denied."[124]

Father Constantine L. Egan, a Catholic chaplain, came to accompany the doomed Catholic men. Even though Meade's telegram to Lincoln made no mention of a rabbi, Baltimore's Rabbi Benjamin Szold was asked to accompany the condemned Jew, a twenty-two-year-old private named George Kuhne. Hoping to arrange clemency, Szold "hurried to the White House, hoping to have a personal interview with the President." Lincoln was closeted with his cabinet at the time, so the quick-thinking rabbi, perhaps believing that Kuhne deserted out of fear, marked in his Bible the verse in Deuteronomy that reads, "What man is there that is fearful and fainthearted? Let him go and return unto his house lest his brethren's heart faint as well as his heart (20:8)." It was delivered to the president with a short note. Before long, Lincoln emerged laughing heartily. "If I were to follow the instructions laid down here," he smiled, "I would not have a man in the field in a week's time." Lincoln sent Szold to talk to the general himself, who listened patiently but turned down the plea for clemency. Szold, disregarding Sabbath restrictions, then traveled to the condemned man, and the two recited Psalms and prayers. As the time neared, Szold "kissed the accused, who convulsively clung to him."[125]

HARPER'S WEEKLY

General Meade, who had sent out a press release ahead of the executions, was looking for wide coverage of the case, and he achieved it: all of the major Northern newspapers were on the scene. The image shows one of the men, likely Kuhne, having been the first to march out, still sitting up following the shots. Despite the executions, the rate of desertion only continued to rise, and the effort in deterrence was a failure.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

A solemn procession, accompanied by the military band playing the death march, paraded the condemned prisoners, "their coffins carried in front of them and their hands tied behind them," before the assembled 25,000 troops ordered to watch the grisly scene.

The Jewish prisoner, along with Rabbi Szold, occupied the right-most position and marched out first, for Judaism was recognized as being "the most ancient of religious creeds." Soldiers at the scene, as well as military and press accounts, highlighted the unusual presence of multiple religious leaders ("a Catholic priest, a Jewish Rabbi and a Methodist preacher") at the execution, evidence of how novel it was, at that time, to witness "the minister, the priest and the rabbi engaged in earnest, fervent prayer."[126] Each prisoner was then seated at the edge of his coffin with eyes bandaged. While the troops watched, fifty muskets simultaneously fired. The two Protestants, the two Catholics, and the Jew were shot to death. “It made me feel worse,” one soldier wrote two weeks later, “to see those five men shot that day than to see a thousand men shot down in battle.”[127] The eerie scene was concluded with the band playing “The Girl I Left Behind Me,” an enlivening military marching tune. The soldiers were then required to march “by the bodies to see that the work of the executioner had been effectually done.”[128]

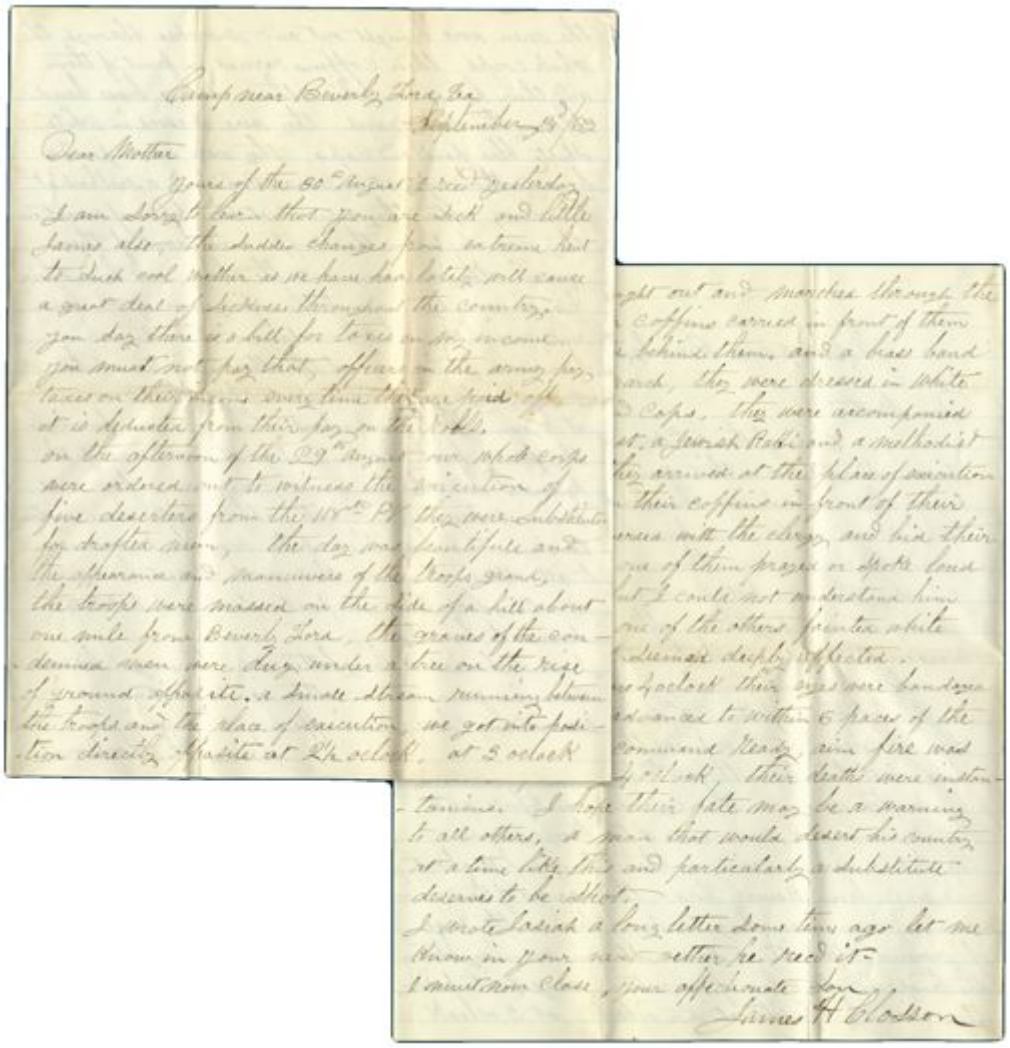
EDWIN FORBES DEPICTS THE LANDSCAPE OF THE EXECUTION

Forbes’s drawing of the execution of five deserters from the 118th PA Volunteers in Beverly Ford, Virginia, shows the grim scene witnessed by 25,000 soldiers.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

Whether justice was actually “effectively done” when the five unfortunate bounty jumpers were summarily tried and shot is doubtful.[129] Judging from the many subsequently published lists of “substitutes enlisted at headquarters … who have deserted,” the executions, for all of the publicity that they garnered, had far less of a deterrent effect than General Meade had hoped. What Meade did teach his troops at Beverly Ford was an enduring lesson in religious pluralism. Deserters, he showed, could be Protestant, Catholic, or Jewish, and however harshly they themselves might be punished, their faith and their clergy would still be accorded the greatest of respect.

"The troops were massed on the side of a hill about one mile from Beverly Ford, the graves of the condemned men were dug under a tree on the rise of ground opposite a small stream running between the troops and the place of execution…"



Camp near Beverly Ford Va
September 3 1863

Dear Mother

Yours of the 20th August I received yesterday I am sorry to learn that you are sick and little James also the sudden changes from extreme heat to such cool weather as we have had lately will cause a great deal of sickness throughout the country you say there is a bill for taxes to come in you must not pay that officers in the army pay taxes on their pay every time they are paid off it is deducted from their pay on the rolls.

On the afternoon of the 29th August two whole corps were ordered out to witness the execution of five deserters from the 11th PA they were substitutes for drafted men, the day was beautiful and the appearance and manoeuvres of the troops grand, the troops were massed on the side of a hill about one mile from Beverly Ford, the graves of the condemned men were dug under a tree on the rise of ground opposite a small stream running between the troops and the place of execution we got into position directly opposite at 2 o'clock, at 3 o'clock got out and marched through the whole corps, their coffins carried in front of them and their hands tied behind them, and a brass band playing the dead march, they were dressed in white shirts blue pants and caps, they were accompanied by a Catholic Priest, a Jewish Rabbi and a Methodist preacher, they arrived at the place of execution their coffins in front of their graves with the clergy and hid their prayers one of them prayed in quite loud but I could not understand him one of the others (a Yankee white) seemed deeply affected.

At 4 o'clock their eyes were bandaged and were to within 6 paces of the command ready, aim fire was given at 4 o'clock, their deaths were instantaneous. I hope their fate may be a warning to all others, a man that would desert his country at a time like this and particularly a substitute deserves to be shot.

I wrote Josiah a long letter some time ago let me know in your next letter he received it.

I must now close, your affectionate son
James H Closson

JAMES CLOSSEN TO HIS MOTHER: "ACCOMPANIED BY A CATHOLIC PRIEST, A JEWISH RABBI AND A METHODIST PREACHER," SEPTEMBER 3, 1863

Clossen, a soldier who witnessed the execution, described the scene with remarkable detail, which is echoed in the image by Edwin Forbes. He also described the interfaith service: "The men were brought out and marched through the whole corps, their coffins carried in front of them and their hands tied behind them, and a brass band playing the dead march, they were dressed in white shirts blue pants and caps, they were accompanied by a Catholic priest, a Jewish Rabbi and a Methodist preacher."

Shapell Manuscript Collection

LINCOLN AT GETTYSBURG, NOVEMBER 19, 1863

Photographer David Bachrach, a member of Baltimore's tightly knit German-Jewish community, was the only photographer to successfully set up the frame with the purpose of capturing Lincoln sitting on the dais just prior to or immediately after giving his famous remarks at the Gettysburg battlefield, November 19, 1863.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

CHAPTER SIX

ABOUT JEWS

1863–1865

Abraham Lincoln provided the model for the public display of religious pluralism that General George Meade staged at Beverly Ford. Having stated his own "regard for the Jews," and having promised that no citizen would "be wronged on account of his place of birth or religious confession,"[1] he continued to interact with a wide variety of Jews during the final eighteen months of his presidential term—evidence of their widening role in national life. At a time when it was commonplace in America to identify Jews as such when describing them, and Jews in many parts of the country experienced prejudice,[2] Lincoln turned a blind eye to stereotypes. So it was in November 1863, when Lincoln submitted to the secretary of war and general-in-chief of the army a recommendation that William Mayer, a Jewish immigrant from Austria, be elevated to the rank of brigadier general. Mayer was reputedly the "most efficient officer" engaged in quelling the notorious July 1863 antidraft riots in New York City. Coming just ten days after the battle of Gettysburg, the riots injured 2,000 people and killed at least 120. Considered one of the worst civil insurrections in American history, the riots began as an expression of discontent against those able to afford to pay others to substitute for them in the military and rapidly escalated into horrific attacks against the city's black residents. Many white Northerners were willing to fight to preserve the Union, but being compelled to fight—and die—in order to end slavery drove some to violence.

Mayer, in a bid to restore order, reportedly went without sleep or rest while he directed troops and was "constantly on duty both night and day." He courageously faced down mobs and was credited with leading children from the Colored Orphan Asylum onto a police boat, thereby saving their lives when the orphanage was torched. Lincoln, in the months that followed, wrote two separate notes recommending Mayer for promotion and another urging that he be permitted to raise troops and reenter the service after he was mustered out.

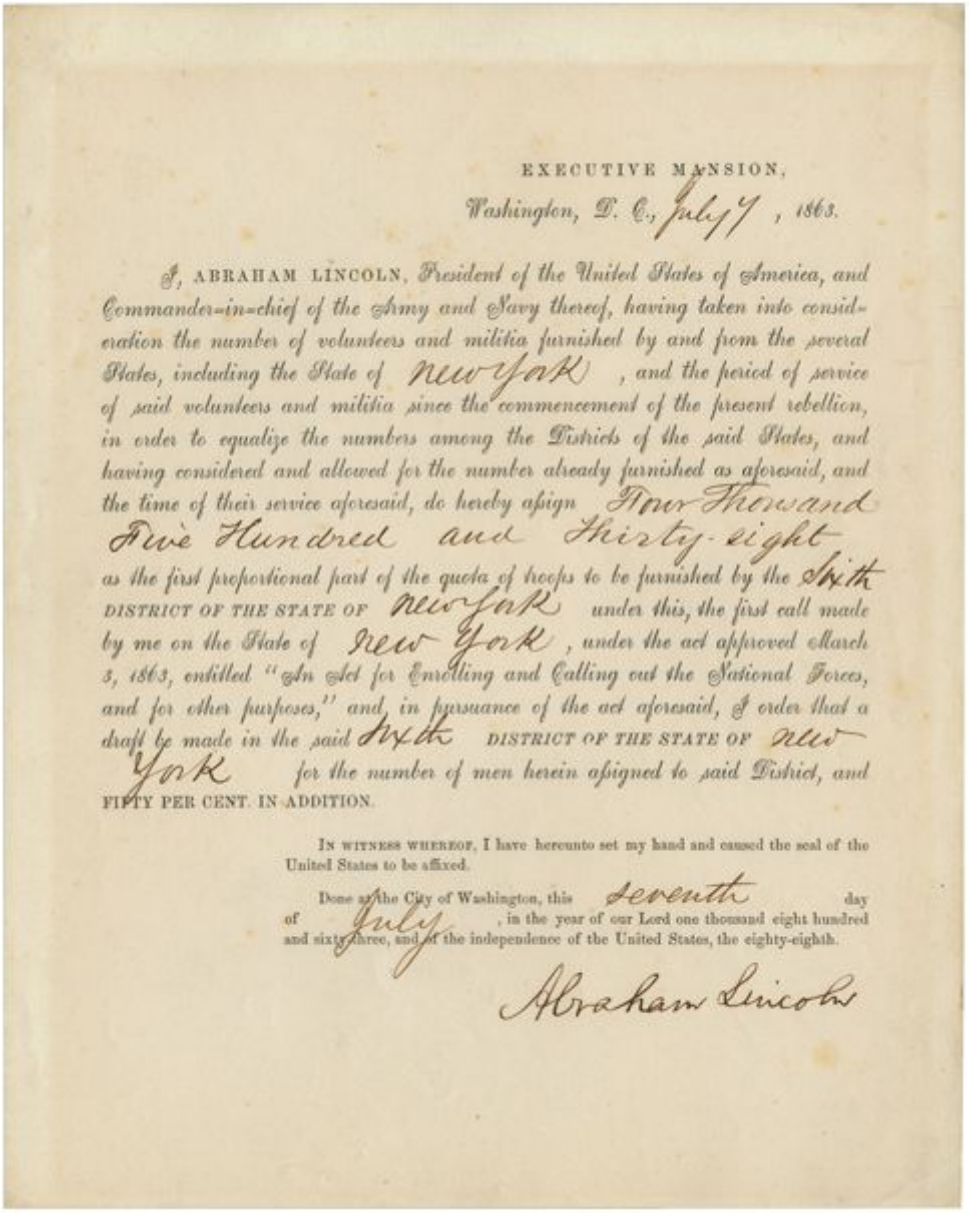
He made no mention of Mayer's religion in any of those letters.[3] Lincoln likewise refused to take religion into account when Jews were prosecuted by military authorities. On one notorious occasion, in 1864, a Jewish clothier in Washington, D.C., named Moses Waldauer was tried for "[s]elling citizens clothing to soldiers to enable them to desert." In trial, it transpired that Waldauer and his daughter had been tricked by the soldiers. Two of them falsely stated that they were awaiting discharge and needed the clothes, and a third fraudulently claimed to be a sergeant and vouched for the men. Waldauer eloquently defended himself before the court. He pointed to the "extraordinary precautions" he took to observe the law, listed a myriad of factual errors in the allegations made against him, and showed that his motive was not to assist desertion but rather to help soldiers who he thought required civilian clothes. Was he, he wondered, supposed to presume "every non-commissioned officer and soldier, however honorable his cause and profession, to be a liar and a scoundrel until he has proved himself otherwise?" Nevertheless, he was found guilty on September 15, 1864, and sentenced to six months in prison plus a fine of fifty dollars. Friends apparently appealed on his behalf, and Lincoln asked the judge advocate general for a report on the case. "This man is a Jew," Joseph Holt's reply began, as if intending to sway Lincoln against the defendant. However, even before Holt's reply was received, Waldauer had been released "by direction of the President."[4]



EXECUTIVE MANSION,

Washington, D. C., July 7, 1863.

I, ABRAHAM LINCOLN, President of the United States of America, and Commander-in-chief of the Army and Savy thereof, having taken into consideration the number of volunteers and militia furnished by and from the several States, including the State of New York, and the period of service of said volunteers and militia since the commencement of the present rebellion, in order to equalize the numbers among the Districts of the said States, and having considered and allowed for the number already furnished as aforesaid, and the time of their service aforesaid, do hereby asign Four Thousand Five Hundred and Thirty-eight as the first proportional part of the quota of troops to be furnished by the Sixth DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF New York under this, the first call made by me on the State of New York, under the act approved March 3, 1863, entitled "An Act for Enrolling and Calling out the National Forces, and for other purposes," and, in pursuance of the act aforesaid, I order that a draft be made in the said Sixth DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF New York for the number of men herein asigned to said District, and FIFTY PER CENT. IN ADDITION.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, this Seventh day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and of the independence of the United States, the eighty-eighth.

Abraham Lincoln

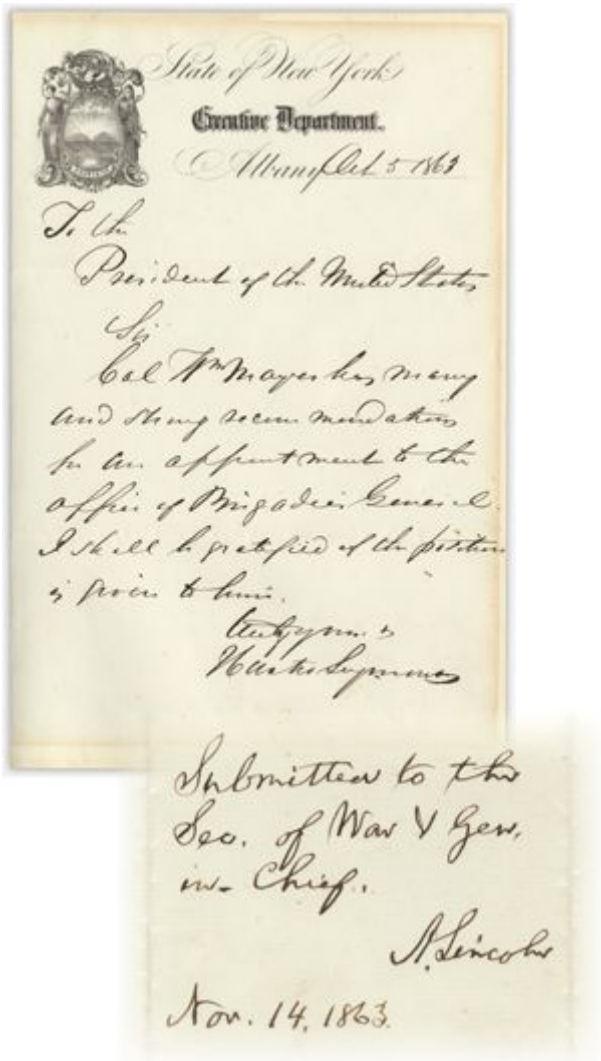
JULY 7, 1863

Lincoln's Order that sparked the New York City draft riots: it would, within a week, cause one of the largest civil insurrections in American history. The riots lasted three days, and calm was restored in large part by the intervention of troops bravely led by William Mayer.

Shapell Manuscript Collection

"MAYER'S COMPANY WAS FIRED ON FROM THE HOUSETOPS…"
AUGUST 1, 1863

Colonel William Mayer raised a regiment from New York during the Civil War. For heroic service in putting down the New York City draft riots in 1863, Mayer received praise from Lincoln: on August 28, 1863, Lincoln wrote that "Col. Wm. Mayer, named within, was the most efficient officer in suppressing the late New-York riots," and furthers his request to be made a brigadier general.
Harper's Weekly



State of New York
Executive Department.
Albany Feb 5 1863

To the President of the United States

Sir

Col Wm Mayer has many and strong recommendations for an appointment to the office of Brigadier General. I shall be gratified if the position is given to him.

Yours truly
Horatio Seymour

Submitted to the Sec. of War & Gen. in-Chief.

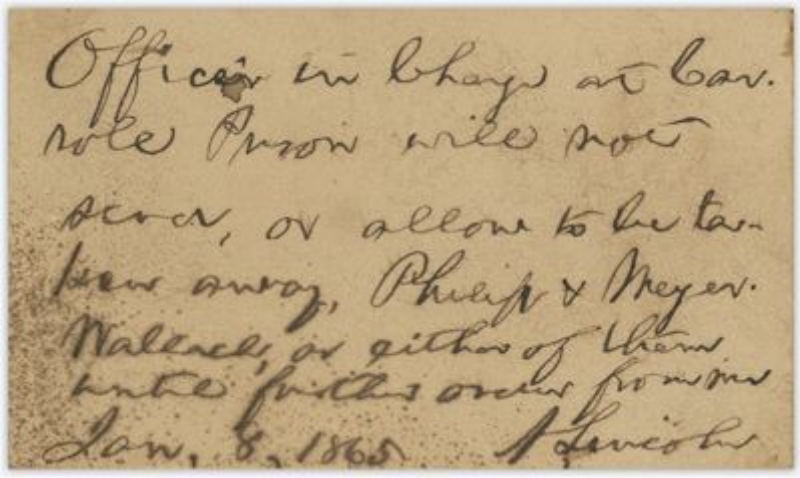
A. Lincoln

Nov. 14, 1863.

HORATIO SEYMOUR TO LINCOLN, OCTOBER 5, 1863, WITH LINCOLN'S ENDORSEMENT ON THE LETTER FIVE WEEKS LATER

Four days before traveling to Gettysburg, Lincoln considers the petition of New York Governor Horatio Seymour for the promotion of Austrian-born Jewish colonel William Mayer to brigadier general—even though Mayer, who immigrated in 1857, would become a U.S. citizen only in June 1864. Nevertheless, he received his commission to brigadier general. Lincoln also wrote a longer letter on Executive Mansion stationery to Stanton again that day about Mayer's desire to raise troops—a request that was granted.

Shapell Manuscript Collection



Officers in charge of Gov.
Sole Prison will not detain, or allow to be tak-en away, Philip & Meyer.
Wallach, or either of them until further order from me
Jan. 8, 1865. A. Lincoln

LINCOLN PERSONALLY INTERVENES IN THE CASE OF TWO JEWISH MERCHANTS, JANUARY 8, 1865

Lincoln interjected himself into the case of Philip and Meyer Wallach, two Jewish merchants charged with selling goods to blockaders. First, on January 8, 1865, Lincoln, acting with concern and unusual caution, instructs that they were not to be sent for or be moved "until further order from me"; four days later, he directs that their case be reviewed, and finally, on February 17, he orders that they be given a "jubilee" and released.

Shapell Manuscript Collection

Judge Advocate Gen. will please examine & report in this case.
NN 3032 A. Lincoln
Jan. 12, 1865.

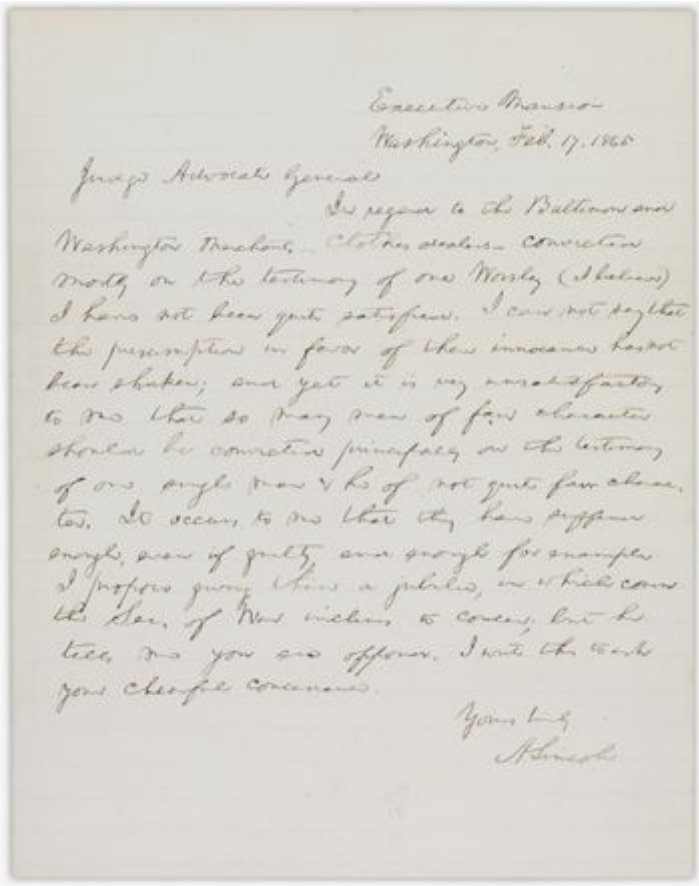
JANUARY 12, 1865

Lincoln endorses the Wallach brothers' court-martial transcript.

U.S. National Archives & Records Administration

In another case involving Jewish clothiers, Lincoln likewise proved sympathetic. On January 8, 1865, he ordered the officer in charge of the Old Capitol (Carroll) Prison not to "send or allow to be taken away Philip and Meyer Wallach, or either of them, until further orders from me." The two Jewish merchants had been convicted for selling contraband goods to the Confederacy and sentenced to a fine plus three years in jail in Albany. The case was one of several, following a sweep of clothing manufacturers in Baltimore and Washington, instigated by a blockade runner and double agent named Pardon Worsley, who claimed that the defendants, many of them Jews, knowingly sold him goods destined for the enemy. Petitions flooded into the Executive Mansion, attesting to the loyalty and patriotism of the men, including a request for clemency from the brothers' relative and mayor of Washington, D.C., Richard Wallach. Lincoln, after ordering an investigation, expressed doubt as to their guilt. "In regard to the Baltimore and Washington Merchants—clothes dealers—convicted mostly on the testimony of one Worsley (I believe) I have not been quite satisfied," he wrote. "It is very unsatisfactory to me that so many men of fair character should be convicted principally on the testimony of one single man & he of not quite fair character." Lincoln therefore proposed "giving them a jubilee," using a biblical term for their release, and that was accomplished on February 18, "by order of the President of the United States."[5]

"I propose giving them a jubilee."



Executive Mansion
Washington, Feb. 17, 1865

Judge Advocate General

In regard to the Baltimore and Washington Marshal, ... Clothes stealing conviction mostly on the testimony of one Worly (I believe) I have not been quite satisfied. I can not say that the presumption in favor of the innocence has not been shaken, and yet it is very unsatisfactory to me that so many men of fair character should be convicted principally on the testimony of one single man who is of not quite fair character. It seems to me that they have suffered enough, even if guilty, and enough for example. I propose giving them a pardon, in which case the Sec. of War wishes to concur, but he tells me you are opposed. I write that I may hear your change concerning.

Yours truly
A. Lincoln

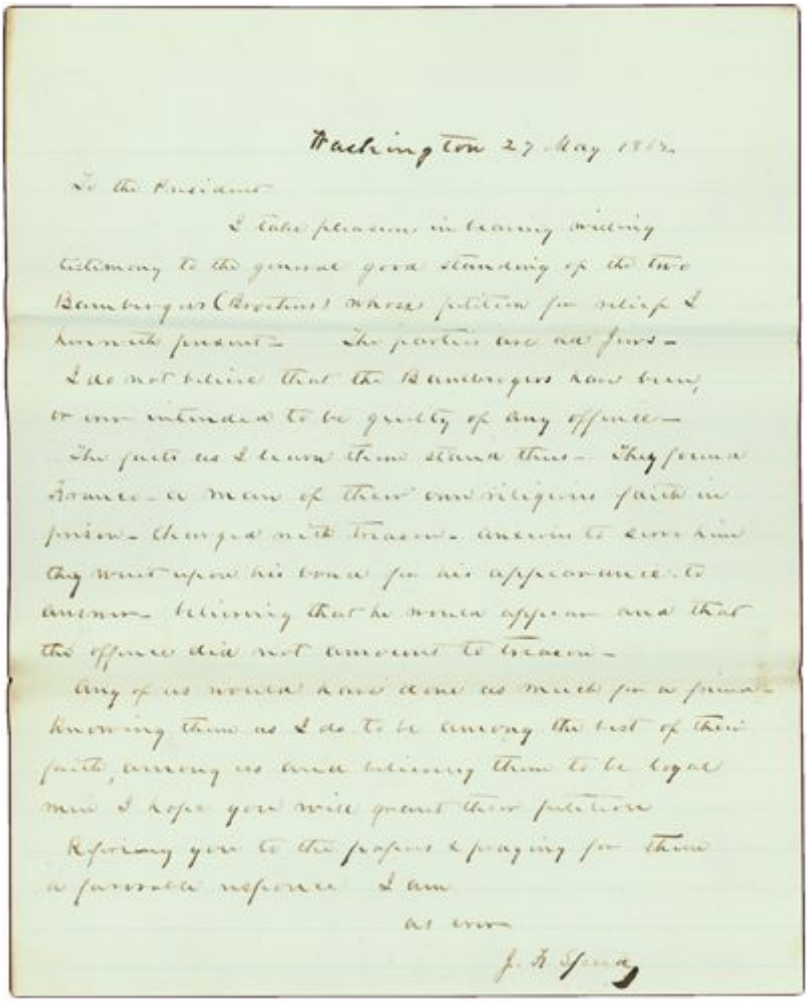
LINCOLN TO JOSEPH HOLT, FEBRUARY 17, 1865

Lincoln frees the Wallachs.
Huntington Museum

In still a third case, Lincoln admitted that an injustice had been done to a Jewish justice of the peace named Nehemiah H. Miller. Rather than covering up the mistake, he immediately moved to restore Miller's reputation and position. Born in Frankfurt, Germany, in 1832, Miller had arrived in the United States about 1857, studied law, and won appointment, on January 12, 1864, as justice of the peace for Washington, D.C.[6] Ten months later, he was removed from office for malfeasance in "exercising extra-judicial authority" and falsely stating that two Egyptian nationals had lived in the country for two years, entitling them to a passport, when in fact they had lived in the country for but two months.[7] Subsequent to Miller's removal, a witness provided an affidavit that, according to the same judges who had earlier removed him, went "very far to relieve Miller of any intentional misbehavior in the matter." The judges informed the president that "had that evidence been before us on the trial, and not contradicted, our decision would have been different." In the face of this evidence of injustice, Lincoln reacted unhesitatingly. "Let him be reappointed," he wrote, and he was.[8]

PARDONING JEWS: TWO INTERESTING CASES

"The parties are all Jews … knowing them as I do to be among the best of their faith … I hope you will grant their petition."



Washington 27 May 1862

To the President

I take pleasure in bearing written testimony to the general good standing of the two Bamberger's (Brothers) whose petition for relief I herewith present — The parties are all Jews — I do not believe that the Bambergers have been or are intended to be guilty of any offence — The facts as I know them about this — They formerly Jewelers — a firm of their own religious faith in prison — charged with treason — Anxious to know why they were upon his bond for his appearance to answer — believing that he would appear and that the offence did not amount to treason —

Any of us would have done as much for a friend knowing them as I do to be among the best of their faith, knowing them to be loyal men I hope you will grant their petition

Referring you to the petition & praying for them a favorable response I am

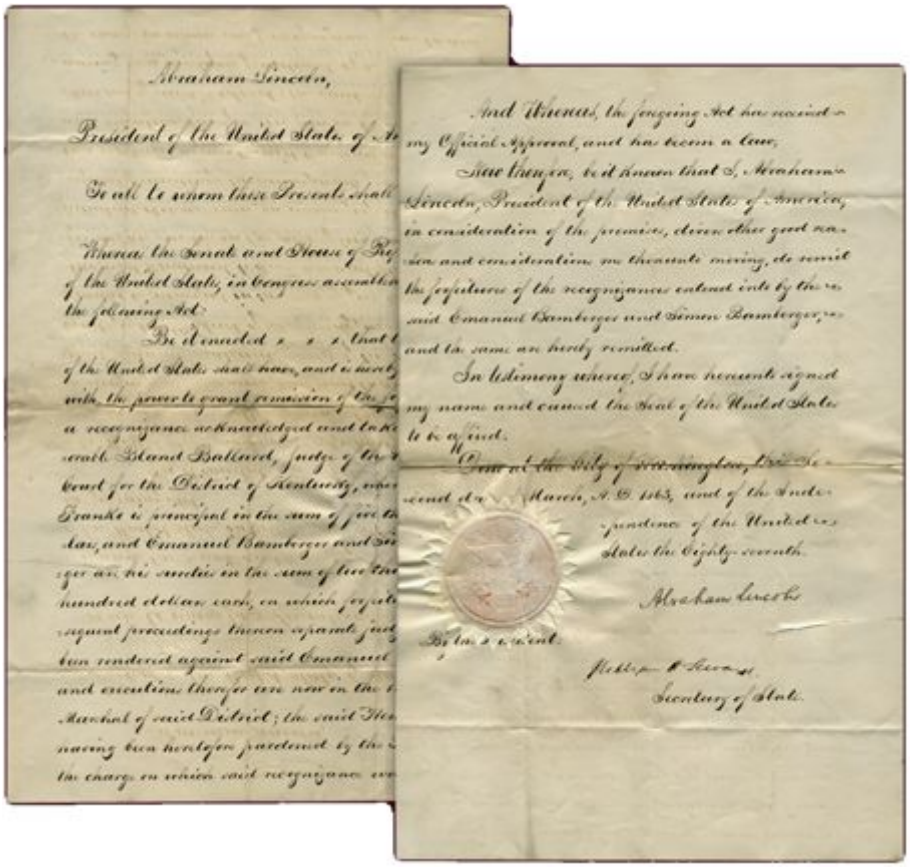
As ever

J. F. Speed

JOSHUA SPEED TO LINCOLN, MAY 27, 1862

Lincoln's close friend Joshua Speed successfully petitioned him to address an unfair judgment against Simon and Emanuel Bamberger; they had posted a $5,000 bond on a co-religionist from New Orleans, Herman Franks, and, when Franks failed to show up, what should have been a simple "case dismissed" resulted in their bond being forfeited. "The parties are all Jews," Speed wrote to Lincoln. "Knowing them as I do to be among the best of their faith … believing them to be loyal men I hope you will grant their petition." Lincoln supported Speed's petition, and the men were eventually pardoned in March 1863.

U.S. National Archives & Records Administration



Abraham Lincoln,

President of the United States of A

To all to whom these Presents shall

Whereas the Senate and House of Re of the United States, in Congress assembled the following Act:

Be it enacted &c &c that t
of the United States shall have, and is hereby with the power to grant remission of the a recognizance acknowledged and take said Bland Ballard, judge of the Court for the District of Kentucky, upo
Franks is principal in the sum of five th dar, and Emanuel Bamberger and Si ger are his sureties in the sum of five thou hundred dollars each, on which record sequent proceedings thereon a grant, just tion rendered against said Emanuel and executions thereon are now in the Marshal of said District; the said Ma having been heretofore pardoned by the the charge on which said recognizance w

And Whereas, the foregoing Act has received my Official Approval, and has become a law,

Now Therefore, be it known that I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States of America, in consideration of the premises, divers other good reasons and considerations me thereunto moving, do remit the forfeiture of the recognizance entered into by the s said Emanuel Bamberger and Simon Bamberger, &c and the same are hereby remitted.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto signed my name and caused the Seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, Dis second day March, A.D. 1863, and of the Independence of the United States the Eighty-seventh.

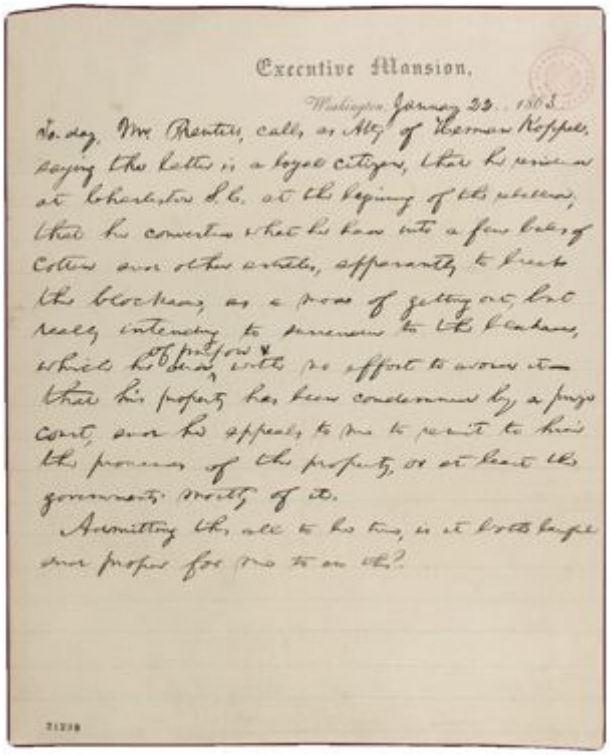
Abraham Lincoln

By the President:

William H Seward
Secretary of State.

LINCOLN SIGNS THE PARDON OF EMANUEL AND SIMON BAMBERGER

U.S. National Archives & Records Administration



Executive Mansion,

Washington, January 22, 1863.

To-day, Wm Reuter, call, as Atty of Herman Kopfel, saying the latter is a loyal citizen, that he resides at Charleston S.C. at the beginning of the rebellion, that he converted what he now owns into a few bales of cotton and other articles, apparently to break the blockade, as a means of getting out, but really intending to remain in the Union, which he has done with no effort to assist that his property has been condemned by a prize court, and he appeals, to me to permit to him the possession of the property, or at least the government moiety of it.

Admitting the all to be true, is it both legal and proper for me to act in it?

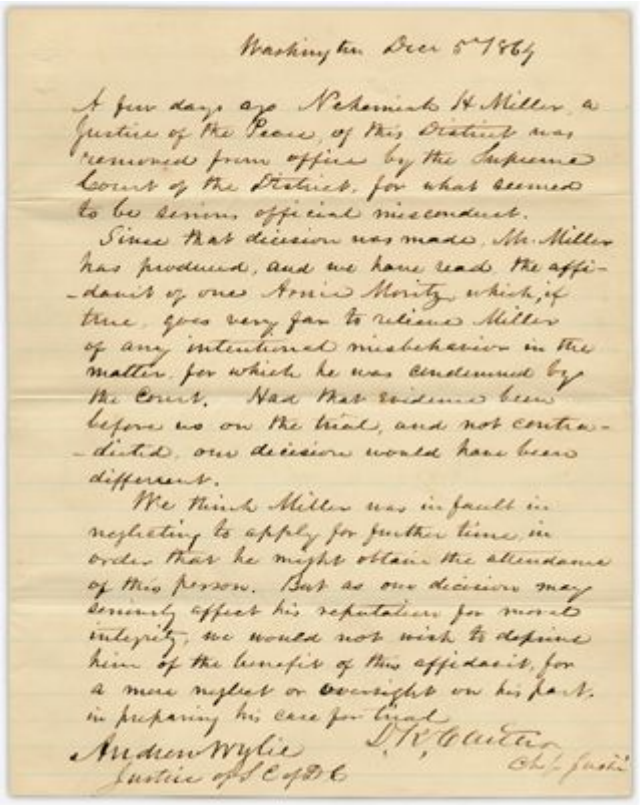
71238

ANOTHER PARDON, JANUARY 22, 1863

Herman Koppel, a tailor hailing from the heart of the Jewish community in Charleston, supplied "cheap, excellent and serviceable" fatigue uniforms to Confederate units. Lincoln wrote a memorandum concerning Koppel, who had appealed to the president to remit proceeds of property condemned by the court. Lincoln reviewed the facts, which included blockade running as a method of Koppel's escape, and asked, "Admitting this all to be true, is it both lawful and proper…?"
Courtesy of Library of Congress



Washington Dec 5th 1864

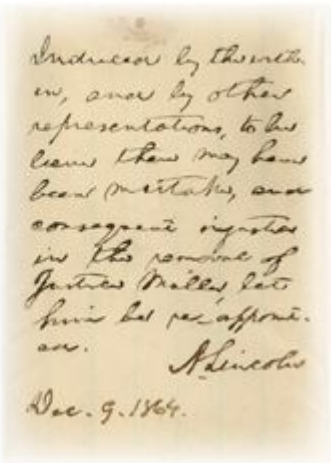
A few days ago Nehemiah H. Miller a Justice of the Peace, of this District was removed from office by the Supreme Court of the District, for what seemed to be serious official misconduct.

Since that decision was made, Mr. Miller has produced, and we have read the affidavit of one Annie Moritz, which, if true, goes very far to relieve Miller of any intentional misbehavior in the matter, for which he was condemned by the Court. Had that evidence been before us on the trial, and not contradicted, our decision would have been different.

We think Miller was in fault in neglecting to apply for further time, in order that he might obtain the attendance of this person. But as our decision may seriously affect his reputation for moral integrity, we would not wish to deprive him of the benefit of this affidavit, for a mere neglect or oversight on his part in preparing his case for trial.

Andrew Wylie
Justice of the Supreme Court

D. K. Cartter
Chief Justice



Induced by the circumstances, and by other representations, to believe there may have been a mistake, and consequent injustice in the removal of Justice Miller, let him be reappointed.

A. Lincoln

Dec. 9. 1864.

DAVID K. CARTTER AND ANDREW WYLIE TO LINCOLN, DECEMBER 5, 1864, WITH LINCOLN'S ENDORSEMENT OF DECEMBER 9, 1864

Lincoln, writing to Attorney General (and brother of Joshua) James Speed, endorses the reappointment of German-born Miller, whom Lincoln twice appointed a justice of the peace in Washington, D.C. Miller would, on the night of April 14, 1865, be the first justice of the peace to take sworn statements from witnesses to Lincoln's murder.
U.S. National Archives & Records Administration

Not all Jews, of course, proved so fortunate. A Jewish businessman named David Hirsch, for example, complained to Lincoln in late 1863 that General Stephen A. Hurlbut, the military governor of Memphis, had unjustly fined and expelled him from the city. While he had left the army of the Confederacy, Hirsch explained, he had nonetheless taken an oath to not take up arms against it, and he therefore felt compelled to refuse Hurlbut's demand that he enroll in the local Union militia. The punishment he incurred for not violating his oath—a $500 fine (equivalent to over $7,000 in today's money) and expulsion from the city—seemed to him cruel and unjust. In fact, Hirsch was one of a series of Memphis Jews whom Hurlbut abused and persecuted; the general is remembered for being corrupt, arbitrary, and anti-Semitic. Hirsch hoped that Lincoln would restore both his money and his status. He had "not come to ask for favors," he wrote when he asked for an appointment with the president, "but merely for an act of justice, sincerely hoping to find it here." He left disappointed, however, for the secretary of war ultimately ruled against him.[9]

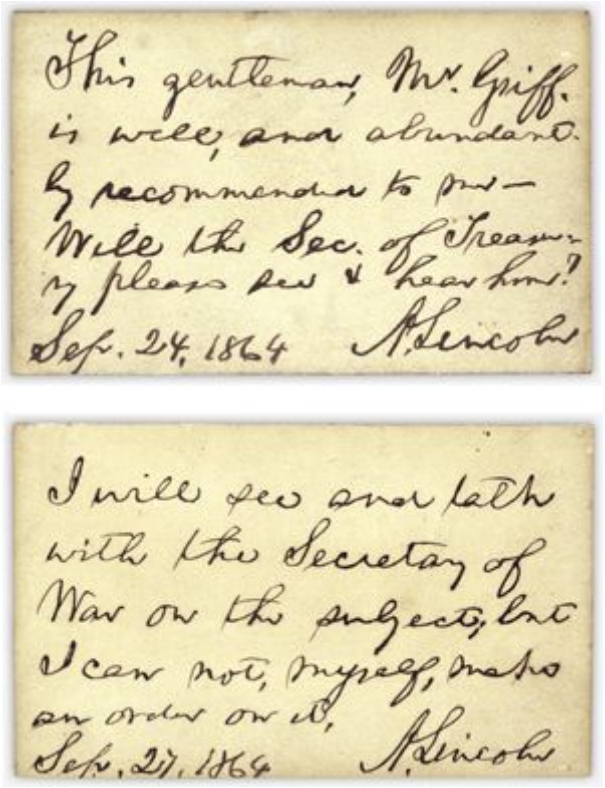
Other Jews who asked for personal favors fared better. A Republican Jewish businessman from Louisville, Kentucky, named Sigmund Griff came to see Lincoln in September 1864 "for the purpose of obtaining some trade facilities." Since he carried strong recommendations from people Lincoln trusted, he was rewarded with three different presidential notes, all written within two days of each other, one asking the secretary of the Treasury to "please see and hear him," one asking the same of the secretary of war, and a third promising to "see and talk with the Secretary of War on the subject." The records have not preserved what "trade facilities" came under discussion, but Griff clearly had the satisfaction of knowing that his proposal was taken seriously.[10]

That same month, Lincoln asked Gideon Welles, secretary of the navy, to accommodate a request made by Jewish congressman Leonard Myers, who represented Philadelphia during the war, to appoint one of his constituents to the "Naval School," then temporarily housed at Fort Adams, in Newport, Rhode Island. "I really wish this done," Lincoln reiterated.[11] Five months later, Lincoln again obliged Congressman Myers, this time in pardoning a bounty jumper, "because Mr. Myers requests it."[12] Myers was part of the first generation of American Jews to serve in Congress, being one of three Jews to serve during Lincoln's presidency, the others being Michael Hahn as a representative from Louisiana, and Myer Strouse, likewise of Pennsylvania. All three men were remembered as Jews but did not identify with the Jewish community. Myers, who possessed a profound sense of civic duty, was dedicated to protecting the rights of immigrants, laborers, inventors, soldiers, sailors, and former slaves and corresponded with Lincoln over at least three years, with Lincoln consistently supporting his appeals.



"PLEASE SEE & HEAR HIM"

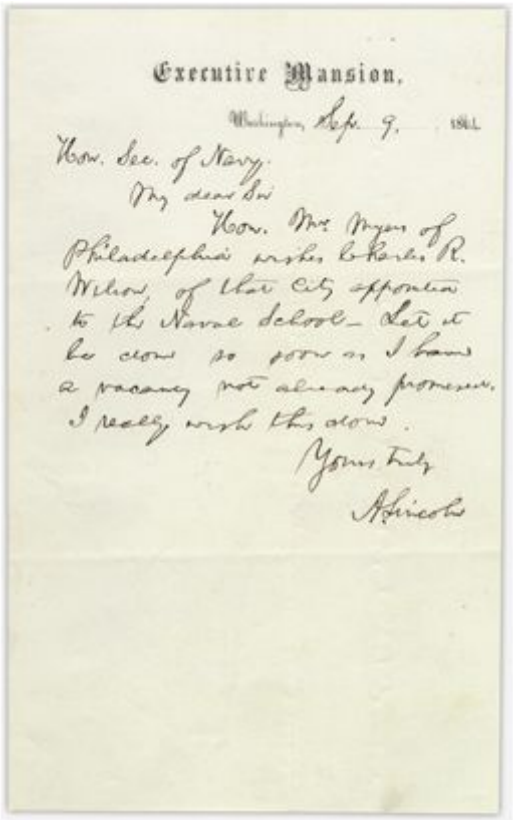
The German-born Jew Sigmund Griff left the Democratic Party because of Stephen A. Douglas's position on the extension of slavery. He became a staunch Lincoln supporter in 1860. As a clothing manufacturer in Louisville, Kentucky, he came so highly recommended to Lincoln that Lincoln wrote three notes, within two days in 1864, to secure him a favor.
Courtesy of David Benjamin Family Collection

In December, Lincoln presented a note to Joseph Stiner, then a captain in the Union army and later a lawyer, politician, judge, member of the Grand Army of the Republic, and a founder of the Hebrew Union Veterans Association, introducing him to Secretary of the Treasury William P. Fessenden. "Please see and hear this gentleman," the president wrote. What Stiner said to Fessenden has been lost, but Stiner did carefully preserve the card, writing on the reverse, "given to me personally by President A. Lincoln, December 2, 1864." The fact that the president of the United States personally took the time to handwrite a card recommending him to the Secretary of the Treasury clearly left a lasting impression. Stiner took pride in having been treated by Lincoln as an equal.[13]

LEONARD MYERS

Leonard Myers, the young congressman who represented Philadelphia during the Civil War and the early years of Reconstruction, was also a cousin of the American composer and virtuoso pianist Louis Moreau Gottschalk—who was a favorite of Lincoln's and performed for him many times.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

Indeed, it was these small courtesies extended to Jews that helped to cement Lincoln's reputation among them. In another such case, Mary Lincoln wrote to General Marsena R. Patrick, provost marshal for the Army of the Potomac, seeking a favor for "Herman Grau, from whose family," she wrote, "I have received much politeness."[14] Herman, along with his brother Jacob, his nephew Maurice, and other members of the distinguished Grau family, pioneered musical theater and grand opera in the United States. They acted as agents, managers, promoters, theater directors, and troupe organizers for a wide array of celebrated performers and performances of opera and popular music that were presented throughout the country. In Washington, they often invited the Lincolns as their guests. Lincoln, under their tutelage, was said to have become "a devotee of Italian Opera."[15] Apparently, Herman Grau sought to open a stage at City Point (now Hopewell) in Central Virginia, where General Ulysses S. Grant had set up field headquarters during the long Petersburg Campaign and some 100,000 troops were encamped. This required General Patrick's permission, and Mary, who felt indebted to Grau and saw "no good reason to refuse this," asked for his "prompt consent."[16]



Executive Mansion,

Washington, Sept. 9, 1864

Hon. Sec. of Navy.

My dear Sir

Hon. Mr. Myers of Philadelphia wishes Edward R. Wilson, of that city appointed to the Naval school. Let it be done so soon as I have a vacancy not already promised. I really wish this done.

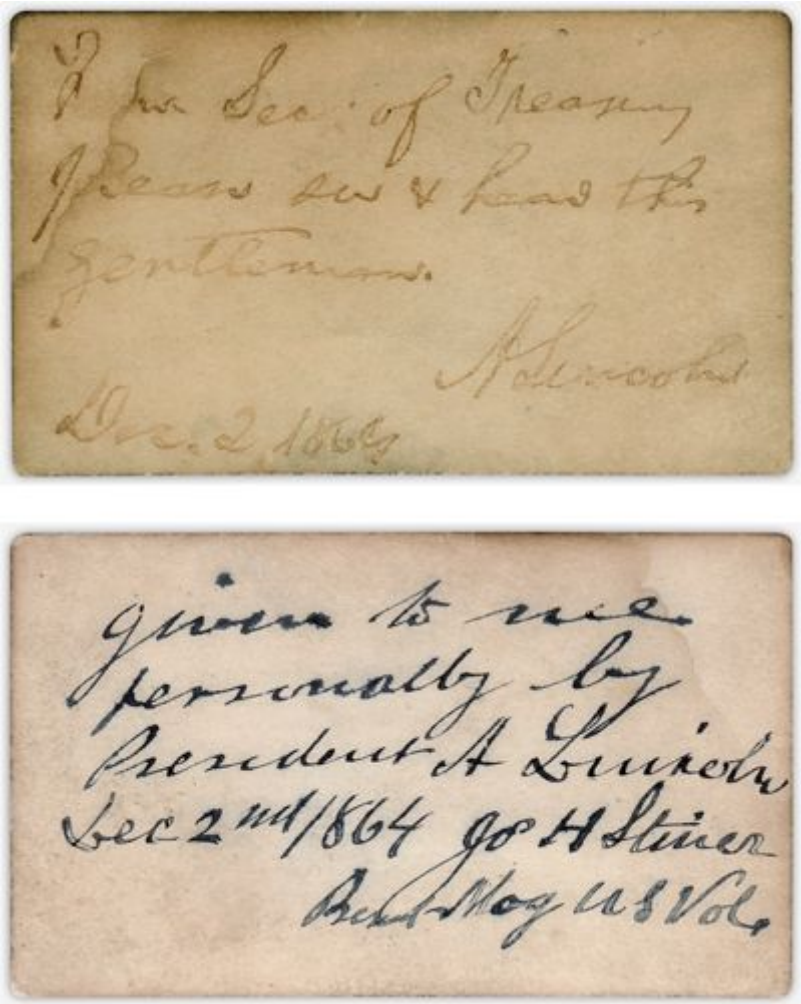
Yours truly

A. Lincoln

LINCOLN TO GIDEON WELLES: "I REALLY WISH THIS DONE," SEPTEMBER 9, 1864

Lincoln, writing on Executive Mansion stationery, seems to have consistently attended to Leonard Myers's requests with a marked interest; here, forwarding a routine appeal for a "Naval School" appointment, the president notes, "let it be done…. I really wish this done." Four months later, the warm relationship between the two men was again evident, "I will do it," Lincoln responds to an appeal, "because Mr. Myers requests it."

Shapell Manuscript Collection



"GIVEN TO ME PERSONALLY BY PRESIDENT A. LINCOLN"

On December 2, 1864, Lincoln writes an introduction for New York Jewish soldier Joseph Stiner.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

In another case of presidential courtesy directed at a Jew, on July 15, 1864, Lincoln personally thanked the Philadelphia Jewish leader Lazarus J. Lieberman for sending him an elegant made-to-measure suit. The suit had been prepared to Lincoln's large measurements by one of the city's top clothing contractors, Rockhill & Wilson, which flourished thanks to lucrative government contracts to make military uniforms, and the suit had then been donated as a benefit for the United States Sanitary Commission to aid sick and wounded soldiers. Funds were contributed at Philadelphia's Great Central Fair to purchase the suit for Lincoln, and the donors asked Lieberman, of Mikveh Israel and himself a significant wholesale and retail clothier, to forward the suit to the president. "I am happy, honored Sir, to be the medium of presentation," Lieberman wrote. Lincoln replied in his own hand, asking both Lieberman and "Messrs. Rockhill & Wilson" to "please accept my thanks."[17]

On May 4, 1864, Lincoln purchased a pair of eyeglasses from the shop of Jewish optician Isaac Heilprin, brother of the outspoken liberal Jewish opponent of slavery, Michael Heilprin. The Washington, D.C., shop, Franklin & Co., was located four blocks from the White House. "Lincoln was a regular customer and a warm friendship developed" between optometrist and president.[18]

"I HAVE RECEIVED MUCH POLITENESS," SEPTEMBER 24, 1864

Mary Lincoln requests that Herman Grau, a Jewish theater director, be allowed to open a business at City Point, Virginia.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

These and similar interactions between Lincoln and Jews might, on their own, seem trivial. For the most part, they have escaped historians' notice. Aggregated, however, they form a pattern. The president of the United States, they show, insisted on treating Jews on the same basis as everybody else. For Lincoln, we have seen, this was nothing new. It continued the example he had set when he first encountered Jews back in New Salem, Illinois. The fact that his network of friends had, for years, been diverse and pluralistic helped to inoculate him against ethnic and religious hatred; "contact among people of different but salient social groups," modern social psychologists know, "reduces prejudice."[19]

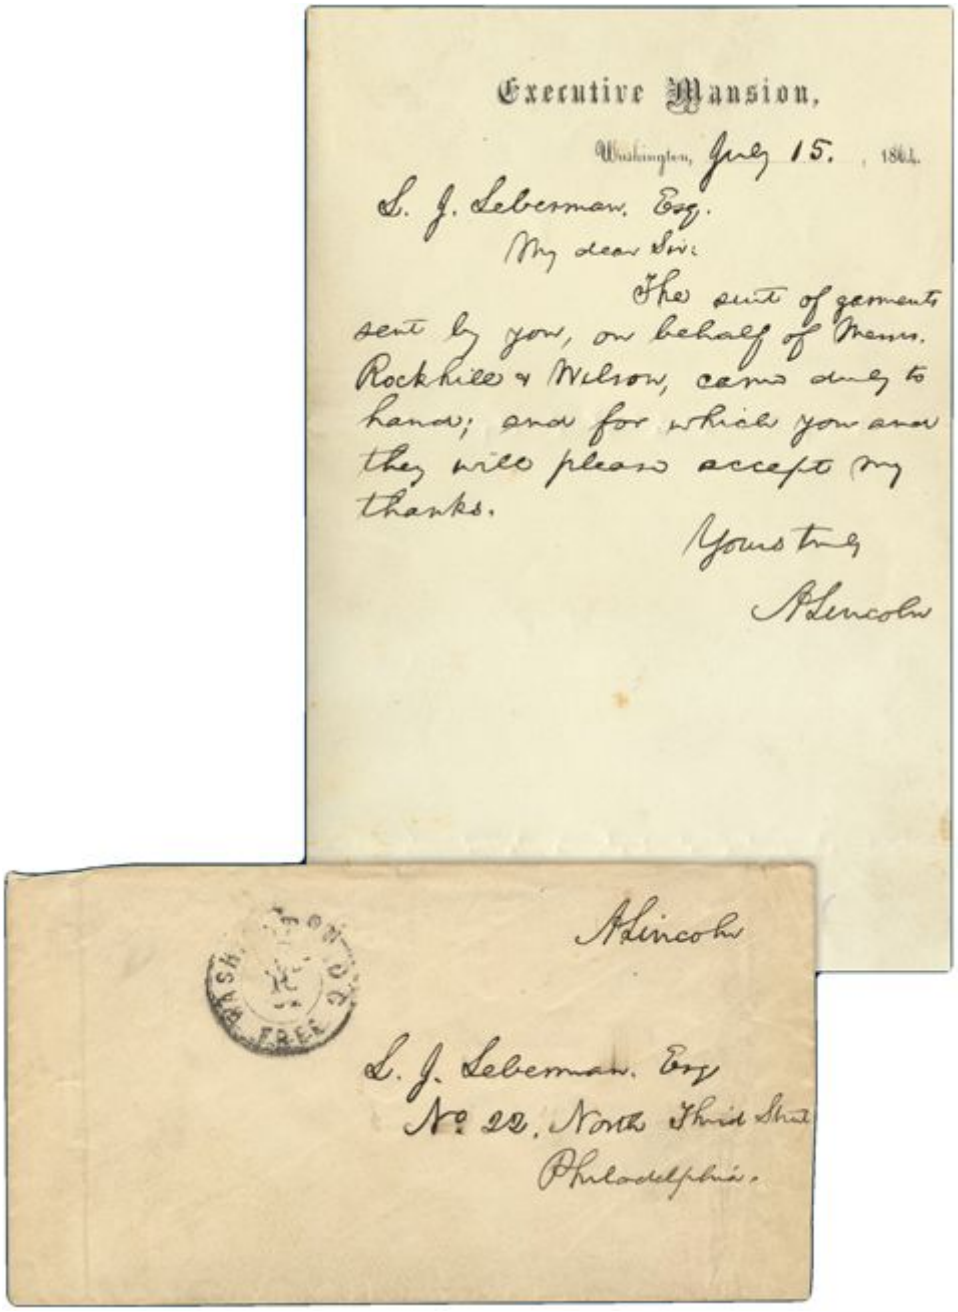
Lincoln's early friendship with Abraham Jonas was a particularly shaping influence. Jonas served for him as an enduring model of what it meant to be a Jew and was someone he knew he could now count upon. This explains why, as president, in December 1862, when testimonies were sent to the Executive Mansion on behalf of an attorney named Thomas Thoroughman of St. Joseph, Missouri, who had been arrested for disloyalty and shipped off to Quincy, Illinois, Lincoln placed the case in the hands of Jonas and his Quincy law partner, Henry Asbury, "both of whom I know to be loyal and sensible men." Upon their recommendation, Thoroughman was paroled and permitted to return home. He rose to become a colonel in the Confederacy.[20]



Executive Mansion,

Washington, July 15. 1864.

L. J. Leberman. Esq.

My dear Sir:

The suit of garments sent by you, on behalf of Messrs. Rockhill & Wilson, came duly to hand; and for which you and they will please accept my thanks.

Yours truly

A. Lincoln

A. Lincoln

L. J. Leberman. Esq

No. 22. North Third Street

Philadelphia.

LINCOLN TO LAZARUS J. LIEBERMAN: "PLEASE ACCEPT MY THANKS," JULY 15, 1864

Messrs. Rockhill & Wilson, clothiers, made the president a suit of clothes. To Jewish civic leader L. J. Lieberman went the honor of presenting the gift. Here Lincoln thanks him and all concerned and handwrites not only the letter but the envelope, replete with frank (free postage accomplished with the president's signature).

Shapell Manuscript Collection

ISAAC HEILPRIN AT FRANKLIN & CO.

This check, from May 4, 1864, is for a pair of eyeglasses that Lincoln purchased from Franklin & Co, the shop of Jewish optician Isaac Heilprin. The glasses cost $2.50 and were for farsightedness.
Christie's Images Limited

Jonas had children of his own fighting for the Confederacy. He and his daughter, Annie, nevertheless supported the Union—so strongly that in one speech he declared that there would be no peace until the rebels "give up their leaders to be hung."[21] Such family divisions as plagued the Jonases were common in the Civil War, especially in cases, familiar to many Jews and to Lincoln's own wife, where kinfolk lived on both sides of the sectional divide.[22] The emotional cost nevertheless remained high. When, early in the war, Quincy's Democratic newspaper questioned whether, as the father of rebel soldiers, Jonas should continue as the city's postmaster, his pained response spoke volumes:

> If it be true, as they say, that two of my sons are in the rebel army, however grieved I may be at the knowledge thereof, all true men who know me will sympathize with me and admit that I have no control in the matter. My five boys were in the South many years before the rebellion, and when last heard from were all loyal to the Union. That two of them, like hundreds of other loyal men, should have been compelled to join the rebel army I am not prepared to deny, since I have not received a line from any one of them since the commencement of this unhappy war.[23]

Adding to Jonas's pain was the fact that his teenage son, Edward, his "principal assistant" as postmaster, the young man whose ear Lincoln had tickled four years earlier, enlisted on the side of the Union, faced his own brothers on the battlefield, and was taken prisoner at the Battle of Shiloh on April 6, 1862. He was freed in a prisoner exchange and returned home to a celebration six months later.[24]

Nine months after that, on July 9, 1863, Jonas's eldest son, Charles, who lived in New Orleans and fought for the Confederacy, was captured at Fort Hudson, Louisiana. He would remain imprisoned, along with other Confederate officers, at the U.S. Military Prison on Johnson's Island near Sandusky, Ohio, for some twenty months, until exchanged on March 14, 1865.[25]

Meanwhile, perhaps affected by the stresses of war, Abraham Jonas's health suddenly took a turn for the worse. Orville Hickman Browning, on August 10, 1863, described his friend's condition as "perilous" ("entirely imbecile—knows nothing—is very feeble and nervous, and seems to be in danger of paralysis or congestion of the brain.")[26] Jonas recovered enough to pen a letter to Lincoln seeking, "in consideration of our old friendship," permission to visit his imprisoned son. "His mother and myself desire to see him," he wrote the president, "not only for the purpose of affording him necessary aid, but also hope to induce him, again to seek protection under the glorious flag of our country." On the same day, Browning wrote to Stanton recommending that the request be granted.[27] Nevertheless, a low-level bureaucrat in the office of the Commissary General of Prisoners rejected the request, and Lincoln may never even have seen it.[28]

both of whom I know to be loyal and sensible men.
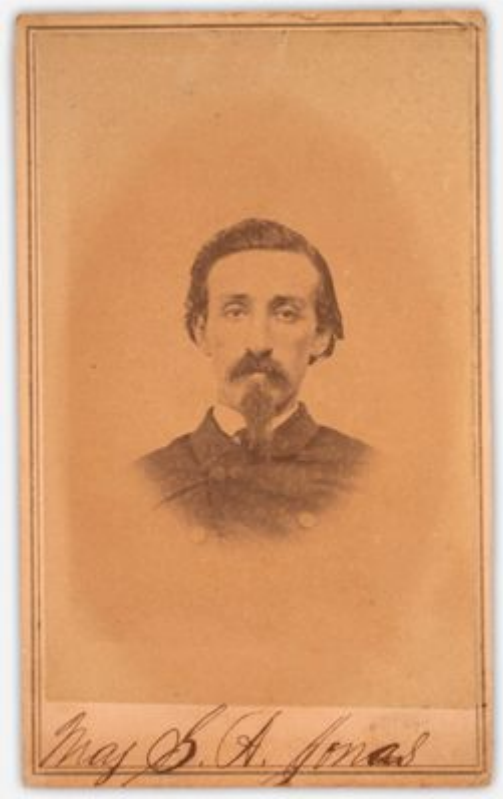
A. Lincoln
Dec. 13. 1862.

"BOTH OF WHOM I KNOW TO BE LOYAL AND SENSIBLE MEN."

On December 13, 1862, Lincoln asked that a case of disloyalty be adjudicated by and entrusted entirely to the judgment of Quincy law partners Abraham Jonas and Henry Asbury. Thomas Thoroughman, a lawyer, was wrongly accused of a crime, Jonas and Asbury determined, and so he was exonerated and duly paroled. The condition of the card is noteworthy in that the original, upper portion was unfortunately removed—and presumably lost—many years ago.

Shapell Manuscript Collection

By late May 1864, Jonas was unable to travel, for his condition had deteriorated and turned hopeless. His daughter Annie, knowing how much her father still wanted to see his eldest son before he died, wrote to Browning in Washington to see if he might intercede with Lincoln to have Charles released on a temporary furlough. Browning agreed and "went immediately to the President, the Secretary of War, and the Commissary General of Prisoners."[29] Lincoln's handwritten order, a testament to his long friendship with Jonas, followed at once: "Allow Charles H. Jonas, now a prisoner of war at Johnson's Island, a parol[e] of three weeks to visit his dying father."[30] After promising that he would "do no act or thing prejudicial to the Government of the United States," Charles hastened to Quincy. He arrived on June 8, 1864, just in time to be "recognized and welcomed" by his father, who died later that day.[31] Burial followed at the Jewish Sunset Cemetery in Quincy, with an impressive Masonic service. The long friendship between the two Abrahams, which began in the Illinois legislature over twenty years before, and was punctuated by Jonas's pivotal roles in the Quincy debates and—after the 1858 lost Senate bid—in Lincoln's successful climb to the presidency, had now come to a close.



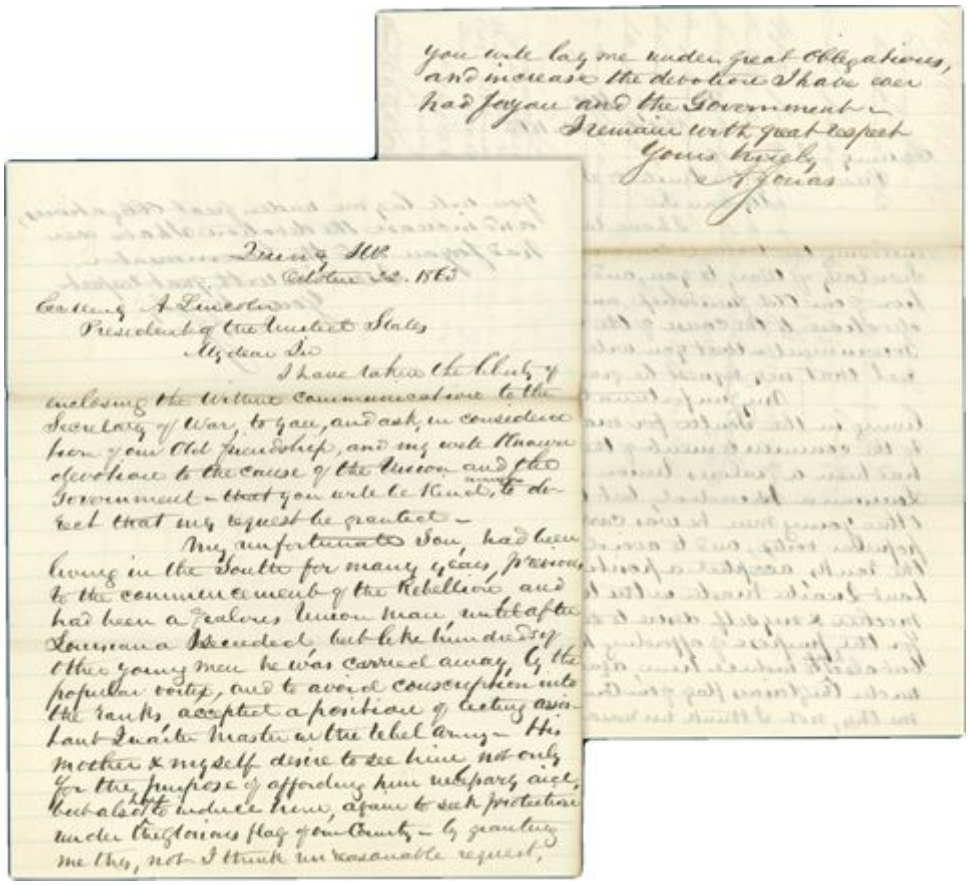
SIDNEY (SAMUEL) ALROY JONAS

Sidney Jonas, the middle son of Abraham and Louisa Jonas, fought for the Confederacy, though it "grieved" Abraham that two of his sons should fight for the rebel army. By the end of the war, five of the Jonas sons had at one time served in the Confederacy. One, Edward, remained entirely loyal to the Union.
Collection of Robert Marcus

On June 10, Browning went at night to the Executive Mansion, to tell Lincoln about the death of their mutual friend and to make a further request, which was granted: "I … got his promise to appoint Mrs. Jonas Post Mistress at Quincy in place of her deceased husband." Just two days later, the nomination, rare for its appointment of a woman, was already in motion in the Senate. Louisa Block Jonas held that position from June 28, 1864, to March 10, 1865.[32]

In August 1864, Lincoln received yet one more request from a member of the Jonas family, this one from George Jonas, who had served in the Confederate forces and then moved to New York. Recalling "the friend-ship existing between my Father and yourself, for so long a time," George appealed to Lincoln for a brief furlough prior to entering "regular active service" on behalf of the Union. Whether he received that furlough is not recorded, but that he expected a positive response "as a matter of personal friend-ship to my late Father" testifies both to the enduring memory of that friendship and to the hope that the obligations of friendship would carry over to the next generation.[33]

The death of Abraham Jonas deprived Lincoln of a "most valued friend" and one of his most ardent and able strategists and political campaigners—the man who had suggested, prior to the 1860 election, that the Republican Party focus on attracting political outsiders, such as "freethinking Germans" and "Israelites." Jonas's suggestion had partly been motivated, we have seen, by the widely publicized 1858 Mortara Affair, the heartbreaking story of a young Jewish lad, secretly baptized as an infant, who was forcibly removed from his parental home to be raised within the Catholic Church.[34] In early 1864, less than ten months prior to another presidential election, Lincoln revisited the Mortara Affair—this time through the medium of theater. Twice, on January 25 and 28, he and his wife, Mary, attended productions of Gamea, The Jewish Mother, an English adaptation of a French play, La Tireuse de Cartes (The Fortune-Teller), inspired by the Mortara controversy.[35]



Quincy Ill
October 22. 1863

Hon. A. Lincoln
President of the United States
My dear Sir

I have taken the liberty of enclosing the within communication to the Secretary of War, to you, and ask, in consideration of our Old friendship, and my well known devotion to the cause of the Union and the Government – that you will be kind enough to direct that my request be granted –

My unfortunate Son, had been living in the South for many years, previous to the commencement of the Rebellion, and had been a zealous Union man, until after Louisiana seceded, but like hundreds of other young men he was carried away, by the popular outcry, and to avoid conscription into the ranks, accepted a position of acting Assistant Quarter Master in the rebel Army – His mother & myself desire to see him, not only for the purpose of affording him temporary aid, but also to induce him, again to seek protection under the glorious flag of our Country – by granting me this, not I think unreasonable request,

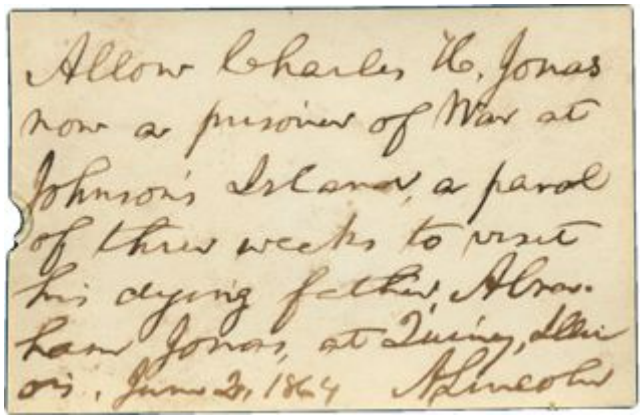
You will lay me under great Obligations, and increase the devotion I have ever had for you and the Government –

I remain with great respect
Yours truly
A Jonas

ABRAHAM JONAS TO LINCOLN, "…IN CONSIDERATION OF OUR OLD FRIENDSHIP," OCTOBER 22, 1863

Three months after Charles Jonas's capture by Union forces, his father, Abraham, appeals to his longtime friend, President Lincoln, to allow him passage to visit his son.

U.S. National Archives & Records Administration



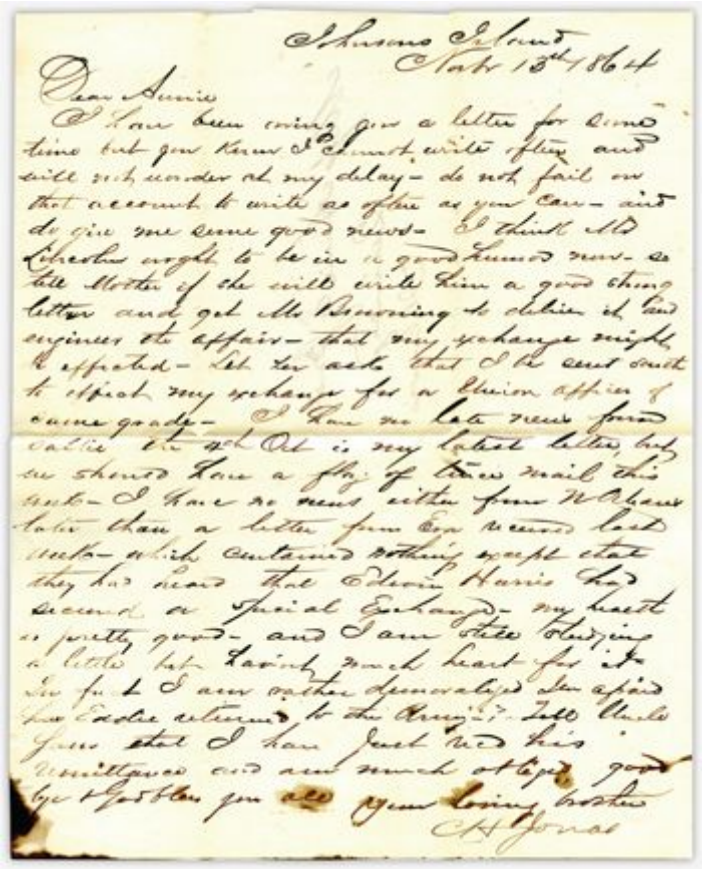
Allow Charles H. Jonas now a prisoner of War at Johnson's Island, a parol of three weeks to visit his dying father, Abm. Lan. Jonas, at Quincy, Illinois. June 2, 1864 A Lincoln

ORDER OF PAROLE OF CHARLES H. JONAS: A FAREWELL GESTURE TO AN OLD FRIEND, JUNE 2, 1864

After hearing of it from Orville Hickman Browning, Lincoln lost no time in accommodating the request from the Jonas family to allow Charles to travel home from a Union prison before his father's death. Had Lincoln not acted in haste to grant the request, Charles would not have made it back in time to see his father alive.

Shapell Manuscript Collection

The original text of the play that Lincoln saw was written by Victor Séjour (1817–74).[36] A Creole of New Orleans birth and superior education, he settled in Paris and is today best remembered for producing the earliest known work of fiction by an African American, a short story entitled "The Mulatto," concerning the rejected black son of a white father. In Gamea, Séjour returned to questions of identity, but instead of focusing upon blacks and whites, he focused upon Jews and Christians. His Mortara-inspired tale took place in the eighteenth century, and in his telling, the child torn from home and hearth and raised as a Christian was actually a girl. But the central elements of his drama drew upon the real Mortara story—such emotion-laden themes as child loss (a tragedy all too familiar to the Lincolns), maternal love, nature versus nurture, multiple allegiances, and conflicting loyalties. The "Jewish Mother" in his play, Gamea, was a sympathetic character—so much so, that one New York newspaper thought that she illustrated "the vital endurance of Judaism," and a French Catholic paper condemned the playwright for pleading "too eloquently the cause of Jews."[37] The kidnapped daughter—named Silvia in the American version—sought simultaneously to satisfy both sides of a divided house ("You would have me choose to reject my God or to betray my mother! How can I? How?") That theme, echoing Lincoln's famous "House Divided" speech, delivered the same year as the Mortara Affair, surely resonated with Civil War–era audiences.[38]



Johnsons Island
Nov 13th 1864

Dear Annie

I have been going to give a letter for some time but you know I must write often and will not wonder at my delay – do not fail on that account to write as often as you can – and do give me some good news – I think Mr Lincoln ought to be in a good humor now – so tell Mother if she will write him a good strong letter and get Mr Browning to deliver it and engineer the affair – that my exchange might be effected – Let her ask that I be sent north to effect my exchange for a Union officer of same grade – I have no late news from Callie & Ed All is my latest letter but we should have a flag of truce mail this week – I have no news either from N Orleans later than a letter from Eva received last week – which contained nothing except that they had heard that Edwin Harris had received a special Exchange – my health is pretty good – and I am quite plump a little fat having much heart for it so far I am rather depressed for fear I shall return to the Army – Tell Uncle John that I have just rec'd his Miscellanea and am much obliged – good bye to you all Your loving brother

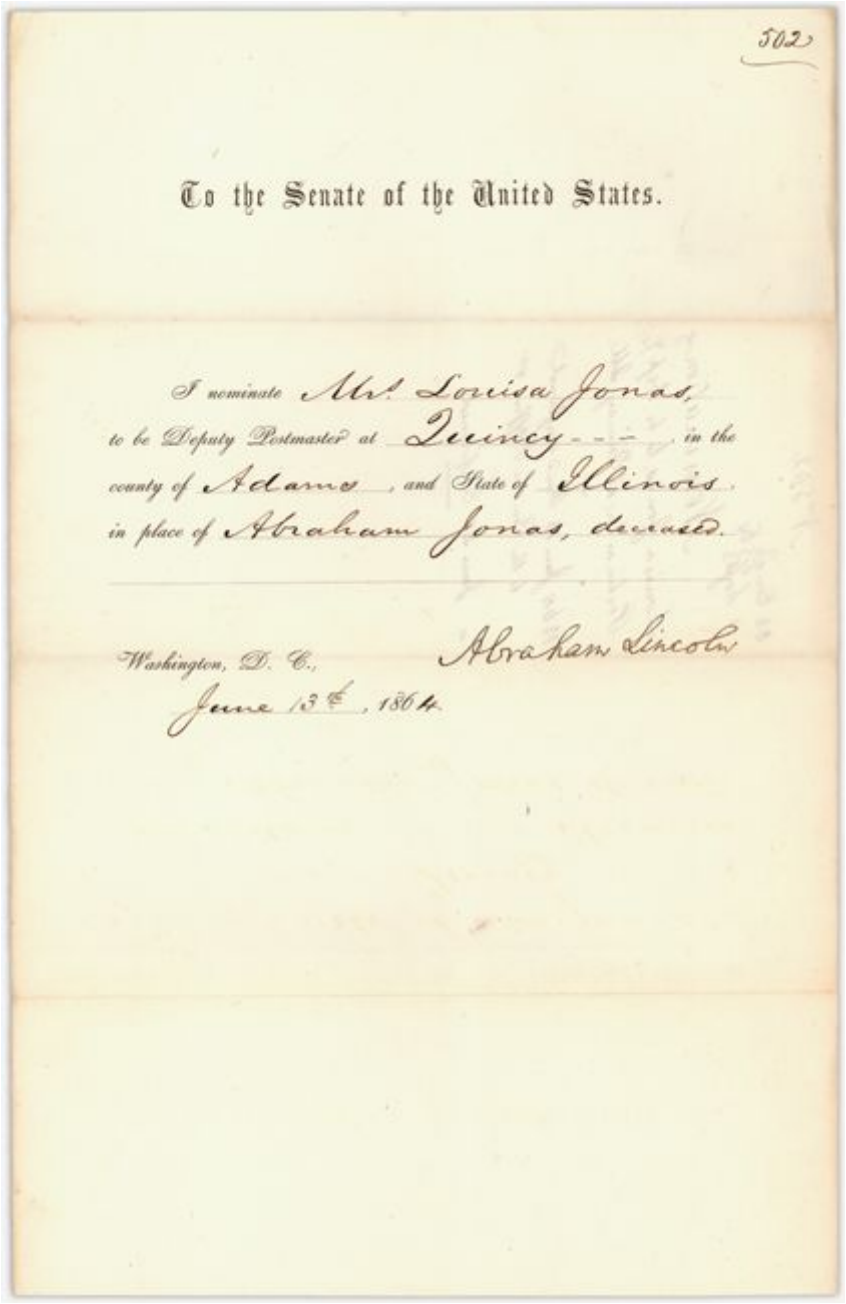
C H Jonas

CHARLES JONAS TO ANNIE JONAS: AGAIN CALLING UPON "MR. LINCOLN," NOVEMBER 13, 1864

Five months after Lincoln grants Charles Jonas passage to see his dying father in Quincy, Browning is again called upon to intercede on behalf of the prisoner, this time in order to expedite his release. Hoping Lincoln's reelection victory five days earlier might affect his chances, Charles writes to his sister Annie: "I think Mr. Lincoln ought to be in good humor now—so tell Mother if she will write him a good strong letter and get Mr. Browning to deliver it and engineer the affair…"

Wells Family

Séjour's skill as a dramatist and Mary Lincoln's "susceptibility to sentimentality"[39] may suffice to explain why the Lincolns returned to see Gamea just three days after they first saw it. The fact that the play was written by a black writer, drew upon a Jewish historical episode, and reflected on issues deeply relevant to the era suggests that they may have had other motivations for watching it a second time as well.[40]



502

To the Senate of the United States.

I nominate Mrs. Louisa Jonas, to be Deputy Postmaster at Quincy - - - , in the county of Adams , and State of Illinois , in place of Abraham Jonas, deceased.

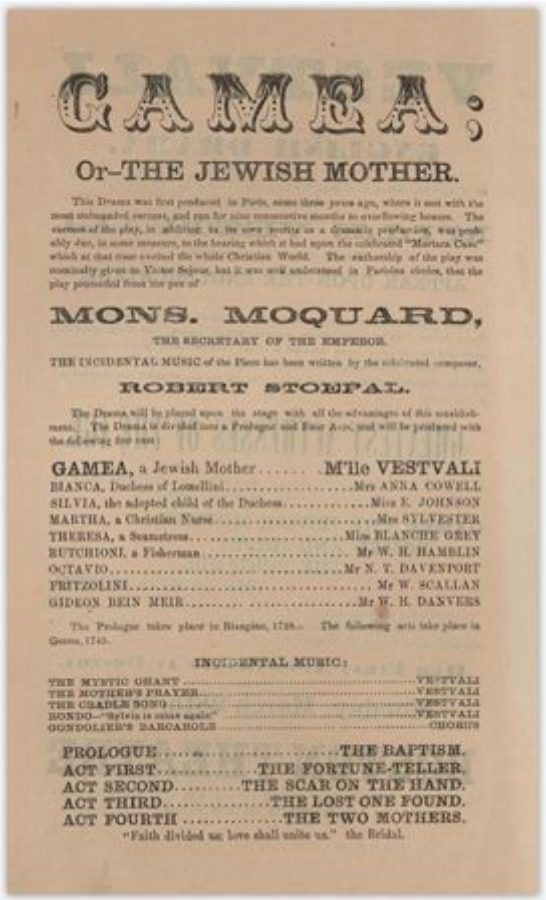
Washington, D. C., Abraham Lincoln
June 13th, 1864.

JUNE 13, 1864: A FINAL HONOR

Less than a week after the death of Abraham Jonas, Lincoln again lost no time honoring yet another request from Browning, this time to appoint Jonas's widow, Louisa, postmistress at Quincy. This document, signed by Lincoln, also mentions the late Jonas, thus linking the three friends.

U.S. National Archives & Records Administration



GAMEA;

Or–THE JEWISH MOTHER.

This Drama was first produced in Paris, some three years ago, where it met with the most unbounded success, and ran for nine consecutive months to overflowing houses. The success of the play, in addition to its own merits as a dramatic production, was probably due, in some measure, to the bearing which it had upon the celebrated "Mortara Case" which at that time excited the whole Christian World. The authorship of the play was nominally given to Victor Sejour, but it was well understood in Parisian circles, that the play proceeded from the pen of

MONS. MOQUARD,

THE SECRETARY OF THE EMPEROR.

THE INCIDENTAL MUSIC of the Piece has been written by the celebrated composer,

ROBERT STOMPAL.

The Drama will be placed upon the stage with all the advantages of this establishment. The Drama is divided into a Prologue and Four Acts, and will be produced with the following fine cast:

GAMEA, a Jewish Mother ..... M'lle VESTVALI
BIANCA, Duchess of Lomellini ..... Mrs ANNA COWELL
SILVIA, the adopted child of the Duchess ..... Miss E. JOHNSON
MARTHA, a Christian Nurse ..... Mrs SYLVESTER
THERESA, a Seamstress ..... Miss BLANCHE GREY
BUTCHIONI, a Fisherman ..... Mr W. H. HAMBLIN
OCTAVIO ..... Mr N. T. DAVENPORT
FRITZOLINI ..... Mr W. SCALLAN
GIDEON BEIN MEIR ..... Mr W. H. DANVERS

The Prologue takes place in Bisagno, 1738.—The following acts take place in Genoa, 1743.

INCIDENTAL MUSIC:

THE MYSTIC CHANT ..... VESTVALI
THE MOTHER'S PRAYER ..... VESTVALI
THE CRADLE SONG ..... VESTVALI
RONDO—"Sylvia is mine again" ..... VESTVALI
GONDOLIER'S BARCAROLE ..... CHORUS

PROLOGUE ..... THE BAPTISM.
ACT FIRST ..... THE FORTUNE-TELLER.
ACT SECOND ..... THE SCAR ON THE HAND.
ACT THIRD ..... THE LOST ONE FOUND.
ACT FOURTH ..... THE TWO MOTHERS.

"Faith divided us; love shall unite us." the Bridal.

GAMEA, OR THE JEWISH MOTHER

"As the proud Jewess defending the faith of the Hebrews," a reviewer noted, the magnificent Felicia Vestvali embodied Gamea, or the Jewish Mother, a character inspired by the Jewish story at the heart of the Mortara Affair. The show was a huge hit—and Lincoln saw it twice within a period of three days.
NewsBank Inc. in association with the American Antiquarian Society

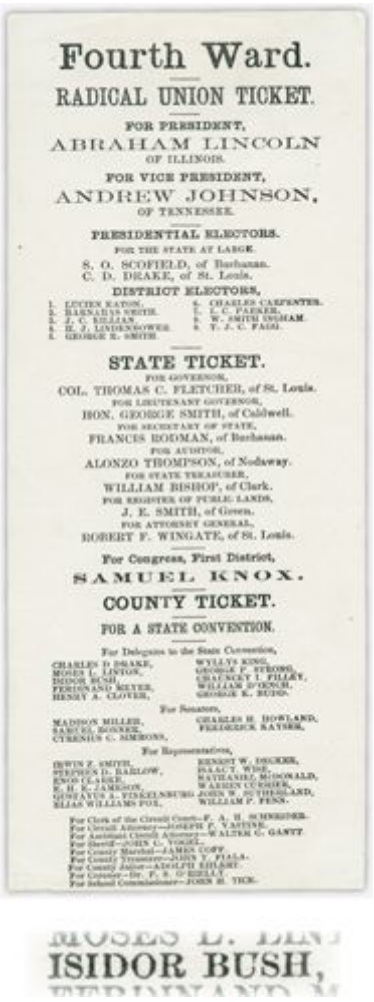
Although the Mortara Affair would not be an issue in the 1864 election and Abraham Jonas would no longer be offering political advice, Abraham Lincoln remained interested in the Jewish vote and eager to attract as many Jews as possible into the Republican Party's ranks. In August, just months before the election, the president's prospects seemed grim, and it was widely believed that he would be defeated. "This morning, as for some days past, it seems exceedingly probable that this Administration will not be re-elected," he wrote in a famous memorandum on August 23. His chances of winning New York looked especially bleak.[41] This likely explains Lincoln's renewed association with Issachar Zacharie, who vigorously campaigned for the president's reelection in the summer and fall and worked especially hard to win Jews over to the president's ranks. Jewish stalwarts from Lincoln's 1860 campaign, such as Abram Dittenhoefer and Isidor Bush, likewise campaigned for his reelection.

Zacharie's renewed ardor for Lincoln was, in part, an expression of gratitude for the release of Goodman Mordecai and J. G. Cohen. Indeed, Samuel A. Lewis, the same Jewish communal leader who had worked with Zacharie to free Mordecai, now worked with him again, offering to help fund Jewish political activities on Lincoln's behalf.[42] General Banks, whom Zacharie had once clandestinely supported for president, was no longer a serious contender. The badly bungled Red River campaign, in the spring of 1864, put an end to his presidential hopes.

Zacharie began his efforts on the president's behalf in early August. "Allow me to introduce Dr. Zacharie of New York … who has been kind, and, in some instances, useful to me," Lincoln wrote to Treasury Secretary William P. Fessenden.[43] What the particular "kindness" was that Lincoln hoped Fessenden would show Zacharie is not clear, but by mid-September, the president was thanking his chiropodist "for the deep interest you have constantly taken in the Union [Republican] cause."[44] By then, Zacharie was busy electioneering on his behalf. "Work and keep on working," he exhorted, "untill [sic] he is Elected."[45] According to historian Bertram W. Korn, Zacharie "conferred with local party officials, took their demands and queries to the President, and obtained statements from him designed to quiet the more restless spirits among his following." He also visited key states on behalf of the campaign. For Lincoln to succeed, he knew, "We must carry Pennsylvania & Ohio."[46] In addition, he continued to use his ties to the president to secure favors for friends. "The personal matter on behalf of your friend, which you mention," Lincoln cryptically wrote to him on September 19, "shall be fully and fairly considered when presented."[47]

DETAIL FROM S. KAUFMANN AND A. DITTENHOEFER TO LINCOLN, MARCH 2, 1865

Two of Lincoln's Jewish presidential electors, one from each of his campaigns, requested an appointment of a colleague. Sigismund Kaufmann, who served as elector from New York in 1860—and Abram Dittenhoefer, also from New York, in 1864—here sign a recommendation to Lincoln of a fellow New Yorker for a consular appointment; Lincoln respectfully referred the request to the secretary of state.
U.S. National Archives & Records Administration



Fourth Ward.

RADICAL UNION TICKET.

FOR PRESIDENT,
ABRAHAM LINCOLN
OF ILLINOIS.

FOR VICE PRESIDENT,
ANDREW JOHNSON,
OF TENNESSEE.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS.
FOR THE STATE AT LARGE.
S. O. SCOFIELD, of Buchanan.
C. D. DRAKE, of St. Louis.

DISTRICT ELECTORS,

1. LUCIEN EATON.	6. CHARLES CARPENTER.
2. BARNABAS SMITH.	7. A. C. PARKER.
3. J. C. ILLIAN.	8. W. SMITH INGHAM.
4. H. J. LINDENOWER.	9. T. J. C. FAIR.
5. GEORGE E. SMITH.

STATE TICKET.

FOR GOVERNOR,
COL. THOMAS C. FLETCHER, of St. Louis.
FOR LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR,
HON. GEORGE SMITH, of Caldwell.
FOR SECRETARY OF STATE,
FRANCIS RODMAN, of Buchanan.
FOR AUDITOR,
ALONZO THOMPSON, of Nodaway.
FOR STATE TREASURER,
WILLIAM BISHOP, of Clark.
FOR REGISTER OF PUBLIC LANDS,
J. E. SMITH, of Green.
FOR ATTORNEY GENERAL,
ROBERT F. WINGATE, of St. Louis.

For Congress, First District,
SAMUEL KNOX.

COUNTY TICKET.

FOR A STATE CONVENTION.

For Delegates to the State Convention,

CHARLES D DRAKE,	WILLYS KING,
MOSES L. LINTON,	GEORGE P. STRONG,
ISIDOR BUSH,	CHAUNCEY I. FILLEY,
FERDINAND MEYER,	WILLIAM D'ONOHL,
HENRY A. CLOVER,	GEORGE K. BUSH.

For Senators,

MADISON MILLER,	CHARLES H. HOWLAND,
MARCUS BONNER,	FREDERICK RAYNER,
CYRENUS C. SIMMONS,

For Representatives,

IRWIN F. SMITH,	ERNEST W. DRUCKER,
STEPHEN D. HARLOW,	ISAAC T. WISE,
EMIL CLARKE,	NATHANIEL McDONALD,
E. H. E. JAMESON,	WARREN CURRIER,
GUSTAVUS A. FINKELNBURG,	JOHN W. SOTHELAND,
ELIAS WILLIAMS FOX,	WILLIAM P. PENN.

For Clerk of the Circuit Court—F. A. H. SCHREITER.
For Circuit Attorney—JOSEPH P. V. MITTNE.
For Assistant Circuit Attorney—WALTER C. GANTT.
For Sheriff—JOHN C. VOGEL.
For County Marshal—JAMES COFF.
For County Treasurer—JOHN T. FALLA.
For County Judge—ADOLPH EHLERT.
For Coroner—Dr. F. S. O'REILLY.
For Inland Commissioner—JOHN H. TICK.

MOSES L. LIN
ISIDOR BUSH,
FERDINAND M

1864 MISSOURI BALLOT

Electors Abram Dittenhoefer and Isidor Bush helped carry their states for Lincoln in 1864. New York stayed in the Republican column, and Missouri, which had gone for Douglas in 1860, turned.
Rail Splitter Archives, New York City

Whether Zacharie ever did present the matter is unclear, but three days later, a young chiropodist and former business partner of Zacharie's named Samuel M. Barnett, whom he had once described to General Banks as "a student of mine," shot Zacharie in the face following an argument. "The matter is … much involved in mystery," the New York Times reported, adding yet another mysterious layer to a life that was plenty overlaid in mystery already. The wound was initially described as "serious and probably fatal," but in fact Zacharie returned to the campaign trail within weeks. The titillating story of the "affray in Broadway" was quickly submerged.[48]

Executive Mansion,

Washington, Sept. 19, 1864.

Dr. Zacharie

Dear Sir

I thank you again for the deep interest you have constantly taken in the Union cause. The personal matter, on behalf of your friend, which you mention, shall be fully, and fairly considered, when presented.

Yours truly

A. Lincoln.

LINCOLN TO ISSACHAR ZACHARIE, SEPTEMBER 19, 1864

"Thank you again for the deep interest you have constantly taken in the Union Cause," Lincoln writes to Zacharie, a message loaded with political innuendo in light of Zacharie's activism in Lincoln's reelection. Notably, Lincoln saved a handwritten draft of the letter for his own papers.
Brown University

In the meanwhile, Lincoln was reported to be "tired and downcast," for he expected to lose such critical states as New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Illinois to his Democratic opponent, George B. McClellan, on November 8. Anticipating a close election, he knew that every vote would count.[49] That probably explains why, on October 23, he met with "certain gentlemen of the Hebrew faith" to discuss the Jewish vote—possibly the first time that any president had ever formally discussed that subject in the Executive Mansion. Rumors circulated, abetted by the voluble Zacharie, that the "gentlemen" pledged to deliver New York's Jewish vote in return for suitable "contributions." John Hay, writing for the president, issued a categorical denial of that claim: “No pledge of the Jewish vote was made by these gentlemen and no inducements or promises were extended to them by the President.” Behind the scenes, however, the wealthy Samuel A. Lewis advised Lincoln to direct any “Jewish committees” seeking political funds straight to him: “I will furnish them such amounts as we see can be used to advantage.” He promised that “nothing shall be wanting on the part of your friends here towards carrying the Union [Republican] Cause.”[50] Myer Isaacs, the editor of the Jewish Messenger and secretary of the Board of Delegates of American Israelites, likewise wrote to the president concerning the Jewish vote. “The Israelites are not, as a body, distinctively Union or democratic in their politics,” he piously insisted; “the Jews, as a body, have no politics.” He nevertheless assured Lincoln that there were many Jews—himself included—who warmly supported the Republican Party. What he and other Jewish leaders of the day really feared was public discussion of the Jewish vote, lest that foment suspicion and hatred. So long as discussions were conducted discreetly, behind closed doors, they were fine.[51]

ISSACHAR ZACHARIE TO LINCOLN, NOVEMBER 3, 1864: ZACHARIE ROUNDS UP HIS FELLOW ISRAELITES

Five days before the election, Zacharie promises Lincoln good news.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

Zacharie, as an ex-spy, had lots of experience working behind closed doors. On November 3, just five days before the election, he felt confident enough to reassure the president that the Jewish vote would swing his way: "As regards the Isr[a]elites—with but few Exceptions, they will vote for you. I understand them well, and have taken the precaution to see that they do as they have promised. I have secured good and trustworthy men to attend on them on Election Day. My men have been all the week seeing that their masses are properly Registered so that all will go right on the 8."[52] Whether the Israelites actually voted en masse for Lincoln on November 8 cannot be known, but a string of much-needed Union victories on the battlefield, divisions within the Democratic Party, and an effective Republican slogan ("Don't change horses in the middle of a stream") turned the tide decisively in Lincoln's favor. He won by more than 400,000 votes and carried all but three states.[53]

Zacharie had anticipated Lincoln's victory and even told the president how to thank him—by saying "Well done my good and faithfull [sic] servant."[54] But as Lincoln knew, he also wanted a favor that the president had promised to grant: a pass to visit his father and family in Savannah as soon as that city was recaptured. No sooner had General Sherman presented Savannah to Lincoln as a "Christmas present" than Zacharie reminded him of that promise in a cleverly worded telegram: "Allow me to congratulate you on the fall of Savannah my family are crazy with joy."[55] Lincoln responded within twenty-four hours, precisely as Zacharie had hoped: with a travel pass and a note addressed to Sherman, introducing "Dr. I. Zacharie, of New York who visits his Father and friends at Savannah, where the Dr. is well acquainted, and where very likely he could be of aid to you in some matters. He is entirely loyal and devoted to the Union cause."[56] On the same day, Lincoln also provided a pass for Zacharie's nephew, Jacob G. Cohen, whom he had freed from prison nine months earlier but who had not previously been able to return home to his wife and four-year-old son in Savannah.[57] Zacharie, overjoyed that the two could travel together, sent Lincoln a gift of bananas and a fervent "God Bless You." He then booked passage to Savannah.[58]

But Zacharie only got as far as Hilton Head, South Carolina, before he was detained. According to an eyewitness, Major John Chipman Gray, judge advocate for the Department of the South, Zacharie, when he arrived in Hilton Head, noticed the boat of Secretary of War Edwin Stanton, who was himself on his way to Savannah to meet with General Sherman. He "very foolishly went on Stanton's boat and spoke to him; whereupon the Secretary ordered him into close confinement where he still is."[59] Zacharie had known Stanton in Washington and, we have seen, had won his support back when he sought to head up a "chiropody corps" for the army. Why the secretary of war now turned and placed him under house arrest, notwithstanding the pass he had received from Lincoln and the introduction he held to General Sherman, is yet another Zacharie-related mystery. Gray, who would later serve as professor of law at Harvard, described the confinement as "rather an arbitrary proceeding," and explained it on the basis of Zacharie's religion, which he personally disdained ("this man … is in appearance the lowest and vulgarest of Jew pedlars … an odious creature"). He also confided that Stanton, who was ill, had been "very bearish and boorish, as his nature."[60] Did the imperious secretary of war, known for making arbitrary arrests, consider Zacharie's friendship with Lincoln a threat to his authority and mission?[61] Did he worry, based on earlier reports from New Orleans, that Zacharie was dishonest and corrupt?[62] Whatever the case, it required renewed intervention from the president to get Zacharie to Savannah.

So, on January 25, Lincoln sent Stanton a message that began with the eye-catching words, "About Jews."[63] Concerning Zacharie, Lincoln delivered a one sentence order crafted in precise legal language that left no doubt as to his intentions: "I wish you would give Dr. Zacharie a pass to go to Savannah, remain a week and return, bringing with him, if he wishes, his father and sisters or any of them." Then, as if to mollify Stanton, he appended two sentences in highly personal terms, justifying his order: "This will spare me trouble and oblige me. I promised him long ago that he should be allowed this whenever Savannah should fall into our hands."[64] That very day, Stanton delivered a pass made out in Zacharie's name to Lincoln's secretary, John G. Nicolay ("presuming that you know where to send it").[65] Zacharie traveled to Savannah with that pass and returned to New York, accompanied by his nephew, on February 22.[66] Lincoln would not hear from him again.

Continuing his memo "about Jews," Lincoln proceeded to the case of Leopold Blumenberg, whom the War Department had dismissed as provost marshal for the 3rd District of Maryland.[67] A native of Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, Blumenberg fought and was decorated in the Danish-Prussian War of 1848 and immigrated to the United States in 1854. Settling in Baltimore, he opposed slavery, came under the influence of Rabbi David Einhorn, and joined the Republican Party. Curiously, his brother, Rudolph Blumenberg, served as a bondsman for illegal slave traders, and was imprisoned for perjury. Lincoln would pardon him, in 1863, after he provided valuable information concerning the slave trade to federal officials.[68] Following the attack on Fort Sumter, Leopold Blumenberg helped to organize a regiment of volunteers, was appointed major, and served as a commanding officer. He distinguished himself for heroism in the 1862 Battle of Antietam, the bloodiest single-day battle in American history, and sustained a severe wound. In recognition of what he had done, Lincoln, in May 1863, appointed him provost marshal (head of the military police) in Maryland's 3rd District, headquartered in Baltimore. There, according to one biographer, "the stringency with which he executed the conscription laws … incurred him the animosity of many citizens."[69] That explains his dismissal on January 17, 1865. Among other things, he was charged with torture: "gag[g]ing men to make them confess they were deserters."[70] Lincoln, in his memo, nevertheless proved sympathetic. "I think he should have a hearing," he wrote. "He has suffered for us & served us well.… He should not be dismissed in a way that disgraces and ruins him without a hearing."[71] Though Stanton demurred ("he was removed for cause of which a statement will be furnished you"[72]), Lincoln appointed Blumenberg to a new patronage position, superintendent of the warehouses at the Baltimore customhouse.[73]

Executive Mansion.

Washington, Dec. 27, 1864.

Major General Sherman

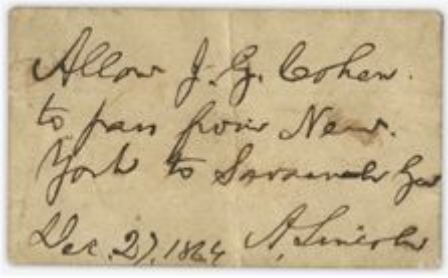
Allow me to introduce Dr. I. Zacharie, of New York who visits his father & friends at Savannah, when the Dr. is well acquainted, and whom my Wife has called to see you on some matters. He is entirely loyal and devoted to the Union cause.

Yours truly

A. Lincoln

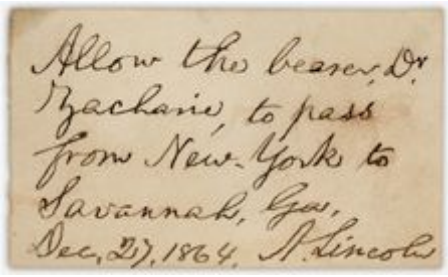
LINCOLN TO WILLIAM T. SHERMAN: ZACHARIE IS "ENTIRELY LOYAL AND DEVOTED TO THE CAUSE," DECEMBER 27, 1864

Whether Lincoln knew of Zacharie's true intentions in his travel to Savannah with nephew J. G. Cohen is not known. We know, however, that Zacharie was not just visiting his father; in fact, he was mysteriously arrested after trespassing onto Stanton's boat, for reasons unclear.
John Hay Library, Brown University Library



DECEMBER 27, 1864, PASS FOR J. G. COHEN

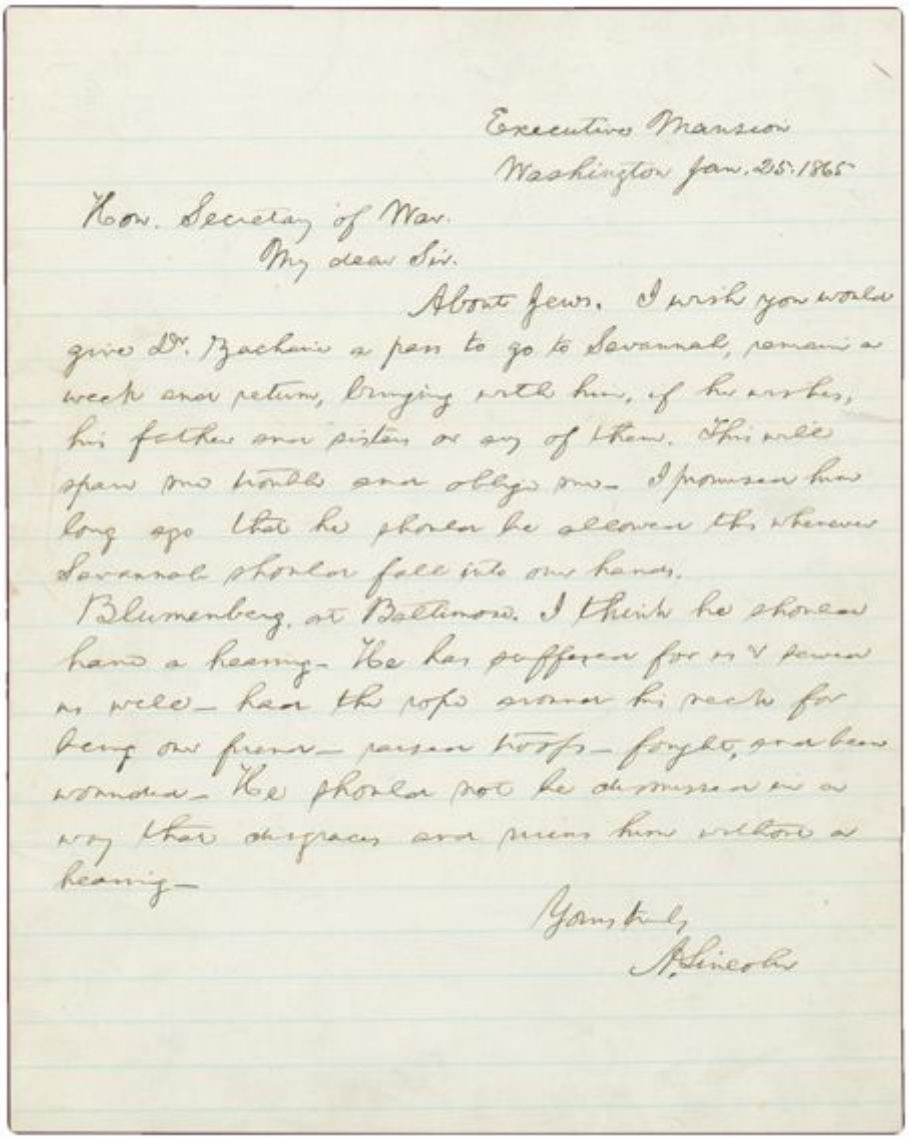
This pass to Savannah, Georgia was written by Lincoln on behalf of Zacharie's nephew, who would accompany his uncle on a mysterious trip to the South.
Shapell Manuscript Collection



DECEMBER 27, 1864, PASS FOR ISSACHAR ZACHARIE

Lincoln's pass for Zacharie to travel to Savannah, dated the same day as that for his nephew.
John Hay Library, Brown University Library

"About Jews. I wish you would give Dr. Zacharie a pass to go to Savannah…"



Executive Mansion
Washington Jan. 25. 1865

Hon. Secretary of War.
My dear Sir.

About Jews. I wish you would give Dr. Zacharie a pass to go to Savannah, remain a week and return, bringing with him, if he wishes, his father and sister or any of them. This will spare me trouble and oblige me. I promised him long ago that he should be allowed this whenever Savannah should fall into our hands.

Blumenberg, at Baltimore. I think he should have a hearing. He has suffered for us & served us well. Has the rope around his neck for being our friend. passed through fought, and been wounded. He should not be dismissed in any way that disgraces and ruins him without a hearing.

Yours truly,
A. Lincoln

ABOUT JEWS

Sounding, uncharacteristically, as brusque as the man whom he addresses, Lincoln writes to Secretary of War Edwin Stanton on January 25, 1865: "About Jews." For Zacharie, whom Stanton recently had arrested in Hilton Head, Lincoln wishes that he receive what had been promised him "long ago" and orders that Zacharie —and anyone in his family—be given a pass to Savannah. The other Jew whom Lincoln references is Leopold Blumenberg, who had been removed as a provost marshal, and Lincoln requests for him the justice of an immediate hearing. "He has suffered for us," Lincoln says, "& served us well."
The New-York Historical Society

Why Lincoln titled his memo concerning Zacharie and Blumenberg "About Jews" remains a riddle. Maybe, as some suggest, Lincoln was responding to a document, now lost, that was similarly titled. Maybe, as others insist, this was his shorthand way of dismissing the anti-Jewish prejudice that he knew to exist even at high levels of government. Or maybe, with his exquisite sense of language and irony, he marveled at the fact that on a single day and in a single memo, he was dealing with two personnel matters involving Jews, though Jews formed but a tiny minority at that time (perhaps one-half of one percent of the entire U.S. population). Whatever the case, the significance of the memo lies less in the phrase "About Jews" than in Lincoln's double display of generosity toward Jews. In an era when anti-Semitism was commonplace, he openly sided with Zacharie and Blumenberg, against the advice of his secretary of war.[74]

As Lincoln's first term wound down, three Jews found themselves guests at a reception held on Saturday afternoon, February 11, 1865, in the drawing room of the Executive Mansion, hosted by the first lady, with the president assisting.[75] One guest was the Washington printer and bookstore owner Adolphus S. Solomons, who had served as one of the "managers" of Lincoln's inaugural ball four years earlier and had business dealings with the government. Mrs. Lincoln made occasional purchases from him. The second guest was Solomons' young daughter, Zillah. The president, who loved children, held a brief conversation with her. The third guest was Myer S. Isaacs, editor of the Jewish Messenger and secretary of the Board of Delegates of American Israelites, who just a few weeks earlier had written to Lincoln concerning the Jewish vote. The fact that these three committed and strongly identifying Jews were "presented and cordially greeted" by the Lincolns was no small matter. Just a few weeks earlier, the wife of General John G. Foster, who commanded the Department of the South, had "absolutely refused to sit at the same table" as Issachar Zacharie, because he was a Jew.[76] By contrast, Mrs. Lincoln was "kindly and gracious in her welcome, having a pleasant word and a pleasant smile," according to Isaacs. Given the president's "regard for the Jews," his family had long treated them as equals.

M. J. Zacharie M.D. has extracted from my feet corns of long standing with producing the slightest pain, and the work is done in the most effectual manner.
U. S. Grant
Washington, D. C.
January 15th 1874

ULYSSES S. GRANT TESTIFIES TO THE SKILLS OF ISSACHAR ZACHARIE, JANUARY 15, 1874

Zacharie's acquaintance with the political elite continued after Lincoln's death. Eventually Zacharie even received support from the man who expelled the Jews from the area of his military control, Ulysses S. Grant. Here Grant, as president of the United States, writes that Zacharie treated him "with[out] producing the slightest pain and the work is done in the most effectual manner."
Shapell Manuscript Collection

LEOPOLD BLUMENBERG

Born in Prussia, Leopold immigrated to the United States in 1854. At the outbreak of the Civil War, he enlisted in the Union army and rose to lead a regiment as a colonel at Antietam. Though ruling with stringency, Leopold continued to rise in the ranks and, following Lincoln's involvement in his case, was later brevetted brigadier general by President Andrew Johnson.

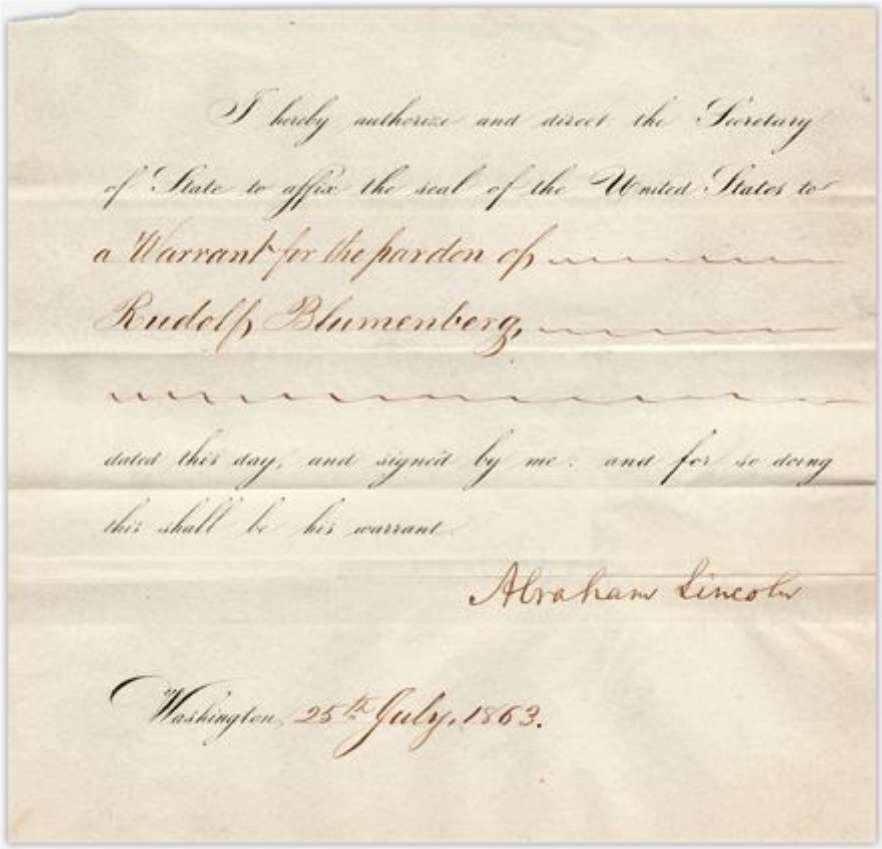
The Jewish Museum of Maryland



I hereby authorize and direct the Secretary of State to affix the seal of the United States to a Warrant for the pardon of Rudolph Blumenberg, dated this day, and signed by me: and for so doing this shall be his warrant.

Abraham Lincoln

Washington, 25th July, 1863.

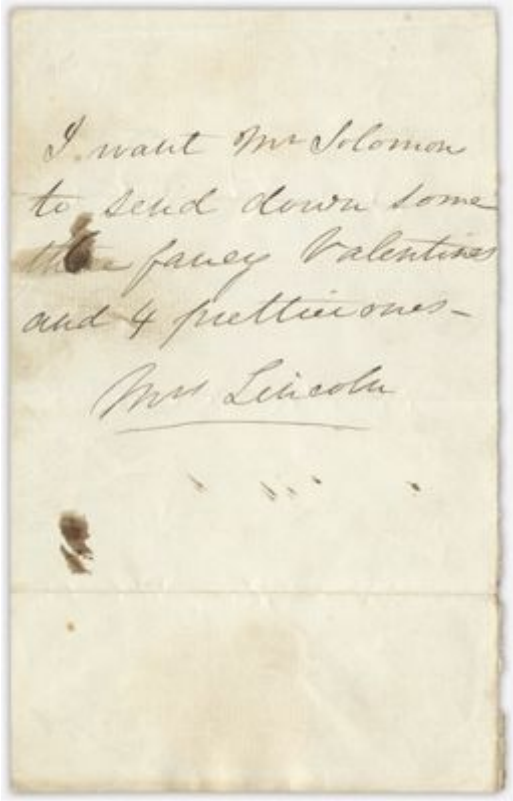
THE PARDON OF RUDOLPH BLUMENBERG, JULY 25, 1863

Rudolph Blumenberg, in contrast to his brother Leopold, was an unsavory bondsman involved in the slave trade. However, after he provided valuable information concerning the slave trade to federal officials, the district attorney petitioned for Blumenberg's pardon, which Lincoln granted on July 24, 1863: "Make out and send a pardon in this case."
Shapell Manuscript Collection

At the reception, Isaacs, like Edward Rosewater at the Lincolns' New Year's gathering back in 1863, paid particular attention to how the president looked. The war's progress, he and others believed, could be tracked upon the countenance of Lincoln's face. "His countenance [is] strongly expressive of good nature as well as of resolution," Isaacs wrote, "an index of his heart." In fact, Lincoln knew by then that the war was approaching its end. Charleston, South Carolina, surrendered to Union forces on the very day that the reception took place.

What concerned Isaacs as he looked at the president's face was the place of Jews in post–Civil War America. Indeed, he had traveled to Washington expressly to oppose

"the submission to Congress of proposed amendments to the Constitution of the United States recognizing Christianity as the religion of the land." He believed that Jews needed to "watch with extreme jealousy and anxiety any attempt to abridge their liberties." Evangelical attempts to write Christianity into the Constitution evoked his darkest fears.[77]



MARY'S JEWISH VALENTINE

On her way to amassing a personal debt of, in today's money, a quarter of a million dollars—spent on carpets, upholstery, drapes, furniture, wallpaper, china, silver, glassware, gowns, hats, shawls, jewelry, and books—Mary Lincoln paused to order some valentines from the local Jewish-owned stationery, printing, and publishing firm of Philp & Solomons.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

Lincoln had so far proved a steadfast defender of Jewish rights, befriending some Jews, appointing others to significant posts, and tailoring his vocabulary ("this nation, under God") so as to exclude none of them. Standing with Adolphus S. Solomons and Zillah in the presidential drawing room must have given Isaacs hope that the president's second term would see more of the same.

A CALCULATED SHOT

Halfway into the third act and timing his actions with the play's punch line so that the audience's laughter would mute the sound of the shot, John Wilkes Booth stepped out from behind a peephole, with gun drawn.
George Eastman House

CHAPTER SEVEN

TO SEE JERUSALEM BEFORE HE DIED

1865

Two months prior to the start of his second term, on January 7, 1865, Lincoln, Mary, and their son, Tad, went to the theater. The Lincolns were frequent theatergoers. This was the seventeenth time in two years that they were attending a performance at Grover's Theater, also known as the New National Theater. Most often, they attended performances of Shakespeare, and on at least three occasions the performances were of Jewish-themed plays. For example, one month following their multiple viewings of Gamea, or The Jewish Mother, the Lincolns, on February 26, 1864, watched The Merchant of Venice, starring Edwin Booth as Shylock. This time, however, they attended a new play featuring the tall, black-eyed actress Avonia Jones.[1] Entitled Leah, the Forsaken, the play was an adaptation by a young American playwright named Augustin Daly of the German-Jewish writer Salomon Hermann Mosenthal's play Deborah. Its subject was the persecution of Jews in an eighteenth-century Austrian village.

As the Lincolns watched, the play's protagonist, Leah, the daughter of a rabbi, fell in love with Rudolf, the son of the village's old Christian magistrate. Peasants, their passions whipped up by a Jewish apostate named Nathan, shouted vile accusations at the Jews: they "poison our wells and fountains"; they "devour little children as a sacrifice" on Passover; they haunt Austria's villages "to beg, to steal, or to wheedle money from the unsuspecting—it is part of their faith"; they are a "soulless and a grasping race, who value more the chink of gold than all the virtues of humanity strung together."[2] Notwithstanding these prejudices, Leah and Rudolf pledged themselves to one another and made plans "to leave this old Mizriam [Egypt] and wander through the desert into the promised land" of America, "to plough the soil and on it rear the altar of a new religion that shall teach love and brotherhood to all men."[3] Through a cruel ruse,

Nathan thwarted these happy plans, misleading Rudolf into believing that Leah valued money more than his love. So, breaking off with Leah, Rudolf married a Christian named Madalena. But on the very eve of that marriage he realized his error and begged forgiveness. Leah refused and cursed him, but Rudolf, in contrition, became an advocate for the Jews and named his own daughter Leah. He even visited the emperor to plead for the right of Jews to remain in the village. The emperor in the play must have seemed familiar to Lincoln: he was "a plainly-dressed mild-looking man" whose doors were "wide open, everybody goes to him, and everybody finds place in his turn."[4] The fanciful emperor, indeed, smilingly hearkened to Rudolf's plea, declaring, "Let them stay; the laws of exile are of ancient date; I will make a new law, I myself am anxious that all my subjects should be equal, for, Jew or Christian, they all belong to me."[5] So, in the end, Rudolf and Leah reconciled, Nathan was unmasked as a scheming apostate, and Leah resolved to leave with her people for America, "the far-off—the promised land."[6]

LEAH, THE FORSAKEN

Containing many offensive lines of dialogue, Leah, The Forsaken may have reminded Lincoln of the anti-Semitic remarks of Benjamin Butler and other Civil War generals.
National Portrait Gallery, London

Leah, the Forsaken, like Harriet Beecher Stowe's great novel, Uncle Tom's Cabin, appealed to emotion and sentiment to combat prejudice. It depicted raw anti-Semitism and hatred in the hope that viewers would sympathize with Leah and recoil from her oppressors. "It is a true picture—every line and point of it limned to the life," the Jewish Messenger's theater critic cheered. He hoped that the play would help to dispel "unfounded prejudice" and lead theatergoers "to cherish kindlier sentiments towards a people who, for no fault of theirs, have been driven about from post to pillar, scarcely anywhere befriended, only recently permitted to enjoy an equal footing with other men."[7]

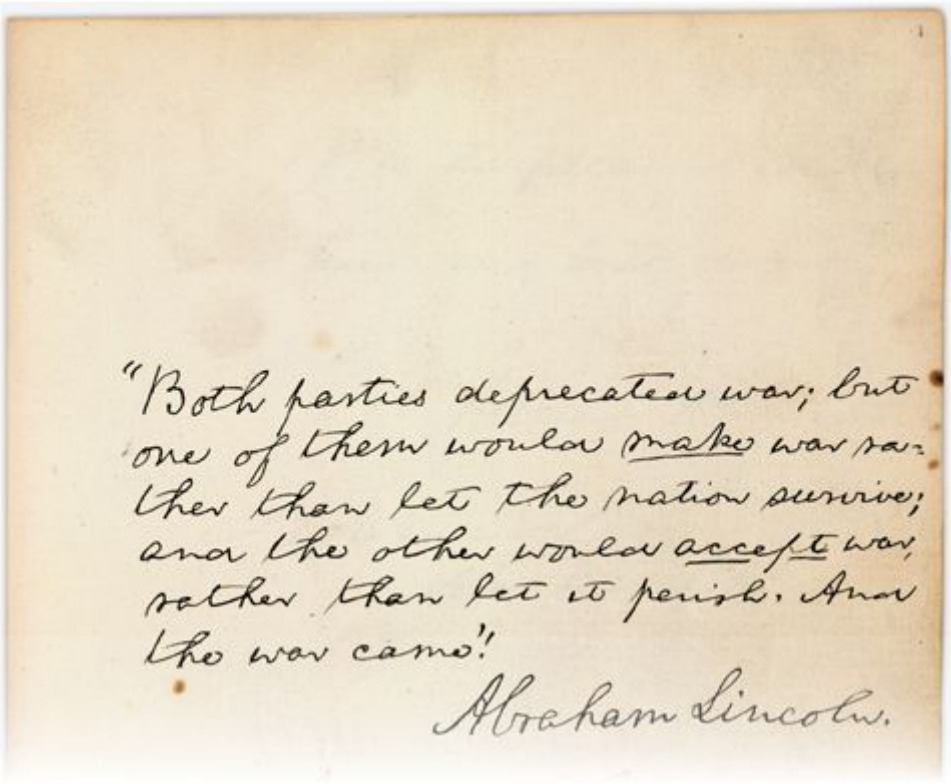
George William Curtis, the antislavery editor of Harper's Weekly, insisted that Leah also carried a more universal message, applicable to the Civil War. This, indeed, may have been what inspired the Lincolns to see the play with Tad. To Curtis, who was the son-in-law of abolitionist Francis Shaw, the anti-Jewish rabble-rousers of Austria had their counterparts in the Union and the Confederacy: those who "appeal to the popular prejudice against an outcast race." If in Europe the question was whether a Jew might be equal to a Christian, in America it was "is a negro equal to a white man?" Leah thus served as an object lesson for Americans: "Upon this hatred of race," according to Curtis, reactionaries sought to gain power "in order to abase, divide, and destroy this nation." "Go and see Leah," he charged his readers, "and have the lesson [it teaches] burned in upon your mind, which may help to save the national life and honor."[8]



"AND THE WAR CAME," MARCH 1865

In this exceedingly rare handwritten quotation from Lincoln's second inaugural, Lincoln declares: "Both parties deprecated war but one of them would make war, rather than let the nation survive, and the other would accept war rather than let it perish. And the war came."
Shapell Legacy Partnership

1865.
Inauguration Day,
MARCH 4.
Admit family of Hon. Mr. Wright
Serg't-at-arms, U. S. S.

ADMISSION TICKET TO LINCOLN'S SECOND INAUGURAL

With this card, the family of Joseph A. Wright, then the American ambassador to Prussia, is invited to Lincoln's second inaugural. There he would hear one of the greatest addresses in presidential history.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

BOOTH STALKS LINCOLN

Gazing down on Lincoln during the second inaugural, unmoved, was the actor John Wilkes Booth. Six weeks later, he would kill the president.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

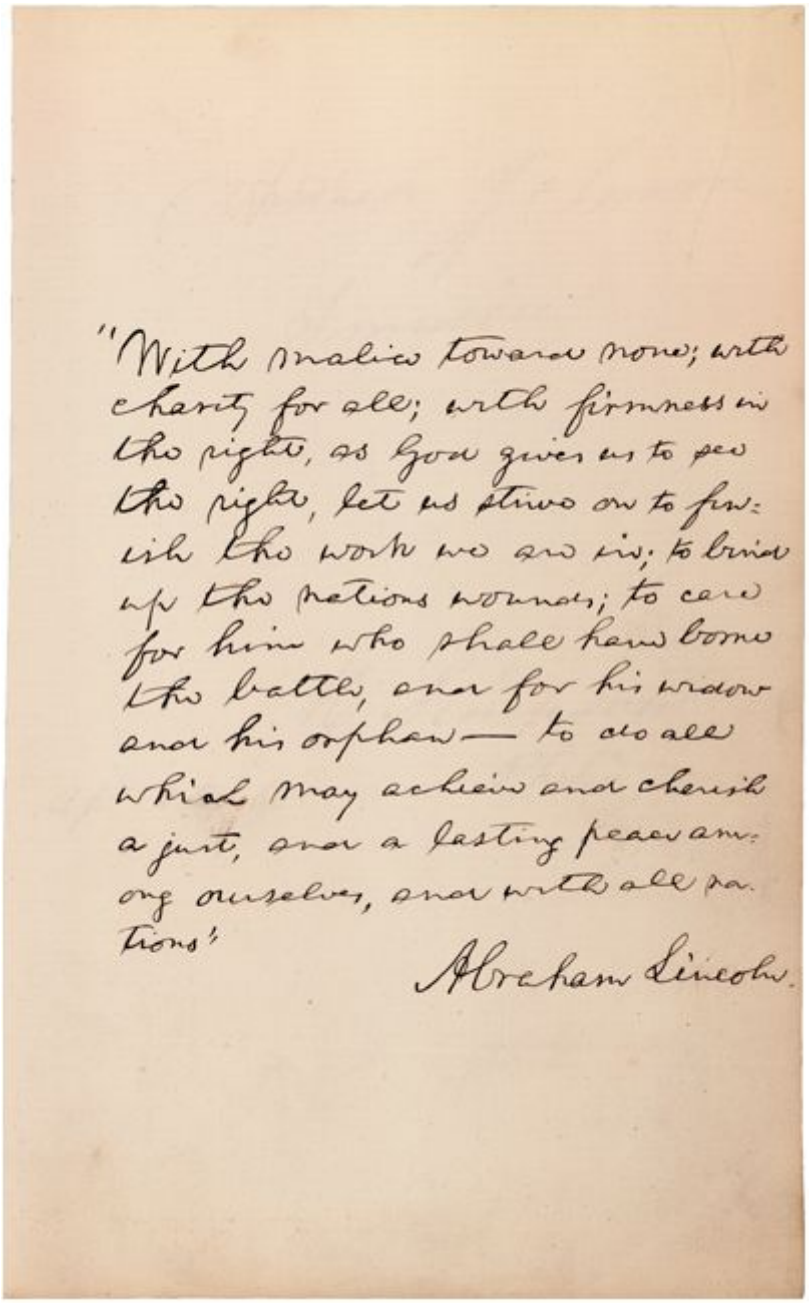
"With malice toward none and charity towards all"
Fred'k Douglass

FREDERICK DOUGLASS ON LINCOLN'S FAMOUS INAUGURAL CONCLUSION

Also listening in the crowd at Lincoln's second inaugural was Frederick Douglass, born into slavery but now the most famous free black man in America. Later, at the White House inaugural reception, policemen refused to admit a person of color. Lincoln got word of the outrage and not only ordered Douglass admitted but greeted him warmly and asked in a loud voice about his inaugural address. "There is no man in the country," Lincoln added, "whose opinion I value more."

Shapell Manuscript Collection

On March 4, at his second inaugural, Lincoln offered his own lesson concerning the Civil War and its meaning. The date that year happened to coincide with the sixth of the Hebrew month of Adar, the day, according to ancient Jewish tradition, when Moses completed his farewell address to the Jewish people and learned that his own death was imminent.[9] The weather in Washington on Inauguration Day was awful: it had, seemingly, been raining for weeks. Riding down Pennsylvania Avenue to the Capitol, Lincoln's carriage churned through some ten inches of mud and standing water. A crowd, waiting for hours at the Capitol, now stood sodden, deep in sludge.[10] Above the inaugural platform, dark clouds scudded across the horizon. At noontime, Andrew Johnson, visibly intoxicated, was sworn in as vice president of the United States, ranting somewhat incoherently about his plebian origins. But as President Lincoln stood to take the oath of office, the sun suddenly burst through the clouds and flooded the scene. Lincoln considered the sunshine at his second inaugural a "happy omen," recalling the words on the eve of the 1860 election: "Just now, the skies look bright." Sadly, the "clouds" would rise again and plunge the nation into mourning the following month.



"With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the nations wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphan — to do all which may achieve and cherish a just, and a lasting peace among ourselves, and with all nations'

Abraham Lincoln.

LINCOLN'S HISTORIC UTTERANCE FROM THE CONCLUSION OF HIS SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS, MARCH 4, 1865

These seventy-five words from the famous conclusion of Lincoln's second inaugural address, written out by Lincoln in an album for a friend, are, in American memory, indelible, and clearly have their roots in the Old Testament's espousal of charity and compassion for the suffering of those swept up in the plague of war.
Shapell Legacy Partnership

Lincoln's second inaugural address, delivered from a makeshift platform at the east front of the Capitol, was, as Frederick Douglass understood at the time, "a sacred effort." According to one scholar's calculations, it "mentioned God fourteen times, quoted the Bible four times, and invoked prayer three times"—this in a mere 700 words.[11] No previous inaugural address had ever been so overtly religious. Nevertheless, the second inaugural, unlike Lincoln's first, made no direct reference to Christianity. Instead, Lincoln posed timeless religious questions concerning God's actions and ultimate purposes. He explored the meaning of war, the wages of sin, the mystery of fraternal hatred ("both read the same Bible and pray to the same God, and each invokes His aid against the other"), and, invoking Psalm 19 ("the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether"), the inscrutability of Divine judgment. His peroration—"With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in" and, borrowing from Exodus 22, from Deuteronomy 14 and 16, from Jeremiah 7, and from Isaiah 1, calling for the nation "to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphan"—set the stage for postwar reconstruction and appealed to values cherished by Jews and Christians alike: hope, charity, reconciliation, and peace.[12]

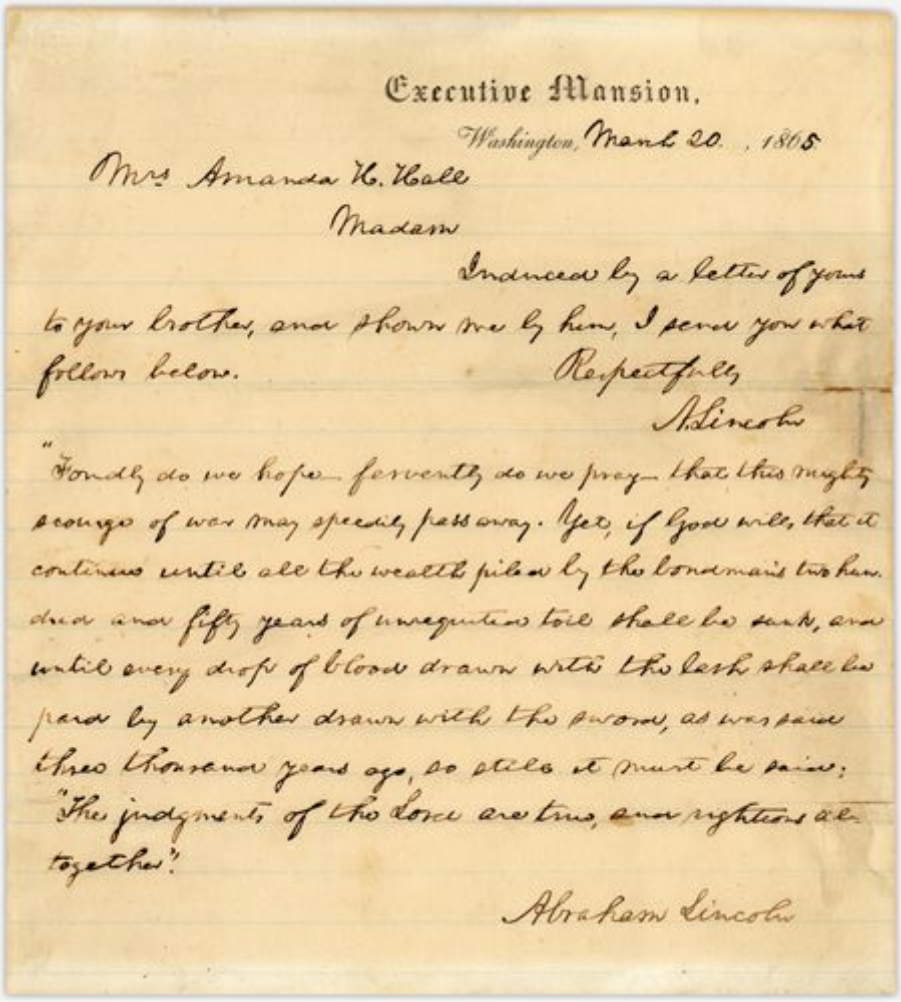
Lincoln emphasized in his second inaugural that slavery, and not secession, was the principal cause of the Civil War. To his mind, the war's terrible toll represented divine punishment upon both sides for the crime of slavery. Much as he prayed for the war to end, he was prepared for it to continue "until all the wealth piled by the bond-man's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash, shall be paid by another drawn with the sword."[13] This sharp focus upon slavery as the cause of the war distinguished Lincoln from members of the National Reform Association and other Christians who blamed the war on the omission of God and of Christianity from the text of the Constitution. Their goal was "to secure such an amendment of the Constitution of the United States as will declare the nation's allegiance to Jesus Christ and its acceptance of the moral laws of the Christian religion, and to indicate that this is a Christian nation, and place all the Christian laws, institutions and usages of our government on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land." Lincoln was polite to the National Reform Association's leaders when he met with them, but much to the relief of Jews like Myer Isaacs, he did nothing to advance their goals.[14] Instead, as his inaugural address made clear, he focused on slavery and reconstruction, and looked ahead to "a just and a lasting peace."

"The judgments of the Lord are true, and righteous altogether" Psalm 19



Executive Mansion,

Washington, March 20, 1865

Mrs Amanda H. Hall

Madam

Induced by a letter of yours to your brother, and shown me by him, I send you what follows below.

Respectfully,

A. Lincoln

"Fondly do we hope—fervently do we pray—that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet, if God wills that it continues until all the wealth piled by the bondman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said: 'The judgments of the Lord are true, and righteous altogether'."

Abraham Lincoln

LINCOLN TO AMANDA H. HALL: "FONDLY DO WE HOPE, FERVENTLY DO WE PRAY…," MARCH 20, 1865

In the most overtly religious portion of the second inaugural address, here from a letter written at the request of a supporter, Lincoln ruminates upon the divine will—and concludes, in an attempt to come to grips with four years of the terrible slaughter with a verse from Psalm 19: "The judgments of the Lord are true, and righteous altogether." In evidence of his wide grasp of the Bible, Lincoln here takes an obscure half verse from Psalms and makes it the lead-in to one of his greatest utterances: "With malice toward none, with charity for all…"
Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library & Museum

THE PURPOSES OF THE ALMIGHTY

LINCOLN'S OWN COMMENTARY on his second inaugural was contained in a letter to Thurlow Weed of New York, a journalist and political advisor. Weed had been critical of the Emancipation Proclamation. Still, he supported Lincoln's reelection and had written to compliment him on his address.

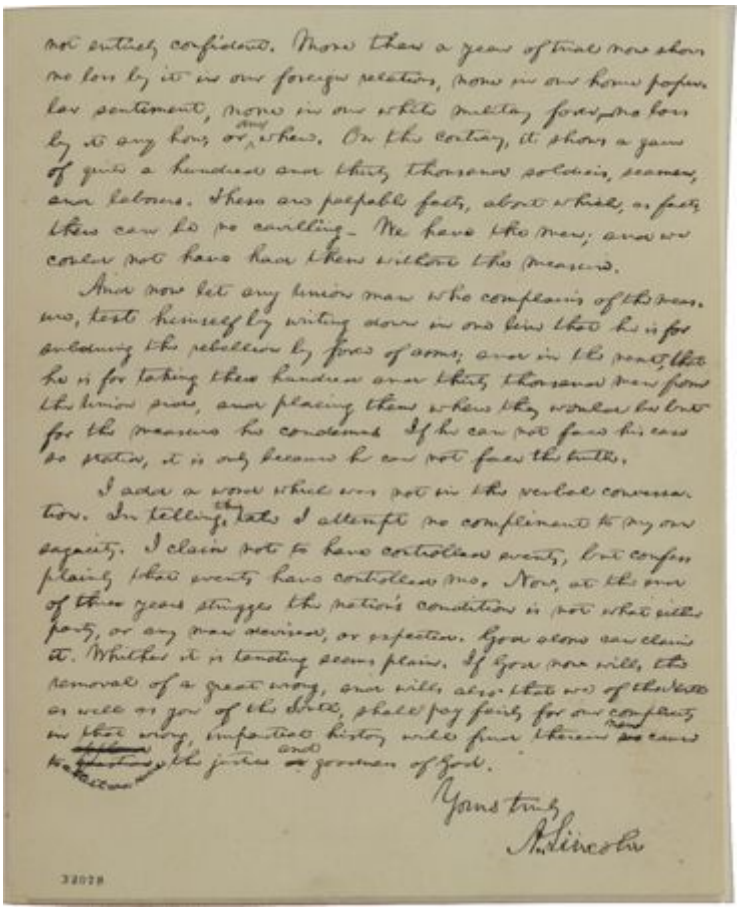
“Every one likes a compliment,” Lincoln wrote in his response, dated March 15, 1865, ten days after his inauguration. “Thank you for yours … on the recent Inaugural Address.… Men are not flattered by being shown that there has been a difference of purpose between the Almighty and them. To deny it, however, in this case, is to deny that there is a God governing the world. It is a truth which I thought needed to be told.”

Lincoln, who had hoped for a quick and victorious end to the war that the South had started, and who consistently believed that the South was morally wrong to have so long sustained an economy supported by the enslavement of human beings, nonetheless struggled with the question of why God was hesitating for years in bringing victory to the Union.

By 1864, the answer began to dawn on him. Writing to publisher Albert Hodges on April 4, he declared: “I claim not to have controlled events, but confess plainly that events have controlled me.” God now willed, he wrote, the removal of a great wrong—slavery—“and wills also that we of the North as well as you of the South, shall pay fairly for our complicity in that wrong…”

With the North fighting the battle against slavery and secession so fervently, how, the question arises, could Lincoln have dared to suggest its complicity? Both sides, he believed, were accountable to God for their actions and guilty of the cruel offense that caused the war—slavery. But what “difference of purpose” could there possibly be between the Almighty and the North? Had not the North chosen to ignore the slave markets in Washington in the years prior to the war? Or Congress’s 1854 endorsement of the extension of slavery with the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska Act? The North was further implicated in its role in the Dred Scott decision of 1857, when the Supreme Court ruled that blacks were so inferior that they had no rights that the white man was bound to respect (before the Civil War, killing a slave was not considered murder but rather destruction of property). The Fugitive Slave Law, the New York draft riots, and the Constitution itself, in which slavery was legally protected and untouchable until Lincoln alone changed its essence, were all evidence to him of the North’s undeniable collusion in the sins against humanity.

Toward the end of the war, both the North and the South, each praying to God to invoke his wrath upon the other, were not able to understand what Lincoln had come to believe: That the purpose of the war was, in essence, retribution. “The Almighty has his own purposes,” Lincoln wrote toward the end of his speech. Mentioning God no fewer than fourteen times, he goes on to say: “If God wills that it [the war] continue, until all the wealth piled by the bondman’s two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash, shall be paid by another drawn with the sword.…” Lincoln then goes on to declare that God has his own reasons—and the final word—for allowing the slaughter of more than 600,000, summarized in ten simple, and perhaps cleansing, words, taken from an obscure half verse in Psalms: “The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.”



not entirely confident. More than a year of trial now shows no loss by it in our foreign relations, none in our home popular sentiment, none in our white military force — no loss by it any how or any where. On the contrary, it shows a gain of quite a hundred and fifty thousand soldiers, seamen, and laborers. These are palpable facts, about which, as facts, there can be no caviling. We have the men; and we could not have had them without the measure.

And now let any honest man who complains of the measure, test himself by writing down in one line that he is for subduing the rebellion by force of arms; and in the next, that he is for taking these hundred and fifty thousand men from the Union prosecution, and placing them where they would be useless for the purpose he condemns. If he can not face his case so stated, it is only because he can not face the truth.

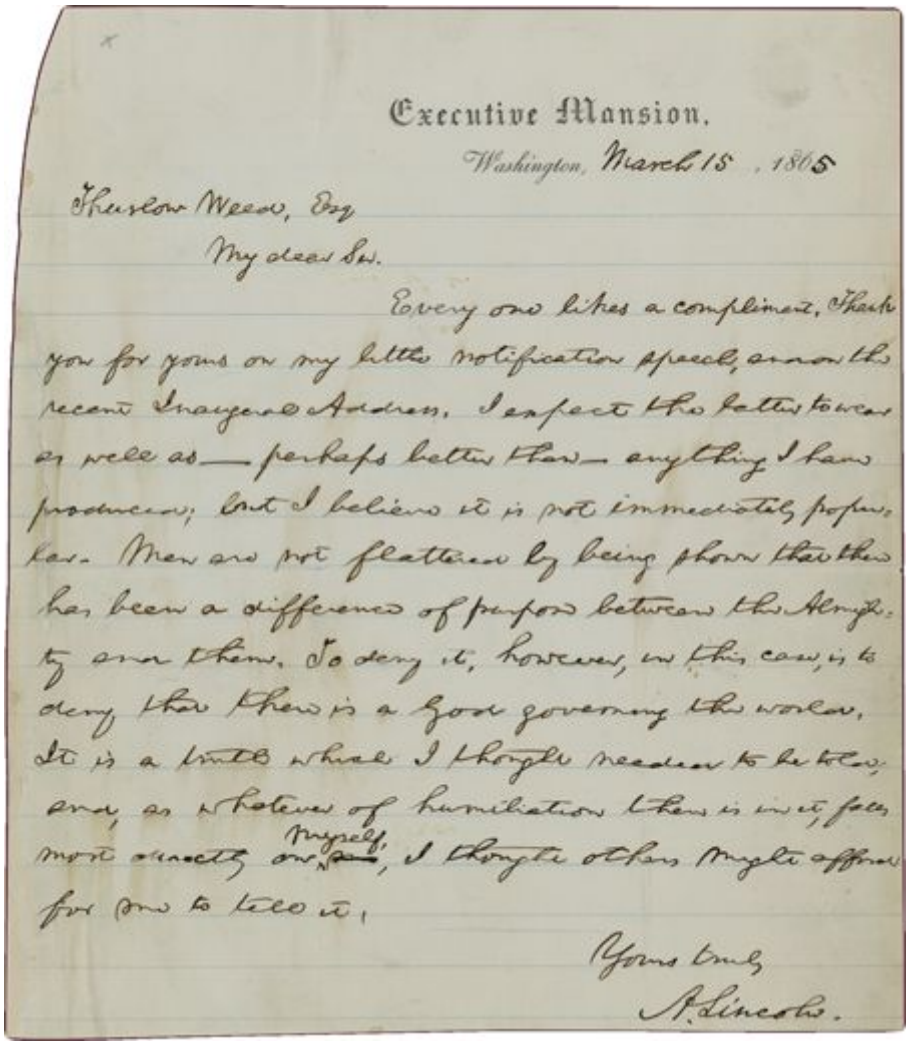
I add a word which was not in the verbal conversation. In telling the story I attempt no compliment to my own sagacity. I claim not to have controlled events, but confess plainly that events have controlled me. Now, at the end of three years struggle the nation's condition is not what either party, or any man devised, or expected. God alone can claim it. Whither it is tending seems plain. If God now wills the removal of a great wrong, and wills also that we of the North as well as you of the South, shall pay fully for our complicity in that wrong, impartial history will find therein new cause to ~~attribute~~ honor the justice and goodness of God.

Yours truly,
A. Lincoln

32028

THE LAST PAGE OF LINCOLN'S LETTER TO ALBERT HODGES, APRIL 4, 1864

Courtesy of the Library of Congress



Executive Mansion.

Washington, March 15, 1865

Thurlow Weed, Esq

My dear Sir.

Every one likes a compliment. Thank you for yours on my little notification speech, and on the recent Inaugural Address. I expect the latter to wear as well as — perhaps better than — anything I have produced; but I believe it is not immediately popular. Men are not flattered by being shown that there has been a difference of purpose between the Almighty and them. To deny it, however, in this case, is to deny that there is a God governing the world. It is a truth which I thought needed to be told; and as whatever of humiliation there is in it, falls most directly on myself, I thought others might afford for me to tell it.

Yours truly

A. Lincoln.

LINCOLN TO THURLOW WEED, MARCH 15, 1865

Shapell Legacy Partnership

The Jewish lawyer and B'nai B'rith leader Simon Wolf thought that Lincoln's inaugural address "evinced more of the priest than the statesman."[15] Overall, responses to the second inaugural were decidedly mixed. Lincoln himself, however, was pleased with his performance. He correctly foretold that the address would "wear as well as—perhaps better than—anything I have produced." While he recognized that his words were "not immediately popular," he attributed this to the fact that "men are not flattered by being shown that there has been a difference of purpose between the Almighty and them." "It is a truth," he explained, "which I thought needed to be told."[16]

THE FALL OF RICHMOND

On April 2, 1865, Richmond was on fire, falling into Union hands. On the very next day, Lincoln would tell Stanton of his intention to visit the fallen city.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

Lincoln visited the front soon after his inauguration and reassured General Grant that "never for a moment" had he doubted the final success of the Union's cause. On April 3, at Grant's invitation and over the objections of Secretary of War Stanton ("Consider whether you ought to expose the nation to the Consequence of any disaster to yourself"), he came to inspect the just-fallen city of Petersburg, Virginia. He urged, as he had several times before, that vanquished rebels be treated leniently. On his return, he thanked Stanton for worrying about him." I will take care of myself," he promised.[17]

The very next day, Union troops entered Richmond. "Thank God that I have lived to see this!" Lincoln declared upon hearing the exciting news.[18] Along with his son, Tad, a bodyguard, and some military men, he set sail for Richmond that morning. Crowds of newly freed blacks and poor whites surrounded Lincoln, shouting, singing, dancing; some even knelt before him. "Don't kneel to me," he gently upbraided them. "That is not right. You must kneel to God only, and thank him for the liberty you will hereafter enjoy." When "an old negro" blessed Lincoln with a paraphrase of the priestly blessing "May the good Lord bless and keep you safe," (Numbers 6:24), the president raised his hat in gratitude and bowed. In so doing, one observer recounted, he "upset the forms, laws, customs and ceremonies of centuries."[19] Many old-time white residents, of course, were heartbroken at what they saw going on around them. Emma Mordecai, scion of a large slave-holding Jewish family, saw black Union troops guarding the roads and declared that they were "all as ill-bred as old Lincoln himself."[20]

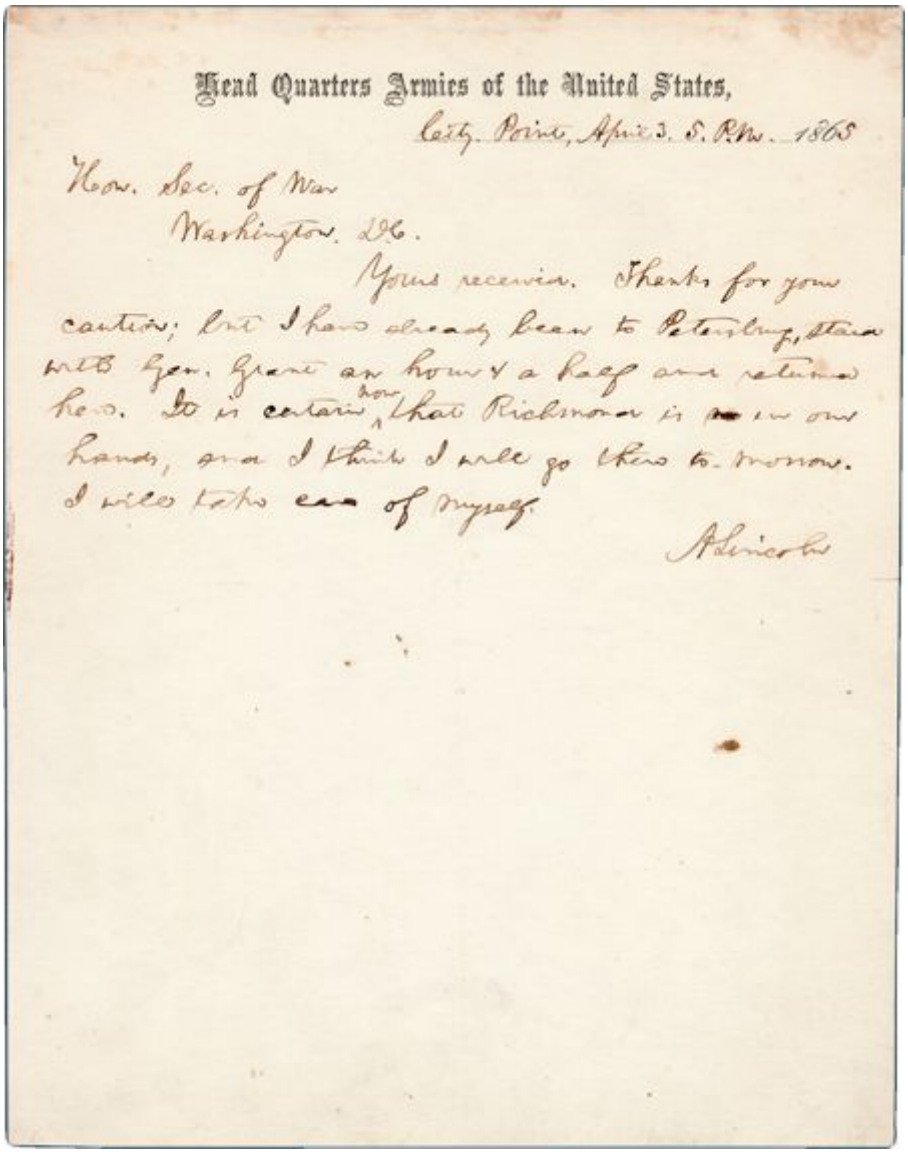
"It is certain now that Richmond is in our hands … I will take care of myself."



Head Quarters Armies of the United States,
City Point, April 3. 5 PM. 1865

Hon. Sec. of War
Washington. D.C.

Yours received. Thanks for your caution; but I have already been to Petersburg, staid with Gen. Grant an hour & a half and returned here. It is certain now, that Richmond is in our hands, and I think I will go there to-morrow. I will take care of myself.

A. Lincoln

LINCOLN TO EDWIN STANTON: "… NOW THAT RICHMOND IS IN OUR HANDS," APRIL 3, 1865

By April 3, 1865, the carnage was almost over, and Lincoln, barely able to contain himself, hurried to the front, waiting for Richmond, the Confederate capital, to fall. Stanton, appalled at the danger, warned Lincoln not to "expose the nation to the Consequence of any disaster" that could easily befall him. Lincoln replied here, reassuringly, with what in little more than a week would become sad irony: "I will take care of myself."
Shapell Legacy Partnership

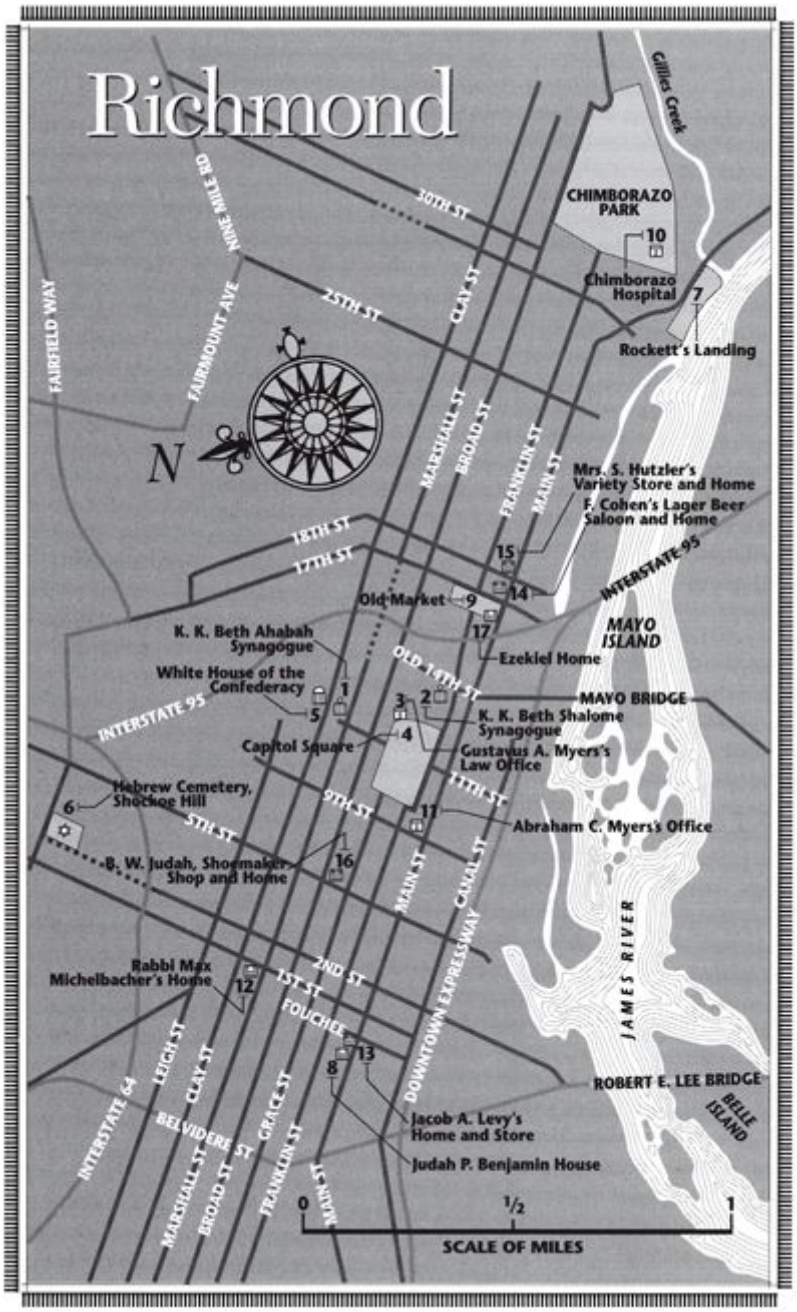
The general in charge of those black troops and now of all of Richmond, Godfrey Weitzel, soon dispatched cavalry to accompany Lincoln to the executive residence of Jefferson Davis. Along the way, he passed the city's first synagogue, Kahal Kadosh Beth Shalome, established in 1790. Arriving at the "Confederate White House," the president sat in Jefferson Davis's chair and asked for a glass of water. Later, he toured the city, reassuring blacks that they were free. That evening, on the USS Malvern, Lincoln met with the only high-ranking Confederate to remain in the capital: John A. Campbell, assistant secretary of war for the Confederacy and a former U.S. Supreme Court associate justice. Lincoln's goal was to pacify the city and return Virginia to the Union. He therefore proposed to Campbell that the two of them sit down with other moderate state leaders the next morning to consider how best to proceed.

LINCOLN AND SON AT THE FALL OF RICHMOND

Lincoln arrives in Richmond and tours the fallen city.
Gilder Lehrman Institute

Only one Southern leader joined Campbell for that meeting: Gustavus Adolphus Myers (1801–69), the city's most prominent Jew and a noted attorney and businessman. A third-generation American and a descendant of one of the city's oldest and wealthiest Jewish families, Myers was a close friend of the Jewish Confederate statesman and secretary of state, Judah P. Benjamin; a former president of the city council; a founder of the Virginia Historical Society; a prominent Mason; a leader in his synagogue; and the proud husband of Anne, the Episcopalian daughter of Virginia's former governor

William Branch Giles.[21] Although he did not know it, Myers had also played a symbolic role in the entry of Union troops into Richmond. His mulatto grandson, William Gill Forrester, scion of Myers's youthful relationship with a free woman of color named Nelly Forrester, had raised the American flag at the Virginia capitol when Union soldiers recaptured it; Forrester had secretly saved and hidden that flag four years earlier when Virginia seceded.[22]



WALKING PAST THE SYNAGOGUE

From the Richmond harbor, Lincoln left the USS Malvern and walked through the center of the city, passing the the 14th Street Kahal Kadosh Beth Shalome synagogue, the center of Richmond's prominent Jewish community, as well as other Jewish sites, on his way to Davis's wartime residence—the Confederate White House—a short distance away.

Courtesy of Tim Belshaw

Myers, Campbell, and General Weitzel met with Lincoln on the Malvern, docked in the Richmond harbor, on the morning of April 5. "Our interview with the President commenced," Myers reported in a memorandum of the conversation, "by his stating that he understood we came in no official capacity and that we were unauthorized to act on any matter that might be the subject of our conversation, which we of course confirmed. He then told us that he had written a paper which he would read to us, accompanied by a verbal running commentary of his own when he considered explanation was necessary." Lincoln, according to Myers, called for the restoration of national authority, made clear that "he could not retract from anything" that he had announced concerning the emancipation of slaves, promised to exercise "sincere liberality" when it came to confiscating property (though in his written paper Lincoln added the threat that "if the war be now further persisted in" he would insist on confiscating property "to bear the additional cost"), and, finally, "professed himself really desirous to see an end of the struggle," trusting "in the Providence of God that there never would be another." In subsequent conversation—conducted in a spirit of "entire civility and good humor"—he talked about convening the Virginia legislature in hopes of restoring Virginia to the Union and discussed the question of loyalty oaths. (Myers believed that they would "be productive of irritation and conducive to no good result.")

GUSTAVUS MYERS

On April 5, Lincoln met with Confederate assistant secretary of war John A. Campbell, and was joined by Gustavus Adolphus Myers, one of Richmond's most prominent Jewish citizens and a well-respected attorney.
Virginia Historical Society

USS MALVERN

Lincoln met with Campbell, Myers, and Union General Weitzel aboard the gunboat USS Malvern, lying on the James River in the Richmond harbor, where he had also spent the previous night.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

Most significantly, the president set forth the philosophy that he expected to guide his postwar reconstruction policies: a "disposition to be lenient towards all persons, however prominent, who had taken part in the struggle" without "any feeling of vindictiveness or of exultation."[23] Ten years earlier, incensed at the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, he had expressed the contrary view, that "like Haman," those responsible "should hang upon the gallows of their own building."[24] Many advocated applying just such a policy to the leaders of the Confederacy. Yet Lincoln refused. Instead, in a private conversation with General Weitzel, he expressed in the homespun language that he preferred the conciliatory philosophy that he had now come to champion: "If I were in your place," he said, "I'd let 'em up easy, let 'em up easy."[25]

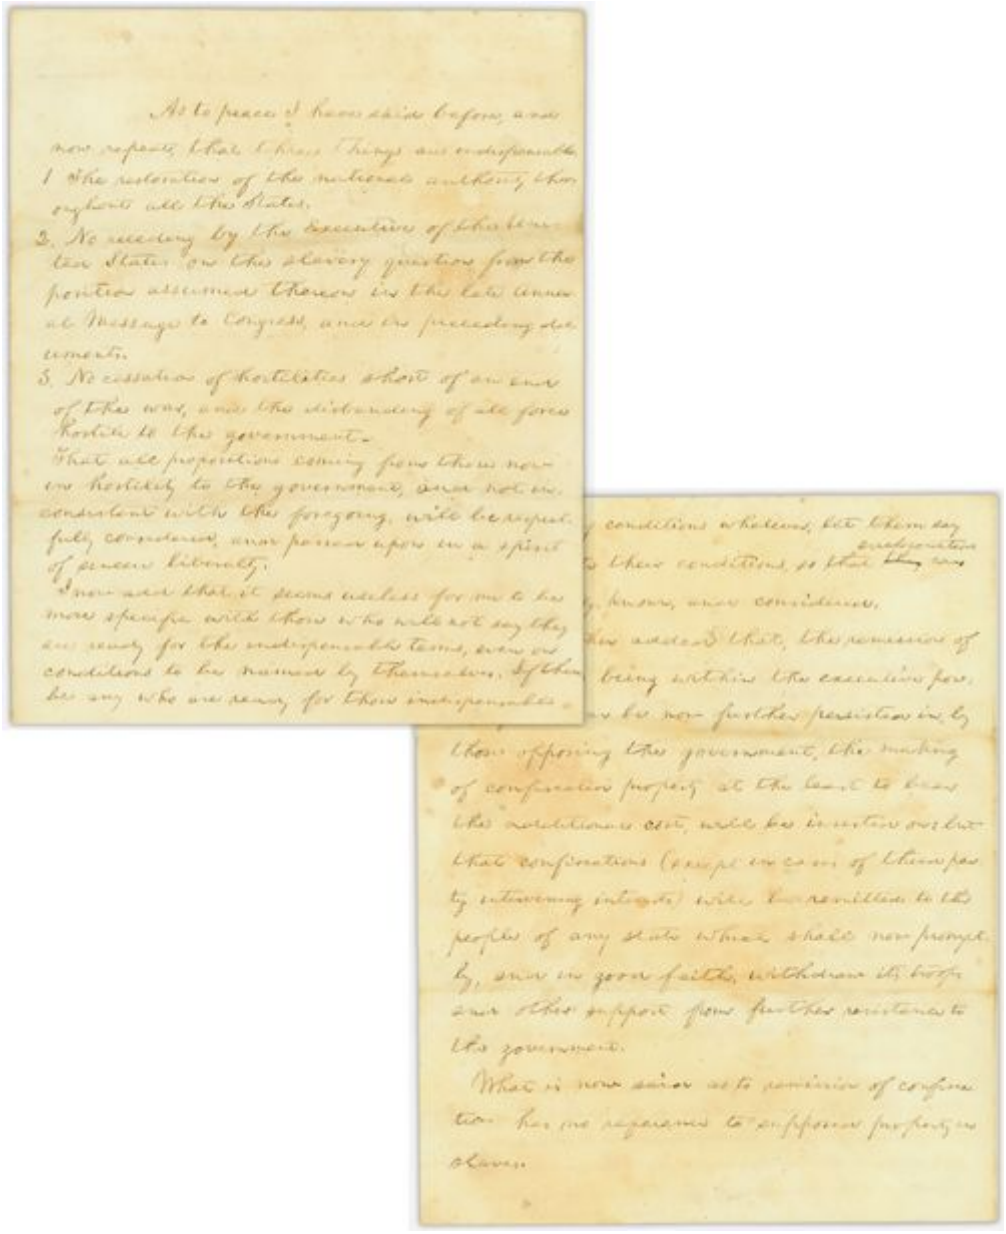
Just four days after this meeting, on April 9, Lincoln's philosophy was placed on public display when Robert E. Lee surrendered his army to Ulysses S. Grant at the brick home of Wilmer McLean in the village of Appomattox Court House, Virginia. Grant, in keeping with Lincoln's orders, was magnanimous. Confederate officers and men would be allowed to return home, "not to be disturbed by U.S. authority so long as they observe their paroles and the laws in force where they may reside." They were thus immune from prosecution for treason. Grant let the defeated soldiers take their horses along with them, so that they could plant crops; he provided them with three days of rations; and he muted Union celebrations. "The war is over," he told his troops; "the rebels are our countrymen again, and the best sign of rejoicing after the victory will be to abstain from all demonstrations."[26]

"As to peace ... these things are indispensable."



As to peace I have said before, and now repeat, that three things are indispensable.
1. The restoration of the national authority throughout all the States.
2. No receding by the Executive of the Government on the slavery question from the position assumed thereon in the late Annual Message to Congress, and in the preceding documents.
3. No cessation of hostilities short of an end of the war, and the disbanding of all forces hostile to the government.
That all propositions coming from those now in hostility to the government, and not inconsistent with the foregoing, will be respectfully considered, and passed upon in a spirit of sincere liberality.
I now add that it seems useless for me to be more specific with those who will not say they are ready for the indispensable terms, even on conditions to be named by themselves. If there be any who are ready for those indispensables conditions whatever, let them say modification to their conditions, so that they can know, and consider.

And added that the removal of being within the executive pow-be now further persisted in, by those opposing the government, the making of confiscation property at the least to bear the rebellious cost, will be in nature and be that confiscations (except in cases of those pe by intervening interests) will be remitted to the people of any state which shall now promptly, and in good faith, withdraw its force and other support from further resistance to the government.
What is now said as to remission of confiscation has no reference to supposed property in slaves.

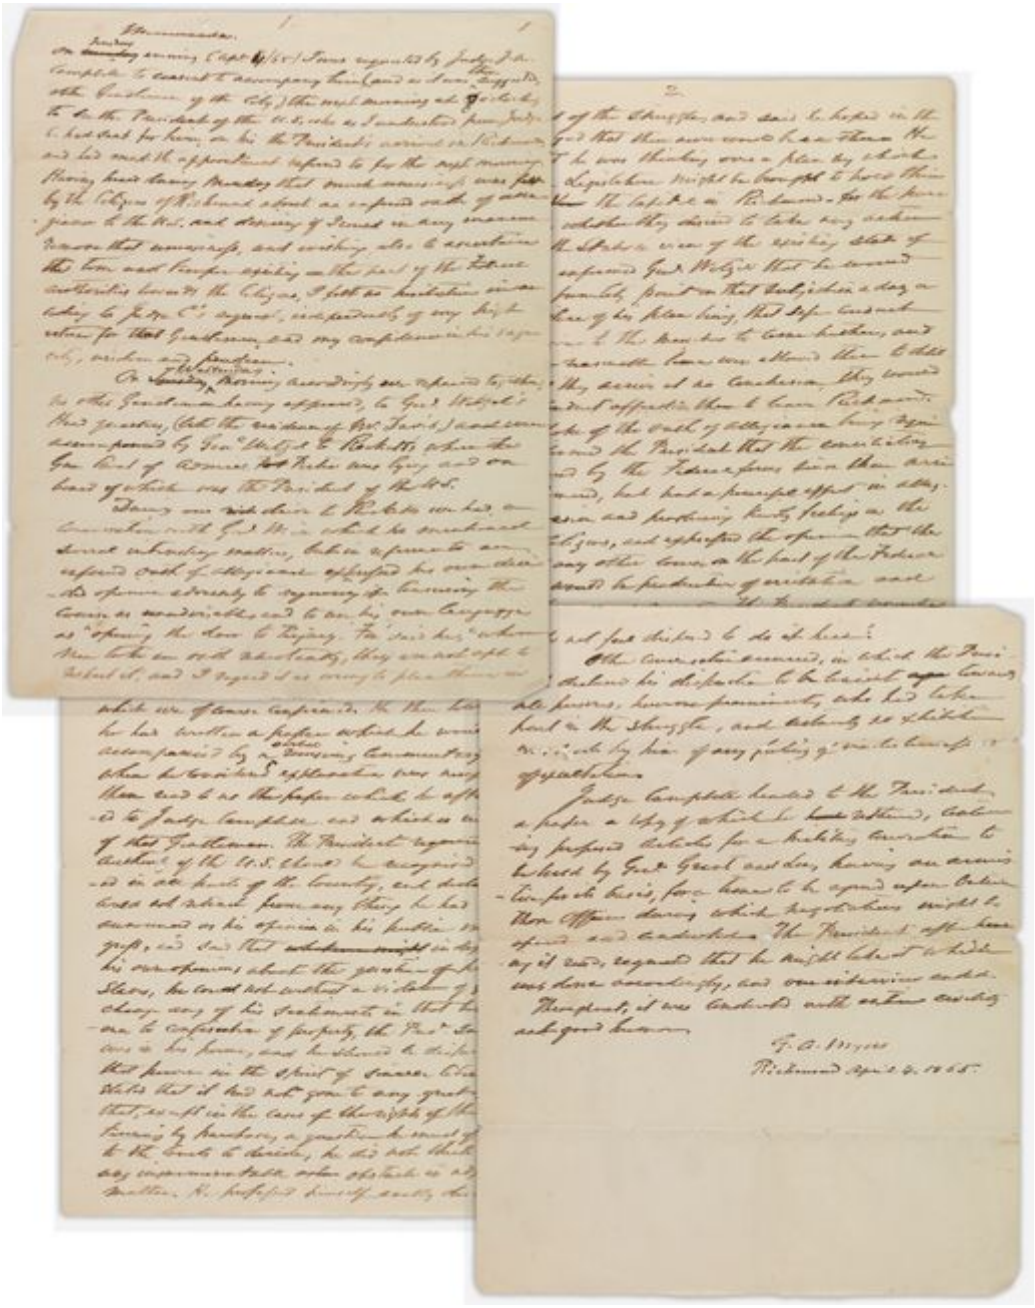
LINCOLN'S NOTES REGARDING CONDITIONS FOR PEACE, APRIL 5, 1865

In a handwritten memorandum that he read at the meeting aboard the Malvern with Judge Campbell and Gustavus Myer, Lincoln laid out his conditions for peace with the South, demanding the surrender of all Confederate armies, the restoration of the Union, and the end of slavery. "The President was prepared for the visit and spoke with freedom," Campbell recalled. Lincoln addressed inquiries to Myers relative to the composition of the legislature, the character of its members, and the advisability of the oath of allegiance. The meeting, however, led nowhere: four days later Lee surrendered to Grant at Appomattox Court House.

Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library & Museum



GUSTAVUS MYERS REPORTS ON HIS MEETING WITH LINCOLN

Though misdated for a day earlier, Myers's report details the meeting with Lincoln, which took several hours and ended "with mutual goodwill," but with no results.
Virginia Historical Society

The surrender at Appomattox occurred fortuitously just one day before Jews across the country sat down to observe the Passover seder, commemorating their own ancestors' passage from slavery to freedom, the exodus of the ancient Israelites from Egyptian bondage. The coincidence won notice from contemporaries. "As the forefathers of the Jews passed over the Red Sea at the time of which this festival is the anniversary," the New York Herald reported, "so also the American people seemed to have passed over and beyond the red sea of blood which has been spilt so freely during the last four years." The Boston Daily Advertiser explicitly pointed to the "coincidence that the modern people of bondage [Southern slaves] have seen their deliverance confirmed and nearly consummated, about the same season of the year [as Passover]; and from what we have seen of their bearing and understanding of the event they are not unlikely to regard its anniversary with equal reverence."[27]

LINCOLN TO JOSHUA SPEED, "IF LIKE HAMAN THEY SHOULD HANG UPON THE GALLOWS…"

Where once, ten years before, Lincoln had declared his satisfaction at the thought that those who wished to protect slavery might, like Haman, "hang upon the gallows of their own building," now, in Richmond, he urged that Confederate leaders instead be, he said, "let up easy." Having for four terrible years presided over a conflict that had already taken the lives of 600,000 of his countrymen, he would, it seems, do anything to prevent one more drop of blood being shed.
Courtesy of the Massachusetts Historical Society

The events of April 11 continued that same pattern. Just as many Jews were sitting down to a second seder, Lincoln delivered what would be his last public address, on reconstruction, including his most explicit statement yet on black suffrage. After acknowledging "He, from Whom all blessings flow"—an epithet for the divine that once again bespoke his sensitivity to non-Christians—he turned to the long-simmering problem of how to readmit Louisiana into the Union. More than a year earlier, Lincoln had thrown his support to the state's governor—the Jewish-born but not Jewish identifying Michael Hahn—who was elected by a minority of voters that excluded both former rebels and all blacks. After congratulating Hahn for "having fixed your name in history as the first free-state Governor of Louisiana," the president had quietly suggested that he consider widening the franchise to include "some of the colored people … as, for instance, the very intelligent, and especially those who have fought gallantly in our ranks." Enfranchising those men, he argued in a striking metaphor, "would probably help, in some trying time to come, to keep the jewel of liberty within the family of freedom."[28]

While Louisiana's new state constitution did not go as far in preserving that "jewel" as Lincoln had hoped, it did provide for the education of all children without regard to race, guaranteed equal rights to all in court, and permitted blacks to serve in the militia.[29] Lincoln, in his public address on April 11, declared for the first time that those concessions might not suffice: "It is also unsatisfactory to some that the elective franchise is not given to the colored man. I would myself prefer that it were now conferred on the very intelligent, and on those who serve our cause as soldiers." Still, he advocated that Louisiana be welcomed back into the Union "as it is, and help to improve it." He disagreed with those who sought to reject and disperse the state's new government. His approach to reconstruction, he indicated, would be to remain flexible and build up gradually and incrementally, until the early buds of freedom "ripened to a complete success."[30]

The popular but deranged young actor John Wilkes Booth, who heard Lincoln's address on that second night of Passover, understood exactly what the president meant by his timely discussion of freedom. "That means nigger citizenship," he exclaimed to a friend. Forgoing his previous plot to kidnap Lincoln in order to end the war, he now resolved upon another course of action: "Now by God, I'll put him through. That is the last speech he will ever make."[31]

Booth belonged to a celebrated family of actors frequently described as being of Jewish "extraction" or "descent."[32] They traced their ancestors back to Spain. Booth's father, the tragic actor and unstable alcoholic Junius Brutus Booth, was characterized by his daughter as a man who "worshipped at many shrines." "In the synagogue," she recalled, "he was known as a Jew, because he conversed with rabbis and learned doctors, and joined their worship in the Hebraic tongue. He read the Talmud, also, and strictly adhered to many of its laws."[33] Booth's brother, the eminent actor Edwin Booth, was a favorite of the Jewish community and, according to Isaac Mayer Wise, personally confessed to him "that he was the son of a Jew."[34] As for John Wilkes Booth, he is not known ever to have identified as Jewish or have been so identified. In the 1850s, he had played on the amateur stage in Cleveland with various Jews, including Simon Wolf, whom some said resembled him. He also, as we have seen, played the part of Shylock at Grover's Theater. On the Friday morning of April 14, 1865, according to Wolf, remarkably, he and Booth met in front of the Metropolitan Hotel in Washington and shared a drink.[35]

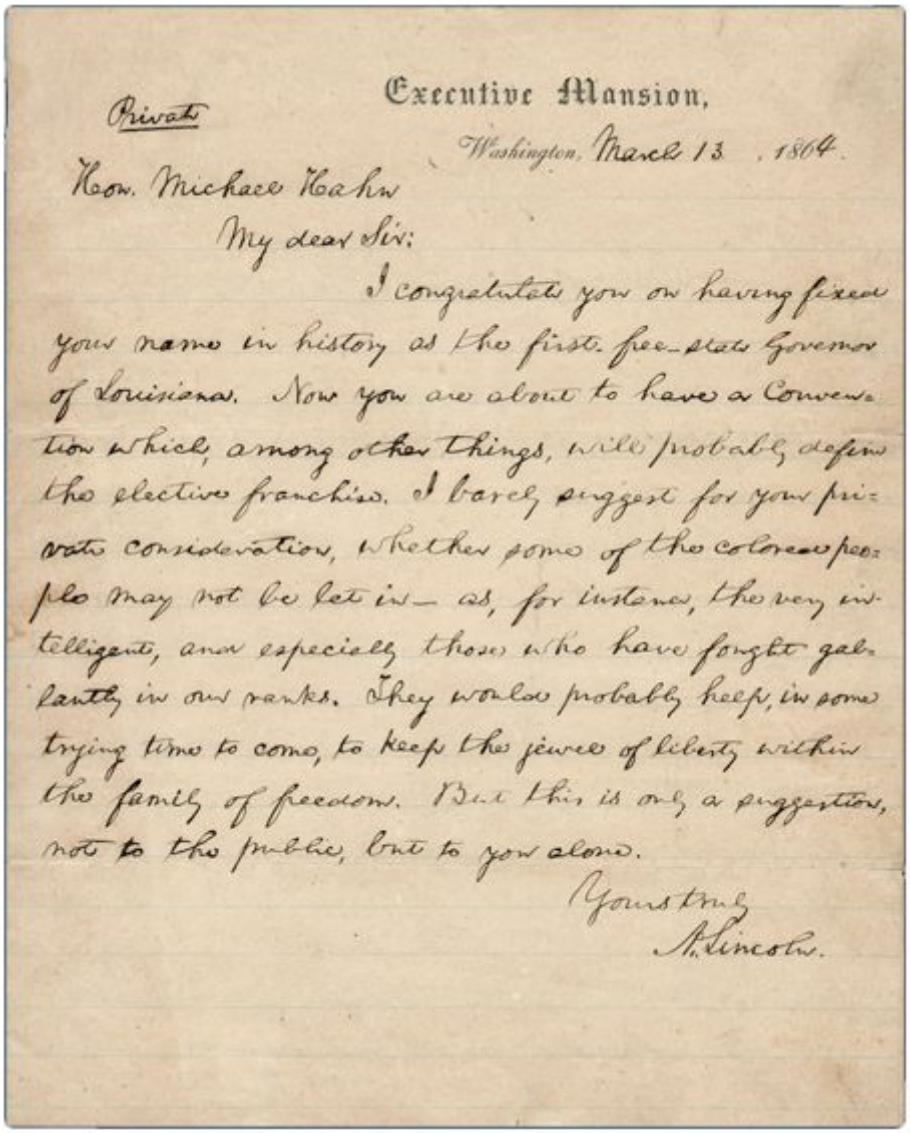
"... to keep the jewel of liberty within the family of freedom."



Executive Mansion,

Washington, March 13, 1864.

Private

Hon. Michael Hahn

My dear Sir:

I congratulate you on having fixed your name in history as the first free-state Governor of Louisiana. Now you are about to have a Convention which, among other things, will probably define the elective franchise. I barely suggest for your private consideration, whether some of the colored people may not be let in — as, for instance, the very intelligent, and especially those who have fought gallantly in our ranks. They would probably help, in some trying time to come, to keep the jewel of liberty within the family of freedom. But this is only a suggestion, not to the public, but to you alone.

Yours truly

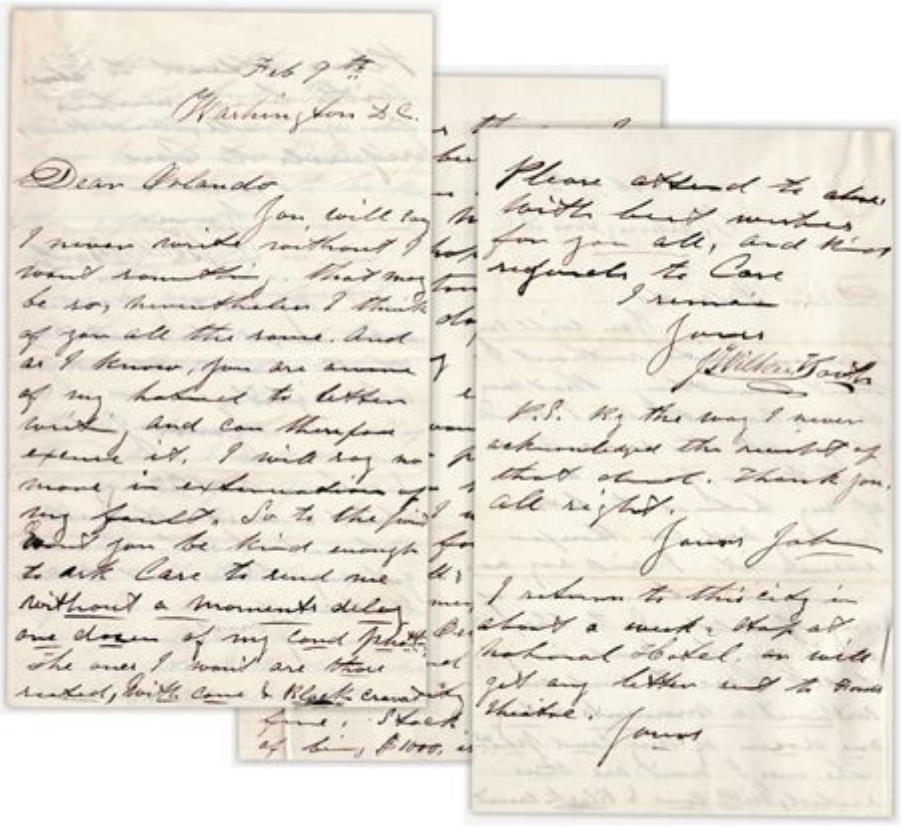
A. Lincoln.

LINCOLN TO MICHAEL HAHN: "THE JEWEL OF LIBERTY," MARCH 13, 1864

Lincoln asks how might full citizenship be extended to African Americans in a postbellum state. Putting the question to Michael Hahn, the Jewish-born governor of Louisiana, Lincoln tactfully answers his own query, suggesting that he consider widening the franchise to include "some of the colored people ... as, for instance, the very intelligent, and especially those who have fought gallantly in our ranks ... to keep the jewel of liberty within the family of freedom." Lincoln would repeat his desire for black suffrage in a speech on April 11. John Wilkes Booth, listening in the crowd, was so enraged by the concept that he vowed then to kill Lincoln.

Shapell Legacy Partnership

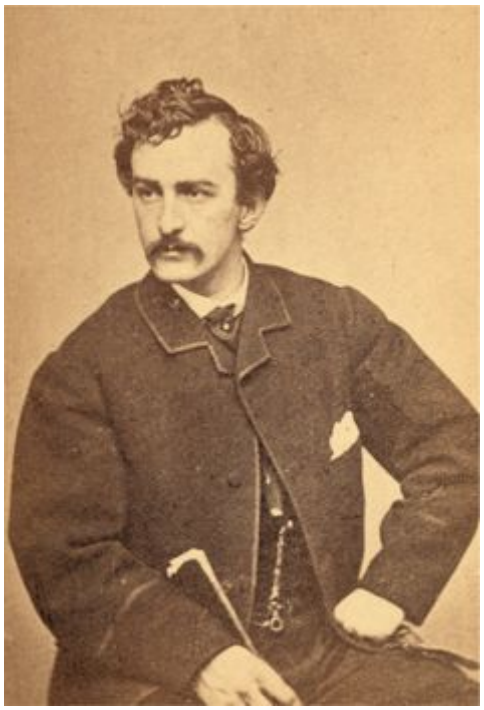
"I return to this city in about a week, stop at National Hotel, and will get any letter sent to Fords Theatre."



JOHN WILKES BOOTH, FEBRUARY 9, 1865

Whether, when John Wilkes Booth wrote this long and intriguing letter, he was just planning to abduct President Lincoln or to kill him instead, is impossible to determine. Writing to a longtime friend, he makes an urgent request: "Would you be kind enough to ask Case to send me without a moments delay one dozen of my card photghs…" It is thought that Booth wanted the photos for identification purposes connected to the Lincoln conspiracy, adding "I return to this city in about a week, stop at National Hotel, and will get any letter sent to Fords Theatre." On April 14, 1865, picking up his mail at Ford's, Booth heard that Lincoln would be attending Our American Cousin there that evening and decided to use that opportunity to kill Lincoln. His favorite photograph, "seated, with cane & black cravat," would soon adorn the wanted poster for the assassination of the president.

Shapell Manuscript Collection



ACTOR AND ASSASSIN JOHN WILKES BOOTH, 1865

Courtesy of the Library of Congress

FRIDAY, APRIL 14, 1865.

Murder of Abraham Lincoln President of the U.S. by John Wilkes Booth, at Ford's Theatre 10 P.M.

Secretary and Asst. Sec. Seward mortally wounded by parties unknown. The City in state of excitement. Tumult and Consternation. Bells Tolling, people hurrying, all kinds in Confusion, groaning among the Dead, This is the Anniversary of the Fall of Sumter, the fourth year of this Terrible Rebellion, ending in Assassination & Death of Chief Actors in Scenes

SATURDAY, APRIL 15, 1865.

At twenty two minutes past 7 o'clock A.M. at the House of the Petersen a German Tailor the President, Surrounded by the Cabinet, his distinguished Family, friends & his last, and at rest of the Great and Good Man was before its maker. Such glorious ruminent Heroism was never seen, the Heavens are shrouded, the Sun sinks down, and Nature sympathizes with our great Loss.

Treason has done his worst, the Madmen fiends, have slain their best friends and have now launched their Lives upon the boisterous Ocean of Johnsons Hands & Measures. At 12 M. today V.P. Johnson was sworn in

Reproduction of Pages from My Diary of 1865

A PAGE FROM THE DIARY OF SIMON WOLF, APRIL 14–15, 1865

In this page from Simon Wolf's diary, he describes the "tumult ... and consternation" in the immediate aftermath of Lincoln's assassination, the conspiracy, and Lincoln's last hours. Wolf was one of the few people who had personal relationships over a number of years with both Lincoln and Booth.

Simon Wolf, Presidents I Have Known

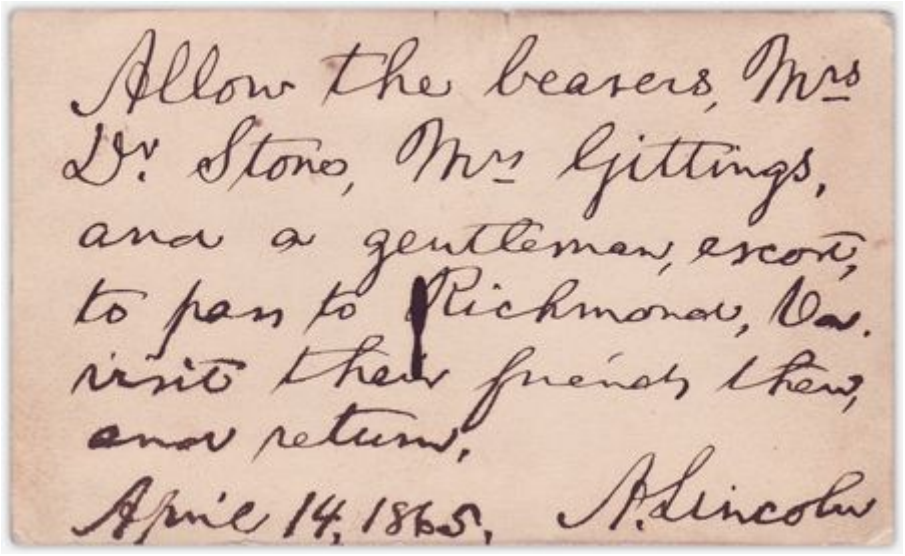
While Wolf and Booth were drinking, Lincoln was meeting with his cabinet. The discussion that Friday covered numerous issues: regulations concerning trade, the reassertion of federal authority, plans for reconstruction, and more. Everybody's mind, however, was on North Carolina, for Confederate forces there were holding out in Raleigh, and word was awaited imminently from General Sherman, whose job it was to subdue those holdouts and bring the war formally to an end. Secretary of the Navy Gideon Welles recorded in his diary that Lincoln was optimistic, "for he had last night the usual dream which he had preceding nearly every great and important event of the War." In the dream, Lincoln recounted, "he seemed to be in some singular, indescribable vessel, and that he was moving with great rapidity towards an indefinite shore." "Generally the news had been favorable which succeeded this dream," he declared hopefully, "and the dream itself was always the same.… We shall, judging from the past, have great news very soon." As Welles noted gloomily when he recorded this remarkable scene, "Great events did, indeed, follow."[36]

Meanwhile, in Cincinnati, Rabbi Max Lilienthal was already celebrating the "national victory." In a public lecture delivered at his synagogue on April 14, he spoke of how far he and his congregants had advanced "intellectually, morally and politically" during the course of the war. "Four years ago," he confessed, "how many of us were Abolitionists? How many of us dreamt of the possibility that this sacred soil of liberty should be cleansed from the scourge of slavery? How many of us had the moral courage enough to think that this great stain could be or should be removed from the brilliant escutcheon of the American people?" He recalled the contempt shown toward Abraham Lincoln ("the scorned railsplitter") upon his election and first inauguration. He doubtless remembered that he had himself opposed Lincoln at that time and that his friend Rabbi Isaac Mayer Wise had mocked Lincoln repeatedly. Now, four years later, it was time to repent, for "the same man, re-elected to the same office" was "respected and revered … as a man of manifest destiny and heroic immortality." "May the Lord forgive those who slandered our good President," Lilienthal exclaimed, as if seeking absolution for himself and his friends. "We had rather complain of the goodness and mercy of his heart than the severity of his administration." Echoing Lincoln, he then called for "no hatred, no vengeance to the South" and urged his listeners to show "that we can be as magnanimous in peace as terrible in war."[37]



Allow the bearers, Mrs
Dr. Stone, Mrs Gittings, and a gentleman escort,
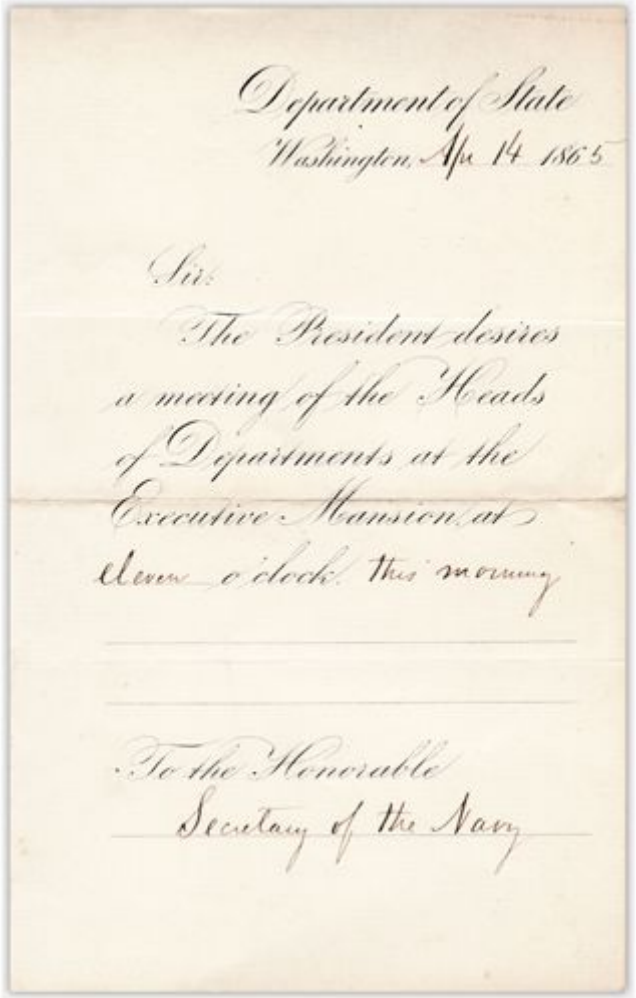
to pass to Richmond, Va.
visit their friends there,
and return.
April 14, 1865. A. Lincoln

ONE OF LINCOLN'S LAST NOTES, APRIL 14, 1865

In a subtle twist of irony, Lincoln interacts with both Dr. and Mrs. Stone on the last day of his life. Here the president issues a pass for "Mrs. Dr. Stone" to travel to Richmond; by that night, her husband, the Lincoln family physician, would be attending at Lincoln's deathbed.

Shapell Manuscript Collection



Department of State
Washington Apl 14 1865

Sir

The President desires a meeting of the Heads of Departments at the Executive Mansion at eleven o'clock this morning

To the Honorable
Secretary of the Navy

TOWARD AN INDEFINITE SHORE

On this, one of the happiest days of his life, and his last, Lincoln called a cabinet meeting with this summons. "Secretary of the Navy Gideon Welles is desired to attend at the Executive Mansion, at eleven o'clock in the morning, April 14th, 1865." Welles's diary entry for that day recorded that Lincoln related to the cabinet a curious dream he had the night before. "It related to your element, the water," he told Welles. "I seemed to be in some singular, indescribable vessel," he said, "moving with great rapidity toward an indefinite shore." It presaged, he was sure, that they should have "important news" very soon, as he had had that dream previously. And they did: within hours, Lincoln was dead, assassinated.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

That night, the evening of Good Friday on the Christian calendar, was, for Jews, the commencement of the Sabbath and the start of the fifth day of Passover. While many Jews settled down to a special holiday dinner, Abraham Lincoln and his wife, accompanied by their guests, Clara Harris and Major Henry R. Rathbone, traveled to Ford's Theatre, arriving late at a performance of Our American Cousin, by Tom Taylor. Jacob H. Rosewald, a Jewish musical prodigy who normally played with the orchestra, was away from the theater that evening, probably on account of the holiday.[38] The orchestra struck up "Hail to the Chief" as the Lincoln party entered the presidential box, and the audience greeted them with a standing ovation.

John Wilkes Booth lurked in the anteroom of the presidential box. Peering through the tiny peephole he had prepared earlier, he watched Lincoln and with his knowledge of the script waited for the perfect moment when one actor stood alone on the stage and an enormous laugh would muffle sounds from the box. When that moment came, he opened the inner door, stepped toward the back of the president's rocking chair, and fired a shot that went into the back of Lincoln's head. He then struggled briefly with Major Rathbone, leaped down upon the almost empty stage, screamed, "Sic semper tyrannis" (Thus always to tyrants), and made his escape out the back door.[39]

FORD'S THEATRE.

FRIDAY.

ORCHESTRA

Section.....

No.....

Ford's Theatre.....Washington.

Reserved Chair--Friday,

IN ORCHESTRA!

GOOD THIS NIGHT ONLY.

☞ Give this portion of the Ticket for entrance to the Door-keeper.

Jas. R. Ford,

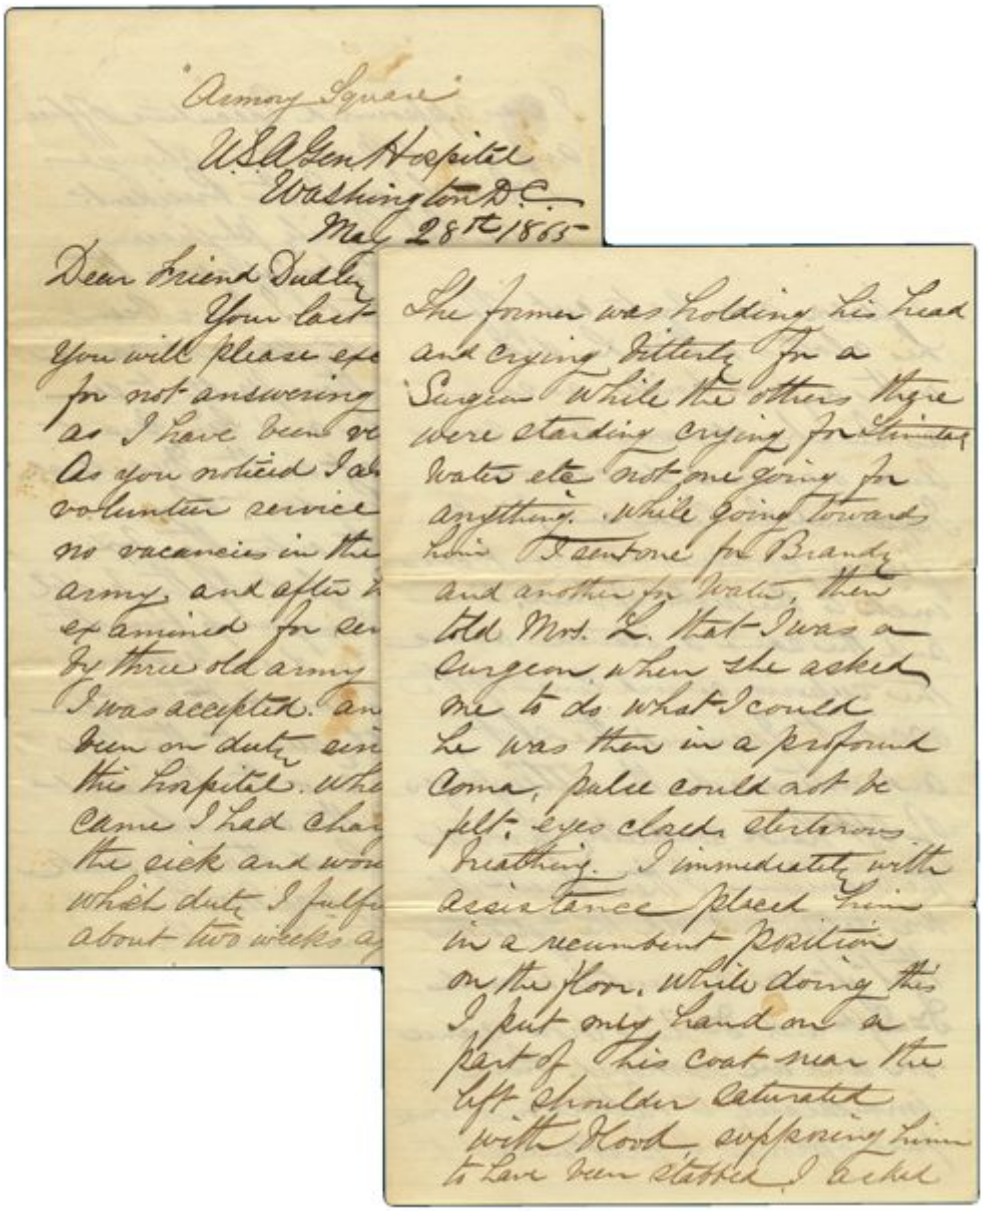
BUSINESS MANAGER.

A TICKET TO TRAGEDY, FORD'S THEATRE, STAMPED APRIL 14, 1865

On the evening of April 14, 1865, Lincoln attended a play at Ford's Theatre in Washington, D.C. Sometime around ten, John Wilkes Booth slipped unnoticed into the presidential box and, standing four feet away from the president, discharged a single bullet from a derringer into the back of Lincoln's head. "There will never be anything like it on earth," one witness said of the pandemonium following the shot. Lincoln never regained consciousness, and when he died the next morning, he became the first president to be assassinated.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

Lincoln, unconscious and bleeding, was soon carried across the street to a boardinghouse and laid diagonally across a bed. Around him gathered family, friends, cabinet members, generals, and, of course, doctors. One of the latter was Charles H. [Carl Heinrich] Liebermann (1813–86), a Russian-born Jewish surgeon who was "for over twenty years the leading oculist in Washington," and also, in 1865, president of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia. Liebermann had been imprisoned in Siberia for promoting Polish independence, trained in Germany, and subsequently immigrated to the United States, bringing with him a superior European medical training. He was a pioneer of strabismus surgery to cure misalignment of the eyes, helped to create Georgetown University's medical school, and, in the face of prejudice, had come to be esteemed by his colleagues, who knew him as a Jew even though he did not otherwise identify with the Jewish community. Upon arriving at Lincoln's bedside, Liebermann poured brandy down the president's throat, removed hair from the area surrounding his wound, and diagnosed the gunshot as fatal.[40] Alonzo Chappel's famous painting, The Last Hours of Lincoln, depicts Liebermann as one of the bearded, bald, grave-looking physicians staring down intensely to the left of Lincoln's bed. He remained at that bedside until the president was pronounced dead at 7:22 on the morning of April 15. "It is all over," he and the other physicians gravely reported to the first lady, who was in the front room. "The President is no more!"[41] In his death vigil, Lincoln's family doctor, Robert K. Stone, counting the president's final breaths, recorded: "Death closed the scene."[42]

"... in a profound Coma, pulse could not be felt, eyes closed. ... It is impossible for him to recover."



Army Square
U.S.A. Gen Hospital
Washington D.C.
May 28th 1865

Dear Friend Dudley

You will please ex for not answering as I have been
As you noticed I ab volunteer service
no vacancies in the army, and after examined for by three old army
I was accepted. an been on duty
this Hospital. Whe came I had char
the sick and wou which duty I fulfi
about two weeks a

The former was holding his head and crying bitterly for a Surgeon while the others there were standing crying for Stimulants Water etc not one going for anything. While going towards him I sent one for Brandy and another for Water, then told Mrs. L. that I was a Surgeon, when she asked me to do what I could. He was then in a profound Coma, pulse could not be felt: eyes closed, stertorous breathing. I immediately with assistance placed him in a recumbent position on the floor. While doing this I put my hand on a part of his coat near the left Shoulder saturated with blood supposing him to have been stabbed. I asked

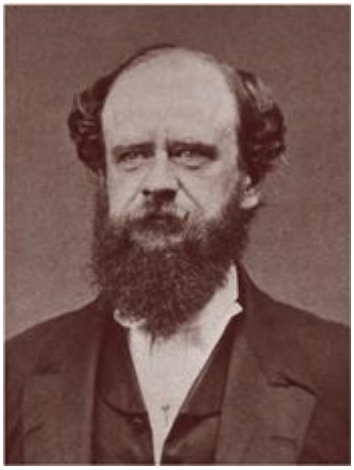
CHARLES AUGUSTUS LEALE TO DWIGHT DUDLEY, MAY 28, 1865

Charles Augustus Leale—age twenty-three and six weeks out of medical school—went to Ford's Theatre especially to see Lincoln on April 14, sat as close as he could to the presidential box, and witnessed Booth enter the box and then jump to the stage with his dagger drawn. Leale immediately hurried to Lincoln and was the first doctor to attend the stricken president. Recalling the event in graphic detail six weeks later, Leale writes that he found Lincoln "in a profound Coma, pulse could not be felt, eyes closed.... It is impossible for him to recover."

Shapell Manuscript Collection

THE LAST HOURS

Alonzo Chappel's famous 1867 painting, The Last Hours of Lincoln, depicts the ten-by-fifteen-foot room in which Lincoln lay dying as large enough to be filled with almost as many doctors who later claimed to be there. Of the nine actually in attendance, Dr. Liebermann is prominently featured here, gazing intently at the president. Liebermann was misidentified in the key that accompanies the painting; research has now correctly determined the likeness of the Jewish doctor.
Chicago History Museum



CHARLES H. LIEBERMANN

The Russian-born Jewish ophthalmologist Dr. Charles H. Liebermann was a leading Washington physician, and while attending Lincoln's deathbed vigil cut a lock of hair away from the president's wound and, in a desperate attempt at resuscitation, poured brandy down his throat.
Georgetown University Archives

News of the president's death spread quickly that Saturday morning. In Washington, Simon Wolf recalled, "the bells of the churches tolled the death knell of the Great Martyr"[43] very soon after he was pronounced dead. In New York, the news hit just as Jews were "proceeding to their places of worship for the services of the Sabbath of Passover."[44] In Philadelphia, Isaac Leeser heard the news from his synagogue president, "during the pause in the morning service, when the Sepher [Torah scroll] was taken out."[45] In San Francisco, Elkan Cohn of Congregation Emanu-El was handed a note with the news just as he was "ascending his pulpit, on Saturday, to deliver the usual sermon … he was so overcome that, bursting in tears, he sank almost senseless."[46] Fittingly, the prophetic portion read in synagogues on the Sabbath when Lincoln was pronounced dead was Ezekiel's vision of the Valley of Dry Bones, a chapter that Lincoln himself had quoted in one of his earliest known addresses.[47] "Behold.… Our bones are dried, and our hope is lost.… Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel."[48] The prophet's message of comfort and hope, uttered against the background of death and destruction, was appropriate to the national mood in the wake of the war's end, and even more so in the face of the assassination. For Jews, the prophecy also reinforced the age-old yearning proclaimed at the conclusion of the seder just days before, "Next Year in Jerusalem!"

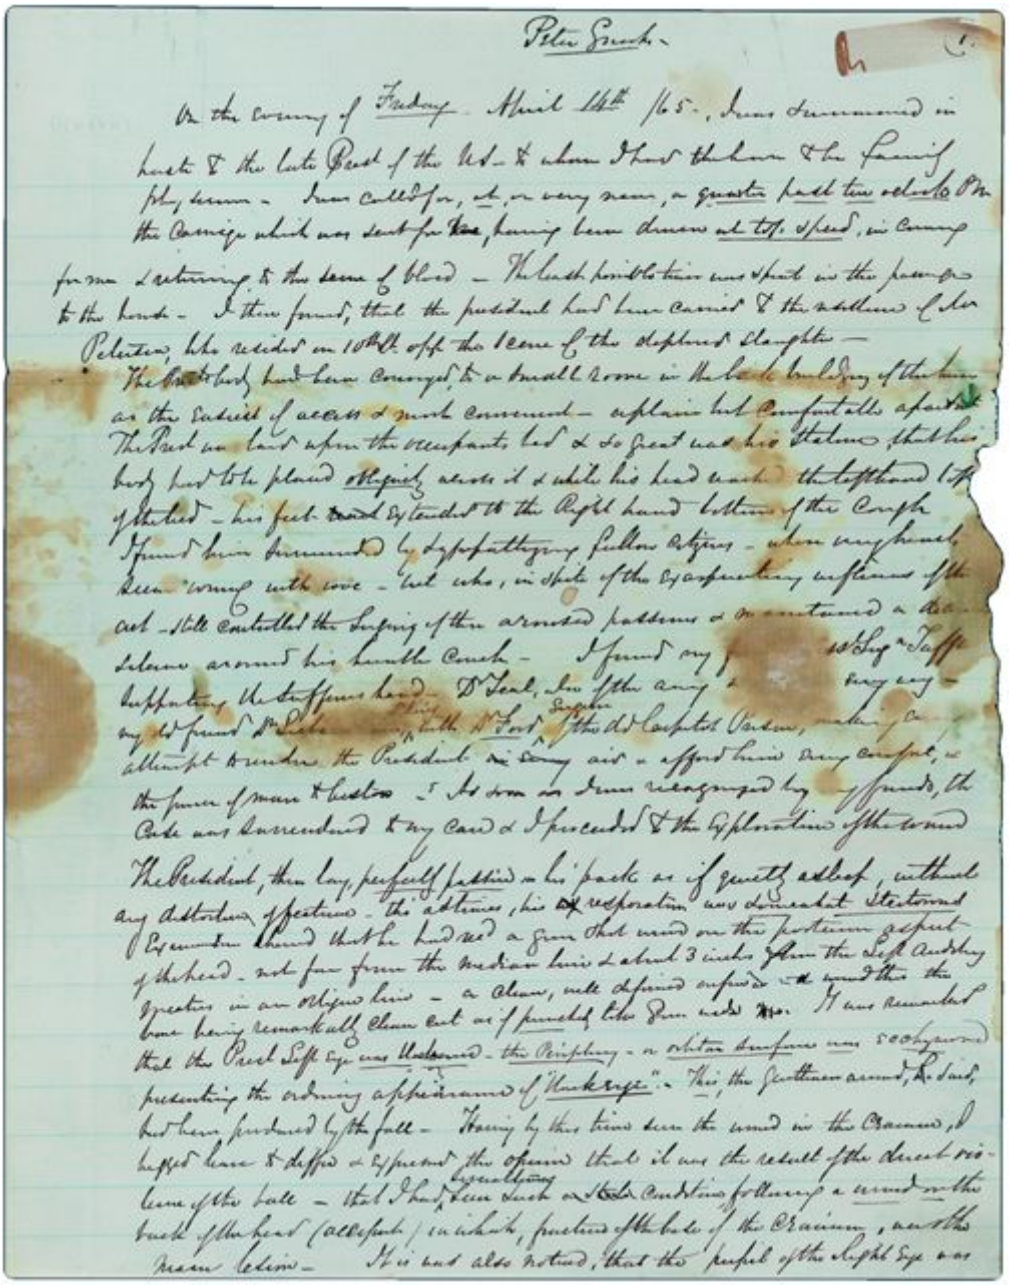
Lincoln, Mary Todd Lincoln later recalled, shared a similar yearning. Writing from Chicago on December 17, 1866, she described a carriage ride they had taken that last afternoon on April 14. With the war over, she said, Lincoln had told her that they needed to make an effort to be happier—they had both been so miserable. "At the expiration of his second term, we would visit Europe, and," she wrote, "he appeared to anticipate much pleasure, from a visit to Palestine."[49] In fact, she told her friends, he wanted to see Jerusalem before he died.

"Death closed the Scene"



Peter Gruber

On the evening of Friday April 14th 1865, I was summoned in haste to the late Residence of the U.S. & when I found the house & the family [illegible] I was called for, at, or very near, a quarter past ten o'clock P.M. the Carriage which was sent for me, having been driven at top speed, in coming for me returning & the scene of blood — The sad [illegible] was spoken in the passage to the house — I there found, that the president had been carried & the residence of Mr Peterson, who resided on 10th St. opposite the scene of the diplomat slaughter —

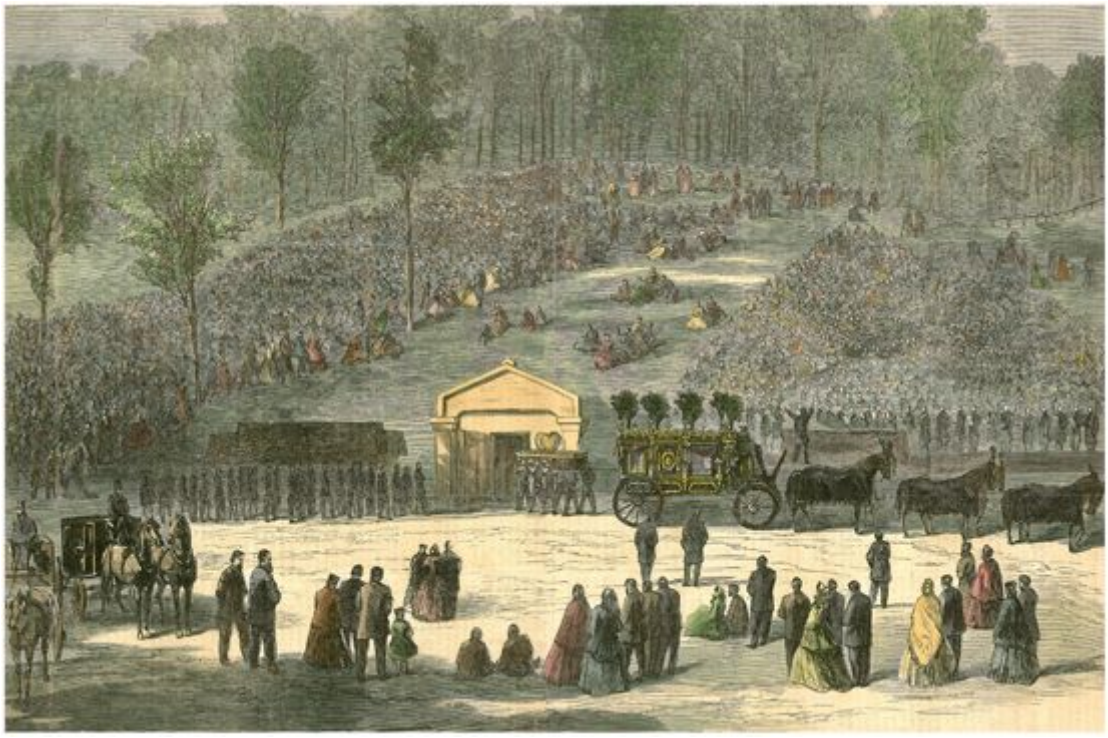
The President had been conveyed to a small room in the back building of the house as the easiest of access & most convenient — a plain but comfortable apartment The Bed was laid upon the oblique [illegible] & so great was his stature, that his body had to be placed obliquely across it & while his head rested the left hand [illegible] of the bed — his feet touched & extended to the Right hand bottom of the Couch I found him surrounded by [illegible] Surgeons — whose every [illegible] seemed [illegible] with love — but who, in spite of the overpowering influence of the act — still controlled the feelings of the [illegible] & maintained a decorum around his humble couch — I found my [illegible] Surg. Taft supporting the sufferers head — Dr Leale, [illegible] of the army [illegible] Surg. [illegible] my old friend Dr Liebe [illegible] 16th N.Y. Vol. Surgeon [illegible] of the Dr Capitol Police, [illegible] attempt to murder the President [illegible] any aid & afford him any comfort, in the power of man & Leale — As soon as I was recognized by my friends, the Coat was surrendered to my Care & I proceeded to the Examination of the wound

The President, then lay, perfectly [illegible] on his back as if quietly asleep, without any distortion of features — the actions, his [illegible] respiration was [illegible] Stertorous & [illegible] I found that he had had a [illegible] shot wound on the posterior aspect of the head — not far from the median line & about 3 inches above the Left Auricular process in an oblique line — a clean, well defined orifice [illegible] the bone being remarkably clean cut as if punched like [illegible] It was remarked that the Pupil Left Eye was Unclosed — the Pupil — a circular aperture was [illegible] presenting the ordinary appearance of "Hutchings" — This, the Gentlemen around, he said, had been produced by the ball — Having by this time seen the wound in the Cranium, I hastily [illegible] & stepped a few paces & opened the opinion that it was the result of the direct violence of the ball — that I had been [illegible] a wound on the back of the head (occipital) in which, portions of the bone of the Cranium, and the [illegible] were [illegible] It was [illegible] also noticed, that the pupil of the Right Eye was

DEATH CLOSED THE SCENE, APRIL 15, 1865

Considered the dean of the mid-nineteenth-century Washington medical establishment, Dr. Robert K. Stone was the Lincoln family physician and attended, along with Dr. Liebermann, whom he calls in the report "my old friend," the president's deathbed and autopsy. His seven-page narrative details his dramatic rush to the stricken president's side, and, some eight hours later, Lincoln's final minutes, decline, death, and autopsy. This page, notably, is stained with human blood; it is, very likely, Lincoln's.

Shapell Manuscript Collection



PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S FUNERAL

After a journey of 1,600 miles from Washington, D.C., Lincoln was buried at Oak Ridge Cemetery in Springfield, Illinois on May 4, 1865.

Sketched by W. Waud for Harper's Weekly

EPILOGUE

As a result of the fact that so many Jews happened to be in synagogue or on their way there when word of Lincoln's death became known, many of the first prayers memorializing the slain president were Jewish ones. Adolphus S. Solomons noted this at the time: "It is a singular fact," he wrote, "that it was the Israelites' privilege here, as well as elsewhere, to be the first to offer in their places of worship, prayers for the repose of the soul of Mr. Lincoln."[1] Newspapers preserved accounts of those prayers. At Temple Emanu-El, according to The New York Times, the congregation rose and "as if by a simultaneous impulse, repeated the Kadisch, a prayer for the nearest deceased relative. After which they were dismissed."[2] Elsewhere, the prayer for the government and the nation was recited, and also prayers for peace. At Shearith Israel, "a highly impressive prayer was … offered up to the throne of Grace by the minister for the repose of the soul of the late President." This was followed, according to the Jewish Messenger, by the Sephardic prayer for the dead, "being the first time in the history of Judaism in America that these prayers have been said in a Jewish house of worship for other than one professing the Jewish religion."[3]

Jewish leaders had the opportunity to deliver polished eulogies for Lincoln during the ensuing days, when funeral services were held across the country and Lincoln's coffin made its more than 1,600-mile trip from Washington, D.C. to New York to Springfield, Illinois. Practically every Jewish religious leader in America eulogized Lincoln, many of them at noon on April 19, when the president's official memorial service took place in the East Room of the Executive Mansion in Washington, and "the various religious denominations throughout the country [were] invited to meet in their respective places of worship at that hour for the purpose of solemnizing the occasion with appropriate ceremonies."[4] Rabbis spoke of Lincoln's character, his values, his leadership abilities, and his faith. They compared him to the greatest of human heroes, particularly to Abraham, his biblical namesake ("Mr. Lincoln had not only the name of our glorious patriarch Abraham, but like him he was a self-made man. Like him he had a high mission from God."[5]); to Moses ("like our own law-giver, Moses, brought a nation to the verge of the haven of peace, and, like him, not allowed to participate in its consummation"[6]); and to George Washington ("Washington's name is identified with our liberty and independence. The name of Lincoln will be identified with our nationality and greatness"[7]). Lewis Dembitz, who, as a delegate from Kentucky, had voted for Lincoln at the Republican convention of 1860, claimed that Lincoln was sometimes known as "Rabbi Abraham, as if he was one of our nation—of the seed of Israel."[8] Isaac Mayer Wise, who had criticized Lincoln repeatedly while he lived and then characterized him in death as "the greatest man that ever sprung from mortal loins," insisted that Lincoln was fully a Jew, "bone from our bone and flesh from our flesh. He supposed himself to be a descendant of Hebrew parentage. He said so in my presence."[9]

EAST.

Admit the Bearer to the
EXECUTIVE MANSION,
On WEDNESDAY, the 19th of April, 1865.

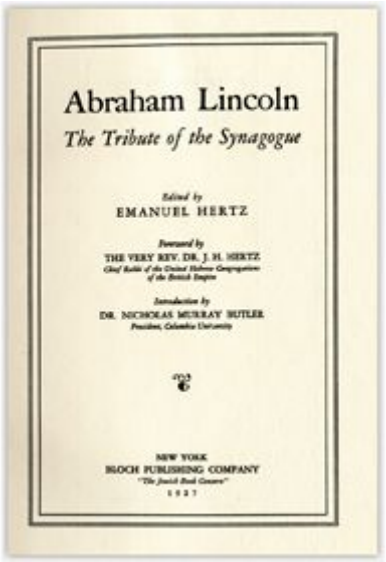
PASS TO LINCOLN'S FUNERAL IN THE EXECUTIVE MANSION, APRIL 19, 1865

Lincoln's official memorial service took place in the East Room of the Executive Mansion. Many Jewish congregations around the country also conducted memorial services at that date and hour.
Shapell Manuscript Collection



ABRAHAM LINCOLN, THE TRIBUTE OF THE SYNAGOGUE, EDITED BY EMANUEL HERTZ

This collection of Jewish eulogies of Abraham Lincoln was published in 1927.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

What distinguished these Jewish eulogies from their Christian counterparts was, of course, the absence of Jesus. Pious Christians, noting that Lincoln was shot on Good Friday, inevitably drew parallels between his death and that of "the son of God," implying that Lincoln died to expiate the nation's sins. The Chicago Tribune, for example, characterized the assassination as "the most horrid crime ever committed on this globe, since the wicked Jews crucified the Savior."[10] Jews, eager to participate as equals in the national rites of mourning, found such allusions insensitive and disturbing. Their neighbors, they feared, viewed them through a New Testament prism, rather than as fellow citizens the way Lincoln had.[11]

In New York, at least, Jews did participate as equals when Lincoln's remains were accompanied through the streets. More than twenty different synagogues and Jewish organizations joined in the solemn procession. The Jewish Messenger calculated that "there were Jewish members sufficient to bring the aggregate of Israelites in the procession to about seven thousand."[12]

In the eleven other major cities where the funeral train paused, Jews participated to a lesser degree. In some, no Jewish participation at all was recorded. In Cleveland, "Solomon and Montefiore Lodges I. O. B. B. [International Order B'nai B'rith], under the marshalship of B. F. Peixotto, Grand Master of the Order in the United States," marched in the funeral procession that accompanied Lincoln's coffin. In Chicago, "the reverend clergy … merged in the one great sorrow—Protestant and Catholic and Hebrew—all moving side by side." The city's Hebrew Benevolent Association, the B'nai B'rith Ramah Lodge, and at least one synagogue participated in the funeral procession.

Finally, in Springfield, where Lincoln was laid to rest on May 4, 1865, the clothing store of the Hammerslough Brothers displayed a portrait of Lincoln with the motto "Millions bless thy name," and Julius Hammerslough was among those who met the body, while his firm provided the black plumes that ornamented the cortege on the last leg of its journey. The funeral oration in Springfield went out of its way to mention Jewish participation in the obsequies in New York ("The Archbishop of the Roman Catholic Church in New York and a Protestant minister walked side by side in the sad procession, and a Jewish Rabbi performed a part of the solemn services").[13] While no Jew participated in the burial ceremony itself, the larger aim of the Jewish community —"to join our fellow citizens in paying a national tribute to a nation's lost chief"—was amply fulfilled.[14]

LINCOLN'S FUNERAL PROCESSION

Jewish photographer Samuel Alschuler, who had twice photographed Lincoln in Illinois, captured Lincoln's funeral procession in Chicago on May 1, 1865, three days before his interment. This later etching is based on Alschuler's photograph.
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

Jews had much more trouble joining with their fellow citizens on June 1, the day set aside by President Andrew Johnson "for special humiliation and prayer in consequence of the assassination of Abraham Lincoln."[15] Johnson had originally set aside the day of May 25 for the commemoration. Following protests, however, he canceled that date, explaining that it was Ascension Day, "sacred to large numbers of Christians as one of rejoicing for the ascension of the Savior." Without checking with other religious groups, he proclaimed "that the religious services recommended as aforesaid should be postponed until Thursday, the 1st day of June next."[16] That conflicted with the second day of Shavuot, the Jewish Feast of Weeks, commemorating the giving of the Torah on Mt. Sinai. "It is not to be expected that President Johnson shall, amid the trying and important duties that devolve upon him at the outset of his administration, keep in memory every festival, fast-day, and ceremonial," the Jewish Messenger explained apologetically to its readers. But the lack of regard for Jewish sensibilities stung nevertheless. The paper wondered how broadly Ascension Day was really observed in America and noted that the new date placed Jews in "a position of … delicacy," since Shavuot was usually celebrated with "flowers and evergreens" and betokened "joy and happiness." Still, it pledged obedience: "There will not be a more faithful compliance with the spirit of President Johnson's Proclamation than in the Synagogues." "The Israelites of America," it patriotically promised, "will yet join in a sincere and earnest prayer to God for the repose of the soul of the late President Lincoln, whose memory all revere [and] for whose loss there is universal mourning."[17]

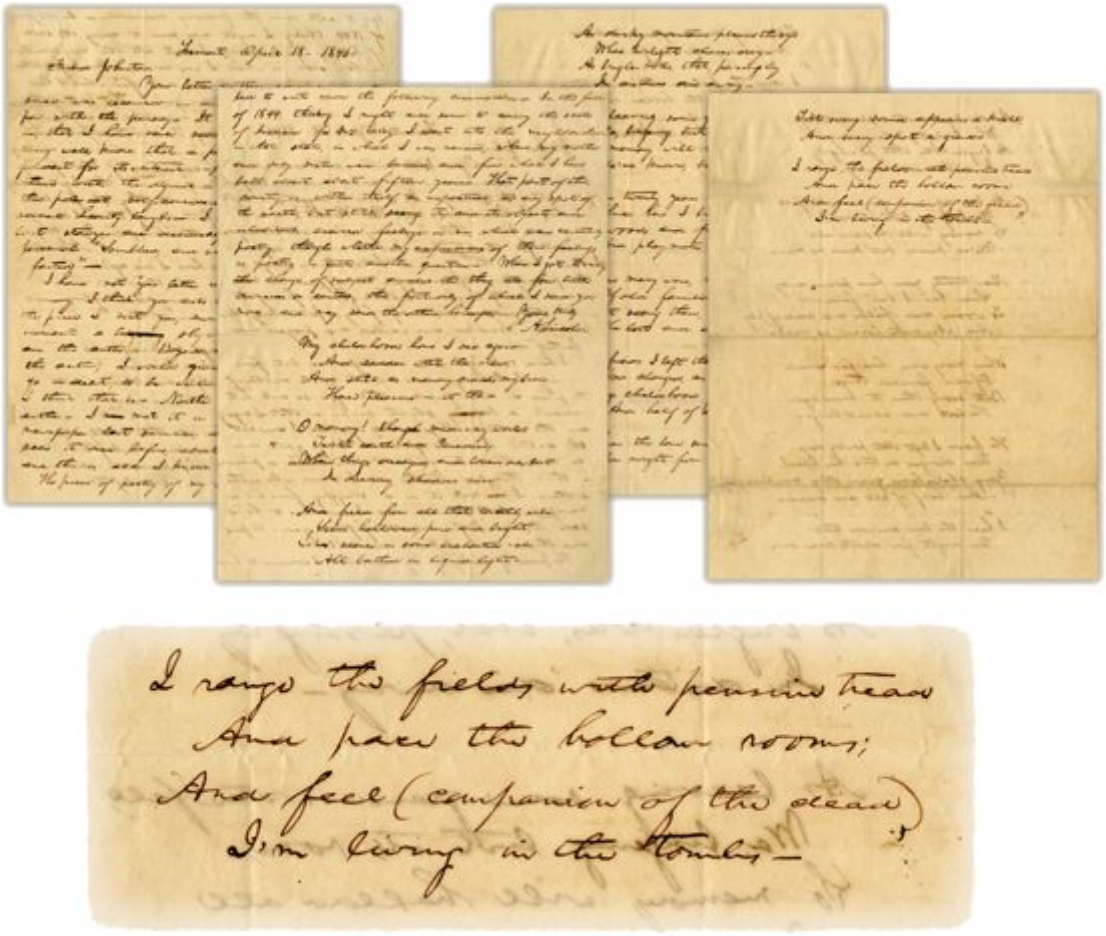
LINCOLN ON MOURNING

IN 1844, LINCOLN PAID HIS RESPECTS at the graves of his mother and sister in Indiana, following a fifteen-year absence. The visit had a profound impact on him, and during a period in which he was practicing his prose, Lincoln wrote a long poem grappling with their deaths. "And feel (companion of the dead) / I am living in the tombs," Lincoln completed the poem, so strong was his connection with his mother and sister upon the visit. Nearly twenty years after penning this poem, and, with having written the greatest speeches in American history, President Lincoln joined his mother and sister in the tombs. Just as Lincoln wrote about his mother and his sister with a great sense of loss, generations of poets and writers, would join him in step to write about another great loss, this time of their "lost Chief" Lincoln.



LINCOLN TO ANDREW JOHNSTON, APRIL 18, 1846

Lincoln shares this poem on mourning with Illinois friend and colleague, Andrew Johnston.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

Johnson's dismissal of Jewish needs was emblematic of his broader anti-Semitism. Charles Francis Adams, son of John Quincy Adams, remarked that "toward Jews, [Johnson] evidently felt a strong aversion."[18] Even in death Lincoln stood out against his predecessors and successors in his inclusiveness towards Jews.

Sabato Morais of Congregation Mikve Israel in Philadelphia, one of Lincoln's foremost rabbinic admirers, led the way on June 1 in memorializing the much-lamented slain president. "In this land of equal right, where the religious tenets of a majority can claim no higher privileges than those revered by a minority, there should not have been found protestants against the first summons of the authorities," he declared, lamenting that the original May 25 date had been changed. "But who among us will this day, let any motives sever him from the community?"[19] Some seven other Shavuot sermons memorializing the assassinated president survive, testimony to the "general attendance at synagogue," noted by the Messenger, as well as to the public's growing obsession with all things Lincoln ("we do not get weary of speaking of his life and his calamitous end," one rabbi admitted), and to the Jewish community's prudent decision to comply with Johnson's executive order.[20] "Jews, Catholics, and Protestants Equally Observe the Day," The New York Times headlined, doubtless to the Jewish community's satisfaction.[21] Several synagogues included Lincoln in the Jewish memorial prayer (Yizkor) traditionally recited on the second day of Shavuot "for the repose of the souls of departed relatives, friends and prominent men of Israel."[22]

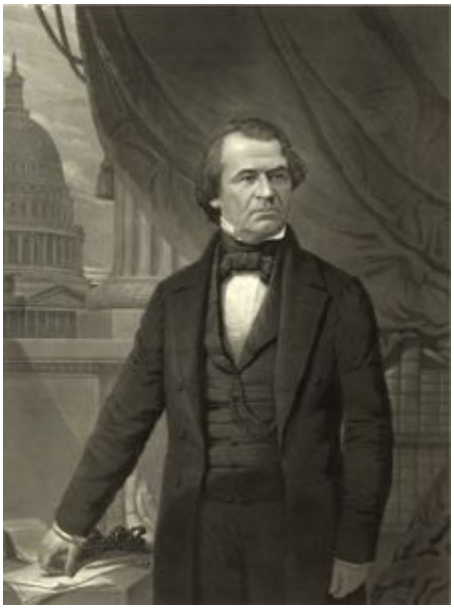
Jews abroad commemorated Lincoln as well. Great Britain's chief rabbi, Nathan Marcus Adler, pronounced what was described as a "magnificent funeral oration" for Lincoln. Speaking on the same platform, the world's best-known Jew and human rights advocate, Sir Moses Montefiore of England, linked Lincoln's efforts to liberate slaves to his own efforts to liberate Jews. "The Negroes are free and will remain so," he was quoted as saying. "Oh that I could say so much for my brothers of all the other lands."[23]

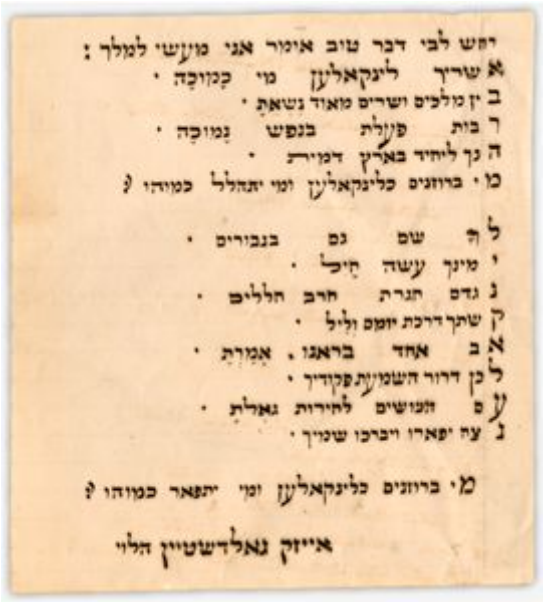


ANDREW JOHNSON, A CONTRAST IN TRUST

Andrew Johnson behaved in a way that was the antithesis of Lincoln's admiration and respect for Jews. Of Senator David Levy Yulee, Johnson once remarked, "... a miserable little cuss—a contemptible Jew ... despicable little beggar..." About Judah P. Benjamin, Johnson said in a speech on the floor of the Senate, that "he belongs to that tribe that parted the garments of our Savior."
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

Not all Jews, however, agreed that Lincoln's passing was to be mourned. "God grant so may all our foes perish!" twenty-six-year-old Eleanor H. Cohen of Columbia,

South Carolina, wrote in her diary, echoing the biblical Deborah's words in the Book of Judges (5:31). She described the news that "our worst enemy is laid low" as "glorious tidings."[24] David Naar, a pro-slavery Democrat from St. Thomas, who edited the Trenton, New Jersey, Daily True American and in 1843 served as appointive mayor of Elizabeth and a judge in Essex County, was more circumspect. Though he had long been critical of Lincoln, whom he labeled a "weak and unfortunate President," he publicly expressed the "sincerest sorrow at his death." Privately, however, he evinced "disgust at the various instances of fulsome adulation exhibited by our people." In an anonymous letter to the Occident under the name "Israelite," he attacked those who considered the president "deserving of any of the religious services appertaining to Jewish worship" and lambasted Jews who made "any comparison between the late President and their great law-giver [Moses], 'whom the Lord knew face-to-face.'"[25]



יזש לבי דבר טוב אומר אני מעשי למלך :
א שריך לינקאלין מי כמוכה ·
ב ין מלכים ושרים מאוד נשאת ·
ר בות פעלת בנפש נמוכה ·
ה נך ליחיד בארץ דמיית ·
מ · ברוזנים כלינקאלין ומי יתהלל כמוהו ?

ל ה שם גם בגבורים ·
י מינך עשה חיל ·
נ גדם תגרת חרב חללים ·
ק שתך דרכת יומם ולילה ·
א ב אחד בראנו . אמרת ·
ל כן דרור השמעת לקדיך ·
ע ם זעקים לחירות גאלת ·
נ עד יפארו ויברכו שמיך ·

מ · ברוזנים כלינקאלין ומי יתפאר כמוהו ?

אייזק גאלדשטיין הלוי

ISAAC GOLDSTEIN'S HEBREW ACROSTIC OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S NAME

The key lines of Goldstein's acrostic honoring Lincoln, translated into English, read as follows:
The Black people thou hast redeemed unto Freedom:
Forever they will praise and bless thy name.
Who among princes is like Lincoln? And who can be praised like him?
Courtesy of The University of Pennsylvania Library

Most Jews, though, eagerly participated in the national memorialization of Abraham Lincoln. The different ways that they did so bespoke their growing position in the nation's cultural life. A poet-businessman from Poland named Isaac Goldstein even published in the Jewish Messenger an unusual Hebrew acrostic in Lincoln's memory.[26]

The renowned Jewish artist Solomon Nunes Carvalho (1815–97), born in South Carolina, produced a magnificent allegorical painting of Lincoln in 1865, the only known painting of him by a contemporary Jew. Lincoln is shown holding a scroll with words from his second inaugural clearly visible—"with malice toward none, with charity for all." A statue of George Washington, standing behind him, looks on with approval, while to his right, the ancient Greek Cynic philosopher Diogenes, remembered for carrying a lamp in daylight in search of a truly honest man, has dropped his lamp in shocked amazement—he has finally found one! The painting anticipated themes that would prove central to Lincoln iconography through the years and bespoke the terrible sense of loss that Carvalho felt upon Lincoln's death.[27]

Even the so-called last or "cracked-plate" photograph of Lincoln by the pioneering photographer Alexander Gardner, an image central to the memorialization of the slain president, had a Jewish angle to it. Adolphus S. Solomons, whose firm did substantial business with the government, recalled at the end of his life that Gardner was in charge of the photography branch of his company, Philp & Solomons. Solomons took credit for persuading Lincoln to give Gardner "another sitting" at his establishment, shortly before the assassination, and described how several initial snaps by the photographer failed to elicit an appropriate presidential expression. "Solomons, tell me one of your funny stories, and we will see if I can't do better," he quoted Lincoln as saying. The result was the photograph now considered to be "one of the great works of art in American history," an image that conveys both the likeness of Lincoln in his final days and the torments of his inner soul.[28]

Other Jews, even if they did not themselves help to create memorial art, responded generously when asked to contribute to public art in the president's memory. Sabato Morais proudly sent a check for $300 (about $4,400 in today's money) to Philadelphia's mayor, as "the voluntary contribution of my constituents towards rearing a monument to the memory of the deeply and universally lamented Abraham Lincoln." The synagogue's contribution, amounting to 1 percent of the total cost of the $30,000 bronze statue sculpted by Randolph Rogers, publicly evidenced the Jewish community's desire to be included among the religiously benevolent.[29]

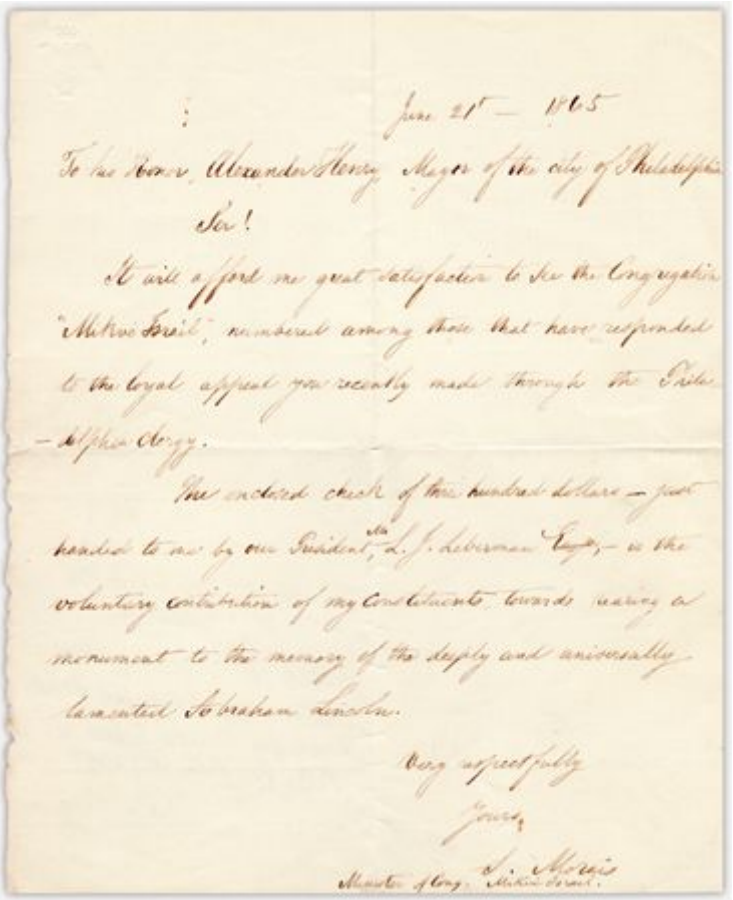
A PORTRAIT OF LINCOLN BY SOLOMON NUNES CARVALHO

The renowned Jewish artist Solomon Nunes Carvalho produced a magnificent allegorical painting of Lincoln in 1865, the only known painting of him by a contemporary Jew.
Rose Art Museum, Brandeis University

THE “CRACKED PLATE” PORTRAIT

Even the so-called last, or "cracked plate" image by photographer Alexander Gardner, involved a Jewish associate: Gardner worked for longtime Lincoln acquaintance Adolphus S. Solomons, who was also present at the photography shoot. The sitting produced at least five different Lincoln images and were the last of Lincoln taken while he was alive.
National Portrait Gallery, Smithsonian Institution / Art Resource NY

In Springfield, Illinois, the National Lincoln Monument Association, which looked to erect a $250,000 ($3.7 million in today's money) monument to the slain president at the site of his tomb at Oak Ridge cemetery, directly solicited the country's Jews. Clothier Julius Hammerslough, who served as the association's "special agent" to the Jewish community, called upon "Hebrews" throughout the country to show "how highly we, as a race, appreciate freedom and the martyrs of liberty." "By contributing to this holy national work," he intimated, Jews would help "to meet prejudices still existing in the minds of many" and prove themselves "foes of all oppression and wrong."[30] Cincinnati's Jews responded warmly to this plea, appointing a five-man "Central Committee with power to collect funds for the purpose."[31] Nationwide, however, the campaign fizzled. By early 1867, the Jewish Messenger complained that the nation had become "strangely forgetful … of the good President who lived and died for his country" and it wondered what had "become of the subscriptions that were collected … for the national and local monuments?"[32]



June 21st — 1865

To the Hon. Alexander Henry, Mayor of the city of Philadelphia

Sir!

It will afford me great satisfaction to see the Congregation "Mikveh Israil" numbered among those that have responded to the loyal appeal you recently made through the Public Press of the City.

The enclosed check of One hundred dollars — just handed to me by our President, Mr. L. J. Lebrman Esqr., is the voluntary contribution of my Constituents towards raising a monument to the memory of the deeply and universally lamented Abraham Lincoln.

Very respectfully
Yours
Minister of Cong. Mikveh Israel

SABATO MORAIS TO HENRY ALEXANDER, JUNE 21, 1865

Rabbi Sabato Morais sends his synagogue's contribution to "A Monument to the Memory of the Deeply and Universally Lamented Abraham Lincoln."
Shapell Mansuscript Collection

Thanks to an infusion of state funds, the Springfield monument at Lincoln's Tomb was finally dedicated in 1874. A young Springfield Jew named Julius Rosenwald, later president of Sears Roebuck, recalled selling commemorative pamphlets to the crowd gathered at the event.[33] But by then, Hammerslough's efforts to solicit Jews had been forgotten, and no leading Jews participated in the dedication, which went unnoticed in the contemporary Jewish press. Only in 1886, when, in a break with precedent, a rabbi named Charles Austrian was invited to offer the closing prayer and benediction at the National Lincoln Monument on the twenty-first anniversary of Lincoln's death, did any hint of what had transpired earlier appear. "There has been a great deal of prejudice against the Jehudim [Jews] here formerly," the Springfield correspondent of the American Israelite revealed, an indication that Hammerslough's earlier comments about "prejudices still existing" was based upon personal experience. The correspondent therefore took special pleasure in noticing that "the community at large" spoke "very favorably" of the rabbi's prayer "and were very much pleased."[34]

Lincoln National Monument.

Springfield, Ills., May 30th, 1865.

Dear Sir:

Benevolence, one of the cardinal principles upon which Judaism is founded, appeals to your kind and noble heart, and solicits your earnest assistance in aiding this great National work. I entrust to your good judgment the annexed Circulars of the National Lincoln Monument Association, and by distributing the same among your Congregation, Schools and Colleges, in your city and surrounding country, you will not only pay tribute to the merits of our fallen Chief, but will also confer a great favor upon me, which shall always have the most grateful remembrance. I would kindly ask you to have the Appeal read in your Synagogue, and impress upon each and every one present the importance of the great and holy work before us.

Trusting your kind assistance and co-operation in the cause for which I appeal to you will bear fruit and meet with success everywhere, I have the honor to remain,

Your Obedient Servant,

Julius Hammerslough.

JULIUS HAMMERSLOUGH ENLISTS THE JEWS FOR LINCOLN, MAY 30, 1865

Addressed to Rev. Isaac Leeser, Hammerslough, who befriended Lincoln in Springfield as a young man, and who served as the association's "special agent" to the Jewish community, called upon "Hebrews" throughout the country to show "how highly we, as a race, appreciate freedom and the martyrs of liberty" and to support the efforts of the National Lincoln Monument Association.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

By the time Rabbi Austrian delivered his closing prayer and benediction, the majority of Americans and the great majority of American Jews held no conscious memories of Abraham Lincoln. They were immigrants or young people, and all that they really knew of America's sixteenth president was what they had read and heard about him. In the years that followed, books, articles, sermons, speeches, films, and eventually Web sites filled out the Lincoln story. They portrayed Lincoln as the savior of the Union, the Great Emancipator, a peerless leader, a consummate politician, a man of the people, a self-made man, a student of the Bible, a prophet, a storyteller, a wit—and, above all, as the personification of all of the noblest qualities that Americans and Jews held dear. He became a never-ending source of inspiration and wisdom.[35]

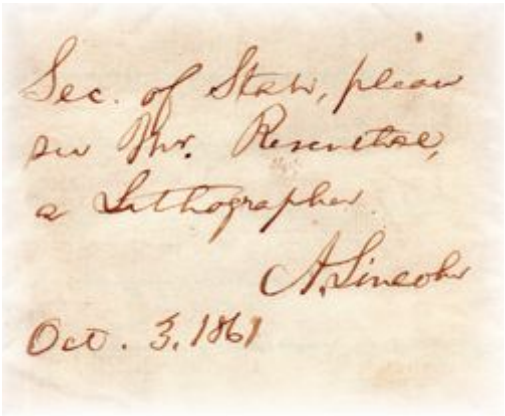
Jews played a very significant role in shaping this portrayal of Abraham Lincoln. They studied Lincoln, collected Lincoln, chronicled Lincoln, quoted Lincoln, fictionalized Lincoln, dramatized Lincoln, painted Lincoln, sculpted Lincoln, wrote about Lincoln, preached about Lincoln, sang about Lincoln, and even, in the case of an east European Jewish immigrant named Victor David Brenner, designed the Lincoln image for the penny in 1909, on the occasion of the centennial of Lincoln's birth.



LINCOLN AND LITHOGRAPHER MAX ROSENTHAL

On October 3, 1861, Lincoln asked Secretary of State William H. Seward to see Jewish lithographer, Max Rosenthal.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

In 1908, Max Rosenthal created this signed image of Lincoln, based on the June 3, 1860 photograph by Alexander Hesler.
Shapell Manuscript Collection

This Jewish love affair with all things Lincoln harks back, one suspects, to Lincoln's own remarkable regard for the Jews. Over the course of his tragically foreshortened life, he interacted with Jews, represented Jews, befriended Jews, admired Jews, commissioned Jews, trusted Jews, defended Jews, pardoned Jews, took advice from Jews, gave jobs to Jews, extended rights to Jews, revoked an expulsion of Jews, and even chose a Jew as his confidential agent. His connections to Jews went further and deeper than those of any previous American president.

This happened, we have seen, even though Abraham Lincoln was not raised among Jews. Growing up, the only Jews he knew were those he read about in the Bible. It was only in the second half of his life, when he was already a grown man, that he encountered almost all the Jews that he personally became familiar with. Others who similarly watched the Jewish presence in America expand, including members of Lincoln's own inner circle, displayed overt prejudice, sometimes generalizing about Jews as a class. Lincoln never did. Instead, influenced by the Jews whom he befriended, he took account of Jewish sensitivities. His rhetoric and actions exemplified for Americans what it meant to embrace Jews as trusted insiders.

THE LINCOLN PROFILE AND 1909 PENNY

The Lincoln image that would go on to grace the one-cent coin was taken by Mathew Brady on February 9, 1864. The original Lincoln penny, designed in 1909 by Victor David Brenner, a Jewish engraver, was, for a short time, engraved with Brenner's initials on the back.

Shapell Manuscript Collection, Stack's Bowers Galleries

LINCOLN AND THE JEWS CHRONOLOGY

Highlighting Connections with Abraham Jonas (Blue) and Issachar Zacharie (Red)

1843

February 22: Washington's birthday is celebrated in Springfield. Abraham Jonas gives the address with Abraham Lincoln in attendance.

1848

Abraham Lincoln represents Elias Salzenstein in court.

1854

September 16: Earliest known letter from Abraham Jonas to Lincoln; it regards political affairs.

October 31: Lincoln meets with Abraham Jonas after arriving in Quincy, Illinois.

November 1: Following a political speech, Lincoln accompanies Jonas to an "oyster saloon" in Quincy.

December 2: In a letter, Abraham Jonas offers Lincoln his support for a Senate run in 1855.

1855

January 1: Lincoln meets Henry Greenebaum for the first time.

Lincoln meets Julius Hammerslough for the first time, in Springfield, Illinois.

1856

October 21: In a sign of their closeness, Lincoln writes Abraham Jonas of being "hobbled" by a case.

November 4: Lincoln and Jonas are electors in the 1856 presidential election, listed together in numerous poll books.

Lincoln is a judge on a case involving Gerhard Foreman, the brother-in-law of Henry Greenebaum.

1857

June 4: Abraham Jonas's son Benjamin works with Lincoln on freeing John Shelby, a black man held unjustly in a New Orleans jail.

Henry Rice serves as a witness in a court case of Lincoln's.

1858

April 3: Jackson Grimshaw writes to Lincoln about politics and mentions the role of Abraham Jonas in local events.

April 25: Lincoln sits for photographer Samuel Alschuler in Urbana, Illinois.

July 30: Abraham Jonas invites Lincoln to visit him in Augusta, Illinois, the next month.

August 2: Lincoln writes to Jonas that he will be with him in Augusta on August 25th.

August 5: Jonas writes to Lincoln that he has announced the visit of August 25th, and expects a large crowd for Lincoln's speech.

August 25: Between the first and second Lincoln-Douglas debates, Lincoln gives a speech with Abraham Jonas in Augusta.

August 25: Lincoln teases Abraham Jonas's son Edward during the assembly in Augusta.

December 26: At a meeting in the law offices of Jonas and Asbury, Lincoln is suggested as a potential presidential candidate.

1859

December 4–5: On the campaign trail, Lincoln visits the Wollman family in Leavenworth, Kansas.

1860

February 3: Jonas writes to Lincoln to request a copy of the Lincoln-Douglas debate book.

February 4: Lincoln writes to Abraham Jonas, noting that Jonas is one of his "most valued friends."

May 16: Mortiz Pinner attends the 1860 Republican National Convention as an unofficial delegate in support of Lincoln.

May 16: Lewis Dembitz attends the 1860 Republication National Convention as a delegate from Kentucky in support of Lincoln.

July 20: Jonas warns Lincoln of the rumors of Lincoln's presence at a Know-Nothing Lodge.

July 21: Lincoln responds to Jonas's warning regarding his rumored association with the Know-Nothings.

November 6: Sigismund Kaufmann serves as a Republican elector for Lincoln in the 1860 presidential election.

November 25: Lincoln sits for photographer Samuel Alschuler in Chicago.

November 26: Lincoln writes that he gave photographer Samuel Alschuler a sitting.

December 9: Orville Hickman Browning writes to Lincoln to request the appointment of Jonas as postmaster of Quincy, Illinois.

December 30: Jonas reports to Lincoln of a plot to assassinate the president-elect prior to Inauguration Day.

Lincoln inscribes a copy of the Lincoln-Douglas debate book to Abraham Jonas.

1861

January 1: Abraham Jonas signs a petition to Lincoln recommending a consular post.

February 11: Henry Greenebaum is part of the crowd that bids president-elect Lincoln goodbye at Springfield, Illinois.

February 19: Lincoln meets Sigismund Kaufmann, likely for the first time, at a reception for members of the Electoral College in New York.

March 4: Adolphus Solomons attends Lincoln's 1861 Inaugural Ball.

April 29: Lincoln nominates Abraham Jonas as postmaster of Quincy.

May 20: Lincoln endorses Julian Allen's proposal for a regiment of Polish-American volunteers.

May 26: Lincoln writes to Secretary of War Simon Cameron that he is "very much inclined to accept Col. [Max] Einsteins Regiment and wish you would have it mustered into service as soon as possible."

June 1: Lincoln appoints Charles Bernays as consul to Zurich.

July 10: Lincoln writes to the Senate to nominate Abraham Jonas.

July 21: Lincoln signs another appointment of Abraham Jonas as deputy postmaster.

August 10: Lincoln appoints Alfred Mordecai Jr. as second lieutenant.

September 3: Lincoln endorses Moritz Pinner as quartermaster.

September 10: Lincoln endorses the promotion of Isaac Moses to paymaster of New York.

September 25: Lincoln appoints Isaac Moses as assistant adjutant general with rank of captain.

October 3: Lincoln asks Secretary of State William Seward to see lithographer Max Rosenthal.

November 13: Lincoln appoints Max Einstein consul at Nuremberg.

November 23: Magicians Alexander and Carl Hermann perform at the White House.

December 6: Lincoln endorses clothier Henry Rice as military storekeeper.

December 11: Amid the chaplaincy affair, Lincoln receives Arnold Fischel at the White House.

December 14: Lincoln addresses the chaplaincy affair, on behalf of the "Israelites," in a letter to Arnold Fischel.

December 24: As a favor, Lincoln sends an autograph for Republican elector Sigismund Kaufmann.

1862

January 6: Lincoln nominates Charles Bernays as consul at Elsinore.

January 25: Lincoln recommends that Henry Moses Judah be appointed brigadier general.

February 17: Lincoln writes to Stanton to "renew" his endorsement of Henry Moses Judah.

March 13: Lincoln thanks Abraham Hart for his sermon.

May 27: Joshua Speed appeals to Lincoln to free Simon and Emanuel Bamberger, noting they are Jews.

July 31: Lincoln writes to financier—and Rothschild emissary—August Belmont that "broken eggs can not be mended."

August 21: William Cullen Bryant writes to Lincoln to introduce Issachar Zacharie and attest to his skills.

August 21: Isaac Leeser writes to Lincoln with a request; John Hay replies that Lincoln wants "it done."

September 11: Lincoln writes to Stanton regarding two long letters he has received from August Belmont.

September 13: Issachar Zacharie treats Lincoln for wrist sprains.

September 18: Lincoln appoints Jacob Frankel as the first Jewish chaplain in the Union army.

September 20: Lincoln writes his first testimonial for Zacharie.

September 22: Lincoln signs his second testimonial for Zacharie, on the day the Emancipation Proclamation is announced.

September 23: Lincoln writes his third testimonial for Zacharie.

November 4: Lincoln writes "We have not yet appointed a Hebrew," and recommends C.M. Levy as assistant quartermaster with rank of captain.

November 25: Lincoln writes to General Nathanial Banks to recommend Zacharie and his potential usefulness to the Union among his "countrymen" in the South.

December 2: Lincoln queries Stanton about Congressman Leonard Myers's recommendation for a chaplaincy appointment.

December 4: Lincoln appoints Charles Bernays as paymaster.

December 13: Lincoln directs Abraham Jonas, his "Loyal and Sensible" friend, to review a legal case.

December 29: Cesar Kaskel telegrams Lincoln to alert him to Grant's General Orders No. 11 expelling Jews from the area under Grant's control.

1863

January 4: Lincoln meets with Cesar Kaskel in Washington, D.C. about Grant's Orders No. 11.

January 5: Lincoln rescinds Grant's General Orders No. 11.

January 7: Lincoln meets with a delegation of Jews regarding General Orders No. 11.

January 14: Zacharie writes to Lincoln to seek permission to visit General Banks.

January 22: Lincoln considers the appeal of Confederate clothier Herman Koppel.

February 19: Zacharie reports to Lincoln with information from his mission to Louisiana

February 27: Lincoln pardons Simon and Emanuel Bamberger.

March: Lincoln speaks of his regard for the Jews with Henry Wentworth Monk.

March 6: Nathaniel Banks writes to Lincoln about Zacharie in Louisiana, noting that Zacharie has "been very active and among the People, especially among his own countrymen, who are numerous and powerful."

March 17: Zacharie telegrams Lincoln reporting his arrival in New York.

March 25: Lincoln writes to Benjamin Gratz to grant permission for a cross-border house guest.

March 25: Lincoln writes to Zacharie that he is "running your matter down as fast as I can."

March 27: Zacharie writes to Lincoln that he hopes Lincoln will follow his advice.

April 10: Lincoln appoints Ferdinand Sarner as Jewish chaplain in the Union army.

April 22: Lincoln reappoints Jacob Frankel as Jewish chaplain in the Union army.

April 25: Zacharie writes to Lincoln regarding the political and military situation in New Orleans.

May 6: Lincoln appoints Bernhard Gotthelf as Jewish hospital chaplain.

May 9: Zacharie writes to Lincoln with an update on the situation in New Orleans.

July 20: Zacharie writes to Lincoln to seek permission to visit General Banks.

July 24: Lincoln endorses a pardon for Rudolph Blumenberg.

July 25: Lincoln signs the pardon for Rudolph Blumenberg.

August 26: George Kuhne is among five convicted deserters to write to Lincoln requesting a stay of execution.

August 27: General George Meade writes to Lincoln regarding the execution of deserters, including George Kuhne.

August 27: Lincoln responds to George Meade regarding the execution of five soldiers, including Kuhne.

August 28: Lincoln writes to Major General John G. Foster to introduce Zacharie.

August 28: Lincoln writes that William Mayer "was the most efficient officer in suppressing the late New-York riots."

August 29: Benjamin Szold meets Lincoln at the White House to appeal the execution of George Kuhne.

September 29: Zacharie sends Lincoln a telegram saying that he will meet with him the following day.

September 30: Zacharie visits Lincoln at the White House.

October 3: Lincoln appoints Charles Weil as a 2nd Lieutenant in the U.S. Signal Corps.

October 22: Zacharie assures Lincoln in a letter that he has not told anyone about their recent meeting.

October 22: Abraham Jonas requests that Lincoln grant him a permit to visit his son Charles in a Union prison.

November 14: Lincoln considers the promotion of William Mayer to brigadier general.

November 14: Lincoln writes to Stanton about William Mayer's request to raise new troops.

1864

January 9: Rachel Rosalie Phillips meets Lincoln at a White House event with her uncle Adolphus Solomons.

January 9: On Lincoln's behalf, John Hay thanks Alexander Hart for sending a sermon by Sabato Morais.

January 12: Lincoln appoints Nehemiah Miller as Justice of the Peace in Washington, DC.

January 16: Lincoln renominates C.M. Levy as assistant quartermaster with the rank of captain.

January 25: Lincoln attends a performance of Gamea, or the Jewish Mother, in Washington, DC.

January 28: Lincoln attends Gamea for the second time in one week.

February 4: Zacharie visits Lincoln at the White House with Goodman Mordecai, a confederate POW freed by Lincoln.

February 13: Zacharie writes to Lincoln and encloses a barrel of hominy.

February 24: Lincoln interviews Joseph Merrifield, a soldier who has filed a complaint of anti-Semitism against General Butler.

March 1: Lincoln promotes Ephraim Joel to the rank of Captain.

March 2: Lincoln reappoints Jacob Frankel as Jewish chaplain in the Union army.

March 13: Lincoln asks Michael Hahn, the governor of Louisiana, how might full citizenship, the "jewel of liberty," be extended to African Americans in a postbellum state.

March 16: Lincoln frees Confederate POW Jacob G. Cohen, at the request of Zacharie, Cohen's uncle.

March 24: Famed pianist Louis Gottschalk plays for Lincoln in a concert at Willard's Hotel.

April 26: Lincoln endorses the court-martial of Ferdinand Levy, removing Levy's disability.

April 30: Lincoln endorses what Senator Conness says about Julius Silversmith.

April 30: Lincoln "cheerfully" endorses what Governor Nye says about Julius Silversmith.

May 4: Lincoln purchases a pair of eyeglasses from Jewish optometrist Isaac Heilprin, with a personal check.

May 13: Zacharie writes again to Lincoln, and sends his regards to Mrs. Lincoln.

June 2: Lincoln allows Charles Jonas, a Confederate POW, to visit his dying father, Abraham Jonas, in Illinois.

June 10: Orville Browning visits Lincoln to request the nomination of Louisa Jonas as postmistress of Quincy, Illinois.

June 13: Lincoln nominates Louisa Jonas as postmistress in place of her deceased husband, Abraham Jonas.

June 28: Lincoln signs the appointment of Louisa Jonas as postmistress of Quincy.

July 15: Lincoln thanks Philadelphia civic leader Lazarus Lieberman for the gift of a suit of clothes.

August 2: Lincoln writes to Treasury secretary William Fessenden to introduce Issachar Zacharie.

August 18: Lincoln appoints Ephraim Joel to serve on General Blair's staff.

September 9: Responding to a request by congressman Leonard Myers, Lincoln responds that "I really wish this done."

September 15: Lincoln orders Moses Waldauer, convicted on a spurious charge of aiding deserters, released from prison.

September 19: Lincoln thanks Zacharie for his commitment to the Union cause and mentions that the matter of his friend will be considered.

September 21: Zacharie writes to Lincoln that his note of the 19th has had the "desired effect."

September 24: Mary Lincoln writes to General Patrick requesting that Herman Grau be able to set up a business in City Point, Virginia.

September 24: Lincoln requests that Treasury secretary Fessenden "see and hear" Sigmund Griff.

September 26: Lincoln requests Secretary of War Stanton to receive Sigmund Griff.

September 27: Lincoln tells Griff that he will meet with Secretary of War Stanton on Griff's behalf.

October 8: Lincoln overturns the conviction of Moses Waldauer for assisting deserters.

October 26: Lincoln meets with Jews in the White House to discuss the Jewish vote in the upcoming presidential election.

November 1: At Lincoln's request, John Hay writes Myer Isaacs regarding issues of the Jewish vote.

November 3: Zacharie writes to Lincoln about political affairs.

November 8: Abram Dittenhoefer serves as Republican presidential elector for New York, upon Lincoln's reelection.

December 2: Lincoln directs Secretary of the Treasury Fessenden to "see and hear" Major Joseph H. Stiner.

December 9: Lincoln asks Attorney General James Speed to reappoint Nehemiah Miller as Justice of the Peace.

December 10: Lincoln frees prisoner Abraham B. Samuels, held by the notoriously anti-Semitic General Benjamin Butler.

December 26: Zacharie telegrams Lincoln to congratulate him on the fall of Savannah.

December 27: Lincoln grants Jacob G. Cohen, Zacharie's nephew, a pass to travel to Savannah.

December 27: Lincoln grants Zacharie a pass for travel to Savannah.

December 27: Lincoln writes to General William Sherman to introduce Issachar Zacharie.

1865

January 7: Lincoln goes to a performance of Leah, the Forsaken at Grover's Theater in Washington, DC.

January 8: Lincoln orders the protection of Philip and Meyer Wallach while they are held in prison.

January 11: Lincoln endorses the appointment of Abram Dittenhoefer.

January 12: Lincoln requests a review of the case of Philip and Meyer Wallach.

January 13: Lincoln writes of a request from congressman Leonard Myers: "I will do it, because Mr. Myers requests it."

January 25: Lincoln writes to Secretary of War Stanton, "About Jews," regarding Zacharie and, separately, Leopold Blumenberg.

January 25: Stanton responds to Lincoln's note "About Jews" that the requests have been addressed.

January 28: Lincoln endorses petition by Abram Dittenhoefer for the pardon of Morris and Abraham Leon.

February 6: Lincoln arranges for the release of Leopold Markbreit, a Union POW held and tortured by the Confederacy.

February 11: Myer S. Isaacs, Adolphus S. Solomons, and Zillah Solomons attend a reception at the Executive Mansion hosted by the first lady, with the President assisting.

February 17: Lincoln, in his third intervention in the Wallach brothers' case, allows them a "jubilee."

March 6: Lincoln grants Lion and Frank Silverman a pass to move their products across blockade lines.

March 11: Lincoln nominates Benjamin Levy to the volunteer force.

April 5: Gustavus Myers meets with Lincoln aboard the USS Malvern to discuss the conditions of peace.

April 14: C.H. Liebermann attends Lincoln's deathbed, pouring brandy down his throat.

NOTES

Please note that some of the links referenced in this work are no longer active.

List of Abbreviations:

AJA – American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, OH

AJA – American Jewish Archives (Journal)

AJHS – American Jewish Historical Society, New York, NY

AL – Abraham Lincoln

ALPLM – Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library and Museum, Springfield, IL

CW – The Collected Works of Abraham Lincoln. Abraham Lincoln and Roy P. Basler, 8 vols. New Brunswick, N.J: Rutgers University Press, 1953.

PAJHS – Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society

LOC – The Library of Congress, Washington, D.C.

AGO – The Adjutant General's Office. Washington: Dept. of Defense, Dept. of the Army, Adjutant General's Office, 1979.

NARA – U. S. National Archives and Records Administration

OR – The War of the Rebellion: A Compilation of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1880-1901.

PUSG – The Papers of Ulysses S. Grant, ed. John Y. Simon, 31 vols. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1967-2009.

INTRODUCTION

1. Robert D. Putnam, American Grace: How Religion Divides and Unites Us (New York: Simon & Schuster, 2010), 526-27.
2. Israelite (January 16, 1863), 218; see below, chapter 4, 112-18.
3. Jonathan D. Sarna, American Judaism: A History (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2004), 375; Jacob R. Marcus, To Count a People: American Jewish Population Data, 1585-1984 (Lanham: University Press of America, 1990).
4. AL to Edwin M. Stanton (November 4, 1862); see below, chapter 4, 92
5. *CW*5, 497-98; see below, chapter 4, 92.
6. Richard S. Lambert, For the Time Is at Hand (London: Andrew Melrose, Ltd., [1947]), 82, see below, chapter 5, 138–41.

7. Lester I Vogel, To See a Promised Land: Americans and the Holy Land in the Nineteenth Century (University Park: Pennsylvania University Press, 1993); Hilton Obenzinger, American Palestine: Melville, Twain, and the Holy Land Mania (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1999).

CHAPTER ONE: THE PROMISED LAND … WHOSE STONES ARE IRON AND OUT OF WHOSE HILLS THOU MAYEST DIG BRASS

1. Jonathan D. Sarna, American Judaism: A History (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2004), 375.
2. Joseph Rauch, "Kentucky," Universal Jewish Encyclopedia (1942), 6: 362-63; William Vincent Byars, B. and M. Gratz: Merchants in Philadelphia (Jefferson City, MO: Hugh Stephens Printing Co, 1916), 258. 262, 278; Morris Feuerlicht, "Indiana," Universal Jewish Encyclopedia (1942) 5:557-8; Ralph D. Gray, "Judah, Samuel," http://www.anb.org/articles/11/11-00481.html, American National Biography Online Feb. 2000, (accessed February 11, 2013); Ruth Marcus Patt, The Jewish Experience at Rutgers (East Brunswick, NJ, 1987), 4-14.
3. Ronald C. White, Jr., A. Lincoln: A Biography (New York: Random House, 2009), 13.
4. http://quod.lib.umich.edu/l/lincoln/lincol-n7/1:1184?rgn=div1;singlegenre=All;sort=occur;sub-view=detail;type=simple;view=fulltext;q1=best+gift+God
5. Rufus Rockwell Wilson, What Lincoln Read (Washington DC, 1932), 13; Michael Hoberman, New Israel/New England: Jews and Puritans in Early America (Amherst, MA: University of Massachusetts Press, 2011), 26; Philip L. Ostergard, The Inspired Wisdom of Abraham Lincoln (Carol Stream, ILL: Tyndale House Publishers, 2008), 245-52; quote is from CW 7:542.
6. See Minute Book of Little Pigeon Creek Baptist Church Spencer County, Indiana 1816–1840, 2–3; online at http://www.bakerscreekbaptistchurch.com/history/history/bakerscreekbaptistchurchlinkswithabrahamlincoln.html; spelling modernized.
7. Mark A. Noll, America's God (New York: Oxford, 2002), 370-85.
8. Perry Miller, Nature's Nation (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1967), 209.
9. Ronald White, A. Lincoln: A Biography (New York: Random House, 2009), 8-9; Ida Tarbell, In the Footsteps of Lincoln (New York: Harper, 1924), 1-16; William E. Barton, The Lineage of Lincoln (Indianapolis: Bobbs Merrill, 1929), 20-40; Robert D. Linder, "Protestant Traditions in Western Europe on the Eve of North American Colonization," The Cambridge History of Religions in America, ed. Stephen J. Stein (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2012), 70-71; for the Lincolns in Hingham, see Solomon Lincoln, History of the Town of Hingham, Plymouth County, Massachusetts (Hingham, 1827), esp. 180-181. A Lincoln to Solomon Lincoln, March 24, 1848, Rosenbach Company, Philadelphia.
10. Clarence E. Macartney, Lincoln and the Bible (New York: Abingdon-Cokesbury, 1949), 10-12; Don E. Fehrenbacher and Virginia Fehrenbacher (eds.), Recollected Words of Abraham Lincoln (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1996), 372-74.
11. Robert Bray, Reading with Lincoln (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 2010), 4.
12. Lindley Murray, The English Reader (Stockbridge: Charles Webster, 1822; orig. ed. 1799), 19-21.
13. Ibid, quotations (in order) from pp. 79, 96, 223, 36. Contrast, William H. McGuffey, The Eclectic Third Reader (Cincinnati: Truman and Smith, 1837; reprint Mott Media, 1982), 69, 75.
14. Minute Book of Little Pigeon Creek Baptist Church Spencer County, Indiana 1816-1840, 2-3; online at http://www.bakerscreekbaptistchurch.com/history/history/bakerscreekbaptistchurchlinkswithabrahamlincoln.html (accessed 12 February 2013); spelling modernized.
15. Allen C. Guelzo, Abraham Lincoln: Redeemer President (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1999), 36.
16. Religious Intelligencer 1 (1817), 555-558; Jonathan D. Sarna, American Judaism: A History (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2004), 74; Jonathan D. Sarna, "The American Jewish Response to Nineteenth-Century Christian Missions," Journal of American History 68 (June 1981), 35-51.
17. The Reformer 4 (1823), 60-62; Jonathan D. Sarna, "American Christian Opposition to Mission to the Jews, 1816-1900," Journal of Ecumenical Studies, 23:2 (Spring 1986), 225-38; Guelzo, Abraham Lincoln, 36-38; see the discussion of missions on http://www.bakerscreekbaptistchurch.com/history/history/bakerscreekbaptistchurchlinkswithabrahamlincoln.html (accessed 12 February 2013).
18. William H. Herndon and Jesse W. Weik, Herndon's Lincoln, eds. Douglas L. Wilson and Rodney O. Davis (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2006), 264.
19. Guelzo, Abraham Lincoln, 119; quotes are from Lincoln's second inaugural address.

20. George Washington to the Hebrew Congregation in Newport, Rhode Island (n.d, August 1790); for a discussion and commentary see To Bigotry No Sanction: George Washington and Religious Freedom (Philadelphia: National Museum of American Jewish History, 2012).
21. The German Correspondent 1 (1820), 6.
22. Jonathan D. Sarna, "The 'Mythical Jew' and the 'Jew Next Door' in Nineteenth-Century America," Antisemitism in American History, ed. David A. Gerber (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986), 57-78.
23. Frederic Cople Jaher, A Scapegoat in the Wilderness: The Origins and Rise of Anti-Semitism in America (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1994), 114-69; Leonard Dinnerstein, Antisemitism in America (New York: Oxford, 1994), 13-34; Jonathan D. Sarna, "American Antisemitism," in David Berger (ed.), History and Hate (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1986), 115-28.
24. Joseph L. Blau and Salo W. Baron, Jews of the United States 1790-1840: A Documentary History (New York: Columbia U Press, 1963), I, 28-32; Jacob R. Marcus, United States Jewry 1776-1985 (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1989), I, 506-9.
25. Thomas Jefferson to Benjamin Rush (April 21, 1803) in The Writings of Thomas Jefferson, ed. Andrew A. Lipscomb (Washington, DC, 1904), 10:382; Thomas Jefferson to John Adams (October 12, 1813) in The Adams-Jefferson Letters, ed. Lester J. Capon (Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press, 1959), 2:383; Thomas Jefferson to Mordecai M. Noah (May 28, 1818) in Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society 3 (1895), 94-95; Robert M. Healey, "Jefferson, Judaism and the Jews: Divided We Stand, United We Fall!" American Jewish History 73 (June 1984), 359-374.
26. Constitutional guarantees of no "religious test" for public office, as well as no "establishment of religion" and the "free exercise" of religion only applied, at that time, to congressional legislation, not to state legislation.
27. Blau and Baron, Jews in the United States: A Documentary History I, 15-16, 33-55; Edward Eitches, "Maryland's 'Jew Bill,'" American Jewish Historical Quarterly 60 (March 1971), 258-80.

CHAPTER TWO: AND THIS TOO SHALL PASS AWAY—NEVER FEAR

1. Johnson v. M'Intosh, 21 U.S. 543, 5 L.Ed. 681, 8 Wheat. 543 (1823); for an explanation of this famous case, see Eric Kades," History and Interpretation of the Great Case of J*ohnson v. M'Intosh,*" Law and History Review 19:1 (Spring 2001), 67-116.
2. Douglas L. Wilson and Rodney O. Davis, eds. Herndon's Informants: Letters, Interview, and Statements about Abraham Lincoln (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1998), 201.
3. Herman E. Snyder, "A Brief History of the Jews in Springfield, Illinois and of Temple Brith Sholom," p.2, copy in Snyder Papers, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, OH; George W. Hawes, Illinois State Gazetteer and Business Directory for 1858 and 1859 (Chicago, 1858), 205-7; Curtis Mann, "North Side of Public Square," For the People: A Newsletter of the Abraham Lincoln Association 12 (Spring 2010), 1-2, online at http://www.abrahamlincolnassociation.org/Newsletters/12-1.pdf; M. R. Werner, Julius Rosenwald (New York: Harper, 1939), 7 dates the store to 1856.
4. Snyder, "Brief History," 2; "Julius Hammerslough, "Men's Wear 25 (1908), 54-55, online at Google books; "Julius Hammerslough, 1832-1908," http://www.frf.com/family/individual.php?pid=I200&ged=FRF_GED_ONLINE.ged (accessed 25 April 2013); George W. Hawes, Illinois State Gazetteer and Business Directory for 1858 and 1859 (Chicago, 1858), 205-7; New York Times, June 20, 1908; David Herbert Donald, "We Are Lincoln Men": Abraham Lincoln and His Friends (New York: Simon & Schuster, 2003), xiv-xvi; Markens, Abraham Lincoln and the Jews, 22–23.
5. Werner, Julius Rosenwald, 8; "Julius Hammerslough," Men's Wear 25 (1908), 54-55.
6. [Baltimore] Sun, Feb 16, 1856, Local Matters, pg. 1; Snyder, "Brief History," 2; Israelite, June 9, 1865, 397.
7. Selma Stern, The Court Jew (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1950, esp. 59, 254; Yehezkel Kotik, Journey to a Nineteenth-Century Shtetl: The Memoirs of Yehezkel Kotik, ed. David Assaf (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 2002), 114-15.
8. "Salzenstein's Store: Abraham Lincoln Shopped Here," Chicago Jewish History 26 (Winter 2002), 7.
9. For the court cases, see The Law Practice of Abraham Lincoln, University of Illinois Press, Champaign, IL, 2000.
10. "Salzenstein's Store: Abraham Lincoln Shopped Here," Chicago Jewish History 26:1 (Winter 2002), 6-7; http://www.abrahamlincolnlongninemuseum.com/map.php; Howard M. Sachar, A History of the Jews in America (New York: Alfred Knopf, 1992), 3-7. James E. Myers, a son of Albert Myers, helped to preserve and restore the Springfield office where Lincoln and William Herndon practiced law, today known as the Lincoln-Herndon Museum, and also authored The Astonishing Saber Duel of Abraham Lincoln (1968).
11. On Jonas, see Bertram W. Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1951), 189-94; Ira L. Harris, "Abraham Jonas: Lincoln's Valued Friend," Lincoln Herald 92:4 (1990), 118-23; Mike Mehlman, "One of Lincoln's Most Valued Friends," Lincoln Herald 103:3 (2001), 145-55; Wayne C. Temple, "Abraham Jonas: One of Lincoln's 'Most Valued [Masonic] Friends,'" The Illinois Lodge of Research Transactions 14 (September 2005), 15-24 (online at http://www.illor.org/2005.pdf).
12. CW 3, 516, cf. CW4, 495.
13. Joseph Jonas, "The Jews in Ohio," reprinted in A Documentary History of the Jews in the United States 1654-1875, ed. Morris U. Schappes (3rd Edition, New York: Schocken, 1971), 224; Jonathan D. Sarna and Nancy H. Klein, The Jews of Cincinnati (Cincinnati: Center for the Study of the American Jewish Experience, 1989), 2, 25-29; London Jewish Chronicle, May 14, 1880, 5.
14. Jonas, "The Jews in Ohio," 225; Sarna & Klein, 27-29.
15. David Philipson, The Oldest Jewish Congregation in the West, Bene Israel Cincinnati (Cincinnati, 1924), 16-17.

    Lucia Orah's death is frequently misdated, but the tombstone clearly states "1st of Tammuz 5585." Rachel, the wife of Joseph Jonas, passed away less than two years later on February 19, 1827. Abraham Jonas married Louisa Block on October 11, 1829; see Malcolm Stern, First American Jewish Families (New York: Ottenheimer, 1981), 136 and Ira Rosenwaike, "Eleazar Block—His Family and Career," American Jewish Archives 31 (November 1979), 143-44.

16. On Jews and Freemasonry, see especially Jacob Katz, Jews and Freemasons in Europe 1723-1939 (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1971); Samuel Oppenheim, "The Jews and Masonry in the United States before 1810," Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society 19 (1910), 1-94; and for a Jewish Mason who was contemporary with Jonas, Joseph L. Blau and Salo W. Baron, The Jews of the United States 1790-1840 (New York: Columbia University Press, 1963), 3, 697700. Jonas's Freemasonry career is explored in Wayne C. Temple, "Abraham Jonas: One of Lincoln's 'Most Valued [Masonic] Friends,'" The Illinois Lodge of Research Transactions 14 (September 2005), 15-24, online at illor.org/2005.
17. According to legislative records, he was elected in 1828, 1829, 1831, and 1833.
18. CW 3, 29; see also Shearer Davis Bowman, "Comparing Henry Clay and Abraham Lincoln," The Register of the Kentucky Historical Society 106 (Summer/Autumn 2008), 495-512.
19. Robert V. Remini, Henry Clay Statesman for the Union (New York: Norton, 1993), 745.
20. Henry Clay to Abraham Jonas (May 3, 1838), Wells Family Collection; I am grateful to Cynthia Gensheimer for providing me with a transcript of this letter.
21. Henry Clay to Abraham Jonas (16 September 1842), The Papers of Henry Clay: The Whig Leader, ed. Robert Seager II (Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1988), IX, 768.
22. Wayne C. Temple, "Abraham Jonas: One of Lincoln's 'Most Valued [Masonic] Friends," The Illinois Lodge of Research 14 (September 2005), 17.
23. John C. Reynolds, History of the M.W. Grand Lodge of Illinois Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons: From the Organization of the First Lodge Within the Present Limits of the State Up to and Including 1850 (Springfield, 1860).
24. Times and Seasons 3 (1842), 749-50 as quoted in Rudolf Glanz, Jew and Mormon (New York: Waldon Press, 1963), 159.
25. Gary Vitale, "Abraham Lincoln and the Mormons: Another Legacy of Limited Freedom," Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society 101 (Fall–Winter 2008), 260-71.
26. Vitale, "Abraham Lincoln and the Mormons: Another Legacy of Limited Freedom," 262. The Latter-Day Saints Millennial Star 24 (London: 1862), 583, 663-65, 775.
27. Earl Schenck Miers, Lincoln Day by Day: A Chronology 1809-1865 (Dayton: Morningside Press, 1991), 202; Charles M. Segal, "Abraham Jonas' Role in Lincoln's First Presidential Nomination," PAJHS 4 (December 1954), 98-99.
28. Brian J. Kenny. "Browning, Orville Hickman"; http://www.anb.org/articles/04/04-00164.html; American National Biography Online Feb. 2000; Access Date: Thu May 23 2013; see Maurice Baxter, Orville H. Browning, Lincoln's Friend and Critic (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1957).
29. The Diary of Orville Hickman Browning, ed. Theodore Calvin Pease and James G. Randall (Springfield: Illinois State Historical Library, 1927), 185 (May 31, 1855). Claims that they were partners from 1843 are unfounded.
30. Donald, We Are Lincoln Men, 103.
31. See the references to Jonas in The Diary of Orville Hickman Browning and Miers, Lincoln Day by Day, 271 (April 23, 1846).
32. Gustav Philipp Körner, Memoirs of Gustave Koerner, 1809-1896: life-sketches written at the suggestion of his children (Cedar Rapids, OH: Torch Press, 1909), vol. 1, 479-80.
33. David Frolick, "From Strangers to Neighbors: The Children of Abraham in Quincy, Illinois," Journal of Illinois History 7 (2004) 17.; http://www.bnaisholomquincy.com/history.php.
34. Diary of Orville Hickman Browning, 425 (August 25, 1860) et passim; AL to Abraham Jonas (July 21, 1860), CW 4, 86.
35. Harrison Dills to Abraham Lincoln (February 19, 1849, April 10, 1849), Abraham Lincoln Papers, LOC, online at memory.loc.gov; on Dills see http://djdills.blogspot.com/2013/05/harrison-dills-bits1.html.
36. Diary of Orville Hickman Browning, 100 (April 15, 1853); 158 (October 18, 1854); Abraham Jonas to Abraham Lincoln (September 16 1854), Abraham Lincoln Papers, LOC.
37. CW 2, 282.
38. CW 4, 67.
39. Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln, I, 363-76.
40. Abraham Jonas to Abraham Lincoln (September 16, 1854), Abraham Lincoln Papers, LOC.
41. CW 2, 240-283; Douglas, as quoted in David H. Donald, Lincoln (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1995), 178.

42. Abraham Lincoln to Abraham Jonas (July 21, 1860), CW 4, 85-86 recounted the visit, which is also described in Diary of Orville Hickman Browning, 160 (November 1, 1854).
43. Abraham Lincoln to Richard Yates (October 30, 1854), CW 2, 284.
44. Abraham Jonas to Abraham Lincoln (December 2, 1854), Abraham Lincoln Papers, LOC.
45. David Osborn, "Trumbull, Lyman"; http://www.anb.org/articles/04/04-00998.html.
46. American National Biography Online Feb. 2000. Access Date: Mon May 27 2013: Ronald C. White, A. Lincoln (New York: Random House, 2009), 208.
47. Abraham Lincoln to Abraham Jonas (October 21, 1856), CW II, 380. Shapell Manuscript Collection.
48. Henry Clay Whitney, Life on the Circuit with Lincoln ... (Boston: Estes and Lauriat Publishers, 1892), 475-77.
49. Ibid, 475-77; People v. Johnson, http://www.lawpracticeofabrahamlincoln.org/Details.aspx?case=136604.
50. http://www.historycentral.com/elections/1856Pop.html.
51. Charles M. Segal, "Lincoln, Benjamin Jonas and the Black Code," Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society 46 (Autumn 1953), 277-282; Eric Foner, The Fiery Trial: Abraham Lincoln and American Slavery (New York: Norton, 2010), 121.
52. Benjamin Franklin Jonas (1834-1911) subsequently fought for the Confederacy and, in 1879, was elected senator from Louisiana. During his term of office (1879–85), he was the Senate's only Jew; see Kurt F. Stone, The Jews of Capitol Hill: A Compendium of Jewish Congressional Members (Lanham:Scarecrow Press, 2011), 35-37.
53. B. F. Jonas to Abraham Lincoln (June 4, 1857), Abraham Lincoln Papers, LOC; Annie Jonas to Wm H. Herndon (October 28, 1866) in Herndon's Informants: Letters, Interviews, and Statements About Abraham Lincoln, eds. Douglas L. Wilson and Rodney O. Davis (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1998.), online at http://lincoln.lib.niu.edu/file.php?file=herndon379.html; William H. Herndon and Jesse W. Weik, Herndon's Lincoln, eds. Douglas L. Wilson and Rodney O. Davis (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2006), 232-33.
54. Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393, at 16; see Justice Curtis's pointed dissent at 181.
55. CW 2, 398-410.
56. Gale v Morgan County Bank, file ID: L02145, The Law Practice of Abraham Lincoln, http://www.lawpracticeofabrahamlincoln.org/Details.aspx?case=137526. On Rice, see the New York Times obituary, June 8, 1914.
57. Isaac Markens, Abraham Lincoln and the Jews, 2324; Shapell Manuscript Collection.
58. Markens, Abraham Lincoln and the Jews, 27-28; H. L. Meites, History of the Jews of Chicago (Chicago: Jewish Historical Society of Illinois, 1924), 47-48; Tobias Brinkmann, Sundays at Sinai (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2012), 60-62.
59. Matthew 12:25, Mark 3:25.
60. CW 2, 461-69. Douglas, upon the death of his wife, became an owner of Mississippi slaves, which he held in trust for his children; see Martin H. Quitt, Stephen A. Douglas and Antebellum Democracy (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2012), 186-94.
61. Henry Asbury to Abraham Lincoln (July 28, 1858), Lincoln Papers, LOC.
62. CW 2, 533.
63. Abraham Jonas to AL (July 30, 1858), Abraham Lincoln Papers, LOC; CW 2, 533-34; 3, 37-38; John E. Boos, Rare Personal Accounts of Abraham Lincoln, William R. Feeheley and Bill Snack, eds. (Cadillac, Mich: Rail Splitter Publishing, 2005), 40-42.
64. Quincy Daily Whig (September 30, 1858), 2.
65. William A. Richardson Jr., "Pen Pictures of the Central Part of the City of Quincy as It Was when Douglas and Lincoln Met in Debate," Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society 18 (July 1925), 401-2.
66. Quincy Daily Whig, October 7, 1858, 2:1 as quoted in Mike Mehlman, "One of Lincoln's Most Valued Friends," Lincoln Herald 103:3 (2001), 148.
67. Maurice G. Baxter, Orville H. Browning: Lincoln's Friend and Critic (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1957), 94; http://www.thelincolnlog.org/Calendar.aspx?year=1858&month=10 (accessed June 4, 2013).
68. CW 3, 245-83; Michael Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln: A Life (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2008), 534-37, provides a summary and contrasting contemporary views on whether Lincoln or Douglas won the debate.
69. Reminiscences of Abraham Lincoln by Distinguished Men of His Time, ed. Allen Thorndike Rice (New York: North American Publishing Company, 1886), 537; Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln, 545-54; Lincoln to Norman B.

Judd (October 20, 1858), CW 3, 329-30.

70. Henry Asbury to Abraham Lincoln (November 13, 1858), Abraham Lincoln Papers; LOC; Lincoln to Asbury (November 19, 1858), CW 3, 339.
71. AL to Norman B. Judd (November 15, 1858), AL Papers, LOC; AL to Norman B. Judd (November 16, 1858) Shapell Manuscript Collection. For Lincoln's discussion of the phrase "And this too shall pass away," see his address before the Wisconsin State Agricultural Society, Milwaukee, Wisconsin (September 30, 1859), CW 3, 482. See also Shnayer Z. Leiman, "Judith Ish-Kishor: This Too Shall Pass," Tradition 41: 1 (2008): 71-77; and Zola, We Called Him Rabbi Abraham, 374–376.
72. Harry E. Pratt, The Personal Finances of Abraham Lincoln (Springfield: Abraham Lincoln Association, 1943), 54, 77-79, 105. By the time the investment was repaid, Lincoln was no longer alive.
73. AL to Alexander Sympson (December 12, 1858), CW 3, 346; Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln: A Life, I, 549-51.
74. Henry Asbury to K. K. Jones (October 2, 1882), copy in SC5836, AJA; Diary of Orville Hickman Browning, 345 (December 26, 1858); Charles M. Segal, "Abraham Jonas' Role in Lincoln's First Presidential Nomination," PAJHS 44 (December 1954), 100.

CHAPTER THREE: ONE OF MY MOST VALUED FRIENDS

1. Abraham Jonas to Lyman Trumbull (December 26, 1858), Trumbull Papers, LOC.
2. Occident 16 (February 1, 1859), 536-42; David I. Kertzer, The Kidnapping of Edgardo Mortara (New York: Knopf, 1997), esp. 127; Bertram W. Korn, The American Reaction to the Mortara Case (Cincinnati: American Jewish Archives, 1957).
3. Jonas to Trumbull (December 26, 1858), Trumbull Papers.
4. AL to Nathan B. Dodson (July 29, 1859) in CW 3, 396; AL to Hawkins Taylor (September 6, 1859) in CW 3, 400.
5. AL to Lyman Trumbull (January 29, 1859) in CW 3, 351.
6. CW 3, 369.
7. AL to Samuel Galloway (July 28, 1859), CW 3, 395; AL to Thomas J. Pickett (April 16, 1859), CW 3, 377-78.
8. AL to Schuyler Colfax (July 6, 1859), CW 3, 390. Shapell Manuscript Collection item.
9. Schurz's lecture (April 18, 1859) can be read at http://www.angelfire.com/ma3/bobwb/schurz/speech/americanism1859.html. On Schurz and his relationship with Jews, see Hans L. Trefousse, "German-American liberalism against Bigotry: Carl Schurz and the Jews," in Germans in America: Aspects of German-American Relations in the Nineteenth Century, ed. Edward A. McCormick (New York: Brooklyn College Press, 1983), 31-44.
10. AL to Theodore Canisius (May 17, 1859), CW 3, 380.
11. Daily State Journal (May 17, 1859) as reprinted in F. I. Herriott, The Premises and Significance of Abraham Lincoln's Letter to Theodore Canisius (1915), online at http://libsysdigi.library.uiuc.edu/OCA/Books2009-06/premisessignific00herr/premisessignific00herr.pdf, 35-37.
12. CW 3, 383.
13. Gary Ecelbarger, "Before Cooper Union: Abraham Lincoln's 1859 Cincinnati Speech and Its Impact on his Nomination," Journal of the Abraham Lincoln Association 30 (Winter 2009), online at http://quod.lib.umich.edu/j/jala/2629860.0003.103/--before-cooper-union-abraham-lincolns-1859-cincinnati-speech?rgn=main;view=-fulltext#link_note_12 (accessed July 12, 2013).
14. http://www.census.gov/population/www/documentation/twps0027/tab09.txt; Jacob R. Marcus, To Count a People: American Jewish Population Data, 1585-1984 (Lanham: University Press of America, 1990), 172-73. There were only about 1,500 Jews in Chicago at that time and 5,000 in San Francisco (Ibid, 28, 57).
15. http://library.cincymuseum.org/lincoln/items/litho1859.htm. Meyer Rosenbaum had a tin shop around 1860, and in 1861 he was selling stoves at 191 West 5th Street. According to the Cincinnati City Directory, it was not until 1866 that a "Rosenbaum & Bros. - Stoves" appears at No. 24, the address depicted in the lithograph, which reads: "Hanging Rock Stove - Foundry - Rosenbaum & (Bros.) - Stoves…"
16. Ecelbarger, "Before Cooper Union."
17. CW 3, 462; see Luke 11:23.
18. Quoted in Michael Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln: A Life (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2008), I, 568.
19. Ecelbarger, "Before Cooper Union."
20. Mark W. Delahay and 53 others to AL (November 15, 1859), AL Papers, LOC.
21. http://lincolninkansas.org/LincolnInKSFront-Info%20copy%201.pdf; a pitcher from that dinner is preserved in the city's Frontier Army Museum. An advertisement for J. Wollman & Co is found in the Kansas Herald of Freedom (March 14, 1857) and Betty Wollman's memories are preserved in the New York Times (March 27, 1927 and December 26, 1927). On Wollman and Abeles, see Joan Ferris Curran, Jonas and Betty (Kohn) Wollman and Their Descendants (Kansas City: J. F. Curran, distributed by H.W.B. Glock, 1986); Joan Ferris Curran, Descendants of Salomon Bloch of Janowitz, Bohemia, and Baruch Wollman of Kempen-in-Posen, Prussia (Baltimore: Gateway Press, 1996), 112-22, 192 (quote from p. 118); and Julia Wood Kramer, The House on the Hill: The Story of the Abeles Family of Leavenworth, Kansas (Chicago: 1990), 13-56. Kramer (p. 21) questions whether Abeles "was stirred by the slavery question or was an ideologue."

22. S. M. Pettingill to William H. Bailhache (October 12, 1859), as quoted in Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln: A Life, I, 582.
23. Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln: A Life, I, 582-83.
24. Harold Holzer, Lincoln at Cooper Union: The Speech that Made Abraham Lincoln President (New York: Simon & Schuster, 2004).
25. Jacques J. Lyons and Abraham de Sola, A Jewish Calendar for Fifty Years (New York: Bloch, 1854), 160-167; Howard B. Rock, "Upheaval, Innovation and Transformation: New York City Jews and the Civil War," American Jewish Archives Journal 64 (2012), 2-3.
26. Holzer, Harold. Lincoln at Cooper Union (2005)
27. Abram J. Dittenhoefer, How We Elected Lincoln: Personal Recollections (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 2005 [1916]), 16.
28. Ibid, 4-5.
29. Ibid, 18-19; CW 3, 522-550.
30. Dittenhoefer, How We Elected Lincoln, 20; Harold Holzer, "The Speech That Made the Man," American Heritage 59:4 (2009), online at http://www.americanheritage.com/content/speech-made-man (accessed July 14, 2013).
31. AL to W. H. Wells (Jan 8, 1859), CW 3, 349; AL to W. H. Ross (March 26, 1859), CW 3, 372-73; AL to George Parsons et al. (December 19, 1859), CW 3, 510; Abraham Jonas to AL (February 3, 1860), http://memory.loc.gov/cgi-bin/query/r?ammem/mal:@field(DOCID+@lit(d0232800)) (accessed July 15, 2013); AL to Abraham Jonas (February 4, 1860), CW 3, 516; Jay Monaghan, "The Lincoln-Douglas Debates, The Follett, Foster Edition of a Great Political Document," Lincoln Herald 45 (June 1943), online at http://archive.org/stream/thelincolndougla00mona#page/12/mode/2up (accessed July 15, 2013); David Henry Leroy, Mr. Lincoln's Book: Publishing the Lincoln-Douglas Debates (New Castle, DE: Oak Knoll Press; Chicago: Abraham Lincoln Book Shop, Inc., 2009), esp. 64-66, 145-49, 160.
32. Walter Stahr, Seward: Lincoln's Indispensable Man (New York: Simon & Schuster, 2012), 174-81.
33. AL to Samuel Galloway (March 24, 1860), CW 4, 34.
34. K. K.Jones, "Abraham Lincoln: How He Was Nominated," Indianapolis Sentinel (29 Sept. 1882), p. 7. Jonas's former law partner, Henry Asbury, confirmed hearing this story from Jonas; see his letter to Jones (October 2, 1882), SC5386, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati OH [available online at http://americanjewisharchives.org/exhibits/aje/details.php?id=677]. See also Proceedings of the Republican National Convention Held at Chicago, May 16, 17 and 18, 1860 (Albany: Weed, Parsons, 1860), 108; Charles M. Segal, "Abraham Jonas' Role in Lincoln's First Presidential Nomination," Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society 44 (1954), 98-105; and for an account that credits Alexander Conner, Republican state chairman of Indiana, with rounding up the supporters, Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln: A Life, I, 620.
35. Philippa Strum. "Dembitz, Lewis Naphtali"; http://www.anb.org/articles/11/11-00958.html; American National Biography Online Feb. 2000 (accessed Jul 16, 2013); Nelson I. Dawson, "Dembitz, Lewis Naphtali," The Encyclopedia of Louisville, ed. John Kieber (Louisville: University Press of Kentucky, 2001), 241-42; Proceedings of the Republican National Convention, 11, 35; Markens, Abraham Lincoln and the Jews, 36.
36. Charles L. Bernays, the delegate from Missouri, descended from a prominent Jewish family and was known to be of Jewish extraction. A freethinker, he and his siblings had been Christened and confirmed as Lutherans by their Jewish parents in Germany. Bernays was a staunch opponent of slavery and editor of the German-American newspaper Anzeiger des Westens. See PAJHS 9 (1901), 52; 11 (1903), 50; Bertram W. Korn, Eventful Years and Experiences (Cincinnati: American Jewish Archives, 1954), 8, 17; Carol S. Porter, Meeting Louis at the Fair (St. Louis: Virginia Publishing, 2004), 4-12; and, for the family background, Thekla Bernays, Augustus Charles Bernays: A Memoir (St. Louis: Mosby, 1912), 11-33.
37. Daily Missouri Republican (March 11, 1860); Moritz Pinner to Wendell Phillips (June 1, 1860), Blagden Collection of Wendell Phillips Papers, Houghton Library, Cambridge, MA, online at http://www.math.rutgers.edu/~zeilberg/family/wp2.html (accessed July 16, 2013); Markens, Abraham Lincoln and the Jews, 34-36. A great deal of additional material on Pinner is available on the Web site established by his descendants: http://www.math.rutgers.edu/~zeilberg/family/moritz.html (accessed July 16, 2013). On the Missouri Post, see http://chroniclingamerica.loc.gov/lccn/sn87052125/.

38. Moritz Pinner to Wendell Phillips (September 2, 1860), Blagden Collection of Wendell Phillips Papers, Houghton Library, Cambridge, MA, online at http://www.math.rutgers.edu/~zeilberg/family/wp3.html (accessed July 16, 2013).
39. Dittenhoefer, How We Elected Lincoln, 38-40.
40. Segal, "Abraham Jonas' Role in Lincoln's First Presidential Nomination," 103-4; Quincy Whig Reoublican (May 26, 1860, June 9, 1860); Iris A. Nelson and Walter S. Waggoner, "Sick, Sore and Sorry: The Stone's Prairie Riot of 1860," Journal of Illinois History 5:1 (2002), esp. 28.
41. Abraham Jonas to AL (July 20, 1860), LOC, online at http://memory.loc.gov/cgi-bin/query/P?mal:1:./temp/~ammem_e.
42. AL to Abraham Jonas (July 21, 1860), CW 4, 85-86.
43. AL to Joshua F. Speed (August 24, 1855) CW 2, 323.
44. AL to Abraham Jonas (July 21, 1860), CW 4, 86. Many Know-Nothings and members of the American Party ultimately supported Lincoln, preferring him to Douglas (who had a Catholic wife) and to the Southern candidates; see Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln: A Life, I, 659-62, 682-83.
45. AL to Joshua F. Speed (May 22, 1860), CW 10, 53-54.
46. Markens, Abraham Lincoln and the Jews, 35-36.
47. Theodore Calvin Pease and James G. Randall, eds., The Diary of Orville Hickman Browning, 2 vols., Collections of the Illinois State Historical Library (Springfield: Illinois State Historical Library, 1925-1933), 2:415.
48. AL to Cassius M. Clay (May 26, 1860), Shapell Legacy Partnership.
49. CW 3, 395.
50. AL to William D. Kelley (October 13, 1860), Shapell Legacy Partnership.
51. AL to David L. Phillips (July 2, 1860), Shapell Manuscript Collection; CW 4, 81; on Phillips see John Y. Simon, "Union County in 1858 and the Lincoln-Douglas Debate," Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society 62 (1969) 267-92, esp. 281.
52. AL to Hannibal Hamlin (July 18, 1860), CW 4, 84.
53. AL to William Seward (October 12, 1860), Shapell Legacy Partnership.
54. Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln: A Life, I, 680.
55. Howard B. Rock, "Upheaval, Innovation and Transformation: New York Jews and the Civil War," American Jewish Archives Journal 64 (2012), 11.
56. Edward H. Mazur, "Chicago's Jews and Abraham Lincoln: The Politics of the Civil War Era," Chicago Jewish History 33 (Winter 2009), 6.
57. "Translation of Selected Minutes of the New York Turn Verein,", July 20, 1850, p.15, http://www2.ku.edu/~maxkade/finding_aid_nytv.pdf; see also Frank Baron, "Abraham Lincoln and the German Immigrants: Turners and Forty-Eighters." Yearbook of German-American Studies Supplemental Issue 4 (Lawrence, KS: Society for German-American Studies, 2012).
58. New York Daily Tribune (February 10, 1861), 8, col. 4. Markens, Abraham Lincoln and the Jews, 32, embellished the quote and misdated it.
59. Markens, Abraham Lincoln and the Jews, 32; see also Jacob R. Marcus, United States Jewry 1776-1985 (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1993), III, 211.
60. Lincoln to Weed, December 17, 1860. Shapell Legacy Partnership.
61. Charleston Mercury (December 21, 1860).
62. Judah P. Benjamin, Speech of Hon. J. P. Benjamin of Louisiana on the Right of Secession (December 31, 1860), 16, online at http://ia700303.us.archive.org/23/items/speechofhonjpben00benj/speechofhonjpben00benj.pdf.
63. Abraham Jonas to AL (December 30, 1860), AL Papers, LOC.
64. William H. Seward to AL (December 29, 1860) as quoted in CW 4, 170.
65. AL to Salmon P. Chase (December 31, 1860), Shapell Manuscript Collection.
66. The proclamation may be found at http://www.wallbuilders.com/libissuesarticles.asp?id=3587.
67. Israelite (November 30, 1860), 172; (December 28, 1860), 205.
68. Jewish Messenger (January 11, 1861), 10.
69. Morris J. Raphall, "The Bible View of Slavery" (1861), http://www.jewish-history.com/civilwar/raphall.html (accessed July 21, 2013); Adam Good-heart, "The Rabbi and the Rebellion," New York Times (March 7, 2011), http://opinionator.blogs.nytimes.com/2011/03/07/the-rabbi-and-the-rebellion/ Bertram W. Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War (New York: Atheneum, 1970), 15-31.

70. Jewish Messenger (January 11, 1861), 10.
71. R.S.H., "Rabbi Raphall," The Independent (February 21, 1861), 8.
72. "David Einhorn's response to 'A Biblical View of Slavery,'" http://www.jewish-history.com/civilwar/einhorn.html.
73. http://www.jewish-history.com/civilwar/heilprin.html; for his brother, Isaac, and Lincoln's spectacles, see Roland T. Carr and Hugh Morrow, "We Found Lincoln's Lost Bank Account," Saturday Evening Post (February 14, 1953).
74. Rev. Hugh Brown, Review of Rev. Dr. Raphael's [sic] disco'rse on "American slavery as being consistent with the Hebrew Servitude of the Old Testament," a sermon preached (by request) in the Baptist church, Shushan, on Wednesday, March 27th, 1861; http://archive.org/stream/reviewofrevdrrap00brow/reviewofrevdrrap00brow_djvu.txt (accessed July 21, 2013).
75. Illowy's speech is available in full at http://www.jewish-history.com/Illoway/sermon.html (accessed July 21, 2013).
76. Speech of Hon. Joseph Jonas of Hamilton County in the House of Representatives, February 25, 26, 1861, SC 5829, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, OH.
77. Hyman L. Meites, History of the Jews of Chicago (Chicago: Chicago Jewish Historical Society and Wellington Publishing, 1924), 45; Markens, Abraham Lincoln and the Jews, 25-26; Abram Vossen Goodman, "A Jewish Peddler's Diary 1842-1843," American Jewish Archives 3 (June 1951), 81-110.
78. Abraham Kohn to AL (February 6, 1861), RG 59, Entry 760, Records of the State Department, Appointment Records, Applications and Recommendations for Office, Applications and Recommendations for Public Office, 1797-1901, National Archives College Park. On Waughop, see The Bench and Bar of Chicago: Biographical Sketches (Chicago: H. C. Cooper, 1883), 395-96.
79. New Hampshire Statesman (February 23, 1861) col. D; The Daily Cleveland Herald (February 25, 1861), col. B; Lowell Daily Citizen and News (February 16, 1861), Col. B; Highland Weekly News (February 28, 1861), 1. Note that Markens, Abraham Lincoln and the Jews, 25, and later sources consistently describe the gift as a "silk flag," but the contemporary newspapers all describe it as a "picture." The acknowledgment found in the archival collection of Congregation KAM from Chicago businessman J. Scammon Young [wrongly identified as a presidential aide], who apparently made the actual presentation of the gift to Lincoln, similarly refers to "your beautiful painting of an American flag," see Chicago Jewish History 33 (Winter 2009), 4, and Korn, American Jewry and Civil War, 205, 301 n. 64. Harold Holzer, Lincoln President-Elect: Abraham Lincoln and the Great Secession Winter 1860–1861 (New York: Simon & Schuster, 2009), 187, provides context but misidentifies the biblical verse.

CHAPTER FOUR: WE HAVE NOT YET APPOINTED A HEBREW

1. CW 4, 190; Markens, Abraham Lincoln and the Jews, 27-28; for the Provisional Constitution of the Confederacy, see http://avalon.law.yale.edu/19th_century/csa_csapro.asp.
2. CW 4, 218; Israelite (February 15, 1861), p.262.
3. Abram J. Dittenhoefer, How We Elected Lincoln: Personal Recollections (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 2005 [1916]), 43; CW 4, 233.
4. CW 4, 239.
5. David H. Donald, Lincoln (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1995), 273; Isaac M. Fein, "Baltimore Jews During the Civil War," American Jewish Historical Quarterly 51 (December 1961), 67-96.
6. CW 4, 262-71.
7. CW 4, 271.
8. Israelite (March 15, 1861), 294.
9. Ibid.
10. See, generally, Catherine A. Brekus and W. Clark Gilpin (eds.), American Christianities: A History of Dominance and Diversity (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2011), esp.1-24.
11. Don E. Fehrenbacher and Virginia Fehrenbacher (eds.), Recollected Words of Abraham Lincoln (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1996), 25; Allen Guelzo, Abraham Lincoln: Redeemer President (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999), 313.
12. Jonathan D. Sarna, "Christians and Non-Christians in the Marketplace of American Religion," American Christianities, ed. Brekus & Gilpin, 119-32.
13. Jewish Messenger (February 18, 1861), online at http://www.jewish-history.com/civilwar/semi02.htm.
14. Ari Hoogenboom, Outlawing the Spoils: A History of the Civil Service Reform Movement 1865-1883 (New York: Praeger, 1982); Michael Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln: A Life (Baltimore: John Hopkins University Press, 2008), II, 69-97.
15. Israelite (April 5, 1861), 317.
16. Israelite (May 24, 1861), 374.
17. Quincy Daily Herald (November 30, 1860), 3; Orville Browning to Abraham Lincoln (December 9, 1860), AL Papers, LOC; Quincy Whig Republican (May 25, 1861), 3.
18. CW 4, 386
19. AL to Simon Cameron (May 26, 1861) in CW 4, 386; Shalom E. Lamm, "Colonel Max Einstein," http://www.jewish-history.com/civilwar/einstein.html, which also quotes Geiss's letter to William Seward (February 24, 1862); Henry S. Morais, The Jews of Philadelphia (Philadelphia: Levytype, 1894), 480-82; George B. McClellan to Irvin McDowell (August 16, 1861); Max Einstein to Simon Cameron (August 18, 1861), Simon Cameron Papers, LOC; George B. McClellan to Simon Cameron as quoted in Roger D. Hunt, Union Army Colonels of the Civil War (Mechanicsburg, PA: Stackpole books, 2007), 61, and in Letters Received, Volunteer Service Branch, Adjutant General's Office, File P17(VS)1861, National Archives; for a history of the 27th Regiment, see http://www.pa-roots.com/pacw/infantry/27th/27thorg.html.
20. Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln, II, 93-94; Israelite (November 6, 1861), 76; Sol Stroock, "Switzerland and American Jews," PAJHS 11 (1903), 50; Richmond Dispatch (June 8, 1861), Journal of the Executive Proceedings of the Senate of the United States of America (1861-1862), First Session: 375 (July 10, 1861), 484 (July 26, 1861); Second session: 70 (January 6, 1862), 96 (January 22, 1862); on Bernays, see above chapter 3, n. 36.
21. Francis B. Cutting to AL (May 28, 1861), AL Papers, LOC.
22. Sigmund Diamond (ed.), A Casual View of America: The Home Letters of Salomon de Rothschild 1859-1861 (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1961), 123-24 [Salomon's letter, written from New Orleans, was dated 28 April 1861].
23. David Black, The King of Fifth Avenue: The Fortunes of August Belmont (New York: Dial, 1981)
24. August Belmont to Lionel de Rothschild (May 21, 1861); Francis B. Cutting to AL (May 28, 1861), AL Papers, LOC.
25. David Black, The King of Fifth Avenue: The Fortunes of August Belmont (New York: Dial Press, 1981), 207.

26. August Belmont to AL (May 9, 1862), AL Papers, LOC; Black, King of Fifth Avenue, 209-11.
27. August Belmont to Thurlow Weed (July 20, 1862), AL Papers, LOC; AL to August Belmont (July 31, 1862) in CW 5, 350-51; Black, King of Fifth Avenue, 216-18, 241-60.
28. John Bassett Moore (ed.), The Works of James Buchanan (Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1911), XI: 353 (online at http://archives.dickinson.edu/digitized-resources/works-james-buchanan-comprising-his-speeches-statepapers-and-private); New York Times (November 9, 1864), 2; Black, King of Fifth Avenue, 242, 257-58.
29. Appointment of Alfred Mordecai Jr. (August 10, 1861), Shapell Manuscript Collection.
30. Varina Davis, Jefferson Davis: Ex-President of the Confederate States of America (New York: Belford, 1890), I, 535-36; Emily Bingham, Mordecai: An Early American Family (New York: Hill & Wang, 2003), 235-37; Stanley Falk, "Alfred Mordecai, American Jew," American Jewish Archives 10 (1958), 125-32.
31. Bingham, Mordecai, 245-51; Stanley L. Falk, "Divided Loyalties in 1861: The Decision of Major Alfred Mordecai," in Sarna & Mendelsohn, Jews and the Civil War: A Reader, 201-25; Jean E. Friedman, "The Moral Imagination of Confederate Family Politics," in Inside the Confederate Nation: Essay in Honor of Emory M. Thomas, eds. Lesley J. Gordon and John C. Inscoe (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2005), 167-87.
32. Bingham, Mordecai, 237, 250, 261. Mordecai concluded his career, in 1895, as superintendent and commandant of the Springfield Armory.
33. John Fitch, Annals of the Army of the Cumberland (Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1864), 264, 270.
34. Philip Kearny to AL; AL to Kearny (September 3, 1861), Abraham Lincoln Collection, Clements Library, University of Michigan (see http://quod.lib.umich.edu/c/clementsmss/umich-wcl-M-816lin?view=text); CW, Supplement I, 95,; http://www.math.rutgers.edu/~zeilberg/family/moritz.html.
35. The Shapell Roster of Jews in the service of the Union and Confederate Armies and Navies during the American Civil War period of 1861–1865.
36. Robert N. Rosen, The Jewish Confederates (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000), 118-26.
37. On Alfred Raphall, see House of Representatives, 53rd Congress, 2nd Session, "Alfred M. Raphall: Report to Accompany H.R. 954."
38. AL to Edwin M. Stanton (November 4, 1862), CW Supplement, p.162; original in Shapell Manuscript Collection; for evidence of Levy's Orthodoxy and stature, see Hyman B. Grinstein, The Rise of the Jewish Community of New York 1654-1860 (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1945), 577 n. 64.
39. Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 108.
40. AGO, General Orders No. 332, Shapell Manuscript Collection; "Proceedings of a General Court Martial, August 10, 1863, Trial of Captain Cherrie [sic] M. Levy," NARA; AL to Samuel C. Pomeroy (November 8, 1863), CW 7, 4.
41. Richard Busteed to AL (November 18, 1863) and other letters appended to "Proceedings of a General Court Martial, August 10, 1863, Trial of Captain Cherrie [sic] M. Levy," NARA (Busteed was appointed judge on November 17, 1863.) In his letter, Busteed noted that Levy's "father-in-law is the well-known Jewish prelate Dr. Raphael [sic], and a large circle of his countrymen are much interested in the case." "I have heard his story," he concluded, "and I believe his narration of the affair." In his eulogy for Lincoln, Raphall reported in the third person that he had seen Lincoln but once, "but on that single occasion, he had shown himself friendly to him—he [Raphall] had asked him but one favor, but that time he had granted it freely—he had granted it lovingly, because he knew the speaker was a Jew—because he knew him to be a true servant of the Lord"; Emanuel Hertz, Abraham Lincoln: The Tribute of the Synagogue (New York: Bloch Publishing, 1927), 169.
42. M. J. Raphall to AL (March 1, 1864), AL Papers LOC; for the renomination, see Senate Executive Journal (January 18, 1864), 380.
43. Senate Executive Journal (March 25, 1864), 458; Samuel F. Chalfin to Cheme M. Levy (July 16, 1864), AL Papers, LOC; "Proceedings of a General Court Martial, August 10, 1863, Trial of Captain Cherrie [sic] M. Levy," NARA; Samuel C. Pomeroy to AL (July 22, 1864), AL Papers, LOC; Report of Committees of the Senate of the United States for the First Session of the Forty-Fourth Congress 1875-1876 (Washington DC: Government Printing Office, 1876), Report #370.
44. Shakespeare Henry V, ii. i. 106.
45. On sutlers see Sarna, When General Grant Expelled the Jews, 19; Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 90.

46. AL to Simon Cameron (September 5, 1861), Shapell Manuscript Collection.
47. AL seemingly to Simon Cameron (December 6, 1861), Shapell Manuscript Collection. On sutlers, see Francis A. Lord, Civil War Sutlers and Their Wares (New York: Thomas Yoselof, 1969); David Michael Delo, Peddlers and Post Traders: The Army Sutler on the Frontier (Salt Lake City, 1992).
48. The Shapell Manuscript Collection has compiled a preliminary list of Jewish sutlers. For the March 19, 1862 Act "to provide for the appointment of sutlers … and to define their duties," see OR, Series 3, Vol. 1, 938-40.
49. CW 5, 447.
50. Herman A. Norton, Struggling for Recognition: The United States Army Chaplaincy (Washington DC: Office of the Chief of Chaplains, 1977); Warren B, Armstong, For Courageous Fighting and Confident Dying: Union Chaplains in the Civil War (Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1998); Steven Woodworth, While God Is Marching On: The Religious World of Civil War Soldiers (Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2001), 145-74; Gardiner H. Shattuck Jir, A Shield and Hiding Place: The Religious Life of the Civil War Armies (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1987), 51-72.
51. OR, Series 3, volume 1, 380-82; for the chaplaincy, see section 9.
52. Congressional Globe (July 12 [13], 1861), 100.
53. OR Series 3, volume 1, 154,157.
54. Congressional Globe (July 12 [13], 1861), 100.
55. Israelite (September 6, 1861), 76 (quoted); (July 19, 1861), 23.
56. Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 58-60; David de Sola Pool, "The Diary of Chaplain Michael M. Allen, September 1861," PAJHS 39 (December 1949), 177-82; http://www.jewish-history.com/civilwar/mmallen.htm (accessed 1 September 2013).
57. For documents, see Myer S. Isaacs, "A Jewish Army Chaplain," PAJHS 12 (1904), 127-37; and Gary P. Zola, They Called Him Rabbi Abraham (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 2014). The standard account of this episode is Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 56-97. For the "sizable number of undesirables," among early Civil War chaplains, including illiterates and irreligious laymen, see Norton, Struggling for Recognition, 85. On Fischel, see Jonathan Waxman, "Arnold Fischel: 'Unsung Hero' in American Israel," American Jewish Historical Quarterly 60 (June 1971), 325-43. Note that Fischel's term at Shearith Israel was ending, and he may well have been looking for another job.
58. Steven E. Woodworth, While God Is Marching On: The Religious World of Civil War Soldiers (Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2001), 145.
59. Israelite (November 15, 1861), 157; (December 6, 1861), 177.
60. For an analysis of these petitions, see Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 66 and 258, nn.37-42.
61. AL to John J. Hughes (October 21, 1861), CW 4, 559-60.
62. Arnold Fischel to Henry I. Hart (December 11, 1861), Board of Delegates Papers, AJHS, NY reprinted in PAJHS 12 (1904), 131-32.
63. United States Christian Commission, Facts, Principles and Progress (Philadelphia: Sherman, 1863), 7-8; AL to George H. Stuart (December 12, 1861), CW 5, 67.
64. AL to Arnold Fischel (December 14, 1861), CW 5, 69.
65. PAJHS 12 (1904), 134.
66. The Presbyter as quoted in Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 64.
67. Statutes at Large, 37th Congress, Second Session (1862), 595; Norton, Struggling for Recognition, 87-93; Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 71-72.
68. Isaac Leeser to AL (August 21, 1862), endorsed by John Hay and Joseph R. Smith, AL Papers, LOC; Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 77; in 1864, Frankel was appointed visiting chaplain with specific responsibility for Jewish soldiers, see Armstrong, For Courageous Fighting and Confident Dying, 39.
69. Henry I. Hart and Myer J. Isaacs to AL (October 6, 1862), Thomas F. Perley to William H. Hammond (October 27, 1862), AL Papers, LOC; Fischel had estimated that there were "thirty to forty" Jews in Washington-area hospitals, but that would not have justified a chaplain either, PAJHS 12 (1904), 136; Waxman, "Arnold Fischel," 341-42.
70. Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 84-87.
71. Ibid, xv-xvi, 82-83; Israelite (May 15, 1863), 357. On Gotthelf, see Iuliu Herscovici, The Jews of Vicksburg, Mississippi (2007), 322-34.

72. James Shrigley in Osborn H. Oldroyd, Lincoln Memorial: Album Immortelles (New York: Carleton, 1883), 336-37; P. M. Zall (ed.) Abe Lincoln Laughing (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982), 82-83. Philadelphia Congressman Leonard Myers, of Jewish descent, was among those who recommended Shrigley to Lincoln. See Myers to AL (November 19, 1862), Shapell Manuscript Collection.
73. CW 8, 102-3; on Gibson, see Ann Braude, Radical Spirits: Spiritualism and Womens Rights in Nineteenth-Century America (Boston: Beacon, 1989), 92, 127.
74. CW 5, 497-98; the order was dated November 15, 1862. Washington's earlier order was dated July 9, 1776.
75. Occident (January 1, 1863), 25.
76. Bernhard Behrend to AL (December 4, 1862) in Occident (January 1, 1863), 25; online with additional information on Behrend at http://www.jewish-history.com/civilwar/shabbat.htm; see also Jewish Life in Mr. Lincoln's City, eds. Laura Cohen Apelbaum and Claire Uziel (Washington, DC: Jewish Historical Society of Greater Washington, 2009), 39, 138.
77. Israelite (January 16, 1863), 218; Jonathan D. Sarna, When General Grant Expelled the Jews (New York: Schocken, 2012), 23.
78. On this episode, see Sarna, When General Grant Expelled the Jews.
79. PUSG 6:238, 283, 393-94; Sarna, When General Grant Expelled the Jews, 44-45.
80. PUSG 7: 8-9; Sarna, When General Grant Expelled the Jews, 45,170 n.34.
81. Sarna, When General Grant Expelled the Jews, 47.
82. Sylvanus Cadwallader, "Forty Years With Grant," 47-49 in Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library, Springfield Illinois; Sarna, When General Grant Expelled the Jews, 47-48, 171.
83. PUSG 7: 53; see John Y. Simon, "That Obnoxious Order," Jews and the Civil War, eds. Jonathan D. Sarna & Adam Mendelsohn (New York: NYU Press, 2010), 358.
84. U. S. Grant to Jesse Grant, August 14, 1868, Shapell Manuscript Collection.
85. OR, series I, vol. 17 (part 2), 463, 471; Sarna, When General Grant Expelled the Jews, 8.
86. Israelite (January 2, 1863), 202; Jewish Record (January 13, 1863); Sarna, When General Grant Expelled the Jews, 17-18.
87. Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 123; John E. L. Robertson, Paducah: Frontier to the Atomic Age (Charleston, SC: Arcadia Books, 2002), 44; Sarna, When General Grant Expelled the Jews, 6-7.
88. OR, series I, vol. 17 (part 2), 506; PUSG 7: 54; Sarna, When General Grant Expelled the Jews, 11.
89. Memphis Daily Bulletin (January 6, 1863) as cited in Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 272 n.16; Sarna, When General Grant Expelled the Jews, 11, 35-37.
90. SC-4218, AJA; Sarna, When General Grant Expelled the Jews, 12-13.
91. Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 125; Markens, Lincoln and the Jews, 118.
92. Israelite (January 16, 1863); PUSG 7: 53-54; OR, series I, vol. 17 (part 2), 544; Sarna, When General Grant Expelled the Jews, 21-22.
93. St. Louis B'nai B'rith to Abraham Lincoln (January 5, 1863), AL Papers, LOC; Isidor Bush to Edward Bates (January 6, 1863), endorsed by Edward Bates (January 12, 1863), AL Papers, LOC.
94. Israelite (January 16, 1863), 218; the article was reprinted as far away as San Francisco: San Francisco Evening Bulletin (February 10, 1863).

CHAPTER FIVE: I MYSELF HAVE A REGARD FOR THE JEWS

1. Diary of Edward Rosewater, January 1, 1863, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, OH, online at http://americanjewisharchives.org/exhibits/aje/_pdfs/X_58.pdf.
2. Edward Rosewater to Leah Colman, September 18, 1862, Colman-Schwarzenberg family album, private collection, as quoted in Kathryn Hellerstein, "A Letter from Lincoln's Jewish Telegrapher," Jewish Quarterly Review 94:4 (Fall 2004), 629-30.
3. Diary of Edward Rosewater, January 1, 1863, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, OH, online at http://americanjewisharchives.org/exhibits/aje/_pdfs/X_58.pdf.
4. Don E. Fehrenbacher and Virginia Fehrenbacher, Recollected Words of Abraham Lincoln (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1996), 397; Michael Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln: A Life (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2008), II, 469.
5. CW 6, 28-20; John Hope Franklin, "The Emancipation Proclamation: An Act of Justice." Prologue Magazine 25 (Summer 1993), online at http://www.archives.gov/publications/prologue/1993/summer/emancipation-proclamation.html; Hellerstein, "A Letter from Lincoln's Jewish Telegrapher," 625-36; see also Isaac Markens, Abraham Lincoln and the Jews (New York, 1909), 56.
6. Jewish Record 1 (January 23, 1863) as quoted in Bertram W. Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1951), 27.
7. Israelite (February 27, 1863), 268.
8. Occident (February 1, 1863), 16.
9. Simon Wolf, The Presidents I Have Known from 1860-1918 (Washington, DC, 1918), 8.
10. Hamagid 7 (January 29, 1863), 34. Earlier, Vidaver was more sympathetic to the South; see Harvey A. Richman, "The Image of America in the European Hebrew Periodicals of the Nineteenth Century (Until 1880)" (Ph.D., University of Texas, Austin, 1971), 206-15, esp. 211.
11. Esther 8:8.
12. AL to John Alexander McClernand (January 8, 1863), Shapell Legacy Partnership.
13. New York World (September 24, 1864) as quoted in Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 194.
14. Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 194; Gary P. Zola, We Called Him Rabbi Abraham: Lincoln and American Jewry—A Documentary History (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 2014), 44.
15. While later sources list his birth as 1827, he was listed on the ship's manifest upon the arrival of the Zacharias in 1832 as being seven years old, and the 1850 U.S. Census lists him as being aged twenty-five. His marriage in 1844 likewise points to the earlier birth year.
16. Elizabeth P. Bentley, Passenger Arrivals at the Port of New York, 1830-1832, From Customs Passenger Lists (Baltimore: Genealogical Publishing Co., 2000), 1102.
17. I. Zacharie to N. P. Banks (December 28, 1863), reprinted in Charles M. Segal, "Isachar Zacharie: Lincoln's Chiropodist," Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society 43 (December 1953), 115 (for Charles Johnson, his letter writer, see p. 94); he likewise admitted to his lack of education in a talk reprinted in Jewish Messenger (May 13, 1864), 141.
18. Charles E. Krausz, "Issachar Zacharie, 1827-1900," A Fast Pace Forward: Chronicles of American Podiatry (Philadelphia: Pennsylvania College of Podiatric Medicine, 1987), 19.
19. The 1850 U.S. Census lists him as living with his wife's family (see below, n. 29); for quote see Jewish Messenger (May 13, 1864), 141 and for Lincoln, see below and CW 8, 238.
20. Cameron Kippen, "A Potted History of Podiatry," http://foottalk.blogspot.com/2008/12/potted-history-of-podiatry.html; D. R. Tollafield & J. C. Cagnall, "Introduction: an historical perspective," in D. R. Tollafield & L. M. Merriman (eds.) Clinical Skills in Treating the Foot (Edinburgh: Churchill Livingstone, 1997), 1-6; James E. Bates (ed.) A Fast Pace Forward: Chronicles of American Podiatry (Philadelphia: Pennsylvania College of Pediatric Medicine, 1987), 5; Collin Dagnall, "The Origin of 'Chiropodist'" Podiatry Now 12 (April 2009), 48.
21. "Lewis Durlacher," The Palgrave Dictionary of Anglo-Jewish History, ed. William D. Rubinstein et al. (New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2011), 235; W. Seelig, "Durlacher: Four Generations of a Family in English Chiropody," The Chiropodist 11 (1956), 76-83.
22. British and Foreign Medical Review 20 (1845), 521.

23. The Medico-chirurgical Review, and Journal of Practical Medicine, new series, 2 (1845), 546.
24. J. C. Dagnall, "Who Wrote 'Eisenberg on the Diseases of the Human Foot'?" The ClioPedic Items 1 (1985), 7-12 suggests that Eisenberg was the nom de plume of George Gabriel Sigmond. Many thanks to Dr Anthony S. Travis for valuable research that is partially incorporated here.
25. I. Zacharie, Corns, Operations on the Feet (New York: [I. Zacharie, 186?]) as quoted in Charles M. Segal, "Isachar Zacharie: Lincoln's Chiropodist," Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society 43 (December 1953), 72-73, 78.
26. I. Zacharie, Surgical and Practical Observations on the Diseases of the Human Foot (Rev. ed, London: Adams Brothers, 1876), ii; the dedication is practically word-for-word identical to John Eisenberg's dedication of his book to the great British physician and physiologist Marshall Hall; see John Eisenberg, Surgical and Practical Observations on the Diseases of the Human Foot (London: Henry Renshaw, 1845), iii. Zacharie presumably backdated his dedication to 1844 so as to pretend that Eisenberg plagiarized him. A "certificate," purportedly from Valentine Mott and dated August 1858 testifying to Zacharie's skills, appears in Corns, Operations on the Feet. For the original, see Shapell Manuscript Collection.
27. Bates, A Fast Pace Forward, 12 includes an ad for Davidson's establishment; for his Jewish connections, see Jewish Exponent 1 (July 22, 1887), 8.
28. The Freemason, 29 September 1900; on Mutter see E. S. Harris and R. F. Morgan, "Thomas Dent Mutter, MD: Early Reparative Surgeon," Annals of Plastic Surgery 33 (September 1994):333-38.
29. The Census listed him as "Isicca Zackriah" and misidentified him as female but correctly listed the first names of his wife and children and listed the head of the household as Jacob Lawson, his father-in-law.
30. Charles M. Segal, "Isachar Zacharie: Lincoln's Chiropodist," Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society 43 (December 1953), 74-79, quoting documents now in the possession of the Shapell Manuscript Collection.
31. Ibid, 76, Shapell Manuscript Collection.
32. Ibid, 77, Shapell Manuscript Collection.
33. Krausz, "Issachar Zacharie, 1827-1900," 19.
34. Freemason's Chronicle 51 (29 September 1900), 147-148; http://www.orderofthesecretmonitorlondon.org.uk/history.html (accessed 25 December 2013).
35. New York Atlas (August 29, 1858) as reprinted in Segal, "Isachar Zacharie," 77-78; see also Zacharie's brochure Corns: Operations on the Feet (n.p., n.d. [1862?])
36. Gilbert Muller, William Cullen Bryant: Author of America (Albany: SUNY, 2008), 74.
37. New-York Evening Post (February 19, 1859), as quoted in Segal, "Isachar Zacharie," 78-79. For his "personal experience" as a patient, see Willliam Cullen Bryant to Edwin M. Stanton (August 21, 1862), Shapell Manuscript Collection.
38. New York Times (December 12, 1862); Frank R. Freemon, "Lincoln Finds a Surgeon-General: William A. Hammond and the Transformation of the Union Army Medical Bureau," Civil War History 33 (1987), 5-21; Bonnie E. Blustein, Preserve Your Love for Science: Life of William A Hammond, American Neurologist (New York: Cambridge, 2002), 62, 82.
39. Bryant to Stanton (August 21, 1862), Shapell Manuscript Collection.
40. W. C. Bryant to AL (August 21, 1862), Shapell Manuscript Collection. Zacharie, of course, was not a "regularly educated surgeon," but he performed like one.
41. George Opdyke to AL (August 28, 1862), Shapell Manuscript Collection.
42. Rufus F. Andrews to AL (August 29, 1862), Shapell Manuscript Collection.
43. Segal, "Isachar Zacharie," 80-81.
44. New York Herald (October 3, 1862), 4.
45. I. Zacharie to E. M. Stanton (August 26, 1862), Letters Received Files, August 27, 1862, Records of the War Department, Office of the Surgeon General, National Archives, Washington, DC in Segal, "Isachar Zacharie," 80.
46. New York Herald (October 3, 1862), as reprinted in Zola, We Called Him Rabbi Abraham, 54.
47. Lincoln's signed, handwritten testimonial (September 20, 1862) is in the Shapell Manuscript Collection.
48. Lincoln's signed, handwritten card, dated September 22, 1862, is in the Shapell Manuscript Collection.
49. New York Herald (September 26, 1862) as quoted in http://www.thelincolnlog.org/Calendar.aspx?date=1862-09-25. Lincoln had sprained his wrist on September 13th trying to restrain his runaway horse during a morning ride.

50. The testimonial signed by Lincoln and Seward (September 23, 1862) is in the Shapell Manuscript Collection; see also CW Supplement I, 152-153.
51. The order is reprinted in PAJHS 43 (1953), 123. The pass was subsequently continued for sixty days more.
52. "Ode to Dr. Zacharie," Vanity Fair 6 (October 18, 1862), 190.
53. Bryant was president of the New York Homeopathic Society; see http://homeoint.org/photo/b2/bryantwc.htm.
54. Blustein, Preserve Your Love for Science: Life of William A Hammond, American Neurologist, 81-83; see also p. 59: "Hammond was more than a little arrogant."
55. CW 5, 444-445.
56. William A. Hammond, A Statement of the Causes Which Led to the Dismissal of the Surgeon-General William A. Hammond from the Army with a Review of the Evidence Adduced Before the Court (New York: 1864), 52. https://archive.org/details/statementofcause01hamm.
57. Maine Historical Society; Zola, We Called Him Rabbi Abraham, 58.
58. N. P. Banks to J. A. Dix (October 6, 1862), Shapell Manuscript Collection; Segal, "Isachar Zacharie," 83, 124.
59. I. Zacharie to William H. Seward (November 24, 1862) reprinted in Charles M. Segal, "Isachar Zacharie: Lincoln's Chiropodist—Addendum," PAJHS 44 (1954), 107.
60. AL to Banks (November 25, 1862), CW Supplement 1, 165; Brown University Library Center for Digital Scholarship, Call no. LA2260 (online: http://library.brown.edu/cds/catalog/catalog.php?verb=render&id=1212770838390625&view=pageturner&pageno=1).

61. James G. Hollandsworth Jr., Pretense of Glory: The Life of General Nathaniel P. Banks (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1998), 83-88.
62. Bertram W. Korn, The Early Jews of New Orleans (Waltham: American Jewish Historical Society, 1969), 227.
63. Benjamin F. Butler to Myer S. Isaacs (February 13, 1864), in PAJHS 29 (1925), 121; on Butler's anti-Semitism, see also Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 164-66 and Robert N. Rosen, The Jewish Confederates (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000), 275.
64. Benjamin F. Butler to U.S. Attorney General, October 23, 1862, Shapell Manuscript Collection.
65. Numbers of Zacharies and Zacharias are listed in the 1840 census from New Orleans, and Zacharie later reported that he had hired "men I have known from my infancy" to assist him in his mission; see Segal, "Isachar Zacharie," 86.
66. Jonathan D. Sarna, When General Grant Expelled the Jews (New York: Schocken, 2012), 44-45. Actually, Grant's order only applied to the area under his command, which did not include New Orleans.
67. N. P. Banks to I. Zacharie (January 1, 1863) in Segal, "Isachar Zacharie," 85.
68. I. Zacharie to AL (January 14, 1863, February 19, 1863), AL Papers, LOC.
69. I. Zacharie to AL (May 9, 1863) reprinted in Segal, "Isachar Zacharie-Addendum," 112-13. Zacharie sent practically the same words to Banks (Segal, "Isachar Zacharie," 98). For Gutheim's view of Lincoln, see Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 48. While Gutheim was an immigrant, his wife was a native of Mobile, Alabama.. Gutheim was banished and moved to Montgomery; he did not return to New Orleans until July 1865. See William Warren Rogers, "In Defense of Our Sacred Cause: Rabbi James K. Gutheim in Confederate Montgomery," Journal of Confederate History 7 (1991): 113-122; Gary P. Zola," Gutheim, James Koppel"; http://www.anb.org/articles/08/08-01796.html; American National Biography Online (accessed July 9, 2012); and Scott Langston, "James K. Gutheim as Southern Reform Rabbi, Community Leader and Symbol," Southern Jewish History 5 (2002), 69-102.
70. New York Herald (June 13, 1863), 8; see also Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 196.
71. I. Zacharie to AL (January 14, 1863, February 19, 1863), AL Papers, LOC.
72. Raymond H. Banks, King of Louisiana, 1862-1865 and Other Government Work: A Biography of Major General Nathaniel Prentice Banks (Las Vegas: R. H. Banks, 2005), 588-89; see Zacharie to Banks (May 3, 1863): "I write by every Steamer to the President & Mr. Seward" in Segal, "Isachar Zacharie," 98.
73. I. Zacharie to N. P. Banks (January 11, 1863) in ibid, 86-87.
74. James Marten, "The Making of a Carpetbagger: George S. Denison and the South, 1854-1866," Louisiana History 34:2 (Spring 1993), 141.
75. Salmon P. Chase, "Diary and Correspondence of Salmon P. Chase," in Annual Report of the American Historical Association, the Year 1902 (Washington: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1903), 355, 359; cf. 353.
76. G. F. Shepley to B. F. Butler (February 20, 1863) in Private and Official Correspondence of General Benjamin F. Butler (Norwood: Plimpton Press, 1917), 3:14.
77. Michael Hahn to AL (June 6, 1863), AL Papers, LOC.
78. See Segal, "Isachar Zacharie," 90-95; and Segal "Isachar Zacharie-Addendum," 110-12 for key evidence. In a letter to Lincoln (Zacharie to AL (February 19, 1863), AL Papers, LOC, Zacharie blamed his enemies for accusations that he was speculating. A secret March 7, 1863 business agreement between Zacharie and rebel sympathizer W. G. Betterton suggests that Zacharie did indeed stand to benefit personally from a deal he advanced to exchange Southern cotton for Northern goods, but Banks may have had knowledge of the matter. See the letter from Zacharie's secretary, Charles Johnson, to Banks (September 24, 1863): "the doctor [Zacharie] just before leaving recd a very scurrilous letter from Mr. Betterton, & intended writing you on the subject, but did not have time" [Typescript in SC 13335, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, OH; original at the University of Rochester].
79. N. P. Banks to W. H. Seward (July 2, 1863) reprinted in Fred H. Harrington, "A Peace Mission of 1863," American Historical Review 46 (October 1940), 77.
80. I. Zacharie to AL (March 17, 1863), AL Papers LOC.
81. Segal, "Isachar Zacharie," 92-95; Banks, King of Louisiana, 760-62; 1209.
82. I. Zacharie to AL (March 27, 1863), AL Papers, LOC.
83. Richard S. Lambert, For the Time Is at Hand: An Account of the Prophecies of HENRY WENTWORTH MONK of Ottawa, Friend of the Jews, and Pioneer of World Peace (London: Andrew Melrose, Ltd., [1947]);

Peter A. Russell, "Monk, Henry Wentworth," in Dictionary of Canadian Biography, vol. 12, University of Toronto/Université Laval, 2003–, accessed December 31, 2013, http://www.biographi.ca/en/bio/monk_henry_wentworth_12E.html. On Artas, which was also the home of Clorinda Minor's short-lived colony of former supporters of the American end-of-days prophet William Miller and is misnamed and mischaracterized both by Lambert and by Russell, see Lester I. Vogel, To See a Promised Land: Americans and the Holy Land in the Nineteenth Century (University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1993), 128-32.

84. Lambert, For the Time Is at Hand, 81-82. Lambert quotes this from a contemporaneous letter sent by Monk to his friend the Canadian publisher and businessman, William Cameron Chewett. We have been unable to locate the original letter, which Lambert reported to be in private hands, but we take the letter to be genuine, for it includes language and allusions that are characteristic to Lincoln and that neither Monk nor Lambert could have invented.
85. Joel 2:27/3:1
86. Edward Yates to Abraham Lincoln (February 16, 1863), AL Papers, LOC; see Yates's A Letter to the Women of England, on Slavery in the Southern States of America (London, 1863).
87. W. T. Sherman to Philemon B. Ewing (November 2, 1862); Shapell Manuscript Collection. See above Chapter 4
88. Lincoln Day by Day: A Chronology 1809-1865, eds. E. S. Miers and C. P. Powell (Dayton: Morningside, 1991) lists just four personal visits of Zacharie to the White House, two of them after Monk was there; cf. n. 13 above, where the New York World described Zacharie as the "favored family visitor at the White House."
89. On the peace mission, see Harrington, "A Peace Mission of 1863," 79-86; Fred Harvey Harrington, Fighting Politician: Major General N. P. Banks (Westport: Greenwood Press, 1970 [orig. ed. 1948]), 126; James G. Hollandsworth Jr. Pretense of Glory: The Life of General Nathaniel P. Banks (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1998), 154-57; and Banks, King of Louisiana, 763-65; the quoted phrase was used by Zacharie in his letter to Banks (December 28, 1863), in Harrington, "A Peace Mission of 1863," 86.
90. I. Zacharie to N. P. Banks (July 30, 1863) in Harrington, "A Peace Mission of 1863," 79.
91. Both Gordon and Jefferson Davis were related to the Confederate general Richard Taylor, the son of former President Zachary Taylor; see Banks, King of Louisiana, 765 n.30.
92. N. P. Banks to AL (September 11, 1863) in Harrington, "A Peace Mission of 1863," 82-83.
93. I. Zacharie to N. P. Banks (September 8, 1863); AL to J. G. Foster (August 28, 1863), John A. Dix to J. G. Foster (September 7, 1863), Lincoln Manuscripts, Brown University Library, https://repository.library.brown.edu/studio/item/bdr:71965/ and CW Supplement I, 199-200.
94. Eli N. Evans, Judah P. Benjamin: The Jewish Confederate (New York: Free Press, 1988), 232.
95. I. Zacharie to J. P. Benjamin (September 28, 1863) in Zola, We Called Him Rabbi Abraham, 59-60; for a possible interpretation of what they may have been doing that night, see Daniel Brook, "The Forgotten Confederate Jew," Tablet (July 17, 2012), http://www.tabletmag.com/jewish-arts-and-culture/books/106227/the-forgotten-confederate-jew.
96. Zacharie to AL (September 29, 1863), AL Papers, LOC.
97. I. Zacharie to N. P. Banks (October 9, 1863) in Harrington, "A Peace Mission of 1863," 83-84.
98. Ibid; Zola, We Called Him Rabbi Abraham, 55-56, 61 reprints both that letter and the New York Herald report (October 21, 1863) on his peace plan. For the request to "lay quiet" see I. Zacharie to N. P. Banks (December 28, 1863), in Harrington, "A Peace Mission of 1863," 86. Blair's plan was likewise discussed at the Hampton Roads Peace Conference of 1865, see James P. Conroy, Our One Common Country: Abraham Lincoln and the Hampton Roads Peace Conference of 1865 (Guilford, CT: Lyons Press, 2014).
99. I. Zacharie to N. P. Banks (October 9, 1863) in Harrington, "A Peace Mission of 1863," 84.
100. I. Zacharie to N. P. Banks (October 16, 1863) in Harrington, "A Peace Mission of 1863," 85.
101. I. Zacharie to N. P. Banks (December 28, 1863) in Harrington, "A Peace Mission of 1863," 86.
102. New York Daily Tribune (June 24, 1864), 5.
103. G. L. Mordecai, A Tribute to Lincoln: "Happy to Serve an Enemy" [New York: Lownsbury, n.d. [1910]), available on the Internet Archive; reprinted from New York Daily Tribune (February 13, 1901); see also Markens, Abraham Lincoln and the Jews, 50-51; Korn, American Jewry and Civil War, 199; Rosen, The Jewish Confederates, 41, 434 n.184; and on Lewis, Howard S. Stein, "Samuel A. Lewis: Nineteenth-Century Jewish American Leader," SC-15490, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, OH.

104. J. G. Cohen to I. Zacharie (March 5, 1864), RG 45, entry 36, miscellaneous letters received, NARA, online at http://lincolnpapers2.dataformat.com/images/1864/03/291966.pdf. For evidence that Cohen was actually captured while running the blockade in the sloop Annie Thompson, see Official Records of the War of the Rebellion (Washington DC, 1902), Series I, vol. 15, 245.
105. I. Zacharie to AL (February 13, 1864); I. Zacharie to AL (May 13, 1864) AL Papers, LOC.
106. Jewish Messenger 15 (May 13, 1864), 141; Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 199.
107. OR, Series 1, vol. 24, part 1, 9.
108. Eric Benjaminson, "A Regiment of Immigrants: The 82nd Illinois Volunteer Infantry and the Letters of Captain Rudolph Mueller," Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society 94:2 (Summer 2001), 137-80; Joseph R. Reinhart, Yankee Dutchmen Under Fire; Civil War Letters from the 82nd Illinois Infantry (Kent: Kent State University Press, 2013), 23-26, 37-44. For Lincoln's knowledge of Hecker's military activities, see CW 4, 390.
109. H. L. Meites, History of the Jews of Chicago (Chicago: Jewish Historical Society of Illinois, 1924 [1990 Facsimile edition]), 93; Reinhart, Yankee Dutchmen Under Fire, 84-98.
110. Jewish Messenger, July 10, 1863, online from Morais's ledger at http://sceti.library.upenn.edu/pages/index.cfm?so_id=1661&PagePosition=40&level=1; see Marc Saperstein, Jewish Preaching in Times of War 1800-2001 (Oxford: Littman Library of Jewish Civilization, 2008), vii-viii.
111. Others claim that he borrowed it from Speaker of the House Galusha Grow, who used the phrase "Fourscore years ago" back on July 4, 1861; see Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln: A Life, II, 570.
112. Abraham Hart to AL (April 23, 1862) AL Papers, LOC. Lincoln responded to Hart on May 13, 1862, AL Papers LOC: "My dear Sir Permit me to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of April 23d containing a copy of a Prayer recently delivered at your Synagogue, and to thank you heartily for your expressions of kindness and confidence. I have the honor to be Your Obt. Servt. A. LINCOLN."
113. Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 36; Arthur Kiron, "'Dust and Ashes,' The Funeral and Forgetting of Sabato Morais," American Jewish History 84:3 (1996), 164; John Hay to A. Hart (January 9, 1864), Shapell Manuscript Collection.
114. Edward Everett, "Gettysburg Oration" (1863) online at http://en.wikisource.org/wiki/Gettysburg_Oration.
115. History of the 118th Regt. P.V. Corn Exchange (Philadelphia: JL Smith, 1905), 296—online at http://freepages.military.rootsweb.ancestry.com/~pa91/cc382902.html; see also Alexandra Lee Levin, The Szolds of Lombard Street (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1960), 37.
116. Joan E. Cashin "Deserters, Civilians and Draft Resistance in the North," in The War Was You and Me, ed. Joan Cashin (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2002), 264. Proportionately, even more soldiers deserted from the Confederacy: see Ella Lonn, Desertion During the Civil War (Gloucester: Peter Smith, 1966 [orig. ed.1928]); cf. Robert Fantina, Desertion and the American Soldier 1776-2006 (New York: Algora, 2006).
117. Quoted in Michael Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln: A Life (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2008), II, 493.
118. Simon Wolf, The Presidents I Have Known From 1860 to 1918 (Washington: 1918), 5-7. Original research from the Shapell Roster suggests that the soldier about whom Corwin and Wolf are referencing is actually a combined account of the lives of Private Michael Wolf(e), Company C, 20th Regiment Massachusetts Infantry (Shapell Roster ID #1193) and Private Adam Wolf(e), Company H, 13th Regiment Massachusetts Infantry.
119. Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln: A Life, II, 492-94; Thomas P. Lowry, Don't Shoot That Boy: Abraham Lincoln and Military Justice (Mason City: Savas, 1999). According to Cashin (p. 270), 80,000 deserters were arrested, but only 141 were executed.
120. Charles Walter et al. to George Meade (August 25, 1863)
121. Meade to AL (August 27, 1863), AL Papers, LOC.
122. Walter, Rainese, Faline, Lae. and Kuhn to AL (August 26, 1863), AL Papers, LOC.
123. Abraham Lincoln to George G. Meade, Autograph telegram signed, August 27, 1863, ALPLM, copied onto a telegram. Thomas T. Eckert Papers, Series 1: Telegrams Sent, vol. 16: p. 281, Huntington Library.
124. George Meade to AL, August 27, 1863 Abraham Lincoln Papers at the Library of Congress.
125. Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 109; Gregory Acken (ed.) Inside the Army of the Potomac: The Civil War Experience of Captain Francis Adams Donaldson (Mechanicsburg, PA: Stackpole, 1998), 332-36; Levin, Szolds of Lombard Street, 37; Markens, Lincoln and the Jews, 47–48; Jewish Messenger (September

4, 1863), 69. Korn's account relies on contemporary sources including the Jewish Record, and is preferable to some later retrospective accounts.

126. History of the 118th Regt. P.V. Corn Exchange (Philadelphia: JL Smith, 1905), 296 – online at http://freepages.military.rootsweb.ancestry.com/~pa91/cc382902.html; James H. Clossen to Mother (September 3, 1863), Shapell Manuscript Collection.
127. Jessie L. Pryer (?) to Sallie (September 11, 1863), Shapell Manuscript Collection.
128. The Survivors' Association. History of the 118th Regt. P.V. Corn Exchange. Philadelphia: JL Smith, 1905.
129. George Levy, "President Lincoln Rejects an Appeal for Mercy," The Lincoln Newsletter, 13:3 (Fall 1994): 1, 4–7.

CHAPTER SIX: ABOUT JEWS

1. Israelite (January 16, 1863), 218.
2. Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 156-88.
3. AL to Edwin M. Stanton and Henry W. Halleck (Nov 14, 1863), Shapell Manuscript Collection; for an August 28, 1863, letter on the same subject, see CW 6, 419-20 and Milton Shutes, "The Case of Colonel William Mayer," Lincoln Herald 63 (1961), 24-26; an additional letter on Nov 14, 1863 AL to Stanton about Mayer raising troops, CW 10, 210. On Mayer, see the New York Times (April 18, 1906), 11; Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 117; Howard Rock, Haven of Liberty: New York Jews in the New World 1654-1865 (New York: NYU Press, 2012), 248-49; Simon Wolf, The American Jew as Patriot, Soldier and Citizen (New York: Gregg Press, 1972 [orig. 1895]), 284.
4. War Department. The Office of the Judge Advocate General. Court Martial File No. NN-2345 (Moses Waldauer) in Court Martial Case Files 1809–1894. Record Group 153: Records of the Office the Judge Advocate General-Army. National Archives and Records Administration, National Archives Building, Washington, DC.
5. AL to Officer in Charge of Caroll Prison (January 8, 1865), Shapell Manuscript Collection; War Department, General Court Martial Orders #398 (December 30, 1864); Mark E. Neely, The Fate of Liberty: Abraham Lincoln and Civil Liberties (New York: Oxford, 1991), 99-103; AL to Joseph Holt (February 17, 1865), CW 8, 303-4; for the pardon, see War Department, General Court Martial, Orders No. 99 (February 18, 1865), Case Files of Investigations by Levi C. Turner and Lafayette C. Baker, compiled 1862-1865. NARA microfilm publication M797. Record Group 94, Records of the Adjutant General's Office. National Archives and Records Administration, National Archives Building, Washington, DC.
6. Journal of the Executive Proceedings of the Senate of the United States of America 13 (January 11-12, 1864), 369.
7. "Local News," Evening Star, Washington, DC (November 21, 1864).
8. National Archives online: Letter from Chief Justice D. K. Cartter and Andrew Wylie, Justice of the Supreme Court of D.C., 12/05/1864. http://research.archives.gov/description/6783000.
9. David Hirsch to AL (December 23, 1863), AL Papers, LOC; David Hirsch to Ulysses S. Grant (January 28, 1864), The Papers of Ulysses S. Grant: January 1 - May 31, 1864, Vol. 10 (Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1982), 519-20; Jeffrey N. Lash, A Politician Turned General: The Civil War Career of Stephen Augustus Hurlbut (Kent, OH: Kent State University Press, 2003), 107-47, esp. 127-28.
10. J. W. Calvert et al to AL (September 9, 1864) AL Papers, LOC; AL notes (September 24, 26, 27, 1864), in the David Benjamin Family Collection.
11. AL to Hon. Sec of Navy (September 9, 1864), Shapell Manuscript Collection.
12. AL to Myers, January 13, 1865, CW 8
13. AL to Joseph H. Stiner (December 2, 1864), Shapell Manuscript Collection.
14. Mary Lincoln to General Patrick (September 24 [1864], Shapell Manuscript Collection.
15. David Rankin Barbee, "The Musical Mr. Lincoln," Abraham Lincoln Quarterly 5 (December 1949), 449-50, 452.
16. Mary Lincoln to General Patrick (September 24 [1864], Shapell Manuscript Collection; "City Point During the Civil War," Encyclopedia Virginia, http://www.encyclopediavirginia.org/City_Point_During_the_Civil_War (accessed April 7, 2014).
17. AL to L. J. Lieberman (July 15, 1864) Shapell Manuscript Collection. On Lieberman [Leberman], see Herbert S. Morais, The Jews of Philadelphia (Philadelphia: 1894), 58, 268, and on Rockhill and Wilson, see Mark R. Wilson, The Business of Civil War (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2006), 124.
18. Carr, Roland T. and Hugh Morrow, "We Found Lincoln's Lost Bank Account," Saturday Evening Post, February 14, 1953.
19. Robert Putnam, American Grace: How Religion Divides and Unites Us (New York: Simon & Schuster, 2010), 526-34.
20. Shapell Manuscript Collection, CW 6, 1-2; Leslie J. Perry, "Appeals to Lincoln's Clemency," The Century Magazine 51 (December 1895), 252. On Thoroughman, see Howard L. Conard, Encyclopedia of the History of Missouri (New York: Haldeman, Conard, & Co., 1901), VI, 190.

21. The Diary of Orville Hickman Browning, Volume I, 1850-1863, eds. Theodore C. Pease and James G. Randall (Springfield: Illinois State Historical Society, 1927), 627 [April 16, 1863].
22. Amy E. Murrell, "Union Father, Rebel Son: Families and the Question of Civil War Loyalty," The War Was You and Me: Civilians in the American Civil War, ed. Joan E. Cashin (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2002), 358-91; Sarna, American Judaism, 114.
23. "Postmaster Jonas and the Herald," Quincy Daily Whig, July 26, 1862. We are greatly indebted to Cynthia Gensheimer for this and other material concerning Abraham Jonas.
24. Quincy in the Civil War: A View of the Great Conflict. Charles A, Landrum, Quincy and Adams Historical Society, 1965; Quincy Daily Whig, October 21, 1862.
25. Robert Rosen, The Jewish Confederates (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000), 151.
26. The Diary of Orville Hickman Browning, Volume I, 1850-1863, eds. Theodore C. Pease and James G. Randall (Springfield: Illinois State Historical Society, 1927), 639.
27. Abraham Jonas to Abraham Lincoln (October 22, 1863), AL Papers, Library of Congress, online at lincolnpapers2.dataformat.com/images/1863/10/280384.pdf. We are indebted to Cynthia Gensheimer for bringing this letter to our attention. O. H. Hickman to W. Stanton (October 22, 1863), Records of the Commissary General of Prisoners, Letters Received, Box 17 (1863), RG 249, NARA.
28. W. Hoffman to Abraham Jonas (October 30, 1863), Records of the Commissary General of Prisoners, Letters & Telegrams Sent, vol. 5, R.G. 249, NARA.
29. O. H. Browning to Annie Jonas (June 2, 1864), Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library, Browning, O. H. SC 195 and in Charles M. Segal, "New Light on Lincoln's Parole of Charles H. Jonas," Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society 42 (June 1953), 407-12; cf. Diary of Orville Hickman Browning, 671-672.
30. Order for Parole of Charles H. Jonas, Shapell Manuscript Collection (June 2, 1864).
31. Segal, "New Light on Lincoln's Parole," 412; Markens, Lincoln and the Jews, 20-21.
32. Diary of Orville Hickman Browning, 672; Cynthia Gensheimer, "Annie Jonas Wells: Jewish Daughter, Episcopal Wife, Independent Intellectual," American Jewish History 98 (July 2014), 102 n. 98.
33. George B. Jonas to Abraham Lincoln (August 31, 1864), AL Papers, LOC.
34. See above, chapter 3, nn. 1-3.
35. David H. Donald, Lincoln (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1995), 569-70; Thomas Bogar, American Presidents Attend the Theatre (Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 2006), 103; cf. David I. Kertzer, The Kidnapping of Edgardo Mortara (New York: Knopf, 1997), 252.
36. Some sources credit the play (partly or wholly) to Jean-François Mocquard; see, for example, Olive Logan, "Mocquard," Harper's New Monthly Magazine 36 (December 1867-May 1868), 114. Modern scholarship credits Séjour.
37. "Albion, 1863," Bulletin of the New York Public Library 44 (New York: New York Public Library, 1940); L'Ami de la Religion as quoted in Victor Séjour, The Fortune Teller, translated from the French by Norman Shapiro. Introduction by M. Lynn Weiss (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2002), xxi.
38. Séjour, The Fortune Teller, translated from the French by Norman Shapiro. Introduction by M. Lynn Weiss, makes available the original French play in translation, with an illuminating introduction; for quote, see p. 162. While I have not located the text of the nineteenth-century English adaptation, which included music for Vestvali to sing, a synopsis of the play survives in Vestvali in English Drama: "Monday, March 28th, 1864, at the Boston Theatre in the New and Powerful Drama ... Called Gamea; Or—the Jewish Mother" (Boston 1864).
39. Thomas A. Bogar, American Presidents Attend the Theatre (Detroit:McFarland, 2006), 103
40. Sejour, The Fortune-Teller, xxii-xxiii.
41. CW 7, 514; Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln, II, 704-10.
42. Samuel A. Lewis to Abraham Lincoln (October 26, 1864), AL Papers, LOC.
43. AL to W. P. Fessenden (August 2, 1864), Brown University Library, https://repository.library.brown.edu/studio/item/bdr%3A72310/ and in CW Supplement I, 253-54.
44. AL to Isachar Zacharie (September 19, 1864), CW 8, 12.
45. I. Zacharie to W. H. Seward (September 21, 1864) reprinted in Segal, "Isachar Zacharie," 116.
46. Ibid, and Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 199-200.
47. AL to Isachar Zacharie (September 19, 1864), CW 8, 12.
48. New York Times (September 23, 29, 1864); Segal, "Isachar Zacharie," 114, 116-17.

49. Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln, II, 721.
50. Samuel A. Lewis to AL (October 26, 1864), AL Papers, LOC; John Hay to Myer S. Isaacs (November 1, 1864), AL Papers, LOC; Jewish Messenger (October 28, 1864), 124.
51. Myer S. Isaacs to AL (October 26, 1864), AL Papers LOC.
52. Isachar Zacharie to AL (November 3, 1864), AL Papers, LOC [English slightly modernized].
53. Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln, II, 681-730.
54. Isachar Zacharie to AL (November 3, 1864), AL Papers, LOC.
55. Isachar Zacharie to AL (December 26, 1864), AL Papers LOC.
56. Pass for Isachar Zacharie (December 27, 1864); AL to William T. Sherman (December 27, 1864), Lincoln Collection at Brown University.
57. Pass for J. G. Cohen from New York to Savannah, Shapell Manuscript Collection. See the obituary for Cohen in the New York Times (January 21, 1900) and the sketch of his son, Eugene Yancey Cohen, in Universities and the Sons: History, Influence and Characteristics of American Universities, with Biographical Sketches, ed. Joshua L. Chamberlain (Boston: Herndon, 1899), 160.
58. I. Zacharie to AL (n.d.[December 28, 1864?])AL Papers, LOC. Roy Basler (CW 8, 238) argues that this undated letter "seems certainly to have been written after January 25, 1865," but the Lincoln Papers cataloged it in December 1864, and that fits the chronology much better.
59. John C. Gray Jr. to Elizabeth Gray (January 14, 1865) in J*ohn Chipman Gray and John Codman Ropes, War Letters 1862-1865* (Cambridge: Riverside Press, 1927), 442.
60. Ibid, 14; Wolf, Presidents I have Known, 10-11, speaks favorably of Stanton, who freed him when he was arbitrarily arrested for belonging to B'nai B'rith and thereby "helping the traitors."
61. Benjamin P. Thomas and Harold M. Hyman, Stanton: The Life and Times of Lincoln's Secretary of War (New York: Knopf, 1962), 346.
62. In his memoirs, William T. Sherman insinuated that Stanton himself engaged in corrupt practices in Savannah, but Sherman despised the secretary of war, and historians have not given this charge credence; see William Tecumseh Sherman, Memoirs of William T. Sherman (New York: Library of America, 1990), 723.
63. AL to Edwin M. Stanton (January 25, 1865), CW8, 238.
64. Ibid.
65. Edwin M. Stanton to AL (January 25, 1865); William G. Moore to John G. Nicolay (January 25, 1865), AL Papers, LOC.
66. New York Times (February 22, 1865), 8.
67. On Leopold Blumenberg, see Isaac Markens, The Hebrews in America (New York: 1888), 131-32; Wolf, The American Jew as Patriot, Soldier and Citizen, 199-200; Universal Jewish Encyclopedia (1940), 2: 418; Isaac M. Fein, The Making of an American Jewish Community (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1971), 99; Jacob R. Marcus, United States Jewry 1776-1985 (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1993), 39-40; and notes to the letters quoted below.
68. AL, Pardon of Rudolph Blumenberg (July 25, 1863), Shapell Manuscript Collection, item 1525; Warren S. Howard, American Slavers and the Federal Law 1837-1862 (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1963), 176; New York Daily Tribune (July 31, 1863), 5.
69. Markens, The Hebrews in America, 132; see also John L. Chapman to AL (November 25, 1864) AL Papers, LOC.
70. Edwin M. Stanton to AL (January 25, 1865), AL Papers, LOC.
71. AL to Edwin M. Stanton (January 25, 1865), CW 8, 238.
72. Edwin M. Stanton to AL (January 25, 1865), AL Papers, LOC.
73. Abraham Lincoln, Memorandum on Maryland Patronage (March 9, 1865), AL Papers, LOC.
74. Bertram W. Korn, "Lincoln and the Jews," Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society 48 (Summer 1955), 190.
75. For what follows except where otherwise noted, see Jewish Messenger (February 17, 1865), 5, and for background, Markens, Abraham Lincoln and the Jews, 57, and Early S. Miers, Lincoln Day by Day (Dayton: Morningside, 1991), 3:313.
76. John C. Gray Jr. to Elizabeth Gray (January 14, 1865) in Gray and Ropes, War Letters 1862-1865, 442.
77. Jewish Messenger (February 17, 1865), 5 and Zola, We Called Him Rabbi Abraham, 129-30, 135-37.

CHAPTER SEVEN: TO SEE JERUSALEM BEFORE HE DIED

1. Andrew Morrison, Theatre Guide of Washington D.C. (Washington: The Theatre Historical Society, 1972); "Civil War Washington," http://civilwardc.org/data/places/view/316 (accessed March 30, 2014); The Lincoln Log, January 7, 1865, http://www.thelincolnlog.org/ (accessed March 30, 2014).
2. Augustin Daly, Leah, The Forsaken (New York: Samuel French, n.d.), 8, 9, 20.
3. Ibid, 13-14.
4. Ibid, 41.
5. Ibid, 42.
6. Ibid, 44.
7. Jewish Messenger (February 6, 1863), 50.
8. "Leah," Harper's Weekly (March 7, 1863), 146; for the attribution to Curtis, see Louis Harap, The Image of the Jew in American Literature from Early Republic to Mass Immigration (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1974), 218.
9. Chaim Milikowsky, Seder Olam: Critical Edition, Commentary, and Introduction (Jerusalem: Yad Ben Zvi Press, 2013), I, 249; II, 180 (in Hebrew).
10. David Herbert Donald, Lincoln (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1995), p.56
11. Frederick Douglass, Life and Times of Frederick Douglass (Hartford: Park Publishing Company, 1882), 402; Ronald C. White Jr., A. Lincoln: A Biography (New York: Random House, 2009), 663, 667.
12. CW8, 332-333.
13. CW 8, 333. At the time, the meaning of "sunk" in this context referred to being repaid.
14. James Mitchell Foster, Christ Is King (Boston: James H. Earle, 1894) 26, 37; Gary P. Zola, We Called Him Rabbi Abraham: Lincoln and American Jewry—A Documentary History (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 2014), 117-137. Lance Sussman, Isaac Leeser and the Making of American Judaism (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1995), 226-27.
15. Jewish Messenger (March 17, 1865), 96.
16. AL to Thurlow Weed (March 15, 1865), Shapell Legacy Partnership, CW 8, 356. For other responses, see Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln, II, 770-772.
17. Edwin M. Stanton to AL (April 3, 1865), CW 8, 384-85; AL to Stanton (April 3, 1865, 5:00 P.M.), Shapell Legacy Partnership, CW8, 385; Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln II, 780, 787-88.
18. As quoted in Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln, II, 788.
19. Ibid, II, 790.
20. Jacob R. Marcus, Memoirs of American Jews 1775-1865 (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1955), III, 333; Emily Bingham, Mordecai: An Early American Family (New York: Hill & Wang, 2003), 258.
21. On Myers, see Herbert T. Ezekiel and Gaston Lichtenstein, The History of the Jews of Richmond from 1769 to 1917 (Richmond: Ezekiel, 1917), 60-62; Myron Berman, Richmond's Jewry 1769-1976 (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1979), 127-29; Eli Evans, Judah P. Benjamin: The Jewish Confederate (New York: Free Press, 1988), 198-200.
22. Theresa M. Guzman-Stokes, "A Flag and a Family: Richard Gill Forrester, 1847-1906," Virginia Cavalcade 47:2 (Spring 1998), 52-63.
23. "Abraham Lincoln in Richmond," Virginia Magazine of History and Biography 41 (October 1933), 318-22; AL Memorandum on Conditions for Peace [April 5, 1865], AL Papers, LOC; CW 8, 386-87; Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln II, 792-793.
24. AL to Joshua F. Speed, August 24, 1855; CW 2, 321.
25. Don E. Fehrenbacher and Virginia Fehrenbacher, Recollected Words of Abraham Lincoln (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1996), 182.
26. James McPherson, Battle Cry of Freedom: The Civil War Era (New York: Oxford, 1988), 849-50.
27. New York Herald as quoted in the Jewish Messenger (April 21, 1865), 124; Boston Daily Advertiser (April 13, 1865), col. B.
28. AL to Michael Hahn (March 13, 1864), Shapell Legacy Partnership.
29. Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln, II, 608.

30. CW 8, 399-405.
31. Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln, II, 803; McPherson, Battle Cry of Freedom, 852.
32. American Hebrew (February 6, 1885), 202; Washington Post (November 9, 1902), 26; American Israelite (June 29, 1893), 4; Arthur Hornblow, A History of the Theatre in America (Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1919), I, 320. Stephen M. Arthur, Junius Brutus Booth: Theatrical Prometheus (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1992), 4, considers the family legend "untrustworthy."
33. Asia Booth Clarke, The Elder and the Younger Booth (Boston: Osgood, 1882), 114, cf. 49.
34. American Israelite (June 29, 1893), 4; Jewish Messenger (November 7, 1862), 139; (November 14, 1862), 147.
35. Simon Wolf, The Presidents I have Known from 1860-1918 (Washington: Byron Adams, 1918), 12; Isaac Markens, "Jews Mourned for Lincoln," American Hebrew (April 9, 1915), 671.
36. Gideon Welles, Diary of Gideon Welles (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1911), II, 280-83.
37. Max Lilienthal, "The Flag and the Union," in David Philipson, Max Lilienthal: American Rabbi (New York: Bloch, 1915), 398-414 [the volume misdates the lecture, which was actually delivered on April 14, 1865], cf. Israelite (April 28, 1865), 348; Bruce l. Ruben, Max Lilienthal: The Making of the American Rabbinate (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 2011), 179-83.
38. Jewish Messenger (November 1, 1895), 2.
39. Burlingame, Abraham Lincoln, II, 816-17; Thomas A. Bogart, Backstage at the Lincoln Assassination: The Untold Story of the Actors and Stagehands at Ford's Theatre (Washington, DC: Regnery History, 2013), 84.
40. "Necrology: Dr. Charles H. Liebermann," Journal of the American Medical Association 7 (1886), 222-23; "The Romance of Liebermann," Journal of the American Medical Association 22 (1894), 291-92; Edward W. Markens, Lincoln and His Relations to Doctors (Newark: 1922), 8; Samuel H. Holland, "Charles H. Liebermann, M.D.: An Early Russian-born Physician of Washington DC," Medical Annals of the District of Columbia 38 (September 1969), 499-504; http://www.medicalmuseum.mil/index.cfm?p=exhibits.lincoln.page_03 (accessed 2/23/2014); Robert Emmett Curran, The Bicentennial History of Georgetown University: From Academy to University 1789-1889 (Washington: Georgetown University Press, 1993), 146-47; for Liebermann's effort to be compensated for emancipating his slave, see http://civilwardc.org/texts/petitions/cww.[007]82.html.
41. As quoted in Donald, Lincoln, 598.
42. Shapell Manuscript Collection
43. Wolf, The Presidents I Have Known, 13.
44. Jewish Messenger (April 21, 1865), 124.
45. Occident (May 1, 1865), 36.
46. The Hebrew, San Francisco (April 21, 1865) as quoted in William M. Kramer, "They Have Killed Our Man But Not Our Cause: The California Jewish Mourners of Abraham Lincoln," Western States Jewish Historical Quarterly 2 (July 1970), 194.
47. "An Address Delivered before the Springfield Washington Temperance Society, on the 22d February, 1842," CW 1, 278.
48. Ezekiel 37:11-12.
49. Justin G. Turner and Linda Levitt Turner, Mary Todd Lincoln: Her Life and Letters (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1972), 218, cf. 400.

EPILOGUE

1. Jewish Messenger (May 5, 1865), 139. "Semi-Occasional" was the nom de plume of Adolphus Solomons; see Isaac Markens, The Hebrews in America (New York: 1888), 248.
2. The New York Times (April 16, 1865), 9.
3. Jewish Messenger (April 21, 1865), 124: Kramer, "They Have Killed Our Man but Not Our Cause," 195.
4. W. Hunter, Acting Secretary of State to the People of the United States (April 17, 1865) in William T. Coggeshall, Lincoln Memorial: The Journeys of Abraham Lincoln: from Springfield to Washington, 1861, as President Elect; and from Washington to Springfield, 1865, as President Martyred; Comprising an Account of Public Ceremonies on the Entire Route, and Full Details of Both Journeys (Columbus: Ohio State Journal, 1865), 112.
5. A. Guinzberg (April 25, 1865), as quoted in Israelite (May 26, 1865), 181; see also Samuel M. Isaacs at Broadway Synagogue in Hertz, Abraham Lincoln: The Tribute of the Synagogue, 71-77.
6. Congregation Mikveh Israel in Occident (May 1, 1865), 36.
7. Hertz, Abraham Lincoln: The Tribute of the Synagogue, 183; see Michael H. Mehlman, "'There Is a Prince and a Great Man Fallen This Day in Israel': The Response of the Rabbis in America to the Assassination of Abraham Lincoln, April-June 1865," Lincoln Herald 111 (2009), 213-14.
8. Zola, We Called Him Rabbi Abraham, 165-67.
9. Israelite (April 21, 1865), 339; Hertz, Abraham Lincoln: The Tribute of the Synagogue, 98. Rabbi Benjamin Szold, as if in answer to Wise, declared that "if he was not as it is said, flesh of our flesh or bone of our bone, he was mind of our mind and soul of our soul" [Alexandra Lee Levin, The Szolds of Lombard Street (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1960), 42].
10. Chicago Tribune (April 17, 1865); see Liebmann Adler's angry response in Abraham Lincoln: The Tribute of the Synagogue, 143; cf. The Jeffersonian (May 11, 1865), http://chroniclingamerica.loc.gov/lccn/sn84026399/1865-05-11/ed-1/seq-2/.
11. Zola, We Called Him Rabbi Abraham, 140; and for Protestant sermons, David B. Chesebrough, "No Sorrow Like Our Sorrow" in Northern Protestant Ministers and the Assassination of Lincoln (Kent: Kent State University Press, 1994).
12. Jewish Messenger (April 28, 1865), 4; the Jewish Record's calculation was somewhat more conservative; see its description of the pageant in Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 239-43.
13. Coggeshall, Lincoln Memorial, 221-22, 274, 294, 307; Morris A. Gutstein, A Priceless Heritage: The Epic Growth of Nineteenth Century Chicago Jewry (New York: Bloch, 1953), 333; Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 214; Markens, Abraham Lincoln and the Jews, 22.
14. Jewish Messenger (April 28, 1865) 4.
15. Andrew Johnson Executive Order (May 31, 1865), http://www.presidency.ucsb.edu/ws/index.php?pid=72168.
16. Andrew Johnson, "Proclamation 130—Postponing the Day of Mourning for the Death of President Lincoln Until June 1" (April 29, 1865), http://www.presidency.ucsb.edu/ws/index.php?pid=72245.
17. Jewish Messenger (May 5, 1865), 140.
18. Charles F. Adams, Charles Francis Adams 1835-1915: An Autobiography (Cambridge: Riverside, 1916), 94
19. Hertz, Abraham Lincoln: The Tribute of the Synagogue, 9-10.
20. Jewish Messenger (June 9, 1865), 180; Israelite (June 16, 1865), 404.
21. The New York Times (June 2, 1865), 1.
22. Hertz, Abraham Lincoln: The Tribute of the Synagogue, 176, cf. 20. 39, 63, 145, 151, 164; Zola, We Called Him Rabbi Abraham, 178-90.
23. All of these are reported by Isaac Markens in "Jews Mourned for Lincoln," American Hebrew (April 9, 1915), 665, 671; see also Universe Israelite (July 1865), 506.
24. Jacob R. Marcus, Memoirs of American Jews (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1955), III, 367.
25. S. Joshua Kohn, "David Naar of Trenton, New Jersey," American Jewish Historical Quarterly 53 (June 1964), 373-95; David Naar to Isaac Leeser (May 24, 1865), Shapell Manuscript Collection; Occident (July 1, 1865), 172-74.

26. Jewish Messenger (May 26, 1865), 165; Zola, We Called Him Rabbi Abraham, 220 includes a translation, which we have slightly altered. On Goldstein, see Jacob Kabakoff, "Isaac Goldstein—Pioneer Merchant-Author," Seekers and Stalwarts: Essays and Studies on American Hebrew Literature and Culture (Jerusalem: Rubin Mass, 1978), 11-19. Goldstein's poem was likely written in the wake of the Emancipation Proclamation but was only published following the assassination.
27. Justin G. Turner, A Note on Solomon Nunes Carvalho and His Portrait of Abraham Lincoln (Los Angeles: Plantin Press, 1960); Agnes Halsey, "A 'New' Lincoln Portrait by Solomon Nunes Carvalho" Old Printshop Portfolio 11:6 (February 1952), 122-127, 129; Joan Sturhahn Carvalho, Artist-Photographer-Adventurer-Patriot: Portrait of a Forgotten American (New York: Richwood, 1976), 162-65 (Sturhahn believes that that the 1865 painting was completed just prior to the assassination).
28. Markens, Abraham Lincoln and the Jews, 29–31; David Ward, "Photographic Imagery," in Abraham Lincoln: Great American Historians on Our Sixteenth President, eds. Brian Lamb and Susan Swain (New York: Public Affairs, 2008), 162.
29. Sabato Morais to Alexander Henry (June 21, 1865), Shapell Manuscript Collection; Hertz, Abraham Lincoln: The Tribute of the Synagogue, 11; New York Times (March 8, 1868), 6. Rev. Jacques Judah Lyons of Shearith Israel and the Jewish Messenger briefly collected contributions toward a monument for Lincoln in New York; see Jewish Messenger (May 12, 1865), 145.
30. Israelite (June 9, 1865), 397.
31. Israelite (July 7, 1865), 5.
32. Jewish Messenger (January 11, 1867), 4; Zola, We Called Him Rabbi Abraham, 239-41.
33. Merrill D. Peterson, Lincoln in American Memory (New York: Oxford, 1994), 53-55; New York Times (January 7, 1932), 18.
34. American Israelite (May 7, 1886), 6.
35. Peterson, Lincoln in American Memory, passim. For details, see Zola, We Called Him Rabbi Abraham.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Soon after I completed the first draft of this book, I suffered cardiac arrest on the streets of New Haven. The miraculous work of Dr. Grant Bailey, who jumped out of his car and expertly performed CPR, saved my life. An army of other dedicated doctors and nurses at Yale-New Haven Hospital and Brigham and Women's Hospital in Boston facilitated my recovery. Thanks to them, I was able to see Lincoln and the Jews: A History through to its final stages.

My collaborator, Benjamin Shapell, conceived this project and placed his remarkable team of researchers and writers at my disposal. Without the efforts of Menachem Grossman, Ariane Weisel Margalit, Sara Willen, Dina Grossman, Janice Parente, and Michal Gorlin Becker, this book would never have come into being. It was a great privilege to be able to access Ben's remarkable private collection of Lincolniana. This book also makes abundant use of the 20,000 documents in the Abraham Lincoln Papers of the Library of Congress, many of them now online; Roy P. Basler's The Collected Works of Abraham Lincoln; the collection of the Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library & Museum; and an array of Jewish and general newspapers, many of them now also available online.

Everyone who writes about Abraham Lincoln knows that they stand on the shoulders of giants: generations of formidable Lincoln scholars who produced majestic works. This book makes abundant use of previous secondary scholarship, both well known and obscure, even as it breaks new ground in exploring Lincoln's relationship with Jews. I extend special thanks to the interlibrary loan office at Brandeis University for tracking down rare Lincoln-related publications for me, mystified as its librarians doubtless were by my unlikely interest in the history of chiropody!

Numerous friends and colleagues assisted with this book in different ways. Cynthia Gensheimer alerted me to the existence of invaluable private correspondence in the possession of the Wells family. Gary Zola sent me an advanced copy of his own We Called Him Rabbi Abraham: Lincoln and American Jewry and placed the remarkable holdings of the American Jewish Archives at my disposal. He and Adam Mendelsohn read and commented on the entire manuscript, offering invaluable suggestions. Carolyn Hessel offered friendship, guidance, support, and criticism—always in the right proportions and at the right time. Sylvia Barack Fishman, my department chair during this project, championed the project and left me time to complete it. I also learned much from discussions with T. Forcht Dagi, David Dalin, Menachem Genack, Shalom Lamm, David Saperstein, and John Stauffer. In addition, I thank the late Dr. Bernard G. Sarnat and Rhoda G. Sarnat, who established the Bernard G. and Rhoda G. Sarnat Center for the Study of Anti-Jewishness, which I direct, and Lawrence E. and Nancy S. Glick, who made the Joseph H. & Belle R. Braun Chair in American Jewish history at Brandeis possible.

Finally, I thank my amazing family. While they may sometimes have tired of hearing about Lincoln, they never flagged in their love and devotion—not even when that meant sitting at my bedside for hours at a time while I battled to live. My children, Aaron and Leah; Aaron's wonderful wife, Talya; and her parents, Robert and Sue Housman; my brother, David, and his family; my in-laws, Elinor & James Langer; and above all, my wondrous wife, Ruth Langer, are the unsung heroes of this book. Their encouragement and fortitude recall one of Abraham Lincoln's most telling aphorisms: "Your own resolution to succeed is more important than any other one thing."

—Dr. Jonathan D. Sarna

Over many years it has been my dream to one day publish a book on Lincoln and the Jews as seen literally in his own hand, through letters in my own collection, as well as those in other archives. I feel very fortunate now in having been privileged to work with so many people who shared this vision, and who worked so passionately to give it a voice.

I wish to thank, first and foremost, my co-author, Jonathan Sarna, with whom it has been for me a great honor to collaborate on this work, which began in 2011 with brainstorming sessions in his Boston office. Without his scholarship and expertise this book would have remained just a dream. I am thankful that Jonathan is on the road to recovery and wish him continued strength.

Though mentioned previously by Jonathan but well worth repeating, I am particularly indebted to the tireless efforts of Menachem Grossman, Ariane Weisel Margalit, and Sara Willen, as well as Dina Grossman and Michal Gorlin Becker. Working with them has been a great privilege for me, and I appreciate more than they know their devotion to this work.

The images in this book bring Lincoln's association with Jews to a new and intimate understanding never before seen, and I am eternally grateful to my longtime and trusted friend Joseph Maddalena for his keen eye, guidance, and selfless devotion in helping me build the collection to what it is today.

The Shapell Manuscript Foundation has been fortunate to have on its staff wonderful researchers and consultants who have contributed to this book in invaluable ways: Dr. John Sellers, with whom I worked on a joint exhibition with the Library of Congress on the occasion of Lincoln's Bicentennial in 2009; Adrienne Usher, Sharon Hannon, Adam Geibel, Janice Parente, Caitlin Eichner, fellow Lincoln (and Twain) enthusiast Tony Travis, Jamie Levavi, Clark Hall, Brian Chanes, and Dyon Maki. In particular I'd like to thank my good friend and fellow collector Bob Marcus, with whom I have shared many fascinating conversations on Lincoln and Jewish Civil War soldiers.

I also want to thank Carolyn Hessel and Marcia Markland: their indefatigable stewardship of this project has been instrumental in bringing the book to life.

My sincere thanks to Eileen Mackevich and Carla Knorowski at the Papers of Abraham Lincoln in Springfield for all their wonderful assistance and professionalism, and especially Daniel Stowell, whose generous sharing of images and original research has so consistently advanced Lincoln scholarship.

Of course to my family, I owe everything, and offer, finally, this book to them in tribute to their patience, understanding, and inspiration. My parents, David and Fela Shapell, who recently celebrated their sixty-fifth wedding anniversary and whose philanthropy and generosity know no bounds; my wife, Susan, and our four wonderful children, Jennifer, Adam, Andy, and Rachel; Jennifer's husband, Mark Smith, and their two daughters, Kaitlin and Alexandra; and Adam's wife, Elisheva, who have all patiently endured what has been my lifetime obsession with Lincoln.

—Benjamin Shapell

INDEX

The index that appeared in the print version of this title does not match the pages in your eBook. Please use the search function on your eReading device to search for terms of interest. For your reference, the terms that appear in the print index are listed below.

Bold entries indicate titles of boxes.

A abolitionists about Sutlers
Abraham Lincoln and the Jews (Markens)
Adams, Charles Francis
Adams, John
Adams, John Quincy
Adler, Nathan Marcus
Allen, Julian
Allen, Michael M.
Alschuler, Samuel G.
American Party
American Society for Evangelizing the Jews
American Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews
Andrews, Rufus F.
Antietam, Battle of
The anti-Semitic abolitionists
The anti-Semitic generals anti-Semitism
Appomattox Court House, Virginia
Arnold, Isaac N.
Asbury, Henry assassination
Athens, Illinois
Augusta, Illinois
Austrian, Charles

B

Bachrach, David
Bailhache, William H.
Baltimore, Maryland
Bamberger, Emanuel
Bamberger, Salomon S.
Bamberger, Simon
Banks, Nathaniel P.
Barnett, Samuel M.
Barrett, Oliver
Bateman, Newton
Bates, Edward
Bedell, Grace
Beecher, Henry Ward
Behrend, Adajah
Behrend, Bernhard
Belmont, August (Aaron)
Benjamin, Judah P.
Benton, Thomas Hart
Bernays, Charles L.
Beverly Ford, Virginia
Bible. See also New Testament; Old Testament
Bijur, Martin
"blab schools"
Black Hawk War
blacks
Blair, Francis Preston
Block, Louisa
Blumenberg, Leopold
Blumenberg, Rudolph
Board of Delegates of American Israelites
Booth, Edwin
Booth, John Wilkes
Booth, Junius Brutus
Boston Daily Advertiser
Boudinot, Elias
Brady, Matthew Brandeis, Louis D.
Breckinridge, John C.
Brenner, Victor David
Browning, Orville Hickman
Bryant, William Cullen
Buchanan, James
Bull Run, First Battle of Burnside, Ambrose

Bush, Isidor
Bushnell, Nehemiah
Busteed, Richard
Butler, Benjamin F.

C
Cadwallader, Sylvanus
Calhoun, John C.
Calvinists
Cameron, Simon
Cameron Dragoons
Campbell, John A.
Canisius, Theodore
Capturing Lincoln
Carpenter, Francis Bicknell
Cartter, David K.
Carvalho, Solomon Nunes
Cass, Lewis
Catholics
Chappel, Alonzo
Charleston Mercury
Chase, Salmon P.
Chicago, Illinois
Chicago Tribune
chiropody
"Christian" (term)
Christian Commission
Christianity
Cincinnati, Ohio
Civil War appointment of quartermasters during chaplains during desertions during Passover seder during sutlers during
A Civil War seder in West Virginia
Clay, Cassius Marcellus
Clay, Henry
Clossen, James
Cohen, Eleanor H.
Cohen, Jacob (James) G.
Cohen, Simon P.
Cohn, Elkan
Colfax, Schuyler
Collis, Septima Maria (Levy)

“compensated emancipation”
Confederacy
Conness, Senator
Constitution
Cooper, Astley Paston
Cooper Union Address
The Correspondent
Corwin, Thomas
Coulter, John
Court Jews
Cromelien, J. M.
Curtis, George William
Cutting, Francis Brockholst

D
Daly, Augustin
Daniel, Book of Davidson, Julius
Davis, Jefferson
Davis, Varina
Dawes, Henry L.
Deborah (Mosenthal)
Delahay, Mark W.
Dembitz, Lewis Naphtali
Democratic Party
Denison, George S. desertions
Deuteronomy, Book of Dills, Harrison discoveries and inventions, lecture on Diseases of the Human Foot (Zacharie)
Dittenhoefer, Abram J.
Dix, John A.
Douglas, Stephen A.
Douglass, Frederick
Dred Scott decision
Dropsie, Moses Aaron
Du Bois, Van Deusen
Dudley, Dwight
Dugger, Jefferson L.
Dunn, William McKee
Durlacher, Lewis

E
Ecclesiastes

Eclectic Third Reader (McGuffey)
Edwards, Elizabeth
Egan, Constantine L.
Einhorn, David
Einstein, Max
Eisenberg, John election of 1860
election of 1864
Emancipation Proclamation
Emerson, Luther Orlando
The English Reader (Murray)
Esther, Book of Etting, Frank Marx
Everett, Edward
Ewing, Philemon B.
Exodus, Book of

F

Faline, John
Felsenthal, Bernhard
Fessenden, William P.
Fillmore, Millard
Fischel, Arnold
Forbes, Edwin
Forbes, G. W.
Forbes, Malcolm
Ford's Theatre
Foreman, Gerhard
Forrest, Nathan Bedford
Forrester, Nelly
Forrester, William Gill
Forsha, S. W.
Foster, John Gray
"fourscore"
Frankel, Jacob
Franklin & Co.
Franks, Herman
Franks family
free blacks
Freemasons
Frémont, John C.
Friedman, Max
Fugitive Slave Law
funeral, Lincoln's

G
Gale, Dewitt
Gamea (Séjour)
Gardner, Alexander
Garfield, James
Garrison, William Lloyd
Geisse, Philip
General Orders No. 11 (“Jew Order”)
General Orders No. 11: “The wisest order yet made by a military command”
Genesis, Book of German, Christopher
German Americans
Gettysburg, Battle of Gettysburg Address
Gibbons, James Sloan
Gibson, Ella E.
Giles, William Branch
Goldsmith (Goldschmit), Abraham
Goldstein, Isaac, acrostic by Gordon, Martin, Jr.
Gotthelf, Bernard H.
Gottschalk, Louis Moreau
Grant, Jesse R.
Grant, Ulysses S. (“Jew Order”). See also General Orders No. 11
Gratz, Benjamin
Gratz, Bernard
Gratz, Hyman
Gratz, Louis A.
Gratz, Michael
Gratz, Simon
Grau, Herman
Grau, Jacob
Grau, Maurice
Gray, John Chipman
Greeley, Horace
Green, William
Greenebaum, Henry
Griff, Sigmund
Grimshaw, Jackson
Grinnell, Moses Hicks
Grossmayer, Nathan
Grover’s Theater
Gurley, John Addison
Gutheim, James K.

H
Hahn, Michael
Hall, Amanda
Halleck, Henry
Haman (Biblical figure)
Hamlin, Hannibal
Hammerslough, Julius
Hammerslough and Brothers Clothing (Springfield, Ill.)
Hammond, William A.
Harris, Clara
Harrison, Benjamin
Hart, Abraham
Hart, Alexander
Hart, Emanuel B.
Hart, Henry L.
Hausserk, Frederick
Hay, John
Hayes, Rutherford B.
Hebrew, Israelite, Jew
Hebrew Assistance Society (Baltimore, Md.)
"Hebrews" (term)
Hecker, Friedrich
Hedrick, Benjamin Sherwood
Heilprin, Isaac
Heilprin, Michael
Henry, Jacob
Henry V (Shakespeare)
Hermann, Alexander
Hermann, Carl (Compars)
Herndon, William H.
Hertz, Emanuel
Hesler, Alexander
Hirsch, David
Hirsch, Mayer (Maier)
Hodges, Albert
Holly Springs, Virginia
Holt, Joseph
Holzer, Harold
Honest Abe honesty, Lincoln's
Hunt, William Holman
Hurlbut, Stephen A.
Hyams, Henry M.

I

Illinois
map poll books (1856)
Illinois Journal
Illinois Staats-Anzeiger
Illowy, Bernard inaugural speeches first second (“With Malice Toward None”) inauguration first (1861)
second (1865)
Isaacs, Myer S.
Isaiah, Book of Israelite
“Israelites” (term)

J
Jefferson, Thomas
Jeremiah, Book of Jerusalem
Jewish Messenger
The Jewish Record
Jewish soldiers serving Lincoln: a sampling
Jewish vote
“Jew Order.” See General Orders No. 11
Joachimsen, Philip J.
Joel, Book of
Joel, Ephraim M.
Joel, Joseph A.
Johnson, Andrew
Johnson, Edgar M.
Johnston, Andrew
Johnston, Thomas
Jonas, Abraham
as committee chairman for Lincoln-Douglas debate as delegate
on Frémont ballot law office advertisement letter from Henry Clay letters from Abraham Lincoln letters to Abraham Lincoln letter to George D. Ramsey Lincoln-Douglas debate book inscribed by Lincoln Masonic document signed by nomination by Lincoln to Quincy deputy postmaster portrait postmaster strategizing with Lyman Trumbull and Thoroughman case

Jonas, Annie Elizabeth
Jonas, Benjamin F.
Jonas, Charles H. parole card
Jonas, Edward L. fly
Jonas, George B.
Jonas, Joseph
Jonas, Julian J.
Jonas, Louisa Block
postmistress
Jonas, Lucia
Jonas, Sidney (Samuel) Alroy
Jones, Alfred T.
Jones, Avonia
Jones, K. K.
Jones, Rosalie
Joshua, Book of Judah, Henry Moses
Judah, Samuel
Judd, Norman B.
Judges, Book of

K

Kahal Kadosh Beth Shalome
Kansas-Nebraska Act
Kansas Post
Karpeles, Leopold
Kaskel, Cesar J.
Kaufmann, Sigismund
Kearny, Philip
Kelley, William D.
Kinkle, John
Knefler, Frederick
Know-Nothings
Koerner, Gustav
Kohn, Abraham
Koppel, Herman
Korn, Bertram W.
Kuhne, George

L Lae, Emile
Lamon, Ward
Langenschwarz, Max
The Last Hours of Lincoln (Chappel)
Lawson, Mary Anne
Lazarus, Aaron
Leah, the Forsaken (Daly)
Leale, Charles Augustus
Leavenworth, Kansas
Lee, Robert E.
Leeser, Isaac
Leon, Abraham
Leon, Louis
Leon, Morris
Levi, Levi Andrew
Levy, Arnold
Levy, Benjamin
Levy, Cheme Moise
Levy, Ferdinand
Levy, Uriah Phillips
Lewis, Ada
Lewis, Samuel A.
Lieberman, Lazarus J.
Liebermann, Charles H.
Lilienthal, Max
Lincoln, Abraham. See also specific headings, e.g.: Emancipation Proclamation Altschuler photos approval of Henry Rice as sutler beardless portrait
  Carvalho portrait
  Cooper Union Address
  “cracked plate” portrait earliest known image endorsement of Moritz Pinner
  first lecture on discoveries and inventions first Washington sitting German photo at Gettysburg inaugural address (first) inaugural address (second)
  Jewish connections of letter from David K. Cartter and Andrew Wylie letter from William McKee Dunn letter from Arnold Fischel letters from Abraham Jonas letters from Benjamin Jonas letter from Isaac Leeser letter from George Meade letter from Leonard Myers letter from Joshua Speed letter from Issachar Zacharie letter to Nathaniel Banks letter to Grace Bedell letter to Simon Cameron letter to Salmon P. Chase ("troub'lous times") letter to Cassius M. Clay ("humblest of all") letter to Schuyler Colfax letter to John Coulter letter to Jefferson L. Dugger letter to Arnold Fischel letter to Michael Hahn ("jewel of liberty") letter to Amanda Hall ("Fondly do we hope") letter to Albert Hodges letter to Joseph Holt ("jubilee") letter to Andrew Johnston ("Living in the tombs") letters to Abraham Jonas ("hobbled") ("one of my most valued friends") (Know–nothing lodge) letter to Norman Judd ("Never fear") letter to William D. Kelly ("a man of great learning") letter to Lazarus J. Lieberman letter to John A. McClernand ("broken eggs") letter to George Meade letter to Robert H. Milroy letter to David L. Phillips ("clouds") letter to George D. Ramsey ("wanting to work") letter to William K. Seward letter to William T. Sherman letter to James Speed letters to Joshua Speed letters to Edwin M. Stanton ("Hebrew") ("About Jews") ("I will take care of myself") letters to Thurlow Weed (the purposes of the Almighty) letter to Gideon Welles letter to Issachar Zacharie on Lincoln penny

note regarding conditions for peace note to Lucy Speed personal check to Franklin & Co.
personal intervention in Wallach case promotion of Ephraim M. Joel recommendation for Isaac Moses salary voucher revision sum Book of with Tad ("A. Lincoln and Son") testimonials for Issachar Zacharie ("plain people") ("corns")

Lincoln, Mary Todd
Lincoln, Mordecai
Lincoln, Nancy
Lincoln, Samuel
Lincoln, Tad ("A. Lincoln and Son")
Lincoln, Thomas
Lincoln cent
Lincoln–Douglas debates
Lincoln on mourning
Lincoln's appointments to Jerusalem
Lincoln's Friend–and Advocate for Jews–Carl Schurz
Lincoln's Jewish Connections
Lincoln Street (Jerusalem)
Locke, David R.
Lorant, Stefen
Lowenthal, Theodore

M
Mack, Harman
Mack, Henry
Mack, Simon
Maddalena, Joseph
Mallory, Robert
Mammoth Cave
Markbreit, Leopold
Markens, Isaac
Marshall, John
Marx, Joseph
Maryland Jew Bill
Mason-Dixon Line
Mayer, William
McClean, John
McClellan, George B.
McClernand, John Alexander
McGuffey, William
McKinley, William
Meade, George
Melville, Herman
Memphis Daily Bulletin
The Merchant of Venice (Shakespeare)
Merrifield, Joseph

Meshullam, John
Meyer, Margarethe
Miller, Nehemiah H.
Miller, Perry
Milroy, Robert H.
Missouri Compromise
The Missouri Compromise and popular sovereignty
Moise, Edwin Warren
Monk, Henry Wentworth
Montefiore, Moses
Morais, Sabato
Mordecai, Alfred, Jr.
Mordecai, Alfred, Sr.
Mordecai, Benjamin
Mordecai, Emma Mordecai, Goodman L.
Morgan, Edwin D.
Morgan, William
Mormons
Morris, Isaac Newton
Mortara, Edgardo
Mortara Affair
Mosenthal, Salomon Hermann
Moses, Isaac
Mott, Valentine
Murray, Lindley
Mutter, Thomas Dent
Myers, Abraham Charles
Myers, Albert
Myers, Anne
Myers, Gustavus Adolphus
Myers, Leonard
Myers, Louis
Myers, Morris
Myers Brothers (department store)

N
Naar, David
National Lincoln Monument Association
National Reform Association nativism
Nauvoo, Illinois
Newman, Leopold
New Salem, Illinois
New Testament

New York City
New-York Evening Post
New York Herald
The New York Times
New York World
Nicolay, John G.
Noah, Mordecai
Northern Democrats
Northwest Ordinance
Numbers, Book of Nye, Governor

O

"Ode to Dr. Zacharie"
Olcott, Franklin
Old Testament. See also specific books, e.g.: Daniel, Book of Opdyke, George
Orah, Lucia
Orah, Rachel Otterbourg, Marcus
Our American Cousin (Taylor)

P

Palmerston, Lord
pardoning Jews: two interesting cases
Parker, Theodore
Passover
Patrick, Marsena R.
Peixotto, B. F.
Pendleton Civil Service Reform Act
Perry, Matthew
Phillips, David L.
Phillips, Rachel Rosalie
Phillips, Wendell
Philp & Solomons
Pierce, Franklin
Pinner, Moritz
poll books
Pomeroy, Samuel C.
postmasters
Pretts, David
Psalms, Book of
The purposes of the Almighty
Putnam, Robert

Q
quartermasters
Quincy, Illinois
Quincy Daily Whig

R
Rainese, John
Ramsey, George D.
Raphall, Alfred
Raphall, Morris J.
Rathbone, Henry R.
Republican Party
Rhodes, Albert
Rice, Henry
Richardson, William A.
Richmond, Virginia
  map of Jewish Richmond
Rockhill and Wilson Clothiers
Rodes, Robert Emmett
Rogers, Randolph
Roman Catholics
“Rosenbaum” sign
Rosenthal, Max
Rosenwald, Julius
Rosenwald, Samuel
Rosewald, Jacob H.
Rosewater, Edward
Rosewater, Leah
Rothschild, James Mayer de Rothschild, Lionel de Rothschild, Salomon James de Rothschild family
Ruskin, John
Russell, John

S
Salomon, Edward Selig
Salzenstein, Elias
Salzenstein, Louis
Samuels, Abraham B.
Sandburg, Carl
Sang, Phillip
Sarner, Ferdinand Leopold
Savannah, Georgia
Schurz, Carl

Seder
Seixas, Gershom
Seixas, Joshua
Séjour, Victor
Seligman, Henry
Seligman, Joseph
Seward, William H.
Seymour, Horatio
Shakespeare, William
Shapell Roster
Shavuot
Shaw, Francis
Shelby, John
Shepley, George F.
Sherman, William Tecumseh
Shrigley, James
Shylock
Silverman, Frank
Silverman, Lion
Silversmith, Julius
Simon, John Y.
Simon, Joseph slavery. See also Emancipation Proclamation
Smith, Edward Delafield
Smith, Joseph
Solomons, Adolphus S.
Solomons, Zillah
South Carolina
Southern Democrats
Speed, James
Speed, Joshua F.
Speed, Lucy
Spiegel, Marcus M. spiritualists
Springfield, Illinois
Stanton, Edwin M.
Stevenson, Robert Louis
Stiner, Joseph H.
Stone, Mrs. Dr.
Stone, Robert K. ("Death Closed the Scene")
Stowe, Harriet Beecher
Strauss, Moses
Strouse, Myer
Stuart, George H.
"Sum book," Lincoln's childhood

Supreme Court sutlers
Szold, Benjamin

T Taney, Roger Taylor, Tom
Taylor, Zachary
Ten Commandments
Thoroughman, Thomas
Truman, Harry
Trumbull, Lyman
Tuttle, James
Twain, Mark

U
Uncle Tom's Cabin (Stowe)
The Union is dissolved
USS Malvern

V
Vallandigham, Clement
A valuable lesson for a wayward nephew: "Wanting to work is so rare a merit…"
Van Dorn, Earl
Vanity Fair
Vestvali, Felicia
Vidaver, Henry

W
Waddell, L. J.
Wade, Benjamin
Waldauer, Moses
Wallach, Meyer
Wallach, Philip
Wallach, Richard
Walter, Charles
Washburne, Elihu B.
Washington, George
Waughop, John W.
Weed, Thurlow
Weil, Charles
Weitzel, Godfrey
Welles, Gideon
Weyer, Josiah S.

Whig Party
Whitney, Henry Clay
Wigwam (Chicago, Ill.)
Willard's Hotel
Williams, Archibald
Wise, Isaac Meyer
Wolf, Simon
Wollman, Betty
Wollman, Henry
Wollman, Jonas (James)
Wollman family
Wolman, Betty
Wood, Fernando
Worsley, Pardon
Wylie, Andrew

Y
Yates, Edward
Yates, Richard
Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA)
Yulee, David Levy

Z
Zacharia, Amelia
Zacharia, Jonathan
Zacharie, Issachar
  broadside of Grant's testimonial on skills of inscribed copy of chiropody book by letter from Abraham Lincoln
  letters to Abraham Lincoln and letter to Lincoln from J. G. Cohen
  Lincoln on "countrymen" of Lincoln's letter of introduction for Lincoln's note following treatment by Lincoln's requests for passes for Lincoln's testimonials for Lincoln to William T. Sherman on Goodman Mordecai on
  "Ode to Dr. Zacharie" telegram to Abraham Lincoln testimonials to

ABOUT THE AUTHORS

JONATHAN D. SARNA is a historian and leading commentator on American Jewish history, religion, and life. Dubbed by the Forward newspaper in 2004 as one of America's fifty most-influential American Jews, Sarna is the Joseph H. & Belle R. Braun Professor of American Jewish History at Brandeis University, and the eighteenth president of the Association for Jewish Studies. The author of hundreds of scholarly articles, Sarna may be best known for his acclaimed American Judaism: A History, winner of the "Jewish Book Council's Jewish Book of the Year Award." You can sign up for email updates here.

BENJAMIN SHAPELL is the founder of the Shapell Manuscript Foundation, an independent educational organization whose collection includes original documents of world-renowned individuals. Shapell has written articles on Lincoln, other American presidents, and Mark Twain. The author also initiated and oversaw the creation of exhibitions and films relating to the central themes of the collection. The foundation has partnered in exhibitions with major institutions, including the Library of Congress, the Morgan Library & Museum, the New-York Historical Society, the National Library of Israel, and the Smithsonian Institution. Shapell lives with his family in Israel.

Thank you for buying this
Thomas Dunne Books ebook.

To receive special offers, bonus content,
and info on new releases and other great reads,
sign up for our newsletters.

Or visit us online at us.macmillan.com/newslettersignup

For email updates on the author, click here.

CONTENTS

TITLE PAGE

COPYRIGHT NOTICE

DEDICATION

FOREWORD by Benjamin Shapell

INTRODUCTION by Jonathan D. Sarna

LINCOLN'S JEWISH CONNECTIONS

CHAPTER ONE: THE PROMISED LAND … WHOSE STONES ARE IRON AND OUT OF WHOSE HILLS THOU MAYEST DIG BRASS: 1809–1830

CHAPTER TWO: AND THIS TOO SHALL PASS AWAY—NEVER FEAR: 1830–1858

CHAPTER THREE: ONE OF MY MOST VALUED FRIENDS: 1858–1860

CHAPTER FOUR: WE HAVE NOT YET APPOINTED A HEBREW: 1861–1862

CHAPTER FIVE: I MYSELF HAVE A REGARD FOR THE JEWS: 1863

CHAPTER SIX: ABOUT JEWS: 1863–1865

CHAPTER SEVEN: TO SEE JERUSALEM BEFORE HE DIED: 1865

EPILOGUE

LINCOLN AND THE JEWS CHRONOLOGY

NOTES

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

INDEX

ABOUT THE AUTHORS

COPYRIGHT

FRONTISPIECE: On October 3, 1861, Abraham Lincoln asked his Secretary of State to see Polish-born Jewish lithographer Max Rosenthal. In 1908, Rosenthal etched this portrait of Lincoln based on an 1860 photograph of Lincoln.

THOMAS DUNNE BOOKS.
An imprint of St. Martin's Press.

LINCOLN AND THE JEWS: A HISTORY. Copyright © 2015 by The Shapell Manuscript Foundation. All rights reserved. For information, address St. Martin's Press, 175 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10010.

www.thomasdunnebooks.com
www.stmartins.com

"Lincoln's Jewish Connections" infographic by Pure+Applied eBooks may be purchased for business or promotional use. For information on bulk purchases, please contact Macmillan Corporate and Premium Sales Department by writing to MacmillanSpecialMarkets@macmillan.com.

First Edition: March 2015

eISBN 9781466864610

First eBook edition: February 2015

Lincoln's Jewish Spy

The Life and Times of Issachar Zacharie

E. Lawrence Abel

Lincoln’s Jewish Spy

ALSO BY E. LAWRENCE ABEL AND FROM MCFARLAND

Intoxication in Mythology: A Worldwide Dictionary of Gods, Rites, Intoxicants and Places (2006)

Confederate Sheet Music (2011 paperback; 2004)

Arab Genetic Disorders: A Layman's Guide (2003)

Jewish Genetic Disorders: A Layman's Guide (2008 paperback; 2001)

Lincoln's Jewish Spy

The Life and Times of Issachar Zacharie

E. LAWRENCE ABEL

McFarland & Company, Inc., Publishers
Jefferson, North Carolina

Library of Congress Cataloguing-in-Publication Data

Names: Abel, E. Lawrence, 1943– author.
Title: Lincoln's Jewish spy : the life and times of Issachar Zacharie /
E. Lawrence Abel.
Other titles: Life and times of Issachar Zacharie
Description: Jefferson, North Carolina : McFarland & Company, Inc.,
Publishers, 2020 | Includes bibliographical references and index.

Identifiers: LCCN 2020030105 | ISBN 9781476680460 (paperback : acid free paper)

ISBN 9781476639833 (ebook)
Subjects: LCSH: Zacharie, I. (Isachar) | Lincoln, Abraham,
1809–1865—Friends and associates. | Podiatrists—United States—Biography. | Jews—United States—Biography. | Spies—United States—Biography. | United States—History—Civil War,
1861–1865—Secret service. | British Americans—Biography. | Eccentrics and eccentricities—United States—Biography.
Classification: LCC E415.9.Z33 A24 2020 | DDC 973.7/85092 [B]—dc23
LC record available at https://lccn.loc.gov/2020030105

British Library cataloguing data are available

ISBN (print) 978-1-4766-8046-0
ISBN (ebook) 978-1-4766-3983-3

© 2020 E. Lawrence Abel. All rights reserved

No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying or recording, or by any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publisher.

Front cover image of Zacharie in later years (photograph courtesy American Jewish Historical Society)

Printed in the United States of America

McFarland & Company, Inc., Publishers
Box 611, Jefferson, North Carolina 28640
www.mcfarlandpub.com

To Barbara,
My soulmate, wife, editor, and conscience,
With much love.
You are the best of me.

Table of Contents

Acknowledgments
Author's Note
Introduction

Part One
The Past Is Prologue
1
"Sucking the egg"
2
"Act according to the custom of that place"

Part Two
I. Zachariah, Jr., Cheroperdist
3
"No Cure No Pay"
4
"Where more money could be made faster"
5
"We the undersigned"
6
"A humble individual"
7
California
8
"Prince of chiropodists"
9
The Mystic Cords of Memory
10
"A chiropodist of marvelous skill"
11
"Dr. Zacharie has operated on my feet" 12
"Ode to Dr. Zacharie"
13
"My own chiropodist is a Jew"

Part Three
Spy and Diplomat
14

The General Prohibition
15
“Spare no expense”
16
Spymaster
17
“Monomaniacs”
18
A Service He Alone Was Capable Of 19
He Lacks Stability
20
“Done things for me that would astonish you”
21
“Can’t go Lincoln”
22
“I promised I would elect you”
23
“My family are crazy with joy”

Part Four

Later Years

24
“Surely you don’t intend to go for Grant”
25
“Republics are unquestionably ungrateful”
26
Return to England
27
Death of an Eccentric Man
28
Aftermath

Appendix: Zacharie’s Accounts

Bibliography

Index of Terms

Acknowledgments

Every historian is indebted to librarians and archivists. As always, I want to thank the interlibrary staff at Wayne State University for their efforts in locating and making available materials from other libraries across the country. A very special word of appreciation goes to Jeffrey Flannery and the archivists at the Library of Congress for their help with the Banks correspondence, and the archivists at the National Archives for lifting the hernia-heavy four volume Smith-Brady Commission onto the cart, along with the Zacharie correspondence.

I also want to give special thanks to Melinda Wallington, Rush Rhees Library, University of Rochester, for sending me copies of Zacharie's correspondence with Seward; to Elisa Ho at the Jacob Rader Marcus Center of the American Jewish Archives for sending the Bertram Korn correspondence and materials; and to Rabbi/historian Gary P. Zola at the American Jewish Archives for sending me the correspondence between Zacharie and Judah Benjamin.

Thanks to Professor Jonathan Sarna for comments and help with locating materials at the Shapell Museum, and to William Binzel for material on Stanton and Yulee. Thanks also to Alison Bundy, John Hay Library, Brown University; Anne Rollins and Wendy Truman, Historical Society of Washington, D.C.; and Heather Green, Williams Research Center, Historic New Orleans Collection, who likewise provided advice and relevant materials. Thanks also to Marcia Ely at the Brooklyn Historical Society; Megan Lewis, reference librarian at the National Institute for Holocaust Documentation; Steven Greenberg, National Library of Medicine; Boni J. Koeliker, American Jewish Historical Society; Patricia D. Klinkenstein, New York Historical Society; and Catherine Robertson, Peabody Essex Museum, Rowley, Massachusetts, for efforts in searching for and/or providing relevant materials.

Special thanks to Timothy Reid, Senior Archivist, Westminster Archives in London, UK, for information on Zacharie's home in London; and to the interdisciplinary librarians at Wayne State University for research assistance. A special note of thanks to Robert Marcus for providing the very rare photo of Zacharie.

I wish also to express my appreciation (in alphabetical order) to the scholars who critiqued various chapters of this book: Barbara Abel, William Binzel, Kathryn Canavan, John Fazio, Roberta Russ, Dr. Jonathan Sarna, Richard Willing, Rabbi Herbert Yoskowitz, and Dr. Gary P. Zola.

Author’s Note

Most of the information about Issachar Zacharie comes from letters to and from him. These letters contain so many misspellings that to note them all with the usual “sic” would have been tiresome for the reader. Accordingly, I have not noted or corrected the misspellings in these letters. Misspellings from other sources are duly noted. I have also, in some instances, taken the liberty of transforming comments in letters into spoken comments. The wording, however, is still as it appeared in the original.

Introduction

John Hay, President Abraham Lincoln's personal secretary, knocked on Lincoln's office door at the White House and entered. Turning to the dapper, bearded man behind him, Hay introduced Dr. Issachar Zacharie. Lincoln and Zacharie shook hands. Chatting briefly, each man took the measure of the other. Then Lincoln sat down, peeled off his slippers and stuck out his bare foot.

Issachar sat down on a chair opposite the President, opened his bag, and took out a sharp knife. Holding the President's foot in his left hand, he offered a few brief words of assurance that he would feel little pain and began to scrape away his corns. Afterwards, a grateful President wrote a public testimonial to the chiropodist: "Dr. Zacharie has operated on my feet with good success and considerable addition to my comfort."

What they talked about while the foot doctor scraped away is not known. The two men were opposites in almost every imaginable way. Lincoln was a towering six foot four inches in height, one of the tallest men in the country. Issachar Zacharie was no more than five foot seven inches. Lincoln's face was craggy; Issachar had a round, cherubic face. Lincoln dressed casually; Issachar dressed to the nines. Lincoln was President of the United States. Issachar was a foot doctor, born in England and still a British citizen. Lincoln's parents were Baptists; Issachar's parents were Jewish.

Despite their differences, a camaraderie developed between the two men. In future letters to the President, Issachar headed his correspondence, "My Dear Friend," and regularly sent baskets of pineapples, bananas, and oranges to Lincoln along with "kind regards" to Mrs. Lincoln. Issachar was one of the few people on friendly terms with the President's mercurial wife, Mary Todd Lincoln, a woman John Hay called a "Hell-Cat" and "Her Satanic Majesty."

Lincoln was on cordial terms with many Jews, but his relationship with Issachar was by far the most intimate. The President, the New York World told its readers, "has often left his business apartment to spend an evening in the parlor of his favored bunionist." When a visitor came to the White House to discuss an early Zionist idea of reestablishing a Jewish homeland in Palestine, Lincoln told him he was not at all opposed to the idea. "I myself have regard for the Jews," he said, "my chiropodist is a Jew, and he has so many times 'put me on my feet' that I would have no objection to giving his countrymen 'a leg up.'"

Issachar was far from a paragon of virtue. He claimed to have been tutored in chiropody by the most famous physicians of his day, which was a lie. He was largely self-taught. He claimed to have earned a medical degree from a medical school in, of all places, Cuba. This also was not true. All the more unbelievable because Issachar didn't know a word of Spanish. He claimed to have authored a text on chiropody. Not true. He plagiarized the book and substituted his own name for the author's.

Lincoln sensed the corn-cutter was duplicitous, but Lincoln had a peculiar fondness for flawed characters. Lincoln was himself not above a certain amount of duplicity. A slightly damaged, overly ambitious man like Issachar Zacharie, he thought to himself, would make a good spy. Lincoln sent him to New Orleans, telling General Nathaniel P. Banks, head of the Department of the Gulf, that Dr. Zacharie could be of help. He could keep him abreast of citizens' attitudes about the Union occupation and Confederate activities in and around the city. Unbeknownst to Banks, Issachar was a double agent. Lincoln was also sending him to New Orleans to keep him informed about Banks' performance. Lincoln had such confidence in the man that he later entrusted him to be his unofficial envoy to confer with Judah P. Benjamin, the Jewish Secretary of State, and other Confederate leaders in Richmond about a peaceful end to the war.

Issachar Zacharie is not known today, although during the Civil War, his name regularly appeared in the newspapers throughout the North. A smattering of historians, Jewish and gentile, are aware of his friendship with Lincoln and his role as Lincoln's spy and unofficial envoy, but other than a paragraph or two, most rarely go beyond mentioning it. Even fewer have been curious about what happened to him after the war, mistakenly assuming he just faded into oblivion.

My aim in this book is to tell the hitherto unknown story of an eccentric man whom the war-time New York World newspaper characterized as "the most favored family visitor at the White House." I started this project anticipating something akin to hero-worship for a man who came from nothing, to be on speaking terms with the President of the United States and the Secretary of State of the Confederacy. I finished uncertain of whether he was a well-meaning entrepreneur or a self-serving opportunist. But uncomplicated men or women rarely make history. Or hold the interest of a biographer or a reader.

Part One

The Past Is Prologue

1

“Sucking the egg”

Issachar Zacharie was born in 1825 in Chatham, England. It was the year composer Johann Strauss II, biologist Thomas Henry Huxley, and neurologist Jean-Martin Charcot were born, and the year inventor Eli Whitney, composer Antonio Salieri, architect Pierre Charles L’Enfant, and astronomer Edmond Halley died. The most significant inventions that year were the electromagnet and cement. In America, John Quincy Adams took the oath as the sixth president of the United States, and the Erie Canal opened. On the Indiana frontier, a tall, lanky 17-year-old Abraham Lincoln was splitting rails for 25 cents a day.

Lodged along the banks of the River Medway about 30 miles southeast of London, Chatham was an industrial naval dockyard and mercantile port dating back to the time of Queen Elizabeth I, “notorious for its poor health and living conditions.”[1] The streets were muddy and filthy with manure and rotting garbage. The air reeked from its stench, from hot tar oakum and oak chips wafting from the dockyard, and from a fetid stream coursing through the back part of the town to the river.

Off-duty seamen and dockworkers with nowhere to go spent their time in public houses and brothels. An undermanned police force contended with drunks, vagrants, pickpockets, thieves, pimps, and prostitutes who wandered the streets in search of prey. Royal marines armed with rifles herded convicts, like animals, to hulk prison ships on the River Medway. Not for nothing was Chatham called “the wickedest place in the world.”[2]

Issachar’s family lived above a wooden dry goods shop on High Street, Chatham’s business district. The offal-saturated street was Issachar’s front garden and playground. He fell asleep to the din of drunken men singing, shouting, and pummeling one another in midnight brawls. Unlike Charles Dickens, who lived in a house on a hill in Chatham far above the streets and dockyards during his early childhood and fondly remembered those days, Issachar never spoke about his early years in Chatham.

* * * * * * * *

Issachar’s father, Jan Zachariah, was born in 1797, and emigrated to England sometime around 1820, from eastern Prussia. Many years later, when a census taker in the United States asked him about his homeland, Jan proudly said Poland,[3] although that country no longer existed at the time of his birth. It had been partitioned and annexed in the late 1700s by Prussia, Russia, and Austria.

Like many of the Jews who emigrated to England and America in the late 1700s and early 1800s, Jan left because he saw no future for himself if he stayed. Most of those who emigrated were single men between the ages of 20 and 26; some were as young as 16.[4]

Jewish emigrants making their way to England mainly settled in the East End of London. Others headed for the naval dockyard towns of Chatham, Portsmouth, Plymouth, Exeter, and Bristol. Dockyard towns and their surroundings were home to thousands of men and their families. A man could earn a modest living as a merchant or peddler in those places.[5]

Jan may have made his way to Chatham because other Jews from his community had gone there before him. Emigrating to places where family or friends of family were already living meant there would be someone there to help a newcomer get settled. In 1780, there were enough Jews in the village and nearby Rochester to build a synagogue called the Chatham Cottage Jews' Tabernacle.[6] It was a small wooden building with Hebrew lettering on its face and a clock visible from several streets away.

Chatham's Jews were third on Charles Dickens' list of what was "principally remarkable" about that seaport town. First and second were its soldiers and sailors.[7] Dickens was exaggerating about Chatham's Jews. When Dickens lived in Chatham between 1817 and 1822, there were only about 60 Jewish families in the town and surroundings among the city's estimated 15,000 dock workers, seamen, and marines.

Most of Chatham's Jews are "the humbler sort," a visitor commented. Their main means of earning a living was dealing in "civil habiliments shed by the recruits when they assume the military or naval uniform."[8]

The "richer sort" of Jews in Chatham and the nation's other seaport towns were the butchers, apothecaries, tobacconists, dentists, chiropodists, silversmiths, watchmakers, pawnbrokers, and shopkeepers who bankrolled itinerant peddlers.

With no known skills, Jan eked out a living as a peddler. If he had some money, he would have bought wares from a local businessman to sell on the street or in the countryside. If he didn't have enough to get started, he would have asked a Jewish merchant for start-up funds or merchandise. In many instances, merchants in smaller Jewish communities who had unmarried daughters loaned peddlers money or goods interest free. Those loans often resulted in marriages through which the peddler became a salesman or partner in the family business.

In 1818, when he was 21, Jan, now calling himself Jonathan, married a local girl, Amelia Cohen. Amelia was the only daughter of Eliezer Cohen, the Hazzan (cantor) for Chatham's Jewish community.[9] A year later, in 1819, Amelia gave birth to their first child, a daughter they named Martha. A second daughter, Francesca, "Fanny," was born in 1820. Two years later, in 1822, Rebecca was born. Jonathan and Amelia's eldest son, the boy who would later become Lincoln's Jewish doctor, was born in 1825, and named Issachar Zachariah, Jr. They named their next two children, both daughters, Amelia Lavinia and Jane.

Seemingly inconsequential, Jonathan's and Amelia's naming their son Issachar, Jr., and one of their daughters Amelia, the same name as her mother, implies that either Jan, Amelia, or both may have been of Sephardic heritage. Sephardic Jews are the descendants of Jews banished from Spain and Portugal in 1492 and 1495, respectively. Sephardic Jews consider it a great honor to have a baby named after a father, mother, or other family member.

Until recently, Ashkenazi Jews, who hailed from Russia, and Central and Western Europe, rarely named a child after a living relative. This is because a longstanding superstition among the Ashkenazi is that if a child has the same name as a living relative, the Angel of Death might get confused. When the time came for him to take the older relative, he might mistakenly take the life of the baby with the same name. It is customary, on the other hand, to name a child after a recently deceased relative as a way of keeping his or her memory alive.[10]

Eight days after Issachar was born, he was circumcised in accordance with an age-old Jewish practice and given his name, Issachar, Jr. In Sephardic tradition, it is customary to name sons after grandparents in a prescribed order. Firstborn sons are named after a paternal grandfather (Jonathan's father); second sons are named after a maternal grandfather. Jonathan and Amelia named their second son, born later in America, Eleazar after Amelia's father. Issachar used the "Jr." and "Jun." suffix in his name until 1843, when he dropped it and changed his surname from

Zachariah to Zacharie.[11]

Coming from Poland, Jonathan should have been Ashkenazi. But not all Polish Jews were Ashkenazi. During the 16th century, a small enclave of Sephardic Jews came to Poland from Italy, where they had relocated after being banished from Spain and Portugal in the late 15th century. A small remnant of these Sephardic Jews, known only by their surnames,[12] continued to live in and around Lublin for many generations[13] The best known of these Sephardic descendants is the Yiddish novelist Isaac Leib Peretz (1852–1915) (originally "Perez"). Issachar's mother's maiden name, Cohen, is both Ashkenazi and Sephardic.[14]

By the time Issachar was born, his father was doing well enough to afford becoming one of the lessees for Chatham's Cottage Jews' Tabernacle.[15] Jonathan's name on the lease was "Jonathan Zacharia of Chatham, salesman."[16] A "salesman," in mid–19th century England, was a storeowner, not a clerk.[17] Attaching the name of a town to his name was a sign Jonathan Zachariah was a respectable member of his community.[18] The other leasees were two other "salesmen," five shopkeepers, five "slop sellers," three stockbrokers, a tobacconist, an apothecary, and a butcher.[19]

* * * * * * * *

In June or July 1832, Jonathan and Amelia Zachariah and their six children, Martha, 13, Fanny, 12, Rebecca, 10, Issachar, 7, Amelia Lavinia, 4, and one-year-old Jane, boarded a coach to London, where they boarded a ship headed to the United States.[20]

The Zachariahs were just another family, among the thousands of immigrants from Britain, Ireland, Germany, and other areas of Central Europe, who left their homes for America in the 1830s and 1840s, to escape an economic depression that had the Continent and England in a -tight-fisted grip.[21] Chatham had been especially hard hit. Budget tightening forced the Navy Board to reduce dockyard expenditures. Shipbuilding was put on hold. Dock workers were laid off. By the early 1830s, Chatham's workforce was half what it had been before the Napoleonic wars.[22] The Zachariahs may also have left to escape a cholera outbreak that Chatham experienced, along with much of England. "We have witnessed in our days the birth of a new pestilence," a contemporary magazine agonized, "which in the short space of fourteen years has desolated the fairest portions of the globe, and swept off at least fifty million of our race."[23]

* * * * * * * *

Issachar's father had known how heart-rendering it was to leave his home. It took a lot of courage to say goodbye to family, friends, and a country he had grown up in. No matter how dismal a future it might have been at home, England was a country of strangers. He had had to learn a new language, find a place to live, and make a living. Now he once again was starting over. This time he had a family to provide for.

Had Issachar's father not had the money to pay for his family, he would have left on his own and sent for Amelia and his children when he could pay for their passage. It was not unusual for a family to be separated for several years until a father or brother saved enough to bring them to America. The possibility of his going it alone must have been discussed. Perhaps Amelia did not want to wait and have to live with and burden her parents, despite the possibility they might succumb to cholera on the ship.

Jonathan had an inkling of what to expect in emigrating to a new country. For Amelia, it was the first time she was leaving home and family. Like many of those sailing to America, she undoubtedly was fearful, not just of what awaited her across the Atlantic, but of the long dangerous voyage across the sea. Issachar and his sisters were probably excited about the new adventure, but they must have been apprehensive as well about going to a foreign country where they had no friends. When it came time to leave, there were the final tearful goodbyes with family and friends.

There were practical things to consider once Jonathan and Amelia decided to leave. Jonathan had to sell his business. It was a buyer's market. He had to take whatever offer came his way. Amelia had to decide what belongings to take. Space aboard ship was limited. Besides clothes, bedding, and utensils for cooking on board, they had to decide what items reminded the family of home. Immigrants were advised to mark all their luggage clearly with their names. It was not unusual for sailors or passengers to "mistake" another passenger's belongings for their own. One guide to prospective immigrants advised packing as little as possible. "Hard cash is the only substance worth bringing."[24]

Immigrant guides and government pamphlets all recommended making the Atlantic crossing in early spring. Crossing in late fall or winter was treacherous. Arriving in spring or summer gave immigrants time to get settled without having to make hasty decisions. The most reliable crossing was by packet ships because they departed from port on a regular schedule, an innovation at that time. The Hendrick Hudson, the ship the Zachariahs sailed on,[25] left London for America three times a year.[26]

Packet ships were tubby-looking. They averaged about 170 feet in length and about 35 feet in width and displaced about 750 tons. The ships were called "packets" because when ships in the 16th century first began carrying mail, it was called "packettes."

The Atlantic crossing was not cheap. The Hudson's first-class cabins, located under the upper deck were the most comfortable of the accommodations, came with a mattress, linens, wash basin, and some drawers. They were also the most expensive at £12 to £20 (about $1700 to $2850 in 2020 dollars) per person.[27] Even so, first-class cabins were not sole accommodations. In some cabins, four to 12 passengers shared the room, two to a bunk. Second-class cabins, situated on the same level but behind the first, were lightly furnished. Steerage passengers in the decks below made do as best they could with little more than cots.

Steerage passage (so-called because ships were once steered from that part of a ship), also called "emigrant class," cost £4 to £5 for adults (the modern equivalent of about $700) and half that for children under 14.[28] (Steerage aboard the Titanic, 80 years later, was about $700 for adults and $300 for children.) For the Zachariah family of seven, the cost of steerage on the Hudson would have been the equivalent today of more than $3,000.

Like everyone else, within hours of leaving England, the Zachariahs were seasick. Huddled on the lower decks, many passengers couldn't hold their stomachs and retched on the floor before they could reach slop buckets. Some managed to get to the upper deck to vomit over the side of the ship. Some passengers became so weak they couldn't walk without help. In violent gales, typically occurring at least once during a transatlantic crossing, hatches were fastened down to prevent the interior from flooding. The heat and lack of air made seasickness even worse. After a while, the Zachariahs and other passengers no longer cared about the nauseating odor. By the end of the 40-day plus voyage, the stench was overwhelming. A standing joke was that immigrant ships could be recognized by their smell.[29] Until the mid–1800s, as many as 20 percent of the passengers died on board the "coffin ships" from typhus and cholera. Sometimes, entire families were wiped out and their bodies were summarily cast overboard.

When the Hendrick Hudson docked in New York on August 24, 1832, the captain handed his passenger list to the port authorities to comply with the American immigration act of 1819. The law required ship captains to record and submit passengers' names, ages, occupations, country of last residence, name of ship, port of embarkation, and date of arrival.[30] Jonathan listed his occupation on the manifest list as "mechanic."[31] In the 19th century, a "mechanic" was a tradesman or general workman.[32] Issachar's birth year on the manifest was 1825.[33] He was seven years old.

* * * * * * * *

So many people immigrated from England to New York during the 1830s that enterprising authors wrote manuals for them to find their way once they landed. When a man is determined to leave England for the United States, Charles Knight wrote in the preface to his manual, The British Mechanic's and Labourer's Handbook, and True Guide to the United States, "he does so in most cases from a wish to better his circumstances…. He fancies he possesses, to use a familiar phrase, a new and improved mode of 'sucking the egg.'" "It would not be all 'beer and skittles,'" Knight cautioned, using another familiar English phrase that meant a good time. "If he should happen to be a little too sanguine in this respect," the newcomer stood "a very fair chance of being most egregiously disappointed."[34]

Knight advised passengers not to be in a hurry to remove their baggage from the docking area once they cleared customs. Under no circumstances, he cautioned, should they "accept the aid of those who swarm about and press their services" upon new arrivals. "Too frequently here, as in the steamboats of the interior, this class of persons are much more ready to help themselves than the stranger."[35]

The Zachariahs had no relatives in New York to meet or help them among its quarter of a million inhabitants. If New York had been their destination, they didn't stay long. Shortly after landing, the Zachariahs boarded a train to Philadelphia. The 90-mile trip cost $3.00 for each family member.[36]

ABL LOC Abraham Lincoln Papers at the Library of Congress. The papers are online at https://memory.loc.gov/ammem/malquery.html.
AJA American Jewish Archives
CW Collected Works of Abraham Lincoln
LOC Library of Congress
NA National Archives
OR. Official Records of the War of the Rebellion
PSUG. Papers of Ulysses S. Grant
RRL Rush Rhees Library, University of Rochester

1. Joan Ryan, Women Naval Dockyard Workers in Two 19th Century Dockyard Towns: Chatham and Plymouth (M. Ph., University of Greenwich, 2011), 24.
2. Robert George Hobbes, Civil Service in Sheerness and Chatham Dockyards. Home and Foreign Travel (London: Elliot Stock, 1895), 103. (Although published in 1895, the chapters on Chatham are dated much earlier in 1848.)
3. U.S. Census, 1850.
4. Haumann, Heiko, A History of East European Jews (New York: Central European University Press, 1990), 71, 94–95; Thomas Nickol and Curt Gerhard Lorber, "Germany between 1780 and 1810," in Christine Hillam (ed.), Dental Practice in Europe at the End of the 18th Century (Amsterdam: Rodopi B. V., 2003), 367).
5. Lucien Wolf, "The Origins of Provincial Anglo-Jewry," in Aubrey Newman (ed.) Provincial Jewry in Victorian Britain (London, 1975), https://www.jewishgen.org/jcr-uk/Provincial_Jewry_Victorian.htm, accessed January 22, 2018.
6. Medway Archives and Local Studies Center, http://discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk/download/GB1204%20DE%202023; http://discovery.nationalarchives.gov.uk/download/GB1204%20DE%20202; Records of Chatham Memorial Synagogue and the Chatham Hebrew Congregation 1834–1972, Chatham Memorial Synagogue, http://www.jewishgen.org/jcr-uk/Community/ch/history1.htm; accessed May 3, 2015.

7. Charles Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (originally published, 1837; New York: Books, Inc., 1867), 14.

8. R.G. Hobbes, Reminiscences of 70 Years' Life, Travel & Adventure; Military and Civil, Scientific and Literary (London: Elliot Stock, 1893), Vol. II, p. 94; Charles Dickens, The Uncommercial Traveler and Additional Christmas Stories (Boston: Houghton, Good and Co., 1879), 256.

9. The Weekly Gleaner, A Periodical Devoted to Religion, Education, Biblical and Jewish Antiquities, Literature and General News, 1 (January–December 1857), n.p.

10. Michael Shekel, The Jewish Life-cycle Book (Ktav Publishing, 1989). 21; Alisa Leebo, First Person Jewish (Minneapo-lis: University of Minnesota Press, 2008), 66.

11. South Carolina Courier, October 19, 1843, 3.

12. Buried in the hoary pages of the Sangre Judia ("Jewish Blood"), the Spanish Inquisition's records of known conversos, are the surnames Zacarias and Zaccheria, variants of Zachariah. The conversos were Jews who stayed behind and went through the motions of conversion to Christianity, but some secretly practiced their previous religion.

13. Halm F. Ghiuzeli, "The Jewish community of Zamosc," http://www.bh.org.il/jewish-community-zamosc/, accessed September 12, 2015).

14. http://esefarad.com/?p=79424; http://www.sephardicgen.com/names.htm, accessed September 12, 2015.

15. Records of Chatham Memorial Synagogue.

16. Ibid.

17. In October 1831, a Charles Leary was arrested for stealing two jackets, valued at 10 shillings, from Jonathan's store. South Eastern Gazette, October 25, 1831.

18. Frank I. Schecter, "An Unfamiliar Aspect of Anglo-Jewish History," American Jewish Historical Quarterly, 25 (1917), 67.

19. Medway Archives and Local Studies Center.

20. The names and ages of the Zachariahs are taken from passenger lists on their arrival in the United States (Elizabeth P. Bentley, Passenger Arrivals at the Port of New York 1830–1832 (Baltimore: Genealogical Publishing Co., 2000), 1102–1103.

21. Robert Justin Goodman, Political Repression in the 19th Century Europe (London: Routledge Taylor & Francis, 2013), ch. 4.

22. Phillip MacDougall, Chatham Dockyard, 1815–1865. The Industrial Transformation (Surrey, UK: Ashgate Publishing, 2009), xvi.

23. The London and Paris Observer, November 27, 1831, 1. Cholera is an acute diarrheal disease that induces severe dehydration. A death spiral ensues from the loss of minerals in the blood that maintain the body's balance of fluids. Charles E. Rosenberg, The Cholera Years. The United States in 1832, 1849, and 1866 (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987), 2–4.

24. Quoted in Elizabeth Jane Errington, Emigrant Worlds and Transatlantic Communities: Migration to Upper Canada (Montreal, Quebec: McGill-Queen's University Press, 2007), 54.

25. Bentley, Passenger Arrivals, 13–14.

26. Edwin Williams, The New York Annual Register, March 10, July 10, and November 10 (New York: J. Seymour, 1832), 226.

27. Norwich Mercury, March 20, 1830, "Maritime Newspaper Articles, 1830," https://immigrantships.net/newsarticles/1830_newsarticles.html, accessed August 14,2017; https://alookthrutime.wordpress.com/tag/cost-of-third-class-titanic-ticket/, accessed August 14, 2017. A first-class cabin aboard the Titanic cost $50,000 in today's money. https://alookthrutime.wordpress.com/tag/cost-of-third-class-titanic-ticket/, accessed August 14, 2017.

28. Norwich Mercury, March 20, 1830. Steerage aboard the Titanic was about $700 for adults and $300 for children.

29. Tyler Anbinder, City of Dreams. The 400-Year Epic History of Immigrant New York (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Harcourt, 2016), 135.

30. Damon Veach, "N.Y. ship lists transcribed from originals," http://www.nola.com/ancestors/archive/1999/la032199.html, accessed May 20, 2015.

31. Bentley, Passenger Arrivals, 13–14.

32. Jack Lynch, "A Guide to Eighteenth-century English Vocabulary," http://andromeda.rutgers.edu/~jlynch/C18Guide.pdf, accessed December 26, 2015.

33. Bentley, Passenger Arrivals, 13–14. The "Find a Grave Memorial Site" incorrectly gives his birth year as 1827, based on his age of 73 when he died in 1900. The Passenger List and U.S. Census data list it as 1825.

34. Charles Knight, The British Mechanic's and Labourer's Handbook, and True Guide to the United States: With Ample Notices Respecting Various Trades and Professions (London: C. Knight, 1840).

35. Ibid., 20.

36. Gary Gorton, "Ante Bellum Transportation Indices," unpublished article, Wharton School, University of Pennsylvania, August 1989, n.p.

2

“Act according to the custom of that place”

New York, Philadelphia, Newport, Baltimore, Charleston, and Savannah, the earliest North American cities where Jews mainly settled, were port cities. They were also cosmopolitan communities. Unlike Boston, colonial America’s most homogenous city, cosmopolitan cities offered greater economic and social opportunities for immigrants.[1] New Orleans would have been a destination, except that until the 1800s, the authorities discouraged Jews from settling there.[2]

Philadelphia in the 1830s was America’s cultural center, the “Athens of America.” Its port bustled with cargo ships from Europe and South America and with packet liners bringing immigrants from Liverpool and Continental Europe and from other parts of America. Immigrants headed there for a good reason: jobs. Pennsylvania was in the midst of a building frenzy. Hundreds of miles of canal beds and railway lines were created connecting Philadelphia with Pittsburgh, Harrisburg, and other parts of the state and with other eastern cities. There was work for unskilled laborers, and they came in droves. The frontier was constantly spreading westward. It was a perfect place to start an itinerant peddling business or a more permanent shop.

There was another reason Jonathan and Amelia headed for Philadelphia—the Dessaus. Jonathan and the Dessaus were either distantly related or had known each other beforehand. The Dessaus (the surname is variously spelled “Dessan” and “Dessaue” in street directories) were originally from Dessau, a town in Saxony-Anhalt, Germany, the birthplace of Moses Mendelssohn. Jacob H. Dessau and his brother, M. H. Dessau, had emigrated to America in the late 1820s. Jacob owned a dry goods store at 108 Sassafras Street in Philadelphia. The Zachariahs would have a place to stay with the Dessaus until they found a place of their own. Four years later, in 1836, Jonathan and Amelia’s second daughter, Fanny, married Abraham Dessau,[3] a “trader.”[4] Several years later, Jacob Dessau married Issachar’s sister, Amelia Lavinia, the “third daughter of Jonathan Zakeriah Esq.”[5]

* * * * * * * *

After moving in with the Dessaus, Jonathan lost no time “starting a business.” Slinging a pack filled with household goods, sponges, tools, ribbons, combs, pins and needles, inexpensive jewelry, and sundry other wares over his shoulder, he trudged the countryside, leaning on a long stick that he also used to beat off dogs that barked and bit “whenever a Jewish peddler comes.”[6]

Jewish peddlers became known far and wide in farming communities, where they were regarded less as itinerant merchants than as friends bringing things they needed. Usually welcomed by a lonely housewife whose husband and older sons were away in the field, he would show her his wares, and she would invariably buy some trifling “notion” so he would return the next time he was in the area.[7]

Jewish peddlers still clinging to their religion made it a point to reach a Jewish home before the Sabbath. Simon Wolf, a future president of B’nai B’rith, recalled how 20 to 30 Jewish peddlers would start out with packs weighing more than 80 pounds on their backs. After walking 60 to 80 miles, they would return a week later, with a much lighter load “and an adequate return in their pockets."[8] When the money the peddler earned was "adequate" enough, he bought a horse and wagon so that he could carry many more items, including ready-made clothes and heavier items.

By 1850, there were 10,669 peddlers in America. By 1860, they numbered 16,594.[9] The actual numbers were likely much higher since itinerant peddlers were often not counted by census takers. Less than one percent of the peddlers in mid–1800s America were Christian. "Eleven times out of ten the peddler is a Jew," a German writer chuckled.[10]

Shortly after coming to Philadelphia, Jonathan became a member of Mikveh Israel (Hope of Israel). Founded in 1782 by Sephardic Jews, Mikveh Israel was Philadelphia's first Jewish congregation and included some of Philadelphia's most influential Jews, among them the Gratz family. Five of the Gratzs were members of the Philadelphia Club, the oldest and most exclusive men's club in Philadelphia.[11] German-born Isaac Leeser was Mikveh Israel's hazan-minister. Leeser became one of the best known and most influential Jewish leaders during the American Civil War.[12] Several years after Mikveh Israel was founded, in 1795, a group of primarily German and Dutch Ashkenazim founded a second synagogue they called Rodeph Shalom (Pursuit of Peace), making Philadelphia the first city in America with two Jewish congregations and the first to follow the prayers, customs, and rituals of Ashkenazi tradition.[13]

When Jonathan's and Amelia's second son, Eleazar, was born in Philadelphia in March 1834, there was one more mouth to feed. Jonathan had joined Mikveh Israel when he first came to Philadelphia, but its dues were beyond what he could afford. Jonathan resigned from Mikveh Israel and joined Rodeph Shalom, which assessed minimal annual dues of $4. In cases of hardship, it exempted them.[14] Jonathon became a founder of its charitable Hebrew Society that provided relief for the poor and the sick. Although a founder, Jonathan could not afford the $50 joining membership that exempted members from all further contributions and all fines "except fines for improper conduct at a meeting." Founding member Jonathan Zachariah wasn't able to come up with enough for the exemption.[15] He was bankrupt.[16]

The Zachariahs would have been in dire straits had it not been for the Dessaus. With money she borrowed from them, Amelia opened a millinery store on Cedar Street (now South Street), the downtown avenue of Philadelphia's retail trade, selling straw bonnets, ribbons, and caps.[17] Amelia had a head for business. A year later, she relocated to Sassafras,[18] the same street Jacob Dessau's shop was on.[19]

* * * * * * * *

Nothing is known about Issachar's childhood in Philadelphia, except by inference. At 13, Jewish boys were accepted as adults in their religious community. They were expected to be able to read or at least pronounce Hebrew words. In a rite of passage, they were called to the synagogue bema on their birthday or the Sabbath closest to it and read a portion of the Torah before the congregation. After that, they were obliged to obey all the commandments of Jewish law and could be counted as one of the 10 adult men required for a minyan necessary for communal prayers. There was no equivalent of the modern-day bar mitzvah, the Jewish rite of passage. Issachar never mentioned having participated in this rite of passage or his ever being able to read Hebrew.

Many years later, Issachar married Mary Ann Lawson, a Christian girl from Philadelphia. How his and Mary Ann's romance began isn't known. Since they lived in the same neighborhood—Issachar's mother's clothing goods shop was on Cedar Street, which intersected with Green Street, where the Lawsons lived[20]—they may have met at one of Philadelphia's "free schools." Other than Mary Ann, there is no record of Issachar's involvement with any other woman before or after they were married.

In 1840, for some unknown reason, the Zachariahs were on the move again. They packed their belongings, 15-year-old Issachar said goodbye to 12-year-old Mary Ann and his other friends and neighbors, and he boarded a train with his family for the 680-mile trip to Charleston, South Carolina.

* * * * * * * *

By the mid–1700s, Charles Towne was the busiest seaport on the Atlantic and the largest and wealthiest city in the South. Ships from all parts of Europe docked at its harbor, unloaded their goods, and loaded their cargoes of indigo dye for England's navy uniforms, along with rice, deerskins, and tobacco for all parts of the world. Although the South had been growing cotton since colonial days, relatively small amounts were exported in the mid–1700s.

That arguably changed after France's Queen, Marie Antoinette, posed for her portrait in a provincial cotton dress. Women of her stature normally wore lavish silk gowns at court. Like the millions of men and women who adopt the fashions worn by movie stars today, fashionable women of her day wanted to dress like the exotic French Queen. Demand for cotton soared throughout Europe. Voracity for cotton increased even more after the French Revolution, when economies across Europe plunged and the zeal for more costly silk collapsed. By the end of the century, cotton and muslin had nearly completely replaced silk as the fashionable fabric of choice.[21]

Up until then, most of Europe's cotton had come from India, but when India could not keep up with demand, Europeans began looking elsewhere. Eli Whitney's invention of the cotton gin in 1794 made it possible to keep up with demand. The Industrial Revolution alchemized it into textiles on a massive scale. In 1790, the American South exported 3,000 bales a year. By 1810, exports amounted to 178,000 bales.

Following the American Revolution, most Northern states outlawed slavery (Delaware was a notable exception). It seemed the South would follow. When cotton became an important cash crop, the insatiable demand for it created a surge in demand for slave labor in the South. In 1790, the slave population numbered about 654,000. By 1810, it was 1.1 million. Marie Antoinette's dress had launched an unimaginable "butterfly effect."[22]

After cotton became "king," it took over as South Carolina's main staple. Fortunes were made almost overnight. For $5,000 to $6,000, which included wages for an overseer and food and clothing for slaves, a cotton crop could fetch more than $40,000.[23] Jewish merchants who catered to rich plantation owners or were owners themselves likewise became wealthy.

Relatively few manual laborers went south to work. Because of the South's large slave force, wages in the south for mechanics, carpenters, blacksmiths, construction workers, and other manual laborers were lower than in other parts of the country. Where others saw unemployment, Jewish merchants saw opportunity. Some remained in Charleston, some went up country and opened stores in surrounding districts, and some ventured further into the backcountry. Eventually, there was at least one Jewish shop in every town in South Carolina that sold clothing, hardware, groceries, notions, trinkets, cigars, and any other marketable goods.

Jonathan's profession is not known. Possibly he peddled clothes and trinkets in the country side while Amelia operated a woman's clothing store at 147 King Street between Queen and Clifford streets.[24] King Street today is a long, pedestrian-clogged hodge-podge of bars, restaurants, souvenir shops, jewelers, antique dealers, a library, and Charleston's preservation society. Original store fronts from the 1840s and 1850s have been torn down or renovated. Across the street from the bygone Zachariah store is a three-story building, one of the few buildings from that time that is still standing. The salesgirl selling jewelry inside did not know how old it was, but it looked very much like it could have been built in Issachar's time.

Amelia was an astute businesswoman. An advertisement in the 1849 Charleston Courier informed the city's women that Mrs. Zachariah was adding a second branch to her business at 147 King, succeeding Mrs. Rayne: "She hopes by strict attention and economy in her charges, to deserve the patronage of the friends of her predecessor." In addition to "French corsets, shoulder braces, girdles or Zohans," Amelia advertised "cleaning, dying and altering straw hats."[25]

Like Amelia, many of the store owners on King Street were women. Miss Ellen M. Cambridge had a millinery next door to Amelia at 146 King, where she exhibited "a select and most fashionable display" of straw bonnets and accessories, "all of which have been purchased with cash, from extensive importers of the latest and most fashionable style of goods in N. York." Madame Figeroux sold silk and spring bonnets and some of the finest "Artificial French Flowers" at 188 King. Further down the street at 253 and 304 King were Mrs. F. Day's and W. Hancock's dry goods stores. A Miss Babcock sold bonnets of "Chameleon and Drab Velvets and silks" at 322 King Street.[26]

Rebecca De Mendes Benjamin, whose son Judah became one of only two Jews to be elected to Congress before the war and who later become Secretary of State for the Confederacy, owned a fruit store on King Street near the docks.[27] Judah was no longer living in Charleston when Issachar was growing up there. Although they would not have known one another then, fate brought them together many years later. Their parents, on the other hand, were probably acquainted.

The Benjamins drew the ire of Charleston's traditionalist Jewish community because Rebecca kept her store open on Shabbos, the Jewish Sabbath on Saturdays. Traditionalists expected the Sabbath should be strictly observed. Since storekeepers were not allowed to operate on Sundays, the Christian Sabbath, closing her store on Saturdays would have meant two days without income, a financial burden for a family struggling to make ends meet. In 1845, Judah's brother Solomon was charged with violating Charleston's 1801 ordinance by selling a pair of gloves on Sunday. He was fined $20.[28]

Women like Amelia and Rebecca Benjamin were often the family's main income earners or took over the family business from their husbands when it fell on hard times. Amelia's daughters probably helped out in her stores, but young Issachar was out of place in a business catering to women and was more likely to have been on his own, wandering about Charleston's streets. It was a vibrant city, with craftsmen going about their work and markets bustling with wagons filled with oranges from Florida, pineapples from Cuba, and vegetables from local farms.

Charleston was also a major center for the slave trade. By the 1850s, there were 32 active slave brokerages in the city.[29] Wandering through the streets, Issachar probably saw black men, women, and children in chains being sold at auction houses throughout the city. But Issachar didn't have to wander the streets to become familiar with slavery. His family owned two house slaves, Harriet Segars, age 60, and Charlotte Bright, age 40.[30]

Except for their religion, Jews were no different from non-Jews in the South in nearly every respect. Charleston's Jews did not question the Talmudic principle that "the law of the land is the law."[31] The principle was inherent in the Sephardic precept, "Every place you go, act according to the custom of that place."[32]

Acceptance and assimilation meant conformity to the South's "peculiar institution." If Jews needed to own slaves and could afford them, they bought them.[33] Since most Jews lived in cities and towns, most of the slaves they owned were domestic servants. Judah Benjamin's parents owned several house slaves. As a successful Louisiana lawyer and plantation owner, he himself owned 140 slaves.[34]

By 1830, 83 percent of the Jewish households in Charleston owned at least one slave, slightly less than the percentage owned by gentile households[35]; by mid-century, there were 5.5 slaves per Jewish household.[36] Charleston's free African Americans, by comparison, owned three times more slaves than Charleston's Jews.[37]

In 1850, Amelia and Jonathan were living in St. Michael's and St. Philip's parish, around Broad and Meeting streets.[38] All of Issachar's sisters were married by then and had left home.[39] Issachar's niece, his sister Rebecca's 12-year-old daughter, also named Rebecca, was living with Jonathan and Amelia instead of her own parents for some unknown reason. Besides Issachar's family and Harriet Segars and Charlotte Bright, and their two household slaves, there were seven others in their home: Lewis and Anne Loyal and their two children, ages 1 and 3, and Frances Martin and his two sons, Jacob, 21, and James, 20.[40] Nothing is known as to whether the Loyals and the Martins were distant relatives or boarders. Lewis Loyal was born in France; his wife, Anne, was born in South Carolina. The Martins were all born in South Carolina.[41]

---

1. Jonathan D. Sarna, "Port Jews in the Atlantic: Further Thoughts," Jewish History, 20 (2006), 214, 213–219.
2. Irwin Lachoff and Catherine C. Kahn, The Jewish Community of New Orleans (Charleston, SC: Arcadia, 2005), 1.
3. Daily Pennsylvanian, August 24, 1836, 2.
4. M'Elroy's Philadelphia Directory, for 1839 (Philadelphia: A. M'Elroy, 1839), 62.
5. Charleston Courier, December 23, 1843, 2.
6. Rudolf Glanz, Studies in Judaic Americana (New York: Ktav Publishing House, 1970), 63.
7. Quoted in Ester L. Panitz, Simon Wolf (Cranbury, NJ: Associated University Press, 1987), 19.
8. Glanz, Studies, 104–121.
9. U.S. Census, 1850, 1860.
10. Glanz, Studies, 56.
11. E. Digby Baltzell, Philadelphia Gentlemen (New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 2004), 279.
12. Leeser organized Philadelphia's first Jewish parochial school at Mikveh Israel and edited The Occident and American Jewish Advocate, the first Jewish monthly periodical in America, and the American Jewish Publication Society. He was also one of the founders of America's first rabbinical college and the Board of Delegates of American Israelites, the first association of Jewish congregations. Lance J. Sussman, Isaac Leeser and the Making of American Judaism (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1995; Korn, American Jewry, 6–7.
13. The split was inevitable. Sephardic prayers and rituals were different from the Ashkenazis' synagogue prayers and rituals. Sephardim pronounced Hebrew differently and chanted different melodies. Rodeph Shalom was the first of many splinterings within American Jewish communities. Henry Berkowitz, "Notes on the History of the Earliest German Jewish Congregation in America," Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, 9 (1901), 125.
14. Edwin Wolf and Maxwell Whiteman, The History of the Jews of Philadelphia (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1975), 234. To encourage members to attend Friday night and Saturday morning services and remain until the end of services, Rodeph Shalom imposed a fine of 25 cents for missing services; the only excuse was if a member were out of town or ill. Members leaving services early were also fined 25 cents (Berkowitz, "Notes," 126).
15. Wolf and Whiteman, History of Jews, 234.
16. Daily Pennsylvanian, April 11, 1837, 1.
17. A. M'Elroy's Philadelphia Directory, for 1839 (Philadelphia: A. M'Elroy, 1839), 284. Cedar/South Street became the core Jewish neighborhood in the 1880s, when it became known as "the great Street for Polish Jews and huckstering of every variety." Harry Bonin, "The Jewish Quarter of Philadelphia," https://www.phillyhistory.org/blog/index.php/2008/03/the-jewish-quarter-of-philadelphia/.
18. A. M'Elroy's Philadelphia Directory, for 1840 (Philadelphia: A. M'Elroy, 1840), 283.

19. M’Elroy’s Philadelphia Directory, for 1839, 62.
20. M’Elroys Philadelphia Directory, 1840, 142.
21. Caroline London, “The Marie Antoin-ette Dress that Ignited the Slave Trade,” https://www.racked.com/2018/1/10/16854076/ma rie-antoinette-dress-slave-trade-chemise-a-la-reine, accessed February 10, 2018.
22. Ibid.
23. Thomas W. Knox, Camp-Fire and Cotton-Field (New York: Blelock and Co., 1865), 380.
24. James William Hagy, Directories for the City of Charleston, South Carolina for the Years, 1849, 1852, and 1855 (reprint, Baltimore, MD: Genealogical Publishing Co., 1998), 47. There are no city directories for Charleston for 1840 to 1848.
25. Charleston Courier, October 17, 1849, 3.
26. Charleston Courier, January 19, 1843; October 19, 1843, 3; October 21, 1843, 3; April 15, 1844, 3; October 16, 1849, 3.
27. Reznikoff, Jews of Charleston (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1950), 71.
28. City Council of Charleston vs. Sa. A. Benjamin, March, 1847; http://www.jewish-history.com/occident/volume4/mar1847/sunday.html, accessed July 7, 2018. The constitutionality of the ban was challenged in 1848, in the Court of Errors in Charleston and upheld. The full text is available at http://www.jewish-history.com/occident/volume5/mar1848/sunday.html.
29. Stephanie E. Yuhl, “Hidden in Plain Sight: Centering the Domestic Slave Trade in American History,” Journal of Southern History, 79 (August 2013), 597.
30. U.S. Census, 1850.
31. Quoted by Jason H. Silverman, “The Law of the Land Is the Law,” in Jack Salzman and Cornel West (eds.), Struggles in the Promised Land (New York: Oxford University Press, 1997), 81
32. Rosengarten and Rosengarten, A Portion of the People (Columbia, SC: University of South Carolina Press, 1002), 63.
33. Bertram W. Korn, Jews and Negro Slavery in the Old South, 1789–1865 (Elk-ins Park, PA: 1961), 26. Issachar rarely expressed any views about slavery, but on the one occasion he did, it was derogatory. Letter of Zacharie to General Nathaniel Banks, January 25, 1863, Nathaniel P. Banks papers, LOC (henceforth Banks Papers), Box 79.
34. Silverman, “The Law of the Land,” 73.
35. James William Hagy, This Happy Land: The Jews of Colonial and Antebellum Charleston (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1993), 91.
36. Ibid. 93.
37. Rosen, Jewish Confederates, 16, 382, n23.
38. U.S. Census 1850. The parish was the local government unit. The two separate parishes were combined for voting purposes.
39. Rebecca married Abraham Dessau, a “trader,” in 1836 in Philadelphia; Amelia Lavenia married Jacob H. Dessau, a “dry goods” merchant, in Charleston in 1843 (Elzas, Jewish Marriage Notices, 21); and Jane married Abraham Backer in 1848 and was living in Columbus, Georgia (Charleston Courier, March 13, 1848, 2).
40. U.S. Census 1850.
41. Although listed in the 1850 census, they are not listed in Hagy’s Happy Land appendix of Charleston’s Jews (277–414).

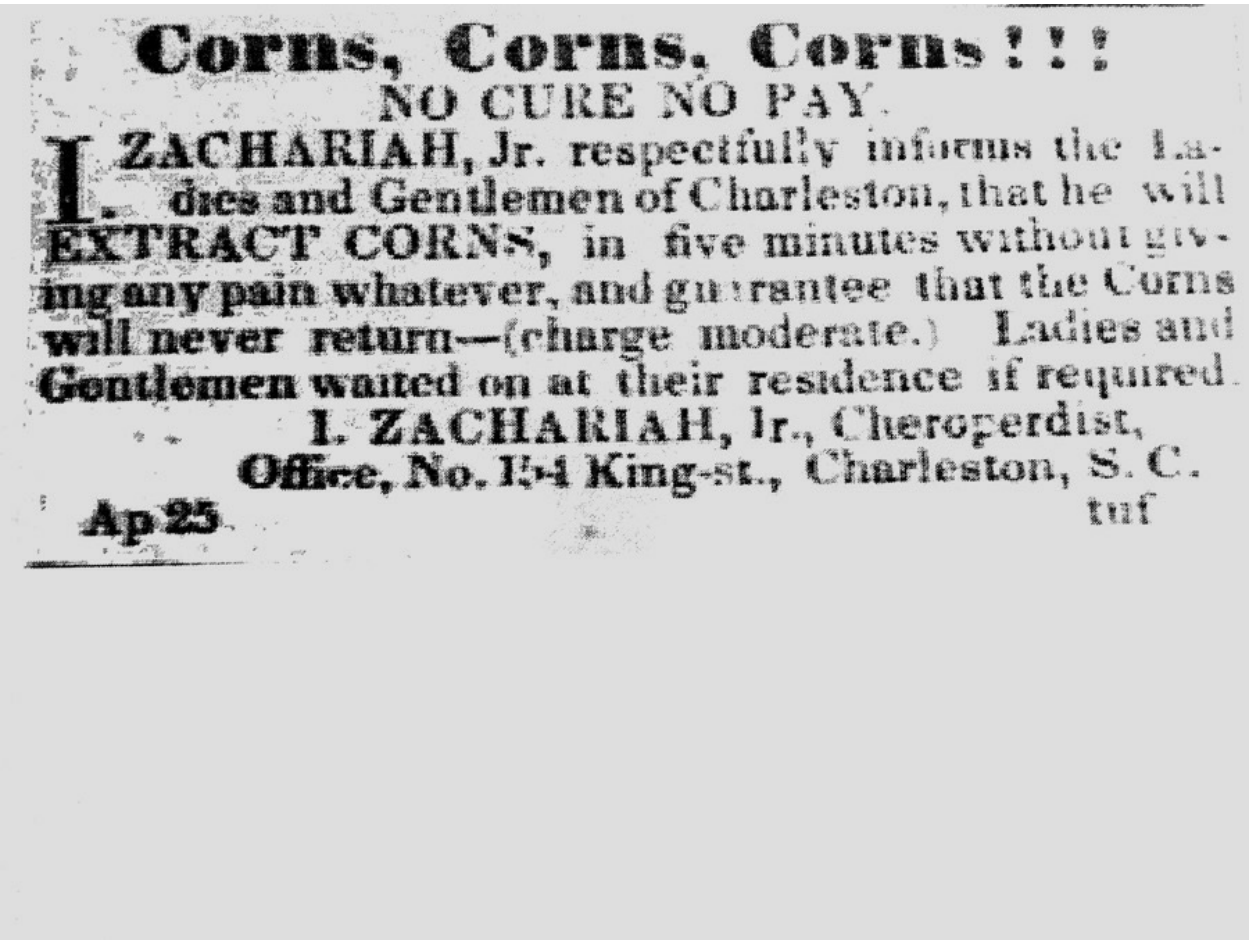
PART TWO

I. Zachariah, Jr., Cheroperdist

3

“No Cure No Pay”

In April 1843, 16-year-old Issachar Zachariah, Jr., placed an advertisement in the Charleston Southern Patriot, “respectfully” informing “the Ladies and Gentlemen of Charleston” that he “will EXTRACT CORNS at his office at No. 154 King St., in five minutes without giving any pain whatever and guarantees the Corns will never return.” The ad stated he was only charging a “‘moderate’ fee,” for his services, and guaranteed “NO CURE NO PAY.” It was signed I. Zachariah, Jr. Cheroperdist.[1] Besides cutting corns, he was also selling patent medicines and perfumes at his King Street store.[2]



Corns, Corns, Corns!!!

NO CURE NO PAY.

I. ZACHARIAH, Jr. respectfully informs the Ladies and Gentlemen of Charleston, that he will EXTRACT CORNS, in five minutes without giving any pain whatever, and guarantee that the Corns will never return—(charge moderate.) Ladies and Gentlemen waited on at their residence if required.

I. ZACHARIAH, Jr., Cheroperdist,
Office, No. 154 King-st., Charleston, S. C.

Ap 25 tuf

One of Zacharie’s early advertisements, using his birth name (Charleston Southern Patriot, 1843).

Issachar’s advertising himself as a chiropodist, or as he termed it, a “cheroperdist,” came out of nowhere. There is nothing to indicate how he learned how to treat corns and bunions or why he even went into that line of work instead of the family dry goods business.

* * * * * * * *

Corns, bunions, and ingrown toenails seem rather trivial problems compared with our present-day anxieties and dread about cancer, heart disease, and other ailments. But in mid-nineteenth-century America, people rarely talked about those diseases. Instead, they were much more concerned about annoyances that made everyday life painful in one way or another. High up on the list of distressing irritations were corns and bunions. Newspapers were full of commentaries about the effects of these "excrescences." Many people would have agreed with the New London Connecticut Daily Chronicle's comment, "Corns have produced more bad tempers and caused more swearing than any other grievance that flesh is heir to."[3]

Corns and bunions made it painful to walk. For women, it was not just painful, it was embarrassing if their corns and bunions became public. Chiropodists, as podiatrists were then known,[4] advertised their willingness to treat women in their homes to avoid public embarrassment. Some chiropodists provided separate entrances at their offices for women desiring priv-acy.[5] It was not an idle whim.

In Paris, a ladies' shoemaker blackmailed his female patients by threatening to reveal details about their feet. He sent them a proof copy of a memoir he was writing about his patients. For 15 francs, he promised to leave their names out of it. One of the entries described a "Madame A ___lives Rue___, No___first floor; married in 1844; three children, pays badly; feet very difficult to fit, instep too flat, two corns and three bunions; walks awkwardly, and wears her shoes out in the inside very fast."

The blackmailer characterized a "Madame B___Rue___, No.__" as "still an old maid … pays her bills, but makes a hard bargain; feet spreading, toes crowding one over the other; two corns and a bunion." Madame C "gives her children nothing, and never pays until served with a writ; feet flat, large, and very apt to burst the leathers; a great many corns and bunions, all mixed up together."

When several of the women he was blackmailing complained to the police about the "literary shoemaker," he was arrested and sent to jail for a month.[6]

* * * * * * * *

People have been hacking corns and calluses from their feet with coarse tools or sharpened instruments on their own or enlisting the help of someone else for the task from the time such tools were invented. As far back as the ancient Egyptians, specially trained professionals took care of foot problems. Hippocrates, the "father" of medicine, mentions removing hardened skin on the feet and invented a scraping tool for just that purpose.[7]

After a 12th-century Papal decree, forbidding clerics from treating foot problems that might cause bleeding, barber surgeons and others took over the trade. An early 17th-century play has one of the characters at a fairground, selling herrings, oysters, pies, and tarts and offering to sharpen knives to "very nicely cut your corns."[8] Corns became much more of a problem during the 17th century, when people began wearing closed-toed leather boots and shoes. Kings and queens who luxuriated in the palaces of Europe experienced the same discomfort as farmers who toiled behind a plough.

The term "chiropody" came into existence in 1785, when a London corn cutter, David Low, wrote a textbook on foot care. Low plagiarized much of his book from an earlier French text, L'Art de Soigner les Pieds, written in 1781 by King Louis XVI's corn cutter. To create the impression of originality, Low changed the title to Chiropodologia, combing the Greek word chiro, meaning hand, and the Latin word pod, for foot. Chiropodologia eventually became

chiropody.[9]

Most medically trained doctors in the 18th and 19th centuries considered treating foot problems literally and figuratively beneath them. Medicine's snobbery left it to barber surgeons and corn cutters to take care of corns, bunions, and related foot problems. Heyman Lion was awarded a doctor of medicine degree from the University of Edinburgh in 1796, and passed his exams with high honors, but the College of Physicians and Surgeons in London denied his application for a diploma. Lion said he intended to specialize in treating foot ailments. The college stated its denial was to maintain the dignity and high standard of the profession. A doctor of medicine, the college said, should not be involved in a degrading business like "corn-cutting."[10]

Despite physicians' low opinion of foot healers, people suffering from painful corns were more than willing to pay to have their annoying foot growths removed. By the 18th century, cutting corns or "corn operating," as practitioners preferred to call what they did, had become a burgeoning profession. Some chiropodists even became very respectable and influential. In 1774, a Mr. March, a prominent London corn cutter, was appointed nail cutter to His Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales, at an annual salary of 50 guineas (about $6,000).[11] After word got out that the Prince of Wales had his own personal "corn operator," aristocrats and anyone else with money had no qualms about employing chiropodists to remove their corns.

By the mid–18th century, corn cutters were such a common fixture in English society that they were featured in popular illustrations. One such picture shows an elegantly dressed corn operator wearing a wig and spectacles and standing before an array of surgical instruments. The fact that he was worth depicting indicates the profession had gained respectable traction.[12] Napoleon Bonaparte's constant companion and confidant, Monsieur Sagrada, was the emperor's personal "corn operator"[13] Napoleon's nemesis, the Duke of Wellington, had no liking for corn cutters. The Duke sued a London corn cutter for claiming in the press that he had cut Wellington's corns.[14]

Since foot care, and especially removing corns, was not a recognized profession, there was no formal apprenticeship for that line of work. In most cases, individuals learned whatever there was to know from someone in their family who trained them. Fathers taught their sons, who in turn taught their sons. Every city had at least one corn cutter.

Prevented from attending Europe's medical schools, many Jews became proficient at treating foot problems, a skill credentialed physicians regarded as undignified. By the 18th century, Jewish barber surgeons and bloodletters in Europe and England were considered specialists in the profession.[15] "Surgeon-chiropodist" Lewis Durlacher (1792–1864), the most famous chiropodist of his day, treated the foot ailments of three British monarchs, George IV, William IV, and Queen Victoria.

Durlacher was taught chiropody by his father, Solomon Durlacher, "Dr., Surgeon, Dentist and Corn Operator." Solomon took his last name from the town of Durlach in Germany when Jews were made to take surnames. He came to England in the 1780s, settled in Birmingham, and married Betsy Harris. The couple later relocated to Bath, where he taught the skill to both his son and his wife Betsy, corn cutter "for the ladies."[16] Jewish "Surgeon-chiropodist" John Eisenberg, an Austrian émigré to England, claimed he had pared the corns from the feet of European nobility, including French Emperor Napoleon III.[17]

* * * * * * * *

Issachar may have decided to become a “cheropedist” after watching itinerant corn cutters who travelled along the Atlantic coast treating patients. Eighteen-year-old Nehemiah Kenison (1824–1891) left home in New Hampshire in 1842 trying to find some kind of work that interested him and found “the very business that I had been hunting and praying for ever since I first left my native town.” Kenison started out as peddler in the rural South. This is how Kenison described his epiphany:

> “What do you suppose I saw upon entering the hotel (in Greenville)? Well, I thought, I have found it at last, and it’s mine. A man by the name of James McMellon was operating on a gentleman’s foot, for the relief of a corn, as I entered the hotel. That would be nothing uncommon now. But it was new to me; and it made a very strong and favorable impression upon me when I saw the doctor receive $5.00 for his fee for only a few minutes’ work. I watched the operation and made up my mind that was the business for me.”

Kenison persuaded McMellon to take him on as an apprentice. In the early part of the century, many of the corn cutters treated corns by digging them out with a scalpel as far down as they dared, until the person being treated howled in pain. McMellon taught Kenison how to remove corns painlessly by first softening them with acid and then carefully shelling them out with a dull bone blade.

A few months later, he returned home to New Hampshire, married his sweetheart, and in 1846, opened an office in Boston where “I soon began to operate, and was a success from the first. I soon bought me a horse and travelled in a number of different Southern States for twenty-two months.”[18]

Issachar’s “James McMellon” was Dr. E. Barinds, a German chiropodist who set up a corn-removing office in Charleston in 1840, at 97 King Street, several stores down from Issachar’s parents’ dry goods store at 147 King St.[19] Barinds’ advertisement assured Charlestonians he “effectually extracts corns” without pain, cures bunions and defective nails “with treatment entirely his own,” and “particularly attended diseases of the teeth.” A curious 15-year-old boy, Issachar watched Barinds extracting corns. Like Kenison, he realized, “there is money in it.”

Many itinerant corn cutters like Barinds also advertised their skills as dentists (until the mid–19th century, both professions were often practiced by the same individual). Barinds offered to “scale teeth to a pearly whiteness, and arrest carious Teeth from further decay.” If a client suffered from rheumatism, Barinds sold a “European Liniment which has never been known to fail.”[20] When Barinds wasn’t cutting corns or pulling teeth, he sold homemade remedies to treat conditions that for “ages baffled the skill of the profession.” With Barinds as his role model, Issachar decided corn cutting had a future for him.

* * * * * * * *

At age 16, I. Zachariah, Jr., went into business for himself as a chiropodist (undoubtedly with the support of his parents) at 154 King Street. Taking a page from Barinds and other chiropodists, he promised, “NO CURE NO PAY.” Clients were also offered “nostrums, salves, lineaments, balms, soaps, plasters, lotions, perfumery” and “a large number of other articles too numerous to mention” at “Thirty Per Cent Cheaper Than Can Be Bought Elsewhere.” In addition to those remedies, he sold his own “Zachariah’s celebrated patent Labor saving preparation for cleaning brass.” Issachar offered potential customers who were used to bartering or buying on credit “a large discount for cash.”[21]

Issachar got the idea to hawk nostrums he claimed to have invented himself from other local businesses in Charleston that were selling eponymously named potions. At 19 Hayne Street, a P. M. Cohen, was doing a thriving business selling “Peter’s Pill,” the “wonderful cures” of which were “the all-engrossing subjects of the day” because of its power to “procrastinate death for years."[22] Further up the street from Issachar's shop, Haviland, Harral & Allen at 286 King Street sold a wide variety of nostrums, including "Sand's Sarsaparilla," "for the removal and permanent cure of all diseases arising from an impure state of the blood" at $1 per bottle, six for $5. If Sands' Sarsaparilla didn't do the job, customers suffering from scrofula, or King's Evil, incipient cancers, syphilitic and mercurial diseases, and a host of other disorders could also try "the Indian Panacea."[23]

Issachar's dual ads ran continuously from April through July. Two months after embarking on his new-found career as a corn cutter, and a month after inventing his patented labor-saving device, he placed a new ad in the Charleston Southern Patriot. In those two months, Issachar had acquired the self-proclaimed medical title "doctor" (in the early 19th century, there was no licensing for practicing medicine—anyone could practice medicine) and invented a new medicine to purify the blood and remove "bilious diseases":

> THE SUMMER HAS COME! and every person that wants to purify their BLOOD now is their chance!—for Dr. I. Zachariah Jr. Has just invented a new preparation for purifying the Blood and removing all Bilious diseases, called Zachariah's Compound Alternative Prepared and sold by the INVENTOR & SOLE PROPRIETOR.[24]

---

1. Charleston Southern Patriot, April 28, 1843, 1.
2. Ibid.
3. New London Connecticut Daily Chronicle, May 12, 1862, 2.
4. "Words" The British Medical Journal, 1 (No. 6166) (March 24, 1979), 814, 1; (No. 1522) (March 1, 1890), 489.
5. Littlefield and Westervelt advertisement, New York Herald, May 6, 1858, 9.
6. Alexandria Gazette, March 6, 1860, 6.
7. John Pearson, "A Brief History of Chiropody and Podiatry," https://johnrpearson.wordpress.com/tag/a-brief-history-of-chiropody-and-podiatry/; Cameron Kippen," A Potted History of Professional Foot Care," http://foottalk.blogspot.com/2008/12/-potted-history-of-podiatry.html, accessed May 25, 2015.
8. Ben Jonson, Bartholomew Fair (1614), quoted by Pearson, "Brief History."
9. Pearson, "Brief History." The full title of Low's book was Chiropodologia, Or a Scientific Enquiry into the Causes of Corns, Warts, Onions and Other Painful or Offensive Cutaneous Excrescences: Confirmed by the Practice and Experience of D. Low.
10. Maurice Marks, "Recent History of Chiropody," in Maurice J. Lewi (ed.), The Text Book of Chiropody (New York: School of Chiropody, 1914), 70.
11. Pearson, "Brief History."
12. Ibid.
13. Kippen, "Potted History."
14. Ibid.
15. Lewi, Text Book, 103.
16. J. Colin Dagnall, "The English Influence on the Beginnings of American Podiatry," in Lisbeth M. Molloway, A Fast Pace Forward (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania College of Podiatric Medicine, 1987), 6–18; Kippen, "Potted History"; Lewis Durlacher's 1845 book, A Treatise on Corns, Bunions, the Diseases of Nails, and the General Management of the Feet (Philadelphia, Lea & Blanchard, 1845) was published within the year in Philadelphia. Malcolm Brown and Judith Samuel, "The Jews of Bath," Jewish Historical Society of England 29 (1982–1986), 157.
17. John Eisenberg, Surgical and Practical Observations on the Diseases of the Human Foot; with Instructions for Their Treatment. To Which Is Added Advice on the Management of the Hand (London: John Eisenberg, 1845).
18. Nehemiah Kenison, The New Revelation; Or Dreams Relating to the Mysteries of the Soul (St. Louis: Privately published, 1879), 8.
19. Charleston Courier, January 31, 1840, 3.
20. Camden (South Carolina) Journal, June 27, 1840, 3.
21. Charleston Southern Patriot, April 28, 1843, 1; May 30, 1843, 1; May 31, 1843, 3.
22. Ibid., April 29, 1843, 4.
23. Ibid., March 4, 1843, 4; April 6, 1843, 1.
24. Ibid., July 15, 1843, 3.

4

“Where more money could be made faster”

In August 1843, just four months after opening his store in Charleston, Issachar received a letter from his mentor, Dr. Barinds, advising him to come to New Orleans, “where more money could be made faster than any other place on the continent.”[1] Issachar was never to return to Charleston. Packing his tool kit and clothes, he said goodbye to his parents and siblings and boarded a stagecoach to New Orleans.

Stagecoaches were so-called from their changing relays of horses at regular stages, stopping every 10 to 15 miles to change to a fresh four-horse team at relay stations along the way.[2] A stagecoach journey like Issachar’s was nothing to take lightly. For one thing, it was expensive. At about 10 cents a mile, the 510-mile trip from Charleston to Montgomery, Alabama, where he could board a ferry to Mobile, would cost the equivalent of about $1 per mile today. Added to that was the costs of lodging and food along the way.[3]

The stagecoach part of the journey was over bone-rattling rutted roads that continuously bounced Issachar against the passenger sitting next to him. Each coach carried up to nine passengers seated on three benches, three to a bench. The front and back seats faced inward and had back rests. The middle bench, the most uncomfortable, had a broad strap for a back support. Front and back seats were given to women. If they were with their husbands, they sat beside them. Issachar’s other passengers, few if any, recently washed and tidy, in their “little ark of humanity”[4] could have been gamblers, prostitutes, merchants, or young or old fortune-hunters like himself.

After 12 or more hours, the coach stopped overnight at an inn, where Issachar slept, his shirt on and trousers off, with two or three other men on greasy pillows in the same soiled bed.[5] Three or four days after leaving Charleston, he arrived in Montgomery, Alabama. From there, he boarded a steamboat for another two-day trip to Mobile, then boarded a train to New Orleans.[6]

* * * * * * * *

Located between Lake Pontchartrain and the Mississippi River, “The Crescent City” (so-called because of the large crescent bend the Mississippi makes near the French Quarter) was the gateway into and from the country’s heartland. New Orleans was much larger, much more cosmopolitan, and much more raucous than Charleston. Peddlers, merchants, planters, factors, sailors, gamblers, pimps, prostitutes, and con men were everywhere. About 40 percent of the population were foreign born, mainly French, German, and Irish.[7] Free blacks made up more than 40 percent of its African American population.

In 1724, the French governor of Louisiana had issued the Code Noir, which expelled Jews from the colony. In 1803, New Orleans became an American city as part of the Louisiana Purchase, and the ban was no longer enforced. Although most of the Jews coming to Louisiana, settled in New Orleans, a sizable number ventured farther inland to Baton Rouge, the second largest town in the state, or Shreveport and Donadlsonville.[8] Judah Benjamin came to New Orleans in 1828. The year before, the Sephardic community, with the help of local merchants like Judah Touro and Jews in other parts of the country, built the city’s first synagogue, the Gates of Mercy.[9]

Most of New Orleans' Jews were small businessmen selling clothing or textiles at the wholesale or retail level or jewelry, tobacco, and fancy import goods at fixed store locations on Chartres Street. Others sold wares at temporary stalls and pushcarts along the river in the French Quarter or at auction or by peddling. A few operated taverns.[10]

Canal Street, with its small, specialized, expensive stores, had carriage tracks and rows of sycamores in the center of the street extending its whole length. Judah Touro, the richest man in the city, lived on Canal Street.[11] Issachar took in all the wealth and allure as he strolled down Canal to St. Charles Street. Dr. Barinds had his office and living quarters at No. 3 St. Charles, at the corner of Canal.[12]

No. 3. St. Charles Street was a large rooming house where "a few young gentlemen [could] be accommodated with board and lodging, or board only, on reasonable terms."[13] Within days of moving in, Issachar placed an ad in the New Orleans Times-Picayune that was not much different from his ads in Charleston. Starting off with the same bold "CORNS!" heading and the same guarantee of "No Cure No Pay," "Dr. Z" assured the ladies and gentlemen of New Orleans that if their corns returned after he removed them at his office or their homes, their money would be refunded.[14]

There was money to be made in New Orleans, but corn-sufferers preferred seeing the older Dr. Barinds. Issachar left after only two months.[15] He did not return for another three years.

After he packed his tool bag and left New Orleans, Issachar headed for Richmond, Virginia, where he briefly leased an office in May 1844, at the Columbian Hotel at 26 Cary Street.[16] He didn't stay long. An ad he placed in the Richmond Whig only ran for one day. Issachar's whereabouts for the next few months are not known. In September, he was back in Philadelphia to marry his childhood sweetheart.

* * * * * * * *

Issachar and Mary Ann Lawson met in Philadelphia when they were teenagers, before his family moved to Charleston. They probably met in school or when Issachar's family lived on Cedar Street near Green Street, where the Lawsons lived. Mary Ann was the oldest of Jacob's and Elizabeth Lawson's five children (four girls and one son). The Lawsons were a middle-class Christian family. Mary Ann's parents were both born in Philadelphia. Jacob was a saddler, and Mary Ann was a dressmaker at the family's new home at 44 Coates.[17] None of the letters Issachar and Mary Ann sent to each other has survived, but they must have written often enough for Issachar to ask her to marry him.

They married in Philadelphia on September 11, 1844.[18] They were both 17. It was a Christian ceremony. Issachar's parents did not attend.

Although Issachar was the grandson of the leader of a Jewish community in England and his father had been an active synagogue member in Philadelphia's and Charleston's Jewish communities, Issachar didn't feel he was turning his back on his ancestral religion when he married Mary Ann. Many Jews who married Christians continued to regard themselves as Jews,[19] although the children of mixed marriages were nearly always raised as Christians by their Christian mothers. Issachar was not a practicing Jew. For him, being Jewish was an ethnicity, not a religion.[20]

* * * * * * * *

Shortly after marrying, Issachar left Mary Ann with her parents while he continued moving from city to city practicing his profession. In April 1846, he was back in New Orleans clipping corns at a "fancy store" at the St. Charles Hotel, when he was arrested.[21]

The charge was forgery, a crime the newspapers called swindling. A New Orleans lawyer, acting on behalf of his brother, a man named Glenn, alleged that when Issachar was in Philadelphia, he had cashed a draft for $217.50 with Glenn, on Issachar's father-in-law Jacob Lawson's account, "under false pretenses."[22] Glenn hadn't pressed charges because Issachar had left Philadelphia, and he did not know where he had gone. By chance, he learned through his brother in New Orleans that Issachar was in that city. Glenn's brother swore out a warrant for Issachar's arrest on his behalf. Issachar was arrested, released on bail, and scheduled to appear in court two days later.

The case drew such wide interest in the newspapers that the New Orleans Daily Delta informed its readers it had been requested to ask them not to prejudge the case until Dr. Zacharie had his day in court.[23] At the hearing, Glenn's lawyer said he had no personal knowledge of the facts other than what his brother had told him. Issachar's lawyers strongly objected to his request for a delay and moved for dismissal. They contended Issachar had been charged based on an affidavit from his accuser who was not in court, and there was no evidence corroborating the alleged fraud. The judge agreed, and Issachar was released.[24] Although the case had been dismissed, many people in New Orleans believed he was guilty and stopped coming to his "fancy store." Issachar closed his business and returned to Philadelphia.

After a brief stay there, he and Mary Ann moved to Baltimore, where Issachar leased a home and set up a new practice. In June 1846, "Dr. I. Zachariah, Jr. Surgeon Chiropedist" placed an ad in the Baltimore American and Commercial Daily Advertiser stating he was now "permanently located" in Baltimore and "would be treating patients, either at his home at 111 Lexington Street or at their residence if required."[25] Shortly after moving to Baltimore, Mary Ann became pregnant. Months later, she moved back to Philadelphia so her mother could help her during and after her pregnancy. Issachar's and Mary Ann's first-born son, Charles Lawson Zacharie, was born in 1847.[26]

---

1. Samuel Wilson, Jr., and Bernard Lemann, New Orleans Architecture (Gretna, LA: Pelican Publishing Co., 1998), xiv.
2. J. Russell Smith, "Line Traffic in the United States Coasting Trade," The Railroad Gazette, 44 (March 1908), 377.
3. William I. Hair, "Stagecoaches and Public Accommodations in Antebellum Georgia," Georgia Historical Quarterly, 68 (Fall 1984), 326.
4. Ibid., 327.
5. Everett Dick, The Dixie Frontier: A Social History of the Southern Frontier from the First Transmontane Beginnings to the Civil War (Norman, OK: University of Oklahoma Press, 1948), 211–212.
6. Gary Gorton, Ante Bellum Transportation Indices, http://faculty.som.yale.edu/garygorton/documents/AnteBellum TransportationIndices.pdf.
7. Lachof and Kahn, Jewish Community of New Orleans.
8. Louisiana State Museum, "Antebellum Louisiana III: Urban Life," www.crt.state.la.us/louisiana-state-museum/online-exhibits/the-cabildo/antebellum-louisiana-urban-life/index, accessed February 28, 2018.
9. Leo Shpall, "The First Synagogue in Louisiana," Louisiana Historical Quarterly 21 (1938), 518; Elliott Ashkenazi, The Business of Jews in Louisiana, 1840–1875 (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1988), 105.
10. Knox, Camp-Fire, 392.
11. Peggy Scott Laborde and John Magill, Canal Street. New Orleans' Great Wide Way (Gretna, LA: Pelican Publishing Co., 2006), 31; Ashkenazi, Jewish Businesses, 10.
12. (New Orleans) Times-Picayune, January 15, 1843, 3.
13. Ibid., March 9, 1841, 1.
14. Ibid., September 6, 1843, 2.
15. His last ad appeared in the Times-Picayune on November 5, 1843, 1.

16. Richmond (VA) Whig, May 28, 1844, 2.
17. A. McElroy's Philadelphia City Directory for the Year 1844 (Philadelphia: Edward C. Biddle, 1844). Coates was renamed "Fairmount Avenue." Neither Mary Ann nor Issachar are listed in the Philadelphia City Directories for 1845–1848, under Lawson or Zachariah.
18. Philadelphia Dollar Newspaper, September 18, 1844, 3.
19. Jacob Rader Marcus, United States Jewry, 1776–1985 (Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 1989–) Vol. 2:203.
20. Michael F. Barnes, "Presentation on the Order," www.orderofthesecretmonitor.co.unk/News_27.html, accessed July 19, 2015.
21. New Orleans Daily Delta, April 14, 1846, 3.
22. Ibid.; (New Orleans) Times-Picayune, April 14, 1846, 2.
23. Ibid., April 15, 1846, 2.
24. New Orleans Daily Delta, April 17,1846, 3.
25. Baltimore American and Commercial Daily Advertiser, June 8, 1846, 2.
26. U.S. Census, 1870.

5

“We the undersigned”

Baltimore was a city on the make, a city whose mantra was “Death or Go-Ahead.” In the 1840s, it was the third largest city in America, outranking Boston and Charleston. With a population increasing by 20,000 every decade, Baltimore was challenging New York and Philadelphia for number one.[1]

Issachar’s first office at 111 Lexington[2] was in the heart of the Jewish district. To give himself credibility, he claimed he had been treating foot problems in Baltimore for the last three years. It was the beginning of a long series of lies he told about himself.[3]

Although he was the only chiropodist in Baltimore, Issachar was too ambitious to be content with merely cutting corns. Six months later, he moved to a new office at 24 Gay Street, inviting prospective patients to visit him at his “new operating rooms,” where he added dentistry to the services he offered.

His work “inserting, plugging, cleaning, extracting, filing, &c” teeth was “equal to any in the city,” he said.[4] He used “the latest improvements in the science” to maintain the beauty and preservation of teeth “at one third less than usual rates.” He cleansed and filled “carious teeth with gold, thereby arresting the progress of decay, and rendering them useful for life.” He also inserted “mineral teeth of a superior quality, with or without colored Gums.” Those inserts “so nearly resemble natural Teeth, both in appearance and usefulness,” that patients who favored him with their patronage would be entirely satisfied.[5]

Issachar assured “his friends and the public in general” he wasn’t giving up his chiropody practice. He would still be extracting “hard and soft corns, bunions [and] club nails penetrating the flesh, in five minutes.” No one need worry about the pain. He promised to remove a patient’s corns “without the least pain or blood.” Their corns, he assured them, “will never return.”[6]

Issachar’s “new operating rooms” sounded professional and dignified. Patients would not be treated in an ordinary room where shelf after shelf harbored patent medicines and various sundries. Patients would have their ailments attended to in a separate “operating room”—not just one, but “operating rooms,” one for their lower extremities and another for their topmost.

Issachar also came up with what would become his most convincing self-promoting logo: “references … and certificates from the first Surgeons and Physicians in the world” that could be seen at his office. It was a bold assertion for the teenage chiropodist.

In January 1847, Issachar went “on a professional tour” to Washington, where he was “happy to operate upon all” who could benefit from his experience and skill at his room at the posh Coleman’s Hotel on Pennsylvania Avenue. (President-elect James Polk had stayed there with his wife two years earlier.) The advertisement for his new venture contained the first of the many testimonials he was beginning to cite from prominent physicians:

> We the undersigned, having examined Dr. I. Zachariah, Jr.’s, method of curing corns, bunions, &c. we do not hesitated to recommend him to the public, and say that his method is a most rational one as well as effectual.[7]

It’s possible these physicians gave Issachar their endorsement, but there’s a nagging suspicion that, like his claiming he had been practicing in Baltimore for three years, he made them up. It stretches probability that the 19-year-old was able to corral these eminent physicians not only into meeting as a group with him, but also into watching him perform corn cutting procedures that as physicians, they had no interest in and in fact looked down upon as degrading.

Issachar's citing endorsements from eminent physicians without their knowledge was nothing new. Drs. W. H. Handy, Charles Bell Gibson, and Nathan R. Smith, three of Issachar's endorsers, are cited in an advertisement for Reinhardt's Patent Glass Pad Double and Single Lever Truss.[8] Issachar sold that same truss in his office above Parker's Fancy Store between 4th and 6th on Pennsylvania Avenue a year later when he was back in Washington treating foot problems and pulling teeth.[9] Drs. Pierre Chatard's, Gibson's, and Smith's names were also cited as endorsing Baltimore dentist Thomas Badaraque.[10]

Issachar got the idea of fake celebrity endorsements from chiropodist John Eisenberg's Surgical and Practical Observations on the Diseases of the Human Foot.[11] Among Eisenberg's - made-up testimonies were those from France's Prince Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, Prussia's Ambassador to England, Lord Dufferin, "Lord in Waiting to her Majesty," the Duke of Wellington, and many others of Europe's eminent nobility. Eisenberg's fake endorsement marketing ploy was obvious. Issachar saw no reason he shouldn't do the same.

Eisenberg and other corn cutters claiming to have treated Europe's "A-list" elite weren't publicly challenged because those worthies couldn't be bothered—with one exception. When the Duke of Wellington was informed his name had been so used, he sued the corn cutter for his fraudulent endorsement.[12]

1. Sherry Olson, “Downwind Downstream, Downtown: The Environmental Legacy in Baltimore and Maryland,” Environmental History 12 (October 2007), 845–866.

2. Baltimore American Republic and Daily Clipper, June 4, 1846, 2

3. Ibid., June 4, 1846, 2. The three years he claimed to have been in Baltimore, he was living in Charleston and New Orleans. (Charleston) Southern Patriot, July 15, 1843, 3; (New Orleans) Times-Picayune, October 19, 1843, 3.

4. Baltimore American Republic and Daily Clipper, November 23, 1846, 3; De-cember 12, 1846, 3.

5. Baltimore Sun, December 3,1846, 3.

6. Baltimore American Republic and Daily Clipper, November 23, 1846, 3; De-cember 12, 1846, 3.

7. Washington (DC) Daily Union, January 13, 1847, 1. The four physicians were W. W. Handy, a professor of anatomy at the Baltimore Dental College (Baltimore City Directory, 1845, 166); Nathan R. Smith, dean and professor of surgery at the University of Maryland who had an office and infirmary on Lombard Street in Baltimore (Baltimore Sun, December 30, 1846, 3); and Charles Bell Gibson, who was a professor of physics at Washington University in Baltimore. Gibson extracted a bullet from General Winfield Scott at Lundy’s Lane during the War of 1812. During the Civil War, he was a surgeon in the Confederate army. Pierre Chatard was an obstetrician. He died two years after being cited in Issachar’s testimonial list (Eugene F. Cordell, Medical Annals of Baltimore (Baltimore: Williams and Wilkins, 1903), 348). John Whitridge had a practice at 46 North Gay Street (Cordell, Medical Annals, 620). Obstetrician Ferdinand Chatard was the son of Pierre Chatard (Cordell, Medical Annals, 348.

8. American and Commercial Daily Advertiser, November 9, 1846, 4.

9. Washington (DC) Daily National Whig, December 3, 1847, 3; January 3, 1848, 3.

10. American and Commercial Daily Advertiser, April 12, 1847, 3. If there is any further need to doubt the credibility of these endorsements, there are noticeably different endorsements from some of these same doctors that Issachar collected in a book he kept of testimonials to his work (Dr. I Zacharie, Corns Operations on the Feet [privately published], 2 hereafter “Corns”). A copy is in the National Archives (RG 112 Records of the Office of the Surgeon General. Central Office Correspondence 1818–1946, Z (July 8, 1830–December 8, 1870), Box No. 113). The original is in the Shapell Museum. Zacharie published a later compilation titled Testimonials to I. Zacharie, Late Chiropodist General, United States Army (London: S. Firth and Ellis, 187–?). Dr. Gibson's statement is dated March 31, 1848, two years after the newspaper endorsement. The testimonial in the book is to “Dr. Zacharie” and quotes Gibson as stating, “We have seen Dr. Zacharie, the Chiropodist, operate, and approve of his method, which is scientific and free from inconvenience or pain” (Zacharie, Corns, 3). In 1848, Issachar was still calling himself Dr. I. Zachariah Jr. He didn’t drop the “Jr.” and change the surname to Zacharie until the late 1850s. It is hardly believable that Dr. Gibson would have given him two testimonials. The name change was an obvious instance of backdating. Issachar resorted to the same sham for another of his books.

11. Eisenberg, Surgical and Practical Observations.

12. Editorial, “The Peerage and Its Corns,” The Spectator 22 (1849), 299.

6

“A humble individual”

Issachar was emboldened when the testimonials he cited from Baltimore’s eminent physicians went unchallenged. Why not claim an endorsement from one of the world’s most famous physicians, especially since he was dead. Who was there to refute him?

A month after he cited the Baltimore endorsements, Issachar quoted an endorsement from Dr. Astley Paston Cooper that he dated June 27, 1837:

> This is to certify, that I. Zacharie studied the profession of Chiropodist under me, and from this day I consider him fully competent to perform the duty of a Chiropodist upon all who may favor him with their patronage.
>
> Given in the city of London, under my hand and seal, this twenty-seventh day of June, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven.[1]

Sir Astley Paston Cooper had been England’s preeminent surgeon and anatomist, famous for breakthrough procedures in vascular and hernia surgeries. Born in Norfolk to a prominent family, his father sent him to London when he was 16 to study medicine under London’s best surgeons. A gifted student, he was appointed demonstrator, and a few years later, lecturer of anatomy at St. Thomas’ Hospital. Cooper was said to have mastered anatomy first by dissecting pets he stole from neighbors and then on the stolen corpses of those same neighbors. As his surgical practice grew, he organized a network of body snatchers to steal corpses to dissect.

Cooper was so highly regarded that he was the physician called upon to remove a tumor from the head of King George IV. The operation was a success. In return, the King made him a baron. He was subsequently appointed sergeant-surgeon to the King and later to Queen Victoria.[2] Cooper’s fame was such that several streets in British cities were named after him, e.g., Astley Cooper Place in Norfolk; Astley Road and Paston Road in Hempstead, as were newly described diseases (e.g., Cooper’s testis [neuralgia of the testicles] and Cooper’s neuralgia [neuralgia of the breast]).

An endorsement from Sir Astley Paston Cooper stating Zacharie had been one of his pupils would have given him serious gravitas in the medical community. But Cooper’s endorsement was fiction. Had Cooper been Issachar’s mentor, Issachar would have been no more than 12 when Cooper wrote the testimonial Issachar attributed to him. In the early 1800s, some children from working families did go to work when they were five or six,[3] but those children were employed as servants, factory workers, miners, and street sweepers. After Charles Dickens’ father was imprisoned for failing to pay a debt, Dickens was sent to work, but not as an apprentice to a posh physician. Dickens worked in a rat-infested shoe-polish factory blacking boots.[4]

Apprentices spent several years with their mentors, not several weeks or months, and surgeons did not take on apprentices for free. Some charged hundreds of British pounds to take on an apprentice. Only the sons of men with money could afford to have their sons apprenticed to a prominent surgeon like Cooper. And no medically trained surgeon would ever have tutored anyone in what the medical profession considered as unworthy of their time as the treatment of corns and bunions. None of that is really relevant. In 1837, when Issachar was 10, he was living in Philadelphia. In 1846, when he boasted of Cooper’s personal endorsement, Cooper had been dead for five years. Who was going to take the time or had the interest to challenge him?

Dr. Zacharie wasn't the only chiropodist citing impressive testimonials in his advertisements to enhance his credibility. "It is a remarkable fact," the editor of the Spectator magazine bemoaned, "that every corn-cutter of any eminence who appears above the horizon can display testimonials from a number of Peers and other persons of distinction." Nearly all of them, it chafed, were fraudulent.[5]

How did Issachar Zacharie, who had little formal schooling and no medical training, come up with Dr. Cooper's name? He found it in advertisements for Sir Astley Cooper's Corn Salve that was sold in America's major cities, including Charleston, when Issachar first began his career. Like all such nostrums, it came with alleged testimonials from "distinguished physicians…. No one acquainted with the character of the distinguished Surgeon whose name it bears, can for a moment doubt the efficacy of SIR ASTLEY COOPER'S CORN SALVE [which] meets with the most favorable reception wherever its genuine virtues are known. In New York this salve is regarded by hundreds and hundreds and even by distinguished Physicians, as the only specific for corns; while in Boston, ample proof is already given by our citizens of its real value."[6] Those who preferred a poultice with an even more prestigious genealogy, one offering "miraculous cures" discovered in the Holy Land, had Jew David's Plaster for its "genuine virtues."[7] For skeptics who had no faith in salves, there was always the "positive cure for corns" used by Lowell, a Maryland man afflicted with painful corns on two of his toes. Determined to put an end to his affliction, he "went into a joiner's shop, took a mallet and chisel, and deliberately severed the two toes from the foot."[8]

Dr. Cooper never invented, sold, or knowingly lent his name to any corn salve. Issachar had no fear of contradiction for claiming to have been personally taught by Cooper or selling a salve with his name. The first advertisements for his eponymous salve did not appear until 1842, a year after Cooper died.

* * * * * * * *

If Issachar didn't learn his skills from Dr. Cooper, from whom did he learn them? Other historians trying to salvage Issachar's credibility speculate he was tutored by Dr. Valentine Mott or Dr. William Gibson, two American physicians who were actually mentored by Cooper.

Valentine Mott (1785–1865) worked under Dr. Cooper at his clinic from 1835 to 1841. He subsequently returned to the United States as a professor of surgery at the New York University Medical College from 1841 to 1850. Like his mentor, Dr. Mott pioneered many new procedures in vascular surgery, including successfully tying the carotid artery in one patient and cutting two inches from the deep jugular vein and reconnecting them, using a tincture of opium as his only anesthetic.[9] Cooper once said of Mott, "he has performed more of the great operations than any man living, or that ever did live."[10] Mott also pioneered the treatment of what today men using Viagra or Cialis are warned not to ignore—an erection lasting four hours or more. The medical emergency stems from the same ailment humorously called in Mott's day and still today "a fractured penis." Mott said when "the newly made bride" was "informed of the nature of the fracture, plaintively and innocently remarked, 'it never would have happened, if he had been at home.'"[11] The four-hour plus erection and the "fractured penis" both result from engorgement of the corpus cavernosum, the spongy erectile tissue in the penis. (Fracture is a misnomer since no bone or cartilage is ruptured.) These two areas become engorged with blood during sexual arousal, causing an erection. Viagra and Cialis work by inhibiting the enzymes that normally keep the blood from draining from the corpus callosum. If the blood does not drain, it can cause serious damage to the penis. The treatment for both the drug-induced erection and the "fractured penis" is draining the blood. Now it is done with a needle drainage. In Mott's day, cold "discutient lotions" (lotions that drained internal fluids) were applied to the penis to cause drainage.

The reason some historians credit Zacharie as one of Mott's students is a testimonial, dated New York, August 1858, that Mott allegedly wrote on Zacharie's behalf:

> Dr. Zacharie was a pupil of Sir Astley Cooper of London, he has been regularly educated as a Surgeon.
> For the last twenty years he had given particular attention to the troubles and diseases of the feet, such as Corns, Bunions, and inverted nails
> "His treatment is founded on the strictest rules of science, such as all Surgeons will approve. I can recommend him to those who may be suffering from those maladies as the most expert and delicate operator I have ever seen."[12]

In appreciation for that testimonial, Issachar dedicated both editions of his book, Surgical and Practical Observations on the Diseases of the Human Foot, to Mott:

> I am indeed rejoiced that this tribute of my respect and admiration has been accepted by you, and that you consider the labours of a humble individual, upon a neglected branch of knowledge, not unworthy of your kind protection and consideration.[13]

Mott's endorsement, backdated to 1844, appears in two editions of Issachar's Surgical and Practical Observations. He plagiarized the first edition, published in 1860, almost verbatim from John Eisenberg's 1845 text. By dating Mott's endorsement a year earlier, Issachar claimed Eisenberg had copied him instead of the other way around. In Issachar's Corns, Operations on the Feet certificate book, Mott's testimonial is dated 1858. In 1844, Issachar was still living in the South. He published a second text with the same title in 1876. This time, he stole the entire text from an American, C. H. Cleaveland, whose text, Causes and Cures of Diseases of the Feet, was published in 1862.[14] Valentine Mott was never Issachar's mentor.

Zacharie wasn't even creative enough to write the dedication himself. Instead, he cribbed it verbatim from Eisenberg's dedication to Dr. Marshall Hall, even to the point of the signature: "I am, sir, Your obliged and humble servant." The only difference was that Zacharie erased Eisenberg's name and replaced it with his own.

Zacharie learned about Mott the same way he learned about Cooper—from advertisements using his name on countless products and service without Mott's awareness or approval. Gold Medal Cognac Brandy carried a fake endorsement: "highly recommended by Dr. Valentine Mott, the acknowledged head of the medical profession."[15] Charles' London Cordial Gin falsely quoted Dr. Valentine Mott of New York as it being "far preferable to even Pure Holland Gin, and is the best article of its kind I have ever seen."[16] Another ad for Charles' London Cordial had an endorsement from both Cooper and Mott: "Recommended By the Late Sir Astley Cooper, Of London, And Dr. Valentine Mott, Of New York, The acknowledged Heads of the Profession in Either Hemisphere."[17] Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, a patent medicine, stated "Dr. Valentine Mott, the widely celebrated Professor of Surgery in the Medical College, New York City," said it gave him "pleasure to certify the value and efficacy of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which I consider peculiarly adapted to cure diseases of the throat and lungs."[18]

The irony of these endorsements for gin and cordials is that Mott was an avowed teetotaler: "It is my full conviction that the pernicious practice of even temperate drinking," he declared, "cannot be too severely reprobated."[19] Mott's name was even used to sell cleaning products like Lyon's Magnetic Powder and Magnetic Pills, "guaranteed to clear a dwelling of bed bugs, cockroaches, rats and mice."[20]

Dr. William Gibson (1788–1868), the other of Cooper's American pupils Issachar cited, was considered the best lecturer in America in his day and was renowned for his prodigious memory.[21] Gibson's testimonial was similarly a fake.

With all the suspicions about Zacharie's testimonials from Astley Paston Cooper, Valentine Mott, and the other physicians he cited, how much faith can we have that any of his testimonials are authentic? Are the testimonies he recorded in Corns, his certificate book, from some of the most famous politicians and other luminaries in America any more truthful? It turns out they are, which is why the man is such an anomaly. He was as skilled as the false medical endorsements he cited said he was.

* * * * * * * *

In a letter Zacharie wrote to President Lincoln in 1863, he said it had been his "good fortune to have secured the friendship of many of our most distinguished statesmen, commencing in my boyhood with the great Henry Clay…."[22] Mentioning his having "secured" Clay's friendship would have more than impressed Lincoln. Senator, congressman, speaker of the House, secretary of state (1825–1829), and three-time presidential candidate (in 1824, 1832, and 1844), Clay was Lincoln's "ideal of a great man."[23]

Clay wrote two endorsements for Issachar. The first, dated January 29, 1848, took "great pleasure in saying Dr. Zacharie operated on me for Corns in Washington with perfect comfort, and to my entire satisfaction, and I derived great and immediate benefit from the exercise of his skill and judgement." The second, dated May 22, 1849, and written from Ashland, Clay's Lexington, Kentucky, plantation, stated, "Since January, 1848, when Dr. Zacharie operated on my feet, there has been no return of my Corns, and I have been completely exempt from them, and my feet always comfortable."[24]

"That commendation naturally opened many doors to the young chiropodist," writes Jonathan Sarna in his and Benjamin Shapell's landmark Lincoln and the Jews.[25] Within the year, Zacharie had additional testimonies from Alabama Senator Dixon H. Lewis ("Dr. Zacharie has surprised me by extracting two Corns and one nail from my smallest toe without a particle of pain," February 29, 1848),[26] Michigan Senator Lewis Cass ("Dr. Zacharie has operated upon my feet with great skill, affording immediate relief without causing the slightest pain," September 12,1848),[27] Missouri Senator Thomas Hart Benton ("Dr. Zacharie has operated on several Corns on my feet with the most perfect comfort to myself," September 24, 1848),[28] Supreme Court Justice R. C. Grier ("I take pleasure in testifying to the skill of Dr. Zacharie, having experienced great relief from his opeations,"September 1848)[29] and John C. Calhoun, former vice president, secretary of state, and South Carolina senator ("I take pleasure in saying Dr. Zacharie extracted my Corns without the slightest pain, and to my entire satisfaction," November 1848).[30]

Professor Hugh Holmes Maguire's testimony ("I have had two Corns removed by Dr. Zacharie … the method is new and I believe will provide a radical cure"), however, is implausible. Maguire's statement is dated November 1, 1848. The professor would have been 13 years old at the time![31] Another testimony from Judge J. Harlan, dated May 17, 1849, is equally fishy. His honor would have been a 16-year-old boy when he "derived much benefit from his [Issachar's] labors."[32]

Advertisements in the Washington Daily Whig and the Daily National Intelligencer corroborate that Zacharie was living in Washington when those testimonials were dated.[33] Either they were backdated or dated incorrectly, or Zacharie made some of them up. Historian Charles

M. Segal was certain they were all authentic. His reasoning was that many of the people whose testimonials appear in Issachar's Certificate Book were still alive when they allegedly wrote them and they would have denied making those statements if they knew of them.[34] That presumes the people whose testimonials were in the book knew they were in it or cared. Valentine Mott would certainly have known his name was being used to sell nostrums, but unlike the Duke of Wellington, he did not take legal action to have his fake endorsements removed.

The only way to be really sure any of Issachar's endorsement were authentic is to compare the handwriting and signatures in his book with the handwriting and signatures of those cited from other sources. I was able to do this for Henry Clay and Samuel D. Lecompten.[35] I did not have access to the handwritten version of Issachar's original certificate book, now in the Shapell Collection, but samples are reproduced in Sarna and Shapell's Lincoln and the Jews. Based on those handwriting samples and signatures, those endorsements are without question authentic.

This leads to at least two intriguing questions. How did Zacharie approach Henry Clay and the other prominent politicians in the first place? They did not travel in the same social circles. Did Zacharie just walk up to them in Washington, introduce himself, and say he would be more than happy to relieve them of any corns or other foot ailments free of charge? And why did Clay write him a second testimonial? Did someone question Clay's endorsement and Zacharie wrote to him for a second to prove its authenticity? It's improbable Clay wrote them without prompting from Zacharie. But even with endorsements from Washington's elite, there still weren't enough patients for Zacharie to remain in Washington.

1. Zacharie also cited Cooper's fake endorsement in The Daily Union, January 13, 1847, 1; February 18,1847, 3; March 5, 1847, 4; Zacharie, Corns, 2.

2. Sir Leslie Stephen and Sir Sidney Lee (eds.), Dictionary of National Biography (London: Oxford University Press, 1921–1922), Vol. IV, 1062–1064.

3. See, e.g., Gary P. Zola, We Called Him Rabbi: Abraham Lincoln and American Jewry, A Documentary History (Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 2014), 403.

4. Joyce Carroll Oats, Soul at the White Heat (New York: Harper Collins, 2016), 62.

5. Editorial, "The Peerage and Its Corns" The Spectator 22 (1849), 299.

6. Hartford (Connecticut) Times, February 11, 1843, 4.

7. New Hampshire Sentinel, Mary 17, 1841, 4.

8. Baltimore Sun, June 6, 1843, 2.

9. I. M. Rutkow, "Valentine Mott (1785–1865), the Father of American Vascular Surgery; A Historical Perspective," Surgery 85 (April 1979), 441–450.

10. "Obituary: Death of Dr. Valentine Mott," New York Times, April 27, 1865, 4.

11. Valentine Mott, "The Fractured Penis of Laceration of the Corpus Cavernosum Penis, Commonly Called Fracture of the Penis," Transactions of the New York Academy of Medicine 1 (1848), 99.

12. Mott quoted in Zacharie, Corns, 2.

13. I. Zacharie, Surgical and Practical Observations on the Disease of the Human Foot (New York: Charles D. Norton, 1860); (London: Adams Brothers, 1876).

14. Eisenberg, Surgical and Practical Observations.

15. Columbia (South Carolina) Daily Phoenix, November 23, 1865, 1.

16. Washington (DC) National Republican, January 25, 1862, 1.

17. Charleston (South Carolina) Courier, February 15, 1862, 3; Daily (Columbus) Ohio Statesman, May 25, 1861, 4.

18. Richmond (Virginia) Daily Dispatch, November 24, 1852, 4.

19. Quoted by Daniel Dorchester, Latest Drink Sophistries versus Total Abstinence (Boston: Frank Wood, 1883), 43; H., "The Pathology of Drunkenness or the Physical effects of Alcoholic Drinks, with Drawings of the Drunkard's Stomach," Botanico-Medical Recorder, 11 (1843), 115.

20. Richmond (Virginia) Daily Dispatch, May 22, 1852, 2.

21. St. Louis Clinical Record 3 (1877), 158.

22. The Abraham Lincoln Papers at the Library of Congress (ABL LOC). Copies of Issachar's correspondence with Lincoln at the Library of Congress are online at "The Abraham Lincoln Papers at the Library of Congress," https://memory.loc.gov/ammem/malquery.html.

23. Quoted in David Von Drehle, Rise to Greatness: Abraham Lincoln and America's Most Perilous Year (New York: Henry Holt Co., 2012), 165.

24. Zacharie, Corns, 5. Clay's statement also appears in a shorter version of Issachar's book, Testimonials To I. Zacharie. Late Chiropodist General, United States Army (London: S. Firth and Ellis, 187–?), 8.

25. Jonathan D. Sarna and Benjamin Shapell, Lincoln and the Jews, A History (New York: Thomas Dunne Books, 2015), 128.

26. Corns, 6; Testimonials, 9.

27. Corns, 5–6; Testimonials, 8.

28. Corns, 6; Testimonials, 9.

29. Corns, 6; Testimonials, 9.

30. Corns, 6; Testimonials, 9. Issachar's Corns also contains testimonials that year from Dr. Wm Gibson, dated March 31, 1848; Professor Hugh M. Maguire, November 1, 1848; and Dr. Thomas Hammond, October 27, 1848.

31. Corns, 3.

32. Ibid., 6–7.

33. Washington (DC) Daily National Whig, January 4, 1848, 2; Washington (DC) Daily National Intelligencer, April 8, 1848, 1.

34. Charles M. Segal, "Isachar Zacharie: Lincoln's Chiropodist," Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, 43 (December 1953), 73.

35. "This will assure those who may desire an operation upon their feet for Corns, that Dr. I. Zacharie has performed an operation upon mine with much success; he extracted one or two for me about one year ago, which gave me immediate relief at the time, and I have not been troubled since then." Sam'l D. Lecomptem [sic]. No date. Corns, 12.

7

California

Issachar was living with his family at 402 N. Street in Baltimore, cutting corns and marketing "Dr. Zacharia's Celebrated Corn Elixir," when his second son, Samuel Purdy, was born in 1848.

With so many testimonials from so many eminent personages, Issachar should have had a thriving practice, but it was not thriving enough for his ambition. There were stories of men making fortunes overnight on the other side of the continent. He wanted his share of the pie.

In January 1848, two years after California became part of the United States, gold was discovered at Sutter's Mill in northern California. The discovery ignited gold-rush fever across much of the world. Thousands came from England, France, Holland, Eastern Europe, and as far away as Australia to make their fortunes. San Francisco's harbor wasn't large enough to accommodate the schooners, ships, brigs, and other vessels bringing passengers and cargoes from abroad. Shipments had to remain aboard for days because there were not enough places on shore for storage.

"A most singular state of things prevails here … without precedent in the history of the world," wrote a newly arrived "intelligent merchant." "All we heard in the States about the gold mines is fully confirmed here. There is gold in abundance. All who go to the mines do well—some return with fortunes; new discoveries are made every day. The millennium, so far as plenty of gold is concerned, cannot be far off. That this mining region, so extensive and so rich, and traveled over by Indians for hundreds of years, should have remained a secret is certainly astonishing."[1]

Although many Jews came to dig in the gold fields, most, including Issachar, had no intention of moiling for gold in the muck. They were not besotted with what lay under the earth. They came to do what they knew best—to get gold by selling the axes, shovels, pans, crockery, shirts, pants, hats, shoes, and other essentials miners needed in their quest for riches.

Some like the "intelligent merchant" loaded their wagons and headed for the mine fields. "Everything is selling very high at retail," the "intelligent merchant" beamed. Flour was $4 a pound, $800 a barrel. Shoes could be had for $50 a pair; pants for $40. "A paltry launch of a few tons of flour or other items earns $1200 or $1500 in a few days." Anything with a steam engine capable of transporting goods inland was a fortune in itself. One merchant offered $8,000 for a leaky launch that might sell for $100 or $150 in the East and had buyers begging him to take their money.[2] Other entrepreneurs went into business as hoteliers, livery stablers, saloon keepers, pharmacists, bathhouse owners, booksellers, jewelers, watchmakers, theater owners, or any other kind of business that catered to miners who came back from the fields with and without their pouches and nuggets of gold.

Most of the newly arriving Jews settled in San Francisco, the Gold Rush's commercial center. A newspaper described them as a "distinct class of dealers in boots and clothing" who had "almost a monopoly of the business."[3] Others set up shops in Sacramento, the gateway to the northern mines, or Stockton, the starting point for the southern diggings. Most of the newcomers, Jewish or otherwise, were unmarried men or men who left their families behind until they could get financially settled. Once they got themselves habituated, they sent for or returned to their homes to bring their wives and children, siblings, and parents.

* * * * * * * *

In a room above Lew Franklin's wood-framed store on Jackson Street near Kearny, where just hours before Franklin had been weighing and paying for gold dust, 50 Jewish men and 18-year-old Mrs. Hanna Solomon Keesing held an impromptu Yom Kippur service on September 26, 1849. It was the first Jewish service on the Pacific coast.[4] A few days later, a steamer arrived with news that the "49 Service," the holiest day in the Jewish calendar, had been observed on the wrong day.[5]

Soon after arriving in San Francisco in 1850, August Helbing, a single-minded, energetic - German-Jewish immigrant, founded the Eureka Benevolent Society, the first of many Jewish - self-help organizations. Within a few years, so many Jews had headed west that there were Jewish benevolent societies in Nevada and Montana, before there was even one in Delaware.[6] Helbing's purpose in starting a benevolent society was to provide San Francisco's Jews with a > suitable ways of spending our evenings. Gambling resorts and theatres, the only refuge then existing in 'Frisco to spend an evening, had no attraction for us. We passed the time back of our stores and often times were disgusted and sick from the loneliness of our surroundings. Besides, our services were in active demand; every steamer brought a number of co-religionists, and they did not always come provided with means. In fact, some came penniless, having invested their all in a passage to the Coast.[7]

The Eureka Benevolent Society and America's other Jewish benevolent societies were committed to helping indigent Jews. They were not overly religious. The one thing they insisted upon was Jewish burial. In a very real sense, writes historian Jacob Marcus, "it was often the cemetery that motivated Jews settling in new communities to bond together and kept Judaism alive. Once a congregation was formed, one of their members became the shochet (ritual slaughterer), mohel (ritual circumciser) and *malame*d (teacher). The next step was to buy an old church building and convert it into a syna-gogue."[8]

Helbing's own story is worth telling for no other reason than to show that while they were mainly shopkeepers, California's enterprising Jews were no pushovers. "When I was young," Helbing recalled. I was "as strong as a lion. I had taken two prizes as an athlete in Munich, and had gone to America in spirit of adventure."

Helbing and a friend had made their way across Panama, bought passage for California, and then waited in their stateroom for their steamer to head up to San Francisco. While they were waiting, another passenger who had bought a ticket at the head office in New York for the same room as Helbing claimed the room was his. Helbing refused to leave. The man sought out the purser. The purser told Helbing he had to vacate immediately. Helbing still refused. The purser summoned the captain. The captain tried to persuade Helbing to leave. When Helbing still refused, the captain threatened to have him bodily removed. Helbing wasn't intimidated. He drew a pistol from his belt, stuck it in the captain's face, and vowed he would kill the first man who tried to enter his room. "I had paid for it and had a right to its possession. But right or no right, I would keep this room or die." The captain backed down. Not eager for bloodshed, his own or his crew's, he found accommodation for the other passenger.

Later that night, despite a drizzling rain, Helbing went out on deck for some air. Cuddled up in a corner, shivering with cold and wet, a man and his wife were holding their little child, keeping him as warm as they could. The family were Jews from Australia who had paid for their passage but couldn't get a room on board. Helbing brought them back to his room. He and his friend gave them their beds and went back on deck where they slept rolled in blankets.[9] The woman was Mrs. Hugh Simon, the first Jewish woman in California from Australia.

Issachar and his brother Eleazar docked in San Francisco in late 1849 or early 1850.[10] Like

Helbing, they came by way of Panama. Long before there was a canal across the isthmus, steamers leaving East Coast ports docked at Colon, Panama's port city on the Atlantic. From there, Issachar and Eleazar trekked to the Pacific by flatboat and pack mules, through tropical jungles and mosquito-infested swamps, risking yellow fever and malaria, all the while on the lookout for local bandits. At Gorgona, where they rested, they spent a sleepless night nervously watching natives honing their machetes. From Gorgona, they slogged their way to Panama City on the Pacific coast, where they boarded a steamer to San Francisco.[11]

* * * * * * * *

On June 14, 1850, less than a year after the first Yom Kippur service, the Daily Alta California reported "that one of the most solemn and impressive ceremonies of the Hebrew faith was performed yesterday at the Albion House."[12] The solemn and impressive ceremony was the first bris (ritual circumcision) on the Pacific coast.

In Judaism, circumcisions are a symbol of the Biblical covenant Abraham made with God. By tradition, all Jewish ritual circumcisions take place on the eighth day of life. The mohel (the person performing the ritual circumcision) was the only Jew in San Francisco with any skill with a knife—Dr. Issachar Zachariah.[13]

The baby was the eight-day-old son of Barnett and Hannah Keesing, the couple who had taken part in the first Yom Kippur service.[14] The Keesings were originally from New Zealand. Whereas most of the gold seekers from around the world came alone, most of the Australian and New Zealander men came with their wives.[15] The Keesings owned a combined boarding house and saloon at the corner of Jackson and Dupont Streets,[16] where they "respectfully invited (the public) to call and taste a glass. A reduction in price will be made when taken by the battle." This was down the street from where the first Yom Kippur service had been held. Downstairs, they sold malt, spirituous liquors, and beer, "drawn from a beer engine, the only one is San Francisco." The bris took place in a room upstairs. Keesing later became a wealthy real estate investor, selling prefabricated wood homes he imported from Australia.

* * * * * * * *

Issachar and Eleazar did not stay in San Francisco for long. There was too much competition. They decided to head 80 miles away to Stockton, which was also booming from the gold trade. In early 1849, Stockton was an outpost with one or two log cabins. A few months later, its harbor was packed with brigs, baroques, and schooners.[17]

In 1850, Issachar and Eleazar opened a small six by 10-foot clothing store on El Dorado Street.[18] They chose it because of its low rent and their willingness to endure whatever inconveniences it entailed to keep down overhead. They dispensed with fancy fixtures. They didn't hire clerks, working long, tiring hours themselves. They bought stock and sold it off as quickly as they could, with little profit. But their reputation for bargain prices brought customers to their door, and the profit from their "cheap store" accumulated. Once their business took off, they stocked more costly items.

Stockton was no bucolic hamlet. It was a rough and violent mining town. Home invasions and burglaries were commonplace.[19] A clothing dealer on Center Street near Issachar's store was robbed of $500 in cash and $200 in clothing. A servant boy walking across a bridge was choked by "two hombres, for the two dollars in his pocket."[20] The Daily Alta California groaned that Stockton had become "the rendezvous of a gang of desperate men who fear neither God nor the law."[21] "In defiance of weak, and badly administered civil laws," Stockton turned to "the more sure and just code of Lynch law."[22] Twelve minutes after a man shot another in a bowling alley, Stockton's vigilante committee tried, convicted, and hanged him.

* * * * * * * *

In a relatively short time after settling in Stockton, Issachar was one of its leading Jewish citizens and the community's mohel. He continued performing circumcisions in Stockton until early 1852, when Abraham Abrahmsohn, "peddler, tailor, miner and matza baker" took over the job.[23] Abrahamson had been a mohel in Germany. "Through this religious profession," he writes, he "had access to the richest and most prominent families" who didn't balk at his charging $50 (the equivalent of $1,600 today) for a circumcision. "I had much to do and in about half a year had laid by a profit of 800 dollars [equivalent to $26,000 today]."[24]

Issachar's and Eleazar's clothing store proved to be its own gold mine. From an initial investment of $50, Issachar realized a profit of $21,500 (equivalent to $700,000 today) in less than six months. Now wealthy, he bought a home at the corner of Grant and Park Streets and planted a flower garden and orchard.[25] Flush with financial success, he left his brother Eleazar in charge of their store and brought his wife and children from Philadelphia and sent for his parents in Charleston.

In the fall of 1851, Issachar became the founding president of Stockton's Hebrew Benevolent Society.[26] Weeks later, he headed a committee to ask Captain Charles Weber, Stockton's founder, to donate an area to bury their dead. Weber generously gave them a 100-square-foot block on what was then the edge of the city. The committee built a fence around the perimeter and planted cypress trees on the grounds. In 1854, Weber formally deeded the cemetery to I. Zacharie and the other trustees of Stockton's Hebrew Benevolent Society.[27] "The Jews have stolen a march on the Christians," the Daily Alta California told its readers. "They have provided a cemetery for their dead, which is enclosed with a strong, solid fence, and is in every way a credit and an honor to them. It is situated near the Calaverns. We are told that our cemetery is unenclosed and the swine root up the interred bodies."[28]

Issachar's and Mary Ann's first daughter was born in 1852.[29] They named her Amelia, after Issachar's mother. Grandmother Amelia stayed with the family only one more year. In failing health, she and Issachar's father went back east to live with their daughter Jane and her husband, Abraham Backer, in Savannah, Georgia.[30] Leaving his brother Elly,[31] as the family affectionately called Eleazar, to look after their store and his family, Issachar accompanied his parents back to Savannah, remaining long enough for his name, along with his father's, to be listed among the new members of Congregation Mikveh Israel in Savannah.[32]

Issachar's mother died in December 1856. Despite having left Stockton three years earlier, Issachar's family had become such a fixture in the city that Julius Eckman's newly launched The Weekly Gleaner as a Voice to Israel (1858), California's first Jewish-based magazine, printed two obituaries about her.

The longer and first notice informed readers that it had "a sad duty to perform in announcing the death of Mrs. Amelia Zachariah wife [who] departed this life at Savannah, Ga., surrounded by her family, with whom but a short stay was allowed her after her return from California. Mrs. Zachariah," it continued, "was the only daughter of the Rev. Eliezer Cohen, who for thirty years was cantor at the Hebrew congregation of Chatham England. The early religious impressions received in youth, were the faithful companions and supporters of our deceased friend in her age." The obituary went on to say she was a devoted wife who refrained from work on the Sabbath and holy days and was very frail in her last days before she left for Savannah. The second, briefer obituary stated that Amelia, a former Stockton resident, died in Savannah on December 26, 1856.[33]

Back in California, in August 1853, Issachar was elected grand marshal of the newly formed Masonic Grand Lodge in San Francisco. The Ark, the Masonic newspaper reporting the installation, informed its fellow Masons that it had "no knowledge of any of the officers except the Grand Master [who] is known as a most energetic, accomplished and efficient Brother, and under his administration the Order must prosper."[34] By then, Issachar was a pillar of the community, sending flowers from his garden, reputed to be the most beautiful garden in the Stockton area, to the city's various social gatherings. School children were allowed to have their picnics on Issachar's grounds, and Stockton's residents were generously invited to visit the garden. Those who cared to could buy peaches at $3 each from the orchard he had planted four years before.[35] Issachar's and Mary Ann's second daughter, Clara Louise, was born in 1854.[36]

Merchandizing had made Issachar a rich man, but he began to miss the kind of social life of a bigger city than Stockton. After a fire destroyed his and many of the other stores on El Dorado Street,[37] Issachar moved his family to San Francisco, where he resumed his chiropody practice and became more involved in the Masons. After he was elected the first "grand Master of Masons in California," he became one of the principal founders of the "Order of the Secret Monitor," an appendant order of Freemasonry, one of the many Masonic orders that didn't involve elaborate ceremonies.[38]

Issachar's chiropody office in San Francisco was located at 148 Montgomery Street. Had he thought of it, he could have advertised himself as not just the only chiropodist in all of San Francisco, but the only chiropodist west of the Mississippi.[39] His advertisements were little changed from his earlier pitches offering to show his certificate book, "containing certificates from many of the most eminent men in the United Sates" to "all who may think proper to examine the same…. His success for the last fifteen years has been such as to warrant him in promising to all who may confide to his expertise…. His charges are quite moderate—trifling, indeed, compared with the relief and satisfaction he affords the sufferer."[40]

Eventually even San Francisco lost its allure, or perhaps an incident left Issachar so humiliated that he felt he had to leave. In November 1856, thieves burgled his apartment while he was asleep and stole all his clothes. With no clothes of his own, he wore one of Mary Ann's dresses to shop for a shirt, trousers and boots. Hoping to avoid being noticed by leaving as soon as the stores opened, he was seen in a clothing store dressed "in the latest style of female attire." He could forgive the man who stole his clothes, he was overheard telling the salesman, but if he found him, he would "lick the rascal that carried off his boots."[41]

1. New Orleans Weekly Delta, May 14,1849, 4; Brooklyn (New York) Daily Eagle, May 21, 1849, 2.
2. Ibid.
3. Philadelphia Dollar Newspaper, June 25, 1851, 2; Boston Courier, April 21, 1851, 2.
4. K. M. Nesfield, "The Jew from a Gentile Standpoint," Overland Monthly and Out West Magazine 25 (April 1895), 414.
5. Martin A. Meyer, Western Jewry. An Account of the Achievements of the Jews and Judaism in California (San Francisco: -Emanu-el, 1916), 46.
6. Gustav Adolf Danziger, "The Jew in San Francisco. The Last Half Century," Overland Monthly and Out West Magazine 25 (April 1895), 385.
7. Jacob Voorsanger, The Chronicles of Emanu-el (San Francisco: Geo. Spaulding Co, 1900), 17; Myer, Jews in California, 46.
8. Marcus, Western Jewry, 2, 197.
9. Danziger, "The Jew in San Francisco," 385.
10. The 1850 U.S. Census lists Issachar (Issica Zackriah), age 25, living at his father-in-law's home with his wife, her three sisters, Fanny, 17, Frances, 12, Lavernia, 7, and Issachar and Mary's two children, Charles, 4, and Samuel, 2.
11. Danziger, "The Jew in San Francisco," 385. The other route, more costly and slower, but safer and more comfortable, was by sailing around Cape Horn. Slower steam-ers could take as long as six months. Clipper ships, the "ocean greyhounds" built for speed, could make the trip in three months.
12. Daily Alta California, June 14, 1850, 2.
13. Ibid.
14. Rochester Daily Democrat, July 25, 1850, 2.
15. Ava F. Kahn, and Adam M. Mendelsohn (eds.), Transnational Traditions: New Perspective on American Jewish History (Detroit: Wayne State University, 2014), ch. 2.
16. Charles Proctor Kimball, The San Francisco City Directory (San Francisco: Journal of Commerce Press, 1850), 66; Daily Alta California, January 30, 1850, 3.
17. Stockton California History 1846 to 1900, http://www.wrightrealtors.com/stockton/stockton_history.htm, accessed July 20, 2015.
18. The Stockton Directory and Emigrant's Guide to the Southern Mines (Stockton: San Joaquin Republican, 1852), 19.
19. Sacramento Steamer, October 31, 1851, 3; San Francisco Daily Placer Times and Transcript, August, 23, 1854, 2.
20. San Francisco Weekly Pacific News, February 15, 1851, 3.
21. Daily Alta California, March 1, 1852, 7.
22. Elkton, Maryland Cecil Whig, April 26, 1851, 1.
23. Abraham Abrahamsohn, An Interesting Account of the Travels of Abraham Abrahamsohn to America, reprinted in Ava F. Kahn (ed.), Jewish Voices of the California Gold Rush. A Documentary History, 1849–1880 (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 2002), 79.
24. Ibid.
25. George H. Tinkham, History of San Joaquin Country California (Los Angeles, CA: Historic Record Co., 1923).
26. In 1855, it became Temple Israel, an Ashkenazi Congregation (Alexander Iser, The California Hebrew and English Almanac for the Year 5612, Corresponding with the years 1851–1852 (San Francisco: Alexander Iser, 1851).
27. Mrs. David "Bea" Schwartz, The Oldest Jewish Cemetery in the West, Stock, California (http://www.wsjhistory.com/oldest_jewish_cemetery.htm, accessed September 10, 2015; I. J. Benjamin, Three Years in America, 1859–1862 (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1956), Three Years, Vol. 2, 64.
28. Daily Alta California, December 4, 1851, 2.
29. U.S. 1870 Census.
30. Jane, Issachar's sister, was 16 when she married Abraham Backer, 24, a merchant from Columbus, Georgia, in 1848. Charleston Courier, March 13, 1848, 2; 1860 U.S. Census.
31. Eleazar was a permanent trustee of Stockton's short-lived Sephardic congregation, Shaar Hashamayim, the "Polish synagogue." Norton B. Stern, and William M. Kramer, "Sephardic Leadership of Early California Jewish Life," Western States Jewish History 17 (April 1985), 227.
32. Saul Jacob Rubin, Third to None. The Saga of Savannah Jewry, 1733–1983 (Savannah, GA: Self-published, 2013), 129.
33. "Obituary," The Weekly Gleaner as a Voice to Israel (January—1857), n.p.; History of San Joaquin Country, 55. Jonathan's whereabouts for the next few years aren't known, other than his being listed in the Savannah Georgia voter records for 1856–1896. In the 1859 state and the 1860 federal census, he is listed as living in Savannah with his married daughter and other members of the Backer family.
34. The Ark, and Old Fellows' Western Magazine: A Monthly 10 (August 1853), 257. The Ark listed his name as "I. Zachariah, Stockton."
35. An Illustrated History of San Joa-quin County (Chicago: Lewis Pub Co., 1890), 64.
36. U.S. 1870 Census.
37. San Francisco Daily Placer Times and Transcript, February 22, 1855, 2.
38. It was a "side degree" that any Freemason who had received it could confer on anyone else. Masonic Standard, November

3, 1900, 19; Michael F. Barnes, Presentation on the Order; Albert C. Mackey, Encyclopedia of Freemasonry and Its Kindred Sciences, http://www.phoenixmasonry.org/mackeys_encyclopedia/s.htm.

39. Charles E. Krausz, A Fast Pace Forward: Chronicles of American Podiatry (Philadelphia, PA: Pennsylvania College of Podiatric Medicine, 1987), 19.

40. Harris, Bogardus, and Labatt, San Francisco City Directory: For the Year Commencing October 1856 (San Francisco: Whitton, Towne & Co., 1856), 7; San Francisco Bulletin, May 2, 1856, 3.

41. Sacramento Daily Union, November 12, 1856, 3; San Joaquin Republican, November, 15, 1856, 2.

8

“Prince of chiropodists”

Back in New York in 1857, Issachar waited a year to set up shop as a chiropodist and instead opened a grocery at 129 Eighth Ave., while Elly went into business as a perfumer at 278½ Hudson.[1] A grocery store was not what we think of today. Issachar did not sell fruits and vegetables. A grocery store in mid–19th century was a general merchandise store. Issachar sold the same items that had made him rich in Stockton—cloth, pins and needles, ribbons, buttons, shoes, and other dry goods, patent medicines, and liquor.[2] A year later, he bought a three-story brick house at 760 Broadway between Eighth and Ninth streets (the site is now a Loft department store) and resumed his profession, “curing bunions and enlargements of the great toe” from his office and upstairs home.[3] His next door neighbors were Hegeman, Clark & Co. Druggists, whose Cod Liver Oil was “recommended by the most eminent physicians,” and a tailor shop.[4]

Broadway was New York City’s main artery, a bustling, hustling thoroughfare lined with wholesale and retail businesses. “There is no street in London that can be declared superior, or even equal, all things considered to Broadway,” wrote Charles Mackay, an English writer who visited the city in 1858. “It is a street sui generis.” In his mind, it was truly American. There was no “uniformity in the design of its long lines of buildings … each man builds exactly as he pleases … the total absence of plan and method … seems to be inevitable in a country where every man is a portion of the government and of the sovereignty, and considers himself bound to consult nobody’s taste but his own.”[5]

Early in the morning, horse-drawn carts and wagons brought food and other goods from the country to those hotels and markets along Broadway while the street was still navigable before the shops opened. Once the dawn hours faded and day took hold, the sidewalks swarmed with peddlers, financiers, and beggars. Newsboys and newsgirls, most of them Irish, peddled their papers on every corner and at the entrance of the main hotels. French, German, and Jewish dry goods jobbers, merchants, tobacconists, and other businessmen huddled together on six-cent - horse-drawn omnibuses on their way to work. By the early 1850s, those horse-drawn omnibuses were carrying over a hundred thousand passengers a day,[6] leaving tons of manure in their wake that had to be removed, stored, and disposed of. Around 9 a.m., professional men, lawyers, doctors, theatrical managers, and clergymen made their way to their offices and places of business. On an average weekday, fifteen thousand omnibuses and personal horse-drawn carriages rumbled across the Broadway and Fulton intersection.[7]

Further into the day, women in bustling crinolines clogged the streets. “As regards the mere volume and circumference of hoop or crinoline,” Charles Mackay chuckled, “the ladies of London and Paris are, to those of New York, but as butterflies compared with canary birds.”[8] The New York Tribune was less sanguine about the fashion. “There is not only a craze for crinoline here, but crinoline itself is crazy—huge, unwieldly, preposterous, and offensive,”[9] forcing gallant men in a hurry to zigzag around them, carefully stepping off the sidewalk onto the manure-laden road to pass.

Visiting the city from Cincinnati for the first time, Rabbi Isaac Wise mused, “the great characteristic of New York … is business. People, it appears, care less for wealth, or the enjoyment thereof, than they do for a position in the commercial world. Everybody aspires to the high position of being one of the greatest merchants, bankers, manufactures or shippers. The highest compliment you can bestow on a gentleman is to tell him you never saw an establishment so extensive and well managed as his own."[10] A hundred and fifty years later, listening to Jewish stand-up comic Jackie Mason, you'd think he was cribbing his routine from Rabbi Wise.

The city's great industry was making and selling clothes. Tens of thousands of New York's Jews worked as tailors, milliners, shirt makers, collar makers, embroiderers, and seamstresses. By 1860, New York was producing 40 percent of all the garments in America,[11] many of which were sent to Southern plantations to clothe slaves.

Broadway's "business palaces" were its magnificent hotels. When the rich and famous came to New York, they stayed at John Jacob Astor's 309 room six-story Astor House at 223 Broadway, the "wonder of strangers" when it opened in 1836.[12] Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, and John Calhoun were regular guests. Webster said, "he would stay at no other hotel." William Seward lived there for 30 years. Lincoln was a guest there in February 1860, when he came to New York to give his Cooper Union speech, and again a year later, in February 1861, on his way to Washington for his inauguration.[13]

Although still in the Bowery district, the swanky hotels in the "sunshine" part of the city were far above the "shadow" of Lower "Mannahatta," as Walt Whitman called the lower Bowery section. The lower Bowery was where New York's worst overcrowded slums were located. It was where drunks, derelicts, prostitutes, and German and Irish working-class immigrants eked out existence.[14] It was also where native-born and immigrant gangs battled for turf. In 1857, the Dead Rabbits gang from neighboring Five Points and the "Bowery B'hoys" mixed it up and splattered blood at the corner of Bayard and Bowery streets in what came to be called the "Dead Rabbit Riot," one of the Bowery's more vicious street fights.[15]

During the day, the Bowery was alive with the sights and sounds and smells of shoppers prowling for bargains on Chatham Street, the center for the city's second-hand goods trade. "Asked to name the street in New York where the greatest number of dirty shirts were bought and sold, chances are ten to one you would name Chatham," said a New Yorker.[16] With an underlying antipathy, later turned into self-deprecation by Jewish comedians, the same New Yorker described Chatham's typical Jewish shopkeeper. He is "a great artist, especially in coats. Step into the nearest clothing-store in Chatham street and slip on a coat—any coat—and we'll wager our wedding-suit it is a 'splendid fit.' There is no such thing as an ill-fitting coat in Chatham Street. Every coat there fits everybody."[17]

Jewish merchants selling or buying used clothing for resale had street stalls cheek by jowl next to fruit peddlers and food sellers and merchants hawking trinkets, tools, and every portable item that could possibly be sold or traded. A reporter for the Christian Register who praised Broadway's Jewish merchants for closing their shops on their Sabbath was dismayed at the "poorer and less educated portion of the race" who "avenge this ecclesiastically enforced reticence by keeping open their places of business on Sunday as we walk through Chatham street (in the Bowery)."[18]

At sundown, the stalls all closed. The lower Bowery was a dangerous place after dark. Men who had to travel downtown at night always carried guns.

* * * * * * * *

Unlike in San Francisco, Issachar wasn't the only chiropodist in New York, and not the only chiropodist on Broadway, for that matter. Further down the street at 516 Broadway, directly opposite the St. Nicholas Hotel, chiropodists Littlefield and Westervelt offered the same services and "provided a separate entrance and rooms for ladies." Further up the street at 821 Broadway near 12th, "Madame Berhard, Chiropodist" offered to remove corns, bunions, and nails "at a moderate charge."[19] At fashionable 74 Fifth Avenue, Issachar faced competition from "Dr. Schlosser," "chiropodist to his Majesty the King of Bavaria and many of the principal sovereigns and dignitaries of Europe."[20]

Issachar was no slouch when it came to crafting for himself what New York Times columnist David Brooks calls "résumé virtues," the skills one brings to the marketplace.[21] Issachar's fabrications had started with fake testimonials from Drs. Astley Paston Cooper and Valentine Mott and likely the Baltimore physicians he named in his earlier testimonials. He had lied about those associations. Why not about attaching the M.D. medical degree to his name? Anyone could call himself "Dr." There was no licensing requirement at the time for using that title. An M.D. after a name, on the other hand, was a title with prestige, backed by a university education.

Ironically, warning potential clients to be wary of "imposters who have from time to time, deceived the public," Issachar did just that. He tacked M.D. after his name and claimed he'd been awarded the degree from the Academy of Medicine in Havana, Cuba.[22] Making up bogus degrees from a foreign university is nothing new today. It is so common that the Federal Trade Commission has a booklet to help identify such fake degrees.[23] In Issachar's day, there was no Federal Trade Commission.

Issachar's claiming to have earned a degree from a Cuban university was ludicrous, but no one called him out on it. A degree from a foreign university has some plausibility if the person speaks the language of the country where that university is located. Issachar didn't speak or understand Spanish. He had never been to Cuba. Had he applied, he would not have been accepted. Havana's only medical school at San Jeronimo University, founded in 1842, only offered medical training and a medical degree after a preliminary four years of study in math, physics, chemistry, and other subjects.[24] By his own admission, Issachar said he had had very little formal education.[25] Issachar claimed he graduated in 1847 from the Cuban Academy of Medicine,[26] but the academy did not exist in 1847. It wasn't founded until 1861.[27]

No one could ever accuse Issachar of modesty. Once settled in his new office, he boasted how for the last 15 years as a "corn operator," he had earned the trust of everyone who had relied on his skill. Patients were welcomed at his office. If they preferred, he treated them in the privacy of their homes. His fee, he stated in his advertisements, was "quite moderate—trifling in deed, compared with the relief and satisfaction he affords the sufferer." He was also "happy" to look after their feet on a yearly contract.[28]

Despite these fabrications, Issachar's chiropodist skills were undeniable. The New York Atlas editorialized that New York's "professors of chiropody" were society's patrons and the best of these "Benefactors of the Human Race" was Dr. Zacharie of 760 Broadway, "the most successful [corn] operator of his class" the city had ever known. "We have tried him to our satisfaction and relief, [and]we would say to the army of sufferers from corns and bunions—go do likewise."[29] The New York Atlas was a Sunday-only newspaper with a circulation of 3,500, second only to the 9,000-copy Sunday edition of the New York Herald. Issachar beamed at the accolade and reprinted it in his certificate book.[30]

William Cullen Bryant, poet and editor of the New York Evening Post, was especially effusive in praising Issachar. “An indefatigable walker,” Bryant “tramped” three miles every morning along the Hudson River from his home to his office in downtown Manhattan and three miles back at night. He kept up that journey for 50 years, not to mention his afternoon strolls. Walt Whitman recalled munching on bread and sausage with Bryant as they strolled through Flatbush. On one particularly long outing, Bryant walked 40 miles.[31]

Bryant had mixed feelings about Jews. Jews were “noble” and spiritual, had strong family ties, and a “disposition to triumph by intellect rather than violence,” he said, but they also had an “unquenchable lust for lucre” and were like snakes “in search of prey.”[32] But when it came to his feet, Bryant wasn’t aware or didn’t care that Issachar was Jewish. All he cared about was Issachar’s guarantee he could relieve his troublesome corns, bunions, and ingrown toenails “in five minutes, without pain, so that the boot can be worn immediately without the least inconvenience to the patient.”

Bryant was so satisfied and impressed with Issachar’s skill that he wrote several articles on chiropody and became one of the Jewish chiropodist’s most ardent boosters. “Treatment of diseases of the feet,” Bryant editorialized, demanded “as delicate a hand, as nice a judgment, and as much anatomical knowledge, as that of diseases of the eye,”[33] Dr. Zacharie at 760 Broadway was “one of the best practitioners of the profession” he had ever seen. “He has no secrets or nostrums, depending entirely for success upon his knowledge of the structure of the human foot and the consummate dexterity of his operations. He coaxes out a corn by solicitations so gentle you feel absolutely refreshed while the operation is going on…. If you have a diseased nail, he will peel it from the toe with as much expedition as he might peel an orange and without drawing blood or giving pain.”[34] Dr. Zacharie should be seen by everyone suffering from “all that torture and annoyance which those afflicted with corns are condemned to suffer.” Dr. Zacharie is “the prince of chiropodists.”[35]

Zacharie in middle age, "A prince of chiropodists" (courtesy the collection of Robert Marcus).

A journalist for the Washington Constitution brought a friend to see Issachar about a toenail that was causing him pain and was similarly impressed. The toenail wasn't the problem. It was a corn growing under it. The only way to relieve the pain, Issachar explained, was to remove the nail to get at the corn underneath.

The patient blanched at the anticipated pain. The only way the corn could be removed from beneath the nail, he thought, was if Dr. Zacharie ripped the nail out with forceps. When Issachar assured him he could remove the nail without pulling it out, the corn-sufferer still hesitated, but held out his foot.

Issachar was as good as his promise. As the trembling patient looked away, he dissected the nail from the toe and removed the corn in less than five minutes. Minutes later, the patient walked out of Issachar's office, thanking him profusely for taking care of his corn so painlessly.[36]

* * * * * * * *

Issachar could have been satisfied with the praise he had earned by his adroit skill, but he had a deep longing for public recognition beyond kudos from Bryant and other appreciative patients. He longed to be respected by men he respected. Fudging (a euphemism for lying) about one's background was no different in Issachar's day than it is today. According to "HireRight.com," about a third of job applicants lie on their résumés. The most common lies concern education and job titles.

Not being challenged about his fake medical testimonials and medical degree emboldened Issachar even more. He felt he had no reason to fear being held to account for his next elaborate fabrication, a full-length book about problems affecting the feet and how chiropodists such as himself treated them. The long-winded title of his 96-page opus was Surgical and Practical Observations on the Diseases of the Human Foot, With Instructions for Their Treatment. To Which Is Added Advice on the Management of the Hand. Illustrations with Six Colored Plates, By I. Zacharie, Surgeon Chiropodist.[37]

When the book came out in 1860, Issachar was so well-known in New York that notices for the book simply advertised it as "Zacharie on the Foot." The New York Tribune told its readers, "among the books upon our table we find a small, neatly bound volume entitled Zacharie on the Foot, which contains a surgical and practical treatise on the diseases of the human foot and the proper remedies for their cure."[38]

William Bryant captioned his review of Issachar's book "The Poetry of the Foot." One would scarcely look into a book bearing this prosaic title for anything like poetry or entertaining reading material:

> "Yet Mr. Zacharie manages to combine both with his 'surgical and practical observations. Of course, it is to the latter that the little volume, with its handsomely colored illustrations, is chiefly devoted.
>
> "Mr. Zacharie gives a lucid account of the diseases to which the foot is subject, and maintains that the chiropodist is as necessary and important a member of the great body of men who have devoted their lives to the healing art, as the dentist. Fortunately, diseases of the foot are not as common as disease of the teeth, and thus there will fewer interested in the book than would otherwise be the case; but all those who haves suffered from their feet will be anxious to see what an experienced and successful chiropodist like Dr. Zacharie has to say on the matter. For others we extract the following chapter on THE POETRY OF THE FEET."

The excerpts included several passages from Shakespeare's plays.[39]

What would Bryant's reaction have been had he known Issachar had copied, almost word for word, Lewis Durlacher's 1845 book, A Treatise on Corns, Bunions, the Diseases of Nails, and the General Management of the Feet?[40] Even his title and dedication were copied from John Eisenberg's book, Surgical and Practical Observations on the Diseases of the Human Foot, also published in 1845.[41] Many years later, when Issachar published a second edition of his book in 1876, his title page read "New York, 1844—revised London 1876." Issachar deliberately misdated the first edition to leave the impression Durlacher and Eisenberg had copied him, rather than the opposite.[42] Issachar also backdated the fake testimonial from Dr. Valentine Mott dated 1858 in the 1860 version to 1844, but he made a careless mistake. The second edition, with the altered 1844 date, was dedicated to "Valentine Mott…. Emeritus Professor of Operatic Surgery." Mott didn't become "emeritus" until 1849.

SURGICAL AND PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

ON THE

Diseases of the Human Foot,

WITH

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THEIR TREATMENT.

Illustrated with Twenty-Seven Plates.

BY I. ZACHARIE,

SURGEON ORTHOPÆDIST,

Late Chiropodist-General, United States Army.

NEW-YORK, 1844.

REVISED. LONDON, 1876.

Title page of Zacharie's book. Note the back-dated 1844 notation.

* * * * * * * *

Issachar's early goal in life had been to accumulate wealth. Now that he had it, he set his sights on climbing New York's social ladder. Social advancement was not easy. "American society rigidly observed the principle that it took at least three generations to produce a gentleman, the minimum prerequisite for acceptance into higher society."[43] One of his first efforts in social advancement was changing his surname from Zachariah to Zacharie[44] and jettisoning his "Jr." suffix.

A name is a person's identity. When Issachar changed his from Zachariah to Zacharie, it was not a minor change. For Issachar, it meant a new identity, a way of reinventing himself. His new name reflected the person he wanted other people to be thinking about when they spoke about him. It may also have been a business decision. By the 1850s, more than a million Germans, Jews, and gentiles had immigrated to the United States. Zachariah was a Jewish surname; Zacharie was German.[45] The image of the German-Jew in the 1850s was success. By then, there was a widespread conviction in America that someone with a German-Jewish name "would not disappoint."[46] Jewish community life in America derived much of its vibrance from the streets. Although Jews sold to gentiles more often than they sold to Jews, Jews preferred to buy and sell to other Jews. Networking, to use a modern term, was inherently a way of sustaining in-group connectedness and cohesion.[47] Changing his name from the Sephardic Zachariah to the Ashkenazi Zacharie was a way to encourage the now-predominantly German Jewish immigrants to patronize his business.

Dropping the "jr." suffix was similarly psychological and pragmatic. A "jr." implies much more than simple descent. It implies certain attributes. A "jr." is not just someone younger than the person he is named after. It implies someone lacking experience, someone in a father's shadow. Author Henry James hated being a "junior." He felt the name robbed him of his own identity; it made him feel diminished.[48]

Albert Arnold Gore, Jr., the 45th vice president of the United States, held onto his "junior" suffix when he ran for the House of Representatives and the Senate, but when he first campaigned for president, Gore dropped the "Jr." from his name because it called attention to his youthfulness. Despite jettisoning his own suffix, Gore juniored his first-born son. "Chatterbox" journalist Timothy Noah found Gore's naming his son "jr." "hard to understand, since Gore must have personally experienced the diminishment that comes from being a Junior."[49] Issachar Zacharie was not someone to let himself feel diminished in his own eyes or anyone else's.

Holding on to his "jr." would also have identified him as Sephardic. Ashkenazis do not name their children after living relatives. A name like Dr. Zacharie, Jr., would have labeled him Sephardic. Dr. Zacharie without "the jr." was Ashkenazi. Despite abandoning his public Sephardic name, privately, Issachar held on to the Sephardic naming custom of not giving children traditional Ashkenazi Jewish names. When Issachar's and Mary Ann's fifth daughter was born in New York in 1858, they gave her the very un–Jewish name of Victoria Mariposa. Mariposa was the name of a gold mine on the river near Stockton where a lump of gold weighting a 130 pounds had been found.[50]

Acceptance into New York society also required conspicuous consumption. Issachar had to demonstrate his wealth. He had to be known as a somebody, someone who lived in luxury, gave lavish parties, and dressed extravagantly for his new social status to be visible. Issachar began dressing ostentatiously, wearing a "dazzling diamond breast pin."[51]

Mary Ann was no longer expected to be a housewife, cleaning the house, cooking and serving meals, and washing and ironing clothes. To be taken seriously by upper class society, the Zacharies had to have servants to do the household work. Mary Ann had to be a woman of domestic leisure. Soon after moving into his new home, Issachar placed a series of advertisements beginning with a "servant girl of all work." When he could not find someone "for all work," his next advertisements were for waiters, waitresses and cooks, "for a private family," and a nursemaid, "who understands the care of children," and a woman who could wash, iron and sew the family's clothes at her own residence. Applicants had to be "nice" and "clean,"[52] with a "kind and obliging disposition." None need apply unless they "understand their business." Those hired would be paid "the best of wages."[53]

When Issachar began hosting parties for New York's prominent elite, none of the cooks he'd hired satisfied him. Supposing foreign born cooks would be more up to the job, his next advertisement for a cook stipulated she should be "an English or German woman." When none of the women who applied seemed suitable, Issachar dropped the nationality requirement, although someone English or German was preferable. The most important qualifications were that she be "a good cook," "well recommended,"[54] someone "who understands cooking in all its branches, such as meats (and) pastry."[55]

Issachar was very demanding and not easily satisfied. Even if the food were cooked to perfection, Issachar's reputation as a gracious, elegant host would be slighted if the food he offered his guests was not served with aplomb. None of the waiters, "colored," "English" or "German" who applied seemed competent. Frustrated at their inexperience, Issachar's next advertisements clearly stipulated the prospective candidate had to "understand his business." He had to be able take full charge of parlors and dining room," including "how to make fires." Issachar was taking no chances. The applicant had to be "well recommended."[56]

Young boys hired to do odd jobs were just as hard to keep. In February 1859, Issachar was looking to hire "a smart, active colored boy from 13 to 18 to attend door and make himself generally useful." "Generally useful" meant "nice," "tidy," and willing to pick up around his office, as well as watching who came through the front door.[57]

* * * * * * * *

Hiring a "Colored Woman; one who is a good cook" meant he did not keep kosher. Issachar was not a practicing Jew. He was married to a Christian, and his children were presumably raised as Christians (with one exception, they would all marry Christians). He ignored the constraints and rituals of Jewish belief, but not its identity or solidarity. Whatever else, he considered himself a Jew. As such, he maintained an abiding interest in what was happening in the Jewish world. In the days before television and radio, when transportation between cities was measured in days, not hours, when news from Europe could take weeks to come to America, newspapers and periodicals were the only way people could learn what was happening in their communities across the country and the world. In 1858, an incident far off in Italy horrified the Jewish world.

Acting on Catholic canon law, Italian police had forcibly removed Edgardo Mortara, a six-year-old Jewish boy, from his parents in the Italian city of Bologna and placed him in a convent to be raised as a Catholic. The abduction was based on his nursemaid's testimony that she had secretly baptized the boy when he was one year old and sick, and in the nursemaid's belief, he was about to die.

The kidnapping galvanized Jews across America. A mass meeting of over three thousand Jews was held at Mozart Hall in New York to protest the outrage. An appeal was sent to President

James Buchanan to intervene. The do-nothing president declined, saying he had no authority to intervene in the affairs of another country. In 1859, a Jewish delegation headed by Sir Moses Montefiore unsuccessfully met with Pope Pius IX to arrange the return of the boy to his family. Years later, Mortara became a missionary. Despite his Catholic identity, he still remembered his mother and attended her funeral in 1895.[58]

Issachar could read about what was happening in the United States and Europe in New York's 13 daily English language newspapers[59] and its various weekly and monthly periodicals. But the best way to keep abreast of momentous events like the Mortara case was through New York's Jewish newspaper, The Jewish Messenger. In 1858, the secular Dr. Zacharie took out a subscription.[60]

---

1. J. F. Trow, Trow's New York City Directory, 1857–1858 (New York: J. F. Trow), 911.
2. Franklin Ellis, History of Cattaraugus Co., New York (Philadelphia, PA: L. H. Everts, 1879), 445.
3. New York Herald, May 10, 1858, 5.
4. New York Evangelist, January 8,1857, 5; New York Herald, January 7, 1858, 6.
5. Charles Mackay, Life and Liberty in America (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1859), 16–17. The New York Times editorialized that a New Yorker who returned after a five-year absence would hardly recognize the changes "in the business character of Broadway," the city's backbone.
6. Burrows and Wallace, Gotham, 653.
7. Ibid.
8. Mackay, Life and Liberty, 18; New York Tribune, January 9, 1858, 3.
9. New York Tribune, January 9, 1858, 3.
10. The Israelite, June 24, 1864, 412.
11. Burrows and Wallace, Gotham, 664.
12. Mackay, Life and Liberty, 18.
13. Robert Edwin Dietz, and Frederick Dietz. 1913: A Leaf from the Past. Then and Now (New York: R. E. Dietz Company, 1914), 69.
14. Walt Whitman, Leaves of Grass, "Mannahatta" (Philadelphia: David McKay, c. 1900), 161.
15. New York Times, July 6, 1857, 1. The Irish and Germans had their own tenement enclaves in the Bowery. The Irish lived in the very low part of the Bowery; the German neighborhoods were to the north. The middle classes lived above Bleeker Street; wealthy New Yorkers lived above 14th. JoAnne O'Connell, The Life and Songs of Stephen Foster: A Revealing Portrait of the Forgotten (Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2016), 308.
16. George G. Foster, New York in Slices (NY: W. F. Burgess, 1849), 13–146, quoted in Rudolf Glanz, Studies in Judaic Americana (New York: Ktav Publishing House, 1970), 163.
17. Ibid., 127.
18. Quoted in Alexandria Gazette, October 22, 1858, 1.
19. New York Herald, May 6, 1858, 9; New York Tribune, April 30, 1858, 1.
20. New York Times, September 7,1859, 5.
21. David Brooks, The Road to Character (New York: Random House, 2015).
22. Washington (DC) Daily Union, January 13, 1847, 1.
23. Federal Trade Commission, "FTC Issues Facts for Business Guide on Avoiding Fake Degrees," February 2005, www.ftc.gov/opa/2005/02/diplomamills.htm.
24. Angelo Baracca, Jungen Renn, and Helge Vendt (eds.), The History of Physics in Cuba (New York: Springer, 2014), 75.
25. Zacharie, letter to General Banks, December, 28, 1863, Banks Papers, Box 30.
26. The Real Academia de Ciencias, Medicas, Physicas y Naturales de la Habana (Royal Academy of Medical, Physical and Natural Sciences of Havana). http://www.academiaciencias.cu/index.php?lang=en.
27. Ibid.
28. New York Evening Post, March 17, 1858, 3; New York Times, February 11, 1858, 3.
29. New York Atlas, August 29, 1858.
30. Zacharie, Corns, 8–9.
31. Gilbert H. Muller, William Cullen Bryant: Author of America (Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 2008), 74.
32. Robert Michael and Philip Rosen, Dictionary of Antisemitism: From the Earliest Times to the Present (Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press, 2007), 75.
33. New York Evening Post, February 19, 1859, 3. Issachar reproduced Bryant's article in Corns, 7–8.
34. Ibid.
35. Ibid., December 5, 1859, 2.

36. Washington (DC) Constitution, January 8, 1861, 3.
37. I. Zacharie, Surgical and Practical Observations on the Diseases of the Human Foot, with Instructions for Their Treatment. To Which Is Added Advice on the Management of the Hand. Illustrations with Six Colored Plates (New York: Charles B. Norton, 1860).
38. New York Daily Tribune, August 22, 1860, 1; Washington (DC) Constitution, January 8, 1861, 3.
39. New York Evening Post, October 25, 1860, 1.
40. Durlacher, A Treatise on Corns.
41. John Eisenberg, Surgical and Practical Observations. For a detailed comparison of other portions Issachar plagiarized from Eisenberg, see Robert Schosteck, "Dr. Zacharie as an Author," American Jewish Archives, document SC-13336.
42. J. Colin Dagnall, "The history of Chiropodial Literature," The Chiropodist 20 (July, 1965), 173–184; J. C. Dagnall, "Issachar Zacharie (1827–1900)," British Journal of Chiropody 22 (1957), 228–231).
43. Glanz, Studies, 132.
44. Perhaps he would not have been so willing to change his name had he been aware that a "Doctor Zacharie" is a disreputable Jewish anatomist in a late 16th-century novel by Thomas Nashe.
45. Rudolf Glanz, "German-Jewish Names in America," Jewish Social Studies 23 (July 1961), 143–169.
46. Glanz, Studies, 292.
47. Hasia. R. Diner, "Buying and Selling 'Jewish.' The Historical Impact of Commerce on Jewish Communal life," in Jack Wertheim (ed.), Imagining the American Jewish Community (Waltham, MA: Brandeis University Press, 2007), 28, 41.
48. Leon Edel, Henry James. The Untried Years (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott, 1953), 57.
49. Timothy Noah, "When Junior is President, Part 1," http://www.slate.com/articles/news_and_politics/chatterbox/2000/10/when_junior_is_president_part_1.html, October 25, 2000, accessed August 6,2013.
50. Daily Alta California, April 27, 1850, 3.
51. New York Herald, October 3, 1862, 5; November 17, 1863, 7.
52. Ibid., November 17, 1859, 6.
53. Ibid., June 1, 1858, 8; June 14, 1858, 6; December 12, 1859, 7.
54. Ibid., June 1, 1858, 8; June 14, 1858, 6.
55. Ibid., January 29, 1859, 7; February 23, 1859, 7; May 20, 1859, 7.
56. Ibid., August 26, 1858, 7; October 5,1858, 8; December 7, 1858, 6; January 26, 1859, 7; October 21, 1859, 7.
57. Ibid., February 4, 1859, 7; August 14,1860, 6.
58. Gotthard Deutsch, "Mortara Case," Jewish Encyclopedia (New York: Funk and Wagnalls, 1905), Vol. 9, 36.
59. New York Commercial Advertiser, The Evening Post, New York Herald, New York Journal of Commerce, New York Daily Era, New York Daily News, New York Journal, New York Transcript, The Sun, The New York Times, and the New York Tribune.
60. "Payments," The Jewish Messenger, October 8, 1858, 62. The Jewish Messenger began publication in 1857 as a semimonthly newspaper and quickly became a weekly. Edited by Samuel Myer Isaacs, it covered topics concerning Jews in America and Europe. It was anti–Reform in religious issues, and politically, strongly abolitionist.

9

The Mystic Cords of Memory

Washington was enjoying a balmy spring during the first days of April 1861. Temperatures were in the 60s and 70s. The magnolia trees were just about to blossom. It should have been another pleasant season in the nation's capital, but instead, it was in turmoil. Reacting to the election of the "Black Republican" Abraham Lincoln in November 1860, seven Southern states[1] had declared themselves separated from the United States and had formed a new nation, the Confederate States of America.

President-elect Abraham Lincoln declared no state had the right to secede. No government, he said, provided for its own demise. During his inauguration speech, he had stated that as president, he had an obligation to "hold, occupy, and possess (the) property, and places belonging to the government, and to collect the duties and imposts, but beyond what may been necessary for these objects … there will be no invasion of any state—no use of force against, or among the people anywhere."[2]

Speaking directly to the South, Lincoln said, "in your hands, my dissatisfied fellow countrymen, and not in mine, is the momentous issue of civil war." Lincoln closed his address with memorable words: "We are not enemies, but friends. We must not be enemies. Though passion may have strained, it must not break our bonds of affection. The mystic chords of memory, stretching from every battle-field, and patriot grave, to every living heart and hearthstone, all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union, when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature."[3]

When Issachar woke on the morning of April 12, 1861, the better angels had taken flight. America was at war with itself. The new Confederacy had demanded the surrender of Fort Sumter, in Charleston Harbor. When that demand was refused, at 4:30 a.m., the "friends" became "enemies." General Pierre Gustave Toutant Beauregard, commanding the Confederate battery at Charleston, gave the signal to open fire. Moments later, a ten-inch mortar exploded above Fort Sumter. Confederate batteries then began pounding the fort into rubble. Major Robert Anderson, commanding officer at Fort Sumter, ordered his men to return fire, but the fort's guns did little damage to the opposing batteries. After 33 hours of back-and-forth Union and Confederate cannonade, with more than 4,000 shells being fired, Anderson surrendered the fort on April 14, 1861.

The following day, Lincoln called on each loyal state's militias to provide 75,000 volunteers to suppress the insurrection. "The insurgents [had] committed the flagrant act of civil war" by firing on the fort, said Lincoln, severing "hope of immediate conciliation."[4] Each state was given a quota of men to militarize. New York was charged with providing 17 regiments (approximately 13,000 men). Enlistments were to last for only three months, long enough, Lincoln believed, to restore the Union. That in turn resulted in four more Southern states declaring their independence from the Union and throwing in with the Confederacy.[5]

* * * * * * * *

At the start of the war, and for its duration, Issachar's father, his brother Eleazar, his sisters and their families were all living in the South and were as Southern in their views as their gentile neighbors. Southern Jews had made comfortable lives for themselves. Most had some kind of small business, but there were also Jews who were politicians and civic leaders, delegates to state conventions, chairmen of local political parties, active members of local Chambers of Commerce and various social and civic organizations, and members of Congress. Despite an undercurrent of anti–Semitism prevalent wherever they lived, the South's Jews regarded themselves as Southerners who were Jewish, not just Jews who lived in the South.

Speaking to a crowd of Jews and Christians at the dedication for Beth Elohim in 1841, Charleston's Rabbi Gustavus Poznanski had expressed a widely held sentiment among Charleston's Jews. "This synagogue is our temple," he told the crowd, "this city (is) our Jerusalem, this happy land our Palestine. And as our fathers defended with their lives that temple, that city and that land, so will our sons defend this temple, this city and this land."[6] Those sentiments were as true in 1861 as they were in 1841.

In late 1860, Issachar's father and his brother Eleazar had moved from Savannah back to Charleston. In January 1861, they both enlisted in the Charleston Home Guard in anticipation of imminent civil war.[7] Jonathan was almost 70 years old at the time. Enlisting in the guard was a pure act of Southern patriotism. As a British or Polish citizen, and at an age "not liable to ordinary militia duty," he was exempt from service. But like many Jews who had spent much of their lives in the South, Jonathan felt the same patriotic devotion as those who were born there.

The Home Guard was a mainly Jewish voluntary police force of 30 mostly elderly men, several with white hair and whiskers, uniformed in long overcoats of homespun gray. It was captained by Myer Jacobs. M. Erlich was the guard's sergeant. Other members included J. Cohen, S. Cohen, C. Hyman, L. Rich, M. Rich, J. Triest, J. Volaski, J Wetherhahn, M. Wetherhahn, and E(leazar) and J(onathan) Zachariah. Jacobs was subsequently raised to the rank of colonel, but he died a few months later in November 1861.[8]

Some members of the Home Guard were Charleston's "oldest and wealthiest citizens, merchants, physicians, clergymen, lawyers, down to the humblest individuals in our community." All were "animated by the single motive of patriotism." When the war erupted, they all pledged to remain in the guard until the "young men on active duty shall return to their homes, and no further call shall be made upon them for service out of the city." One of General Beauregard's batteries pounding Fort Sumter into submission was commanded by Jewish Lieutenant Isaac Valentine.[9] After the fort surrendered, Anderson's garrison was ferried aboard the Isabel to a federal fleet outside the harbor. The Isabel was owned by one-time immigrant German peddler and now Charleston's shipping tycoon Moses Cohen Mordecai, who named it after his mother.[10] In December 1861, after the Charleston Home Guard was merged into the Regiment of Reserves,[11] Jonathan returned to Savannah to live with his daughters and their families. As a 30-year-old, Eleazar was subject to the draft but never seems to have served in the regular Confederate army.

Jews, it has been said, are like everyone else, only more so.[12] Jews in the South sincerely believed in the South's deeply held principle of states' rights. They did not question whether slavery was right or wrong; they simply accepted it as part of the Southern way of life. Southern Jews fought to preserve the South's customs and institutions, including its caste system, with the same patriotic fervor as gentile Southerners. They wore the same uniforms. They served as privates and officers. They dug latrines, drove wagons, did picket duty, killed and died for their commitment to the South in the same percentages as gentiles.[13] Rabbi Max Michelbacher of Beth Ahabah Synagogue in Richmond, the Confederacy's capital, published a prayer for the Confederacy's soldiers that began with the Sh'ma, the watchword of the Jewish faith and the oldest prayer in Judaism. It is the only prayer specifically commanded in the Bible (Deuteronomy 6:4–9) to be recited in the morning after one gets up and at night before one goes to sleep.[14]

Southern women as a whole, Jewish and gentile, were just as resolute and vocal in backing the Confederate cause. Phoebe Yates Levy Pember, a member of an elite Jewish family in Charleston, recalled how the "women of the South had been openly and violently rebellious from the moment they thought their states' rights touched…. They were the first to rebel—the last to succumb."[15] In Richmond, Catherine Moses told her son Ezekiel "she would not own a son who would not fight for his home and country."[16] Before the war, Southern women would never have imagined themselves doing tasks they readily committed themselves to in support of the war effort. Throughout the South, they rolled up their ruffled sleeves and roughened their hands making cartridges, rolling bandages, sewing uniforms, knitting socks and gloves, and assembling sandbag fortifications. They formed their own women's auxiliaries and organized clothing collections, solicited donations for families of soldiers, cared for wounded soldiers in their homes, and did whatever else they could for the cause. Some Northern generals believed their efforts in support of the Confederacy prolonged the war.[17] In New Orleans, teenager Clara Solomon railed at how Northerners were "raging an unholy and unrighteous war against us." In November 1861, just after leaving services at the Sephardic Dispersed of Judah, Clara and her friends and families and thousands of others cheered as the "grand review" of local soldiers marched down Canal Street. Clara beamed with pride at seeing her cousin, Samuel Myers, F Company, 4th Louisiana, at the head of his company imagining them pitching into the Yankees and giving them "a sound thrashing."[18]

Northern Jews were not under the same pressures to conform. Like other Northerners, they held different views of slavery. Three of the North's best-known Orthodox rabbis, Morris Raphall in New York, Isaac Leeser in Philadelphia, and Reform Rabbi Isaac Meyer Wise in Cincinnati, the editor of The Israelite, preached slavery was not a sin.[19] Rabbis David Einhorn and Abraham B. Arnold in Baltimore, Sabato Morais in Philadelphia, and Liebman Adler in Chicago preached against slavery. Prominent Jews who did not openly condemn slavery were singled out as Christ killers by fire-breathing abolitionists. The abolitionist editor of the Liberator, William Lloyd Garrison, viciously attacked Mordecai Manuel Noah (1785–1851), calling him a "miscreant Jew," a "Shylock," an "enemy of Christ and Liberty," and "the lineal descendant of the monsters who nailed Jesus to the cross."[20] Isaac Meyer Wise in turn vilified abolitionists, calling them warmongers. It wasn't Lincoln's election, he said, that threatened the destruction of the Union—it was Lincoln's and his supporters' "irrepressible conflict doctrine."[21]

As the editor of the *Jewish Messenge*r, Myers Samuel Isaacs had the largest forum. Isaacs was against slavery but refrained from publishing letters for or against the institution. Isaacs insisted America's religious leaders should keep religion out of politics. His Jewish Messenger largely avoided political commentary not involving Jewish issues, but after Fort Sumter was shelled, on April 26, 1861, Isaacs wrote an editorial urging all Jews to "stand by the flag." Shreveport Louisiana's Jewish congregation responded to Isaac's editorial with a resolution rejecting Isaac's exhortation and wrote Isaacs that it was discontinuing its subscription to the J*ewish Messenger* and all Northern papers opposed to "our holy cause." Isaacs chuckled when he read the rebuke. Only one of Shreveport's Jews subscribed to the Messenger, and he hadn't paid his bill for two years.[22] Later on in the war, Isaac Meyer Wise did a complete 180 degree turn in his admiration for Lincoln, even to the point of maintaining Lincoln was a Jew. In a eulogy he delivered after the assassination, Wise told his congregants, “Abraham Lincoln believed himself to be bone from our bone and flesh from our flesh. Wise said Lincoln supposed himself to be of Hebrew parentage. He said so in my presence. And, indeed, he preserved numerous features of the Hebrew race, both in countenance and character.”[23] When asked about Lincoln’s Judaism, his son Robert answered it was the first he had heard about it.[24]

1. South Carolina (December 20, 1860), Mississippi (January 9, 1861), Florida (January 10, 1861), Alabama (January 11, 1861), Georgia (January 19, 1861), Louisiana (January 26, 1861), and Texas (February 1, 1861).

2. Roy Basler (ed.), Collected Works of Abraham Lincoln (New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1953), Vol. 4, 254, 330.

3. Basler, Collected Works, 4:271. Lincoln refused to use the term "Confederacy," since that would give it some semblance of legitimacy.

4. Ibid., 5, 241.

5. Virginia (April 17, 1861), Arkansas (May 6, 1861), North Carolina (May 20, 1861), and Tennessee (June 8, 1861).

6. Quoted in Rosen, Jewish Confeder-ates, 1.

7. Charleston Courier, January 11, 1861; May 2, 1861; Charleston Mercury, November 29, 1861, 2.

8. Charleston Mercury, January 12, 1861, 2; "Charleston Under Arms," Atlantic Monthly, August 1861.

9. Rosen, Jewish Confederates, 393, n121. Valentine was killed in action in June 1862, as was Rabbi Poznanaski's son, Gustavus, Jr. Charleston Mercury, June 21, 1862, 2).

10. Rosen, Jewish Confederates, 2, 9.

11. Charleston Courier, December 11, 1861, 1.

12. Edward S. Shapiro, We Are Many (Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 2005), 171; Amos Oz and Fania Oz-Salzberger, Jews and Words (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2012), 147.

13. The number of Jews who served in the Confederate army is estimated at 2,000 to 3,000. Jews serving in the Union army are estimated at 7,000. Simon Wolf, The American Jew as Patriot, Soldier and Citizen (New York: Brentano, 1895); Simonhoff, Jewish Participants, 21–28.

14. Rosen, Jewish Confederates, 382. The words are "Sh'ma Yisra'el, Adonai Eloheinu, Adonai Echad" ("Hear, Israel, the Lord is our God, the Lord is One").

15. Marcie Ferris Cohen and Mark I. Greenberg, Jewish Roots in Southern Soil (Waltham MA: Brandeis University, 2006), 114.

16. Ibid.

17. M. I. Greenberg, "Becoming Southern: The Jews of Savannah, Georgia, 1830–70," American Jewish History 86 (March 1998), 68.

18. Elliott Ashkenazi, The Civil War Diary of Clara Solomon (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1995), 264.

19. For Northern and Southern rabbis on the slavery issue, see Korn, American Jewry, 15–55.

20. Rosen, Jewish Confederates, 38; Jonathan D. Sarna (ed.), Jews and the Civil War: A Reader (New York: New York University Press, 2011), 231.

21. On Wise's views of slavery and abolition, see Sefton D. Temkin, "Isaac Mayer Wise and the Civil War," in Sarna and Mendelson, Jews and the Civil War, 161–180. Two weeks after Lincoln was elected in 1860, Wise said, the "the people of the United States just committed one of the greatest blunders a nation can commit." The Israelite, November 30, 1860, reprinted in Zola, We Called Him Rabbi, 201.

22. Jewish Messenger, June 7, 1861, 172.

23. Funeral Address By Rabbi Isaac M Wise, Delivered at Lodge Street Temple, Cincinnati Ohio, April 19, 1865, Jewish-American History Foundation, http://www.jewish-history.com/civilwar/lincoln_eulogy.html, accessed 12/1/2017.

24. Isaac Markens, "Lincoln and the Jews," Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society 17 (1909), 109.

10

“A chiropodist of marvelous skill”

On Monday, April 15, 1861, the same day Lincoln called for volunteers, New York City’s wealthiest businessmen and most influential citizens met on Pine Street to organize a huge mass meeting in support of the Union, to take place the following Saturday “We are either for the country or for its enemies,” the Chamber of Commerce’s president declared.[1]

A day later, after New York State’s Legislature voted to call out its state militias, Colonel Marshall Lefferts, the commanding officer of the 7th militia, one of the city’s oldest and best-known militia units, sent word to his men to prepare to leave for Washington. The 7th militia was known as the “Silk Stocking Regiment” and the “Blue Bloods” because it was made up of so many of the city’s social elite, men whose surnames were Vanderbilt, Tiffany, Van Buren, Fish, and Hamilton. On Friday, April 19, the 1,050-man militia gathered at the armory in Tompkins Market and mustered into federal service as the 7th New York Militia Regiment.

At 4 p.m., Issachar Zacharie looked on as the “Blue Bloods” marched past his office at 760 Broadway toward the ferry that would take them across the Hudson River to the train depot and on to Washington. Perhaps he recognized several of the men marching by. The day before they left, he had advertised “he was willing to give the country the benefit of his professional services,” offering to “relieve” all the men in the 7th Regiment and all men enlisting in every other New York volunteer regiment of their corns and bunions “gratis” if they visited his office between 4 and 9 p.m.[2]

The same day the “Blue Bloods” were mustered, the first blood of the Civil War was shed. The 6th Massachusetts Volunteer Militia had been the first state militia to answer Lincoln’s call for volunteers. The unit was changing trains in Baltimore on its way to Washington when it was attacked by a jeering mob of secessionists. At first, the mob threw bricks. Then someone fired at the soldiers. The soldiers fired back. When the mêlée ended, four militia men and nine of their assailants were dead, and many more were wounded.

Word of the mêlée quickly spread across the nation. Tempers flared as both sides accused the other of provoking the riot.[3] In New York City, all businesses closed at 2 p.m. Many of the merchants gathered for a scheduled meeting or had at least one representative there. The organizers of the rally had intended it to show that “the chief representatives of [the city’s] wealth and influence” supported the war effort.[4]

New York City and its boroughs would eventually send 22 infantry regiments of about one thousand men each to war. The most colorful regiments were the Zouaves, known for their distinctive dark blue jackets with red trim, red sashes with blue trim, baggy red pantaloons, and yellow tasseled red fezs. The 11th New York Infantry, composed of firemen from around the city, was organized by Colonel Elmer Ellsworth, a personal friend of President Lincoln, and was popularly called “Ellsworth’s Zouaves” and the “Fire Zou Zous.” Another Zouave unit, the 6th New York Volunteers, popularly known as “Billy Wilson’s Zouaves,” was manned by gang members and criminals from the Bowery.

* * * * * * * *

By the second year of the Civil War, the North was reeling from setback after setback.

Everyone had envisioned a short war. Both sides had believed it would be over by Christmas. Northerners had been confident their superior manpower and industrial strength would bring the South to its knees and the country would be reunited in short order. The North had four times the population as the South. It had an overwhelming advantage in money. It had more industrial muscle. Its factories turned out more guns and heavy weaponry, more boots and shoes, more cloth for uniforms and tents. It had more trains and more ships. It could move more troops and supplies and transport them faster to wherever they were needed. It had a navy that hemmed in the South's major ports. The South believed it had the upper hand. It had the better military leaders. It had men who had grown up with guns and riding horses. It had shorter supply lines. For the South, it would be a defensive war.

In the first two years of the war, the South was not only holding out, but it was also beating the North. The war was turning into a bloodbath. Thousands of husbands and sons had been killed or maimed. There was no end in sight. Despite all its advantages, the North was losing. As more and more dispiriting news about the war sapped Northern morale, Issachar left New York for Washington, confident he could help the war effort.

Issachar believed the Army of the Potomac had what Lincoln called the "slows" because its soldiers were plagued by corns and bunions. Dr. Zacharie, said the Indiana State Sentinel, had "patriotically determined to dedicate his services to the Army of the Union."[5] If he could persuade the government to create a chiropody corps, with Issachar as its commander, he would not only be helping the war effort, but it would also be the opportunity for him to gain a recognition he craved apart from his reputation as a chiropodist.

Issachar knew he faced an uphill battle. A chiropody corps was completely new to the army. To make it happen, he would have to convince President Lincoln, Secretary of War Edwin Stanton, Surgeon General William Hammond, and the generals in the field of its desirability and effectiveness. Issachar was not naïve. He couldn't just walk into the offices of those leaders. He had to have letters of introduction and endorsements from influential people, people who were well known and highly respected. And Issachar knew who to approach first to give him that entrée.

Bryant was not just one of Issachar's appreciative patients who had written a glowing editorial about him, but he was also a personal acquaintance of Lincoln's. Bryant had introduced Lincoln at his February 27, 1860, speech at Cooper Union in New York, the speech that had launched his bid for the presidency. Since then, he and Lincoln had frequently written to one another, and Bryant was a frequent visitor at the Lincoln White House.[6]

On August 21, 1862, Issachar met with Bryant and told him of his idea to help the war effort by creating a chiropody corps "to inspect the feet of the men and keep them in order for marching." The "indefatigable walker" didn't need any convincing. He was more than willing to endorse Issachar's plan. He knew firsthand (in his case, first foot) how proficient Issachar was at removing corns and bunions and other foot ailments. An army was said to march on its stomach. Bryant knew that before that army sat down to eat, its feet brought it to the campfire. Bryant concurred when Issachar outlined his idea for a "Corps of Chiropodists" with himself as its "Chief." He wrote two letters of introduction on Issachar's behalf, one to Lincoln and another to Secretary of War Edwin Stanton.

Bryant's letter "To Mr. Lincoln" was brief and to the point: "The bearer of this note, Dr. I. Zacharie, a chiropodist of marvelous skill, as I have had occasion to experience, has desired I would say to you what I know of him. He is a regularly educated surgeon, whose operations on the feet are performed with a nicety and delicacy, which is truly surprising. If you or any of your family are incommoded with any disease whatever of the feet, he will be happy to give proof of his skill."[7]

Bryant's letter to Secretary Stanton introduced Issachar and urged him to consider his idea of a corps of chiropodists, headed by Dr. Zacharie, "to inspect the feet of soldiers and keep them in order for marching." "A soldier who cannot march," he said, "is a useless incumbrance." Bryant assured Stanton that Dr. Zacharie's skill in this branch "is truly astonishing."[8]

After handing Issachar those letters, Bryant also wrote a long editorial, "Chiropody in the Army," outlining the reasons the army ought to establish a chiropody corps. It was hardly a new idea in the history of war, Bryant explained. Prussia's Frederick the Great had made a chiropody corps part of his army, and in no small way, it had led to its effectiveness. A reliable source, he said, had informed him that some Rebel commanders had chiropodists on staff to keep their men in marching order (this was not true). "The remarkable rapidity of some of the manoeuvres by which they have effected so much," he speculated, "is in a degree owing to this cause."[9]

Citing Napoleon's maxim "a general whose forces are inferior in number to the enemy, should do his best to make up for the difference in numbers by being able to march swiftly," Bryant protested "men should not hobble on corns nor limp with bunions, club nails and distorted joints, nor drag themselves along on swelled feet." In a not-so-subtle word of support for Issachar in his upcoming meetings with Lincoln and Stanton, Bryant commented how "only the professional chiropodist" (meaning Issachar) was competent to treat diseases of the feet. "Performed rudely and imperfectly," he warned, possibly from experience with other chiropodists, "the operation often does more mischief than it prevents."[10]

Bryant's article caught the attention of other newspapers across the North, which assumed the proposed chiropody corps had already been approved. The Buffalo New York Commercial informed its readers, "the Government is about to introduce chiropody in the army, and to have the feet of the men regularly inspected, and, if necessary, operated upon. This practice is adopted in some of the European armies."[11]

Four days after the Post's article, the New York Herald waded in with the same headline and support. "We understand several gentlemen, medical and surgical, of the highest eminence, have united in recommending to the government the organization of a corps of chiropodists, to inspect the feet of the men and keep them in order for marching."[12] The Boston Daily Advertiser noted, "during the recent movements in Virginia many of our troops were injured in the feet by severe marching over rough roads—the shoes of many of them being of poor quality."[13]

"It has occurred to us," James Gordon Bennett, the New York Herald's influential editor/owner editorialized, "this branch of surgery might be introduced into the army with very positive utility, not only with an eye to the comfort of the soldier, but the efficiency of the service. There can be no greater hindrance to rapid marching, or to celerity of movements of every sort," he said, "than the pain, irritation and halting propensities arising from afflictions incident to the feet, and almost inseparable from army life and exposure." Also citing Frederick, the Great and Napoleon, the Herald commented, "careful attention to the condition of the feet of their soldiery was what made their armies formidable. Humane considerations, not less than the efficiency of the service recommend the introduction of this branch of surgery; and under an able and skillful head an organization of operators throughout the army might be perfected of the highest practical value and importance."[14] It was unusual praise from the normally acerbic newsman, better known for his mocking sarcasm than for genuine tribute.

Issachar could not have been more pleased. He clipped the article from the Herald, attached it to a piece of his letterhead, and sent it to Secretary Stanton.[15] He sent another copy to Surgeon General Hammond, asking Hammond to give his idea of a chiropody corps his "favourable consideration."[16]

A week later, Issachar arranged meetings with George Opdyke, New York's Republican Mayor, and General Rufus F. Andrews, head of the New York Customs Office, to ask for their endorsements. Despite his view that slavery robbed "its victims of their dearest rights, and [sunk] them almost to a level with the brute creation," Opdyke had become wealthy manufacturing cheap slave clothing for plantation owners.[17] Had Issachar known Lincoln had no love for Opdyke (Opdyke had backed Salmon Chase, Lincoln's rival for nomination as president at the Republican National Convention in Chicago), he might have thought differently about asking for his endorsement.[18]

Unlike Opdyke, Andrews was a personal friend of Lincoln's and had supported his nomination at the 1860 Republican convention. Lincoln had rewarded him by appointing him Surveyor of the Port Office. After Lincoln's death, when Mary was distributing mementoes to Lincoln's personal friends, she gave Andrews the pen Lincoln had used to sign the Emancipation Proclamation.[19]

Both men agreed to support Issachar. Writing on mayoral letterhead, Opdyke recommended Dr. Zacharie "for your favorable consideration as the Chief of a Corps of Chiropodists, which, I learn, and I hope truly, is to be organized for the benefit of the country, by keeping in good marching condition, the feet of those who go forth to fight our battles." It was "unquestionably very important," he added, "all our soldiers, should be able at all times to command the use of their feet."[20]

Andrews' letter, dated a day after Opdyke's, was more personal. Addressing Lincoln as "His Excellency Abraham Lincoln, President," Andrews took "great pleasure in introducing to you my friend Dr. Zacharie." Dr. Zacharie, he went on, was coming to Washington "on a highly patriotic mission, which he will explain to you. If you can give him a hearing & examine his testimonials, I feel you will put him in the way of doing the country a good service in providing for the comfort of the soldier."[21]

Several days later, the New York Times also editorialized about the idea of "attaching a corps of chiropodists to the army" that had recently been broached in Washington. Issachar had not left the proverbial stone unturned. The Times could only have known about the idea from Issachar. Up until then, the only broaching in Washington was Issachar privately lobbying Secretary Stanton and Surgeon General Hammond. A chiropody corps, said the Times, would be "decidedly utilitarian" by relieving soldiers of much of the fatigue and suffering imposed on them from "military locomotion." The Times urged Washington to "let the idea receive prompt and strenuous attention."[22]

* * * * * * * *

Armed with his letters of introduction and Bennett's and Bryant's "Chiropody in the Army" editorials that he had already sent to Stanton and Hammond for their "favorable consideration," Issachar left for Washington in September to personally lobby for his cause.

Wartime Washington was nothing like the Washington of Issachar's early career. The city was as squalid as ever. Most of its streets were still unpaved, and none of them was lighted except Pennsylvania Avenue. Clouds of dust covered everything. There were still no streetcars and no sewage system. Animals still roamed the sewers rooting for garbage. The air still swarmed with mosquitoes. The stench and squalor were not unlike his early years in Chatham. The main difference was Washington was under strict military rule. Mounted sentries were posted at every street corner. The city's hotels and boarding houses were full. Restaurants had long queues waiting for a table. Where Issachar managed to find a room isn't known.

Issachar's first visit was to Secretary of War Stanton. Edwin Masters Stanton, a short, stocky, full bearded man, did not suffer fools gladly. Initially, he had been no admirer of Lincoln. After the Battle of Bull Run (July 1861), he blamed the "imbecility of this administration … for the national disgrace."[23] As a private citizen, Masters' annual income had been about $50,000.[24] His sense of duty made him reluctantly agree to take over as Lincoln's Secretary of War in January 1862, at $8,000 a year, after his predecessor, Simon Cameron, was forced to resign because of corruption. Pennsylvania Congressman Thaddeus Stevens had joked there were limits to Cameron's honesty, saying he didn't think Cameron would steal a hot stove. When Cameron was told what Stevens had said about him, he demanded Stevens apologize. Stevens did. He said Cameron was not above stealing a red-hot stove.[25] Lincoln, no slouch when it came to a political jab, appreciated the wit.

Stanton was a workaholic, totally dedicated to his job. Within days of taking office, he wrote to the New York Herald's assistant editor, Charles Dana, who had supported his appointment, "as soon as I can get the machinery of the office working, the rats cleared out, and the rat holes stopped we shall move."[26] Dana, he said, was "right in supposing my acceptance of the War office means 'thoroughness, earnestness, & no compromise.'" He would "not do the Lord's work deceitfully."[27]

Stanton was at the War Office promptly at 9 o'clock and left late at night. Fifteen-hour days were not unusual. Sometimes he didn't come home until early morning on the next day. When Stanton's carriage came into sight, the doorkeeper at the War Office leaned inside and said two words: "The Secretary." Nothing more had to be said. "Stragglers and loungers scurried to their desks." As he got out of his carriage, Stanton was beset with favor-seekers on the sidewalk. Sometimes he stopped and briefly chatted with a soldier or a needy-looking woman. Others were curtly told to wait in the reception room upstairs until called upon.[28]

Issachar waited with the rest of the visitors in the corner of Stanton's office on the second floor of the War Department until it was his turn. The room was stark. There were no carpets and no furniture other than the high, long desk that Stanton customarily stood behind facing the door. When Stanton came to work, it was to work, not entertain. Stanton gave no thought to privacy. Visitors bided their time until it was their turn and stepped up to his desk. Stanton did not like long-winded appeals. Visitors were told to state their business as briefly as possible and within the hearing of everyone in the room. When they finished, they received a prompt and final answer.

When it was finally his turn, Issachar handed him the letter Bryant had written on his behalf and reminded him about the clippings he had sent him. Stanton looked up at him through his thick eyeglasses. Issachar outlined his idea of creating an army corps of chiropodists to look after the feet of battlefield soldiers. Stanton heard him out but was non-committal. He saw some merit in the idea, but before giving Issachar a yes or no, Stanton sent him to confer with the country's foremost generals. Issachar would need their approval to move freely within Union lines.

Issachar wasted no time. Possibly with an introductory note from Stanton, a day or two later, on September 5, 1862, he met with "Little Napoleon," Major General George B. McClellan, the imperious commander of the Army of the Potomac. McClellan had a few foot problems of his own and was more than happy to let Issachar take care of them when Issachar assured him it would hardly hurt at all. Clipping McClellan's corns, Issachar outlined his idea for a chiropody corps. The operation went well. Before leaving, he asked McClellan to write him a testimonial for his certificate book. McClellan saw no reason not to. Dr. Zacharie, he wrote, had relieved him of "all trouble with my feet" without the slightest pain and "I am sure that the exercise of similar skill would be productive of great benefit to our troops, and save them from much necessary pain."[29]

A day later, Issachar treated Major Generals Ambrose Burnside ("I take great pleasure in acknowledging a kind service of Dr. Zacharie, by relieving my feet from Corns … much suffering in the army would be avoided could a proper attention be given to this subject; besides, it would add to the efficiency of our soldiers"), Nathaniel Banks ("I acknowledge with infinite pleasure, the services which Dr. Zacharie has rendered … to my feet … attention to the feet of the solider is as important as other medical assistance which is furnished them"), and George Cadwallader ("Dr. Zacharie … has operated on my foot with much satisfaction … the efficiency of the army would be promoted by more attention to keeping the feet of the soldiers in good condition").[30]

Hearing about Issachar's visits to McClellan and the other generals, the Boston Advertiser jumped to the conclusion that a New York chiropodist had received authority from the War Department to cross the Potomac to Alexandria to inspect the feet of the troops. These men had just returned from continuous severe marching for two weeks over rough roads in Virginia. Because of the poor quality of their shoes, they had injured their feet and needed treatment.[31]

Other papers began building the story. The Newport (Rhode Island) Mercury told its readers, "Dr. Zacharia the Chiropodist, had been summoned to Washington to discuss the subject of Chiropody as applied to military pedestrianism," implying Stanton had been the one to ask Issachar about his proposal and not the other way around. The proposed chiropody corps, it opined, was "on a fair way to be accomplished."[32]

The New York World incorrectly reported Surgeon General Hammond fully supported the planned chiropody corps. It was obvious to Dr. Hammond, the World editorialized, one surgeon was not enough to take care of the army's foot soldiers. "If it is necessary to attend to the wounds of the soldiers after a battle, it is … even more necessary to attend to his marching capabilities anterior to the engagement. A chiropody corps of assistants specially educated to the care of the feet, in conjunction with or under the orders of Dr. Zacharie [would] be a direct benefit to the army, and will cause his name to come pleasantly into their memories when they contrast the subsequent with the anterior condition of their feet."[33]

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper reported Secretary of War Stanton had sent Dr. Zacharie to Surgeon General Hammond to discuss "military pedestrianism," and they were now meeting on a daily basis. "No fitter man could be made available than this gentleman (Dr. Zacharie), should the matter [of a chiropody corps] be seriously entertained."[34]

1. Burrows and Wallace, Gotham, 868.
2. Brooklyn Evening Star, April 18, 1861, 1. The Evening Star added a footnote to the notice: “This is what we should call, ‘Patriotism striking out a feet [sic].’”
3. Abel, Ernest L. “Maryland-born James Ryder Randall Penned One of the Civil War’s Most Stirring Songs in Honor of His State,” America’s Civil War (July 1988), 78–82.
4. Burrows and Wallace, Gotham, 869.
5. Indiana State Sentinel, May 20, 1875, 6.
6. Gilbert H. Muller, Abraham Lincoln and William Cullen Bryant: Their Civil War (Palgrave Macmillan, Cham, Switzerland: 2017), 24.
7. Bryant to Lincoln (August 21, 1862), reproduced in Heritage Auction Gallery Heritage Auction Gallery, “Dr. John K. Lattimer Collection of Lincolniana” (Dallas, TX: 2008), No. 61022. The letter is now part of the Shapell Manuscript Collection and is reproduced in Sarna and Shapell, Lincoln and the Jews (New York: Thomas Dunne Books, 2015), 130–131.
8. Bryant to Stanton (August 21, 1862). Parts of the letter are quoted in Sarna and Shapell, Lincoln, 129.
9. New York Evening Post, August 22, 1862, 2. Bryant possibly had in mind Confederate General Thomas “Stonewall” Jackson’s “foot cavalry,” renowned for the distances they covered in a day’s march. None of the Confederacy’s generals relied on a chiropodist in his command.
10. Ibid.
11. Buffalo (New York) Commercial, August 25, 1862, 2.
12. New York Herald, August 26, 1862, 4.
13. Boston Daily Advertiser, September 8, 1862, 2.
14. New York Herald, August 26, 1862, 4.
15. Zacharie to Stanton, August 26, 1862. Letters received files, August 27, 1862, Records of the War Department (RG 112), Office of the Surgeon General, National Archives and Records Administration (NARA), Box 113.
16. Zacharie to Hammond, August 27, 1862. Ibid.
17. James L. Huston, The Panic of 1857 and the Coming of the Civil War (Baton Rouge, LA: Louisiana State University Press, 1987), 91.
18. After the Convention, Opdyke had gone to Springfield in early 1861, to ask for a patronage job as collector of customs in New York. Lincoln turned him down. Opdyke went back to New York and won the mayoral election.
19. The Inland Printer, A Technical Journal Devoted to the Art of Printing 21 (April 1898–September 1898), 71.
20. Opdyke to Lincoln (August 28, 1862), Heritage Auctions Catalogue, “The John Lattimer Collection of Lincolniana, #6014, 2008.” A partial copy of the letter in Andrew’s handwriting is reproduced in Sarna and Shapell, Lincoln and the Jews, 131.
21. Andrews to Abraham Lincoln, August 29, 1862, copy in Sarna and Shapell, Lincoln and the Jews, 131.
22. New York Times, August 30, 1862, 3.
23. Alonzo Rothschild, Lincoln, Master of Men: A Study in Character (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1908), 227.
24. Stanton was a formidable defense lawyer. In 1859, Stanton got Dan Sickles off after he had murdered his adulterous wife by arguing Sickles had suffered from temporary insanity. It was the first time that defense was successfully used in the United States to exonerate someone about whose guilt there was no doubt.
25. Ernest B. Furgurson, Freedom Rising: Washington in the Civil War (New York: Vintage Books, 2004), 110.
26. Frank Abial Flower, Edwin McMasters Stanton: The Autocrat of Rebellion, Emancipation and Reconstruction (Akron, OH: Saalfield Publishing Co., 1905), 125.
27. Edwin McMasters Stanton to Charles Dana, January 24, 1862, Rosenbach Collection, www. http://civilwar.rosenbach.org/?p=3962, accessed October 24, 2017.
28. Benjamin Thomas and Harold M. Hyman, Stanton: Life and Times of Lincoln’s Secretary of War (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1962).
29. McClellan testimonial, Zacharie, Corns, 6. While there is no record of McClellan’s doing or saying anything about Jews during the war, while he was travelling back from Germany in 1875, he wrote, “We have lots of Germans and Jews on board—but fortunately there are enough Christian gentiles to make it pleasant for us [so as to] enable us to be quite independent of the sons of Jacob.” “American Civil War Union General George McClellan's Anti-Semitic Letter,” Shapell Collection, http://www.shapell.org/manuscript/anti-semetic-civil-war-union-general-george-mcclellan, accessed January 3, 2016.
30. Burnside, Cadwalader and Banks testimonials, Corns, 7.
31. Boston Daily Advertiser, September 8, 1862, 2. Ordinarily, soldiers marched an average about two miles an hour a day. In forced marches, for 20 or at least 10 miles, they averaged three miles an hour. OR Series 1, Vol. 16, pt. 1, 56.
32. Newport (Rhode Island) Mercury, September 13, 1862, 2.
33. New York World, September 19, 1862, 2.
34. Frank Leslie’s Illustrated Newspaper, September 20, 1862, 4.

11

“Dr. Zacharie has operated on my feet”

Issachar shook hands with Lincoln on September 20, 1862. The two men could not have been more different. At 53, Lincoln was more than 20 years older than Issachar and looked it. Lincoln was sinewy, rawboned, and 6 feet 4 inches in height. He had long pendulous arms that tapered to long bony hands, big even for his large frame. His size 14 feet were even proportionately larger than his hands. Issachar was about 5 feet 7 inches in height, portly, and normally proportioned for his size.

The only facial features they had in common was a relatively large nose. Both men had beards, but they were nothing alike. Lincoln’s beard was scraggly. Issachar’s mutton-chopped beard was neatly trimmed. “Fashionable whiskers” was how the New York Herald described Issachar’s facial hair.[1]

Lincoln had large floppy ears to go with his prominent nose. His eyes were deeply set; his eyebrows were bushy. He had high, prominent cheekbones. There was a large mole on the right side of his sallow, deeply furrowed face. An overly large Adam’s apple bulged from his throat. During one of his debates with Stephen Douglas years before, Douglas had accused Lincoln of being two-faced. Lincoln shot back that if he had another face, “would I be wearing this one?”[2] Issachar had a full round face, smooth skin, and the energetic look of youth. His ears weren’t overly large or small for his head. He had no moles or other distinguishing facial features, and his hair had begun to recede.[3]

They were also opposites when it came to what they wore. Lincoln dressed casually. He wasn’t slovenly, but he was careless about his clothes. Issachar was fastidious. He dressed nattily and sported a “dazzling diamond stick pin in his vest.”[4]

Entering Lincoln’s office, Issachar wasn’t impressed. The floor was covered with oil cloth. A large walnut table, laden with maps and books, occupied much of the room. There were two horsehair sofas, several wooden chairs, and a fireplace. When he came in, Lincoln was sitting at a dilapidated desk. As the tall lanky President rose from his chair and walked over to greet him, the chiropodist could not help noticing Lincoln walked with a loose, almost unsteady gait.[5]

After shaking hands and a few pleasantries, Issachar handed Lincoln the letter of introduction Bryant had written on his behalf and showed him the testimonials McClellan and the other generals had just written for him. Issachar said he had been informed Lincoln was having problems with his feet and was more than happy to relieve him of his discomfort.[6] Issachar didn’t broach his idea of a chiropody corps just yet. What better way to convince Lincoln of its potential value and his own skill than by a firsthand demonstration?

Lincoln didn’t pay much attention to his own appearance or his clothes, but he was very much mindful of his oversized feet. His bootmaker, Dr. Kahler, had a card Lincoln gave him to show John Hay, Lincoln’s secretary. “When this man comes,” the card read, “show him right in.” On one occasion, Dr. Kahler arrived in the middle of Lincoln’s cabinet meeting. After showing Hay the card, Hay led him into the room. Lincoln looked up and without pausing slipped off his boots and stepped on to a piece of paper Kahler had placed on the floor to trace the outlines of his feet. At another cabinet meeting, Lincoln told his cabinet the “state of their minds indicated they need to be measured for new shoes."[7] Lincoln's corns were so bothersome that when he wasn't walking or riding or was at the Soldier's Home, his summer retreat, he wore soft goatskin slippers.[8]

* * * * * * * *

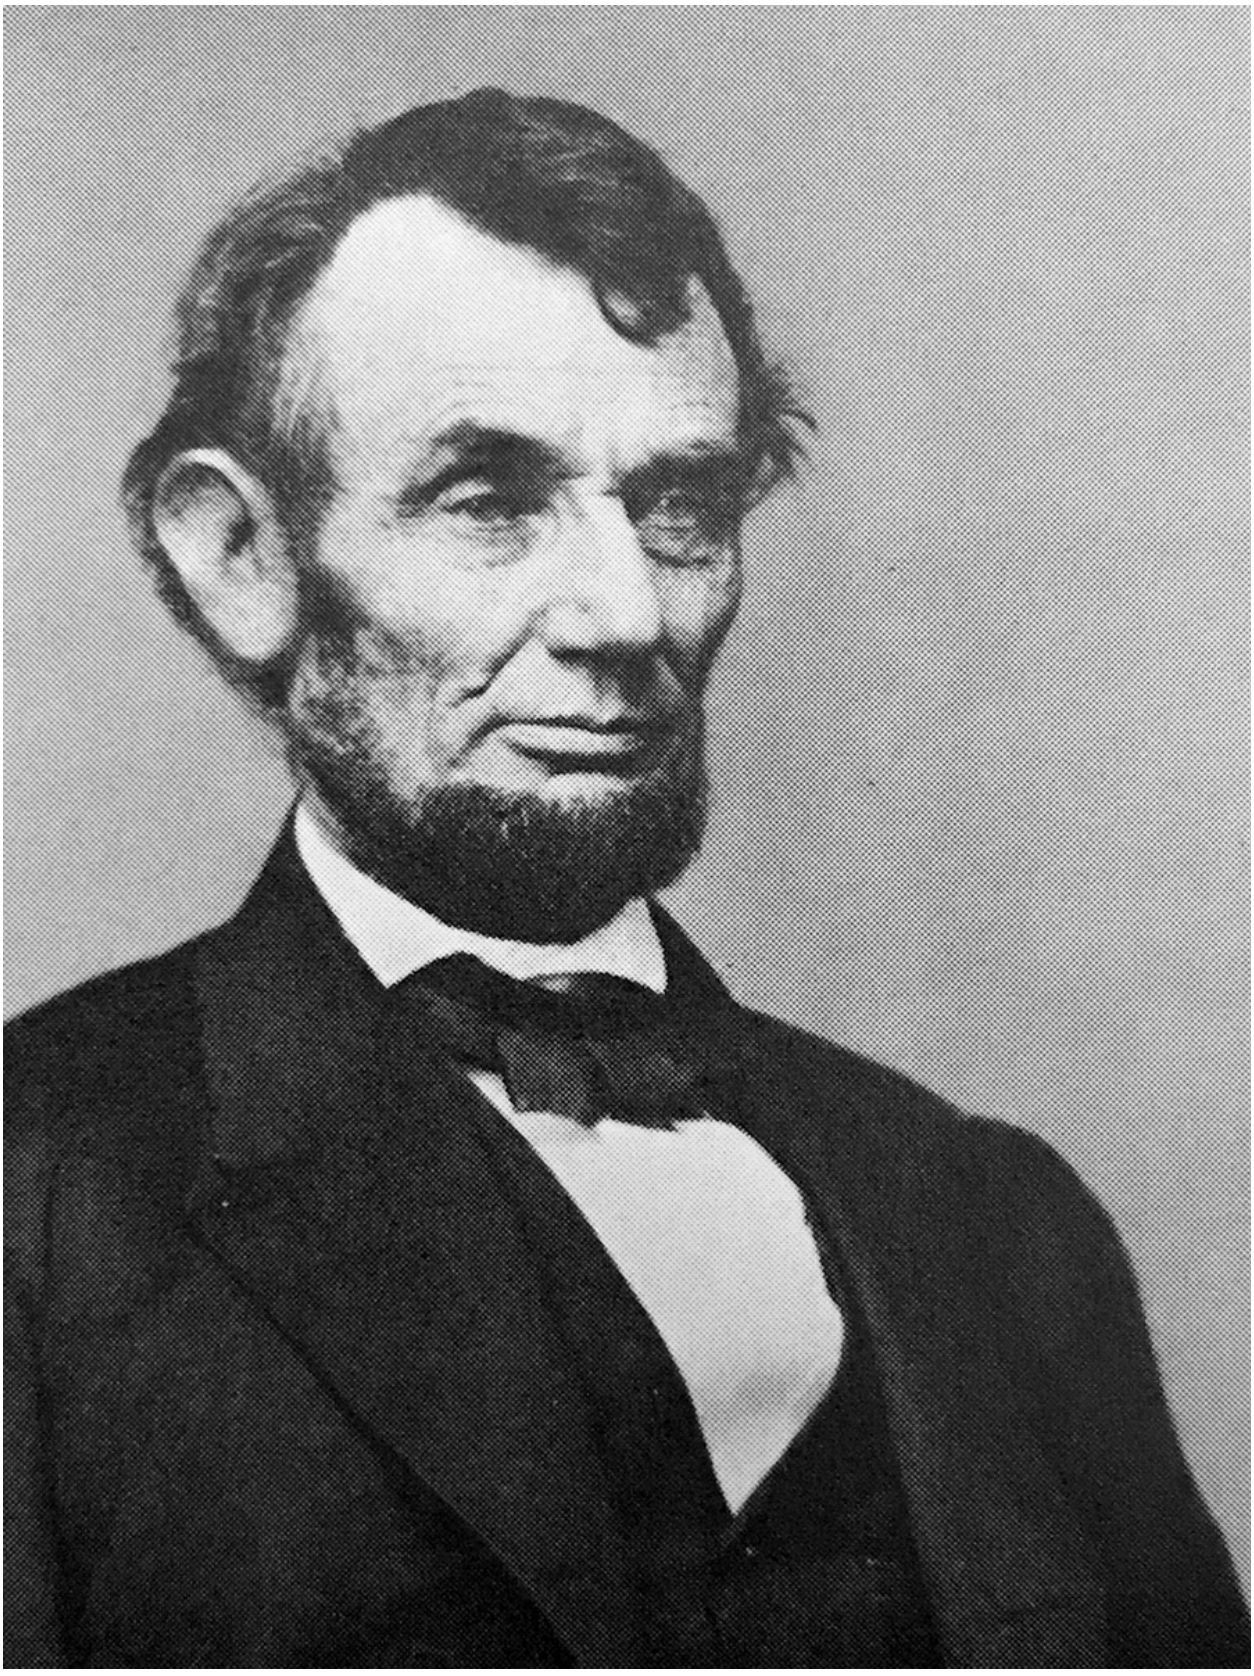
Assured by the testimonials Issachar had just handed him that he was not a charlatan, at least when treating foot problems were concerned, Lincoln sat down in his chair, removed his slippers, and stuck out a bare foot.[9] Issachar removed his jacket, seated himself in a chair opposite the president, took hold of the bony foot, and carefully examined it. Spreading Lincoln's toes apart, Issachar felt the thickened corns on the top of his toes and the bunion bump where Lincoln's big toe joined his foot. Then he opened his instrument bag, laid out his rasps and fine-grained sandpaper, dabbed Lincoln's corns with silver nitrate to harden them, and carefully scraped away the dead skin.

As Issachar packed up his equipment, he made his usual request for a testimonial. Lincoln saw no reason not to comply and wrote out a few words:

> Dr. Zacharie, has with great dexterity, taken some troublesome corns from my toes—He is now treating me, and I believe with success, for what plain people call backache. We shall see how it will end.
>
> Sep. 20, 1862 A. Lincoln[10]

It ended well. On September 22, 1862, five days after Lincoln announced his preliminary Emancipation Proclamation declaring slaves would officially be emancipated as of January 1, 1863,[11] Issachar was back at the White House treating Lincoln's back and wrist, along with his corns.[12] Before Issachar left, Lincoln wrote him another testimonial:

> Dr. Zacharie has operated on my feet with great success, and considerable addition to my comfort.
>
> Sept. 22, 1862 A. Lincoln[13]



Abraham Lincoln: "Dr. Zacharie has operated on my feet with great success, and considerable comfort." 1864 (courtesy Library of Congress).

After handing him the testimonial, Lincoln told him to come back the next day, and he would write him a letter endorsing his chiropody corps. The following day, September 23, 1863, Issachar had the promised testimonial. Lincoln had asked him to come back so Secretary of State William Seward could cosign it. Seward had no hesitation in lending his name to the proposal; Issachar had previously scraped away Seward's corns as well:

> Executive Mansion
> Washington, D.C. Sept. 23, 1862
>
> From numerous testimonials of the highest character, and from personal experience,[14] we approve the very great success of Dr. I. Zacharie in operating upon corns, bunions, and other troubles of the feet, by which instantaneous relief is afforded, and we desire the soldiers of our brave army may have the benefit of his surprising skill.
>
> Lincoln
> William H. Seward[15]

